Digitized by Google

EX LIBRIS
DR. HERBERT SILVETTE

THE OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SERENISSIMO, POTENTISSIMOQVE PRINCIPI IACOBO, BRITANNIAE MAGNAE, FRANCIAE, ET HIBERNIAE REGI, FIDEI PROPVGNATORI, AD AETERNITATEM BRITANNICI NOMINIS IMPERIIQVE NATO,

PERPETVAE PACIS FVNDATORI,

PVBLICAE SECVRITATIS AVTHORI

GVILIELMVS CAMDENVS MAIESTATI EIVS DEVOTISSIMVS D.D. CONSECRATQVE.

Digitized by Google

Thomas Camden att Clarendon house buried in Westminster Abby. Lond Ed 9 Nov: 10 — 5 state fun 94. see his epitaph in Stows survey Lond: p. 774.

Camden writ this last edition — after 1605 for the mention of the creation of the Baron Brumfield of warr Lower ward in that year — vi: pte f: 246.
Hee writ it — An° 1606 — vi: pte f: 705.

Digitized by Google

BRITAIN,

OR

A CHOROGRAPHICALL DESCRIPTION OF THE MOST flouriſhing Kingdomes, ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, and IRELAND, and the Ilands adioyning, out of the depth of ANTIQVITIE:

BEAVTIFIED WITH MAPPES OF THE ſeverall Shires of ENGLAND:

Written firſt in Latine by William Camden CLARENCEUX K. of A.

Tranſlated newly into Engliſh by Philémon Holland Doctour in Phyſick:

Finally, reviſed, amended, and enlarged with ſundry Additions by the ſaid Author.

LONDINI,
Impenſis GEORGII BISHOP & IOANNIS NORTON.
M. DC. X.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE AVTHOR TO THE Reader.

I Hope it shall be to no discredite, if I now vse againe by way of Preface, the same words with a few more, that I vsed twenty foure yeeres since in the first edition of this worke. Abraham Ortelius the worthy restorer of Ancient Geographie arriuing heere in England, about thirty foure yeares past, dealt earnestly with me that I would illustrate this Ile of Britaine, or (as he said) that I would restore antiquity to Britaine, and Britain to his antiquity; which was as I vnderstood, that I would renew Anoientries, enlighten obscuritie, cleare doubts, and recall home Veritie by way of recovery, which the negligence of writers and credulitie of the common sort had in a maner proscribed and vtterly banished from amongst vs. A painfull matter I assure you, and more than difficult; wherein what toyle is to be taken, as no man thinketh, so no man beleeueth but hee that hath made the triall. Neuertheless how much the difficultie discouraged me from it, so much the glory of my country encouraged me to vndertake it. So while at one and the same time I was fearefull to vndergoe the burden, and yet desirous to doe some service to my Country, I found two different affections Feare, and Boldnesse; I knowe not how, contained in me. Notwithstanding by the most gratious direction of the Almighty, taking Industrie for my consort, I aduentured vpon it, and with all my studie, care, cogitation, continuall meditation, paine, & trauaile I emploied my selfe thereunto when I had any spare time. I made search after the Etymologie of Britaine and the first inhabitants timerously, neither in so doubtfull a matter haue I affirmed ought confidently. For I am not ignorant that the first originalls of nations are obscure by reason of their profound antiquitie, as things which are seene very deepe and farre remote: like as the courses, the reaches, the confluents, and the out-lets of great riuers are well knowne, yet their first fountaines and heads lie commonly vnknowne. I haue succinctly runne over the Romans government in Britaine, and the inundation of forraine people thereinto, what they were, and from whence they came: I haue traced out the ancient diuisions of these Kingdomes, I haue summarily specified the states, and iudiciall Courts of the same.

In the severall Counties I haue compendiously set downe the limites (and yet not exactly by pearch and pole to breed questions) what is the nature of the soile, which were the places of greatest antiquitie, who haue beene the Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Viscounts, Barons, and some of the most signall, and ancient families therein (for who can particulate all?) What I haue performed, I leaue to men of iudgment. But time the most sound & sincere witnesse will giue the truest information, when envie which persecuteth the liuing, shall haue her mouth stopped. Thus much giue mee leaue to say, that I haue in no wise neglected such things as are most materiall to search, and sift out the Truth. I haue attained to some skill of the most ancient, British and English-Saxon tongues: I haue trauailed over all England for the most part, I haue conferred with most skillfull obseruers in each country, I haue studiously read ouer our owne countrie writers, old and new, all Greeke and Latine authors which haue once made mention of Britaine. I haue had conference with learned men in other parts of Christendome: I haue beene diligent in the Records of this Realme. I haue looked into most Libraries, Registers, and memorials of Churches, Cities, and Corporations, I haue poored vpon many an old Rowle, and Euidence: and produced their testimonie (as beyond all exception) when the cause required, in their very owne words (although barbarous they be) that the honor of veritie might in no wise be impeached.

Digitized by Google

For all this I may be censured vnadvised, and scant modest who being but of the lowest fourme in the schoole of Antiquity, where I might well have lurked in obscurity, have adventured as a scribler upon the stage in this learned age amidst the diversities of reliesshes both in wit and iudgement. But to tell the truth vnfainedly the love of my Country which compriseth all love in it, and hath endeared me unto it, the glory of the British name, the advise of some traditious frieuds hath overmastred my modesty, and (wild I, nild I,) hath enforced me against my owne iudgement to undergoe this burden to heavy for me, and so thrust me forth into the worldes view. For I see iudgements, preiudices, censures, reprehensions, obtrectations, detractions, affronts, and confronts, as it were, in battaile array to environ me on every side: some there are which wholy contemne and avile this study of Antiquity as a back-looking curiosity; whose authority as I do not utterly vilefie, so I doe not overprise or admire their iudgement. Neither am I destitute of reasons whereby I might approove this my purpose to well bread and well meaning men which tender the glory of their native Country: and moreover could give them to understand that in the studies of Antiquity, (which is alwaies accompanied with dignity, and hath a certaine resemblance with eternity) there is a sweet food of the minde well befiting such as are of honest and noble disposition. If any there be which are desirous to be strangers in their owne soile, and forrainers in their owne City, they may so continue and therin flatter themselves. For such like I have not written these lines, nor taken these paines. Some there be who may obiect the silly web of my stile, and rough hewed forme of my writing. Verily I acknowledge it, neither have I waied every word in Goldsmithes scales, as Varro commanded, neither purposed I to picke flowres out of the gardens of Eloquence. But why (should they obiect this, when as Cicero the father of Eloquence denieth that this kinde of argument can ΑΝΘΗΡΡΟΓΡΑΦΕΙΣΘΑΙ, that is, be flourished out, and as Pomponius Mela said, is incapable of all Eloquent speech.

Many happily will insult over me for that I have adventured to hunt after the originals of names by coniectures, who if they proceed on to reiect all coniectures, I feare me a great part of liberall learning and humane knowledge will be utterly out-cast into banishment. For the edge of our understanding is so blunt that we are of necessity enforced to prosecute many matters in all professions coniecturally. In Physick ΣΗΜΕΙΑ, ΤΕΚΜΗΡΙΑ, ΕΙΚΟΤΑ, which are nothing else but coniectures, have their place, and stand in good steed, likewise in Rhetorike, Civil Law, and other artes they are admitted and allowed. And whereas coniectures are certain detections of things vnknowne, and as Fabius tearmeth them, directions of reason to verity, I have alwaies thought that they were to be accounted among the skuppers wherewith Time worketh and draweth Veritie out of Democritus his deepe dungeon. But if these men may be induced to attribute ought to coniectures, I doubt not but my modesty and moderation in coniecturing may withall purchase my pardon; Plato in his Cratilus commandeth that we recall the originals of names to the barbarous tongues (for so he called all but Greek) as being most ancient. I thereupon in Etymologies and my coniectures have made recourse to the British, or Welsh tongue (so they now call it) as being the same which the primitive and most ancient inhabitants of this land used, and to the English-Saxons tongue which our Progenitours the English spake. He commandeth that the name be consonant to the nature of the thing, and the nature thereof to the name, if they be heerein dissonant, I admit them not. In things, saith he, there is ΦΩΝΗ, ΣΧΗΜΑ, ΧΡΩΜΑ: that is, but I cannot aptly expresse them, A sound, a forme, and colour, if these discover not themselves in the name I reiect the coniecture. As for obscure Etymologies, far fetched, hardly wrested, and which may be drawne diversly; I have vouchsafed them no place in this worke, finally I have beene so sparing and cautelously forecasting in my coniectures that if I be not thought ΕΥΤΟΛΜΟΣ, that is, Happily adventurous, I shall not seem ΤΟΛΜΗΡΟΣ, that is, Presumptuously audacious. And albeit I have once or twice framed two coniectures in one and the same name, yet I forget not in the meane time that Vnity is consecrated unto Verity.

There are some peradventure which apprehend it disdainfully and offensiuely that I have not remembred this or that family, whenas it was not my purpose to mention any but such as were more notable, nor all them truly (for their names would fill whole volumes) but such as happened in my way according to the methode I proposed to my selfe; And with Gods grace I may have

Digitized by Google

have a more convenient occasion to deserve well of the Nobility and Gentry. But happily they will be most offended heerin who have least deserved of their country, or overvallew themselves most, or whose Gentry may be but newly blossomed. Of whom yet I protest I would not offend any, and therfore desire and hope their noble natures will not take it offensiuely upon such causelesse apprehensions.

Others wil call me in question for that I have commended some persons now living; yet I have done it sparingly, and that out of an assurance of verity, out of the common consent and voice of such as can well iudge of worth, and from no base flattery. By these sparing commendations such as are commended may be lessoned that their deportments may be answerable, and that they preserve and daily increase the same. Succeding ages, which I respect more than the present, will render to every man his right whatsoever is now scribled in papers. In the meane time I wish them to remember, that to praise good men is but to shew a light of direction as out of a watch towre to posterity. True is that saying of Symmachus. Imitation is encouraged with the seemely praises of the good, and imitating vertue is cherished by the example of others honour. If any say that I have sought occasion to commend some one or other, I confesse it. Neither is well-meaning without leasing to be blamed among the good, and wel deserving, friends are not to be forgotten. Howsoever Virtue and Glory hath alwaies opposites, and men vsually envy the present, and reverence what is past; yet God forbid that we should be so partially iniurious as to thinke our times vnder most worthy Princes to be barrain of praiseworthy persons. As for such as maligne the praise of the good, I feare me least in their owne giltinesse they may apply the dispraise of the bad to themselues. As for my selfe I sensibly understand that which Plinie intimated to Tacitus in like case. There will be great offense, and slender thankes, for albeit in the loosenesse of the world, there is much more to be discommended than commended; yet if you commend you shal be taxed as oversparing; if you discommend you shall be censured as overlavish, although you doe the one most completly, and the other most moderatly.

Some will blame me for that I have omitted this and that towne and Castle, as though I purposed to mention any but such as were most notorious, and mentioned by ancient authours. Neither verily were it worth the labour once to name them, when as beside the naked name there is nothing memorable. Truly it was my proiect and purpose to seeke, rake out, and free from darknesse such places as Cæsar, Tacitus, Ptolemee, Antonine the Emperour, Notitia Provinciarum, & other antique writers have specified and Time hath overcast with mist & darknesse by extinguishing, altering, and corrupting their old true names. In searching and seeking after these, as I wil not a vouch uncertainties so I doe not conceale probabilities. That I have not found out every one although I have sought after them with painfull and chargeable inquiery let it be no imputation to me, as it is not to a Spadiard that worketh in Mines, who while he findeth and followeth the maine vaines, seeth not the hidden small fillets; or that I may use that which Columella did. As it is the commendation of a good Huntsman to finde game in a wide wood, so it is no imputation if he hath not caught all, and likewise to mee, Some things are to be left to the inquisitiue diligence of others, Neither, as a learned man said, he teacheth wel which teacheth all. An other age, and other men may daily finde out more. It is enough for me to have begun, and I have gained as much as I looke for, if I shall draw others into this argument, whether they undertake a new worke or amend this.

There are certaine, as I heare who take it impatiently that I have mentioned some of the most famous Monasteries and their founders. I am sory to heare it, and with their good favour will say thus much, They may take it as impatiently, and peradventure would haue vs forget that our ancestoures were, and we are of the Christian profession when as there are not extant any other more conspicuous, and certaine Monuments, of their piety, and zealous devotion toward God. Neither were there any other seed-gardens from whence Christian Religion, and good learning were propagated over this isle, howbeit in corrupt ages some weeds grew out overranckly.

Mathematicians will accuse me as though I had wholy missed the marke in the Cosmographical dimensions of Longitude, & Latitude. Yet heare me I pray you. I haue carefully conferred the Locall tables new and old, Manuscript, and printed, of Oxford and Cambridge, and King Henry the Fifth. In the Latitude they do not vary much from Ptolemee, but agree wel together, neither doe I thereupon imagine with Stadius, that the globe of the earth is removed from his centre,

Digitized by Google

centre, therefore I haue relied vpon them. But in the Longitude there is no accord, no consent at all. What should I then doe? Whenas therefore the moderne nauigatours haue obserued that there is no variation of the Compasse at the Isles of Asores, I haue thence begun with them, the account of Longitude as from the first Meridian, which yet I haue not precisely measured.

As for obscurity, fables, extrauagant digressions I trust there is no cause to sue out my pardon. There will be no obscuritie but to them which haue not sipped the first elements of Antiquity, and our histories: vpon fables I haue in no wise relied, & that I might not digresse extrauagantly. I haue had often recourse to the title of my booke (as Plinie aduiseth) and eftsoones demanded of my selfe why I tooke penne in hand. Many haue found a defect in this worke that Mappes were not adioined, which doe allure the eies by pleasant portraiture, and are the best directions in Geographicall studies, especially when the light of learning is adioined to the speechlesse delineations. Yet my ability could not compasse it, which by the meanes and cost of George Bishop, and Iohn Norton is now performed out of the labours of Christopher Saxton, and Iohn Norden most skilfull Chorographers.

But least I should runne at random in my Preface. To accomplish this worke the whole maine of my Industrie hath beene employed for many yeares with a firme setled study of the truth, and sincere antique faithfulnesse to the glory of God and my countrie. I haue done dishonour to no nation, haue descanted vpon no mans name, I haue impaired no mans reputation, I haue impeached no mans credit, no not Geffray of Monmouth whose history (which I would gladly support) is held suspected amongst the iudicious. Neither haue I assumed vpon my selfe any perswasion of knowledge, but onely that I haue beene desirous to know much. And so I right willingly acknowledge that I may erre much, neither will I sooth and smoth my errours. Who shooting all day long doth alwaies hit the marke? Many matters in these studies are raked vnder deceitfull ashes. There may be some escapes from memorie, for who doth so comprehend particularities, in the treasury of his memory, that he can vtter them at his pleasure? There may be mistakings in regard of my vnskilfulnesse, for who is so skilfull that strugling with Time in the foggie darke sea of Antiquity, may not run vpon rockes? It may be that I haue been mislead by the credit of authors and others whom I tooke to be most true, and worthy of credit. Neither is there verily (as Pliny saith) any easier slipping from truth, then when a grave Authour warranteth an vntruth. Others may be more skilfull and more exactly obserue the particularities of the places where they are conuersant, If they, or any other whosoeuer, will aduertise me wherein I am mistaken, I will amend it with manifold thankes, if I haue vnwitting omitted ought, I will supply it, if I haue not fully explicated any point, vpon their better information I will more cleere it, if it proceed from good meaning, and not from a spirit of contradiction and quareling, which doe not befit such as are well bred, and affect the truth. Meane while let your kinde courtesie, my industry, the common loue of our common mother our natiue Country, the ancient honour of the British name obtaine so much vpon their entreaty, that I may vtter my iudgment without preiudice to others, that I may proceed in that course that others haue formerly done in the like argument, and that you would pardon my errours vpon my acknowledgement, which may be as well hoped as requested, from good indiffrent and reasonable men; so I passe not for the vnreasonable, and worser sort which gnaw vpon all at tables, carpe in conventicles, enuy, back-bite, sclaunder, and detract. For I haue learned of the Comicall Poet, that sclaunder is the treasure of fooles which they carry in their tongues, & I know for certainty that Envy is seated (I will say it although Envy stood at my elbow) in none but in degenerous, vnnoble, and base mindes. The honest good and noble natures as they detest envy, so they cannot envy. As for my selfe, and this worke, I doe most humbly submit it to the censure of the godly honest and learned with all respectiue reverence of whom if it be not approoved, I hope in regard of my professed loue to our native Country, that it may be excused. Farwell.

Terentianus Maurus:

Bookes receiue their doome according to the Readers capacity.

pro captu Lectoris habent sua fata libelli.

Digitized by Google

Ad Lectorem.

MAgna per immensum celebrata Britannia mundum
Imperio, populo, rege beata suo,
Nunc prodit, renouata nouis, ornata figuris:
Auctior illa tibi, notior illa tibi.
Camdeni liber est, satis est dixisse, scienti:
Camdenum nescis? perlege, notus erit.

GVILIELMVS SYDLEIVS Eques auratus.

Ad amicum suum Guil. Camdenum Georgij Buc Equitis aurati Reg. Sp. C. Heptastichon.

SI quàm describis terram Camdene Britannam,
Tam graphice, tanta curâ, grauitate, fideq;
Herôum velles Britonum res scribere gestas,
(Hac etenim sola neglecti in parte iacemus)
Historiæ poterat conferri nulla Britannæ.
Hoc tibi restat opus, vel non hoc fiet in æuo,
Secula quòd binos phœnices nulla tulere.

Ad Guil. Camdenum, Edw. Grant Sacræ Theologiæ Doctor.

ERgóne priscorum lustras monumenta virorum,
Vt possis facili contexere singula filo,
Quæ latuere diu cæcis immersa tenebris,
Antiquata vsu, priscum sumptura nitorem?
Vnde Britannorum nomen? quo cœperit ortu?
Incola quis primus celebres habitauerit oras?
In quauis regione doces, quæcunque vetustæ
Sunt vrbes, quæ vera simul Comitúmq; Ducúmq;
Stemmata: quæ terræ dotes: quis limes agrorum,
Ordine perspicuo perstringis singula plenè.
Egregium moliris opus, vel iudice Momo,
Quod semper præsens, quod postera prædicet ætas;
Te patriæ stimulauit amor, te docta vetustas
Excitat, vt cunctis patriæ spatiêris in agris:
Multi multa canunt, tu multum scribere tentas,
Hoc multo multos superas, qui multa tulerunt.
Tu Camdenus eris seros celebrandus in annos:
Ergo age, quo tendis gressu, patriámq; vemsta,
Ne labor iste tuus desit cupientibus ista.

In antiquam Guilielmi Camdeni Britanniam.

DE te deque tuo libro dum scribere carmen
Mens congesta velit, meritasq; intexere laudes, Insonuit mea Musa mihi, quid carmina quæris?
Sit scripsisse satis, quod scripsit Horatius olim:
Hic meret æra liber Sosijs, hic & mare transit,
Et longum noto scriptori prorogat æuum.

I. W. Gen.

In

In postremam Guilielmi Camdeni Antiquitatum editionem, Epigramma.

G. Ga.

SEmentem sterili quoties tellure recondit,
Luditur optatâ fruge colonus iners.
Ventifugæ nunquam dominus ditescit arenæ;
Pinguis at irriguo flumine terra beat.
Fœcundum facunde solum Camdene secasti,
Illud & ingenij nobile flumen aquat.
Atq; vt opima solet iacto cum semine gleba
Parturit innumeris granula adaucta modis:
Sic toties cusus tibi qui fuit antè libellus,
Cultior antiquo prodijt eccè liber.
Heu nusquam tanto respondent arua colono,
Cuius ab ingenio prominet his genius?
Sume animum. Cùm te hinc discedere iusserit
Vt quæras tritâ pascua læta viâ;
Ætas
Semper Camdenus simul & Britannia viuent:
Longæuus nequit hic, dum manet illa, mori.

In Guilielmi Camdeni Britanniam.

NEscia penè sui, generisq; oblita prioris,
Anglia cùm iacuit semisepulta situ,
O quis, ait, tantum aut animis, aut arte valebit,
Vindice qui tractet vulnera nostra manu?
Camdenus patriæ lugentis imagine motus
Ingenium, artem, animos versat: opemq; tulit:
Mortua restituit veteris cognomina gentis,
Mortis & eripuit se patriamq; metu,
Æternùm per te, Camdene, Britannia viuit,
Cumq; tua æternùm, tu quoque gente manes.

G. Carleton.

Ad eundem.

QVæ vix nota sibi fuit antè Britannia, vtriq;
Nunc Camdene, orbi munere nota tuo est,
Ignotæq; velut fuerat non vlla cupido,
Sic modò sic notam mundus vterque cupit.
Sed tamen incassum: nimia nam dote superba
Indignum nullum non sui amoris habet.

Ianus Gruterus I. C.

Camdeno suo Britannia.

CLarus vt Eoas sol quando aduerberat æthes
Et procul inuisis ferit astra liuentia flammis
Nox petit Oceanum, vultuq; enascitur orbi;
Sic Camdêne tuum inbar vt fulget e per Anglos
Seu Phœbi cœpit, nox fugit, & hispida dudum, Multumq; heu squallens radiare Britannia cœpi,
Non mea nunc Thetis cùm deserit alba profundum
Gratior exurgit, pallentes murice viuo
Instaurata genas, pigro nec sydus ab Orco,
Nec dux astrorum de vertice vesper Olympi,
Illa ego quàm limâ repolita Britannia mirâ
Mi Camdêne tuâ, noua nunc magno Insula ponto:
Frontispicij explicatio.
„ Illa ego rupe super scuto horrida, & horrida gaso,
„ Hinc pelagi numen, dea spicea visitur illinc,
„ Piscosus valle Nereus, & classibus armat,
„ Atq; Ceres flauos spargit suaserta per agros,
„ Saxea deinde strues, & quæ depicta tabellis
„ Fronte libri, veluti seruens a sentibus vrna,
„ Et surgens pyramis, nostræ miracula mortis
„ Tellaris, later ipse negat (fas) cuncta vetster:
Exero nunc vultus exhaustos ante ruinis,
Et nunc flore meo marcentes pello vietos,
Verùm erit illa dies cùm quæ micat Anglia forsan
Nebula quæretur, cinere occultata, situque, Atque alios lychnos dabit: Id Camdène negato
Historicum vincendo Chaos, qui nuris abunde:
Hæc tibi prisca, redux, tuaq; vrbi, Britannia canto.

Edmundus Bolton.

In Britanniam denuò illustratam

Ioh. Stradlingius.

INsula in Oceano quondam notissima, cæcis
Delituit tenebris vix benè nota sibi.
Ingenij (Camdene) tui radiante tenebras
Lumine (seu fugiunt nubila sole) fugas.
Sic rediuiua viget, nec quà patet illa latere
Tu potes: Illam tu, te celebrem illa facit.

Εἰς Βρεταννικὴν ἀρχαιολογίαν Ιλίφιλου Καμδήνου, Ἐξαίστιχον Β. Δωδ. γκλώνου.

Πρῦμνῆς, φιλαλήθης, πλυμαδής τε παρελθών,
Καμδήνου πάτρην φωσφόρου ἐξεφάνη.
Πύχνα κ' ἀμφίδυσιν λαικάλεν ἐστα πεδαυτῶν,
Τηλυγέτῳ μῦθον χρέα τοῦ Βρεταίν.
Χαῖρε γεραιὰ ὃς εἶ· αἰνιδύνην ἀπέδιξας,
Κοινωνὸς πημῆς ἔντεα δυσάπτες.

Εἰς τὴν Βρεταννίαν Ιλίφιλου τοῦ Καμδήνου.

Θεῖε Σόλων, ὡς καλὰ δίδαξας λαὸν Ἀθηναῖς,
Ἀντιπελαργῆσαι πατρίδι, ἢ ἧ φίλοις:
Πειθόμενοι δ' ὁσιοῖσι τοῖς ὀρθρίσεια ταῦτα
Ἠγαγε Καυδήνην πατρίδ' ἀγλαΐα φίλη.
Εἰπὲ Σόλων, ὄφελεν πλείων ὀφείλειν πατρίδι χαίη, Ἢ ἄρα Καυδήνῃ πλείον ὤφελε πίστις.

H. Cuffinus.

Ad Guilielmum Camdenum, Britanniam Historica veritate denuo illustrantem.

CAMDENE, laus est inuidenda, præclarum
Audire ciuem, patriæ que seruire.
Autoritati, & gloriæ perennanti.
CAMDENE, dum decus Britanniæ campum
In æuiternæ prouehis sagax Famæ,
Nitore regio stiloque præclaro:
Præclarus inde ciuis audis, & iure.
Quid? non decore modò Britanniam mactus,
Honore mactus ipse & gloriæ punctis:
Sed hunc & illum luce tua reples mundum:
Vt, quæ sibi vix nota erat priùs terra,
Vtramque nunc domum pulsauerit Solis.
CAMDENE, laudis hoc tuæ est. Et extensum Quò latiùs volat Britanniæ nomen:

CAM-

Digitized by Google

CAMDENE, augustior tantò tibi sacro
Adorea in Memoriæ exstabit altari.
Tam nominis cati est litasse regnorum
Famæ, inclytasque protulisso virtutes.

Caspar Dornauius. D.

In Britanniam rediuiuam Ri. Parker Caio-Gonuil. carmen congratulatorium.

SAlue, grata redis (memorandæ Britannia) terris
Quam iuuat e tenebris exiliisse tuis.
Fallor? an antiquo mutatus sistor in orbe?
Ant te dum relego, secla priora lego?
Fallor? an Arthuros, Egbertos, Cassibelinos
Cerno rediuiuos ducere castra sua?
Fallor? an hîc acies sæuæ certare solebant?
Hîc Offa, hîc rigidus tendere Penda solet?
Festino nimium. Quæ qualia, quantaq; cerno Surgere sacra Deo, mœnia, templa, domus?
Queis hic Normannis donari prædia legi?
Vnde sequens soboles nomen & omen habet.
Sed quot cerno domus orbatas stirpe vetusta?
Heu quas dilapidant alea, vina, Venus?
Vt vidi, vt dolui, novus vt nunc sedibus hospes
Diceret: hæc mea sunt, ito colone vetus.
Quis Genius talem (veneranda Britannia) nobis
Esse velit reducem? quo duce tanta refers?
Scilicet hoc debes Camdeno: agnosco parentem,
Et Genium, cuius te tibi reddit amor.
Fœlix ipse suo libro: fœlicior ipsa
Præconem talem laudis haberet tuæ.
Plus loquar, an fleam? video tantum instar in ipso.
Quas Musas vocitem? sed (mea Musa) sile.
Parcus amor loquitur: maior stupefactus adegit
Mirari hoc tacitè, nec scio solus, opus.

In Britanniam à Guil. Camdeno illustratam F. Aderb. Carmen.

PIctus atrox Hebridas, glacialẽ Scotus Hibernẽ
Mouerat, Attacotus Vararim, Saxoq;, Visur-Coniunctis armis, animisq; excindere gentes, (gim
Subruere eximias cumulatis cladibus vrbes,
Atque Britannorum nomen demergere bellis.
Vt tamen emergant quæ sunt immersa ruinis,
Et decus antiquum rediuiua Britannia cernat;
Ecce vetustatem Camdenius eruit omnem,
Magnarum rerum scrutatus magna sepulchra,
Submonit cineres, nigrantes dispulit vmbras:
Inque prius retrò studijs se contulit æuum;
Contulit atque decus patriæque, sibique labore.

In antiquam Camdeni Britanniam H. N. L. χρηϊάσμα.

PRisca Britannorum deleuit nomina Tempus
Antiquas vrbes exitióque dedit.
Cuncta triumphato Camdenus tempore reddit,
Ingenio priscum restituitque decus.
Ingenio cedat Tempus, cedatque vetustas:
Ingenium maius Tempore robur habet.

Ad eundem.

ERrabat quærens Antiqua Britannia lumen,
At, Camdene, tuam venit vt illa domum:
Inuenit lumen, mansit, cupiensque poliri;
Hospes ait mihi sis, qui mihi lumen eris.

I. W.

Digitized by Google

BRITANNIA

SI iactare licet màgnorum munera diuûm,
Sibique veris fas placere dotibus ;
Cur mihi non videar fortunatiſsima tellus ?
Digna eſt malis, bona quæ parùm nouit ſua.
Vltima lanigeris animoſa eſt India lucis,
Suis ſuperbus eſt Arabs odoribus.
Thuriferis gaudet Panchaia diues arenis ;
Ibera flumen terra iactat aureum.
Ægypto faciunt animos ſeptem oſtia Nili,
Laudata Rheni vina tollunt accolas.
Læta nec veribus ſibi diſplicet Africa glebis ;
Hæc portubus ſuperbit, illa mercibus :
At mihi nec fontes, nec ditia flumina deſunt,
Sulciue pingues, prata nec ridentia.
Fœta viris, fœcunda feris, fœcunda metallis ;
Ne glorier, quòd ambiens largas opes
Porrigit Oceanus, neu quòd nec amicius vllâ, Cœlum, nec aura dulcius ſpirat plagâ.
Serus in occiduas mihi Phœbus conditur vndas,
Sororque noctes blanda ducit lucidas.
Poſſem ego laudati contemnere vellera Bætis.
Vbi villus albis mollior bidentibus ?
Et tua non nequeam miracula temnere Memphi.
Verùm illa maior, iuſtiorque gloria,
Quòd Latijs, quòd ſum celebrata BRITANNIA Grajis,
Orbem vetuſtas quòd vocârit alterum.

Digitized by Google

For the easier reading of the English-Saxon words in this Booke, I thought good to prefixe heere the Characters of the English-Saxon Alphabet.

A	a	r	ꝑ	ꝓ	r
b	b	ſ	ꝺ	ꝺ	ſ
c	c	t	ꝛ	ꝛ	t d	d	u	ꝟ	ꝟ	u
e	E	x	ꝑ	ꝑ	x
f	e	y	x	x	x
g	f	ſ	ẏ	ẏ	ȝ
h	g	æ	ſe	ſe	Æ
i	h	th	æ	æ	æ
l	i	th	Ð	Ð	Th
m	l	and	ð	ð	th
n	m	that	þ	þ	th
o	n		ꝥ	ꝥ	and p	o				that q	p
	q

PVBLIVS OVIDIVS NASO.

Nescio qua natale solum dulcedine cunctos
Ducit, & immemores non sinit esse sui.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

BRITAINE.

BRITAINE or BRITANNIE, which also is ALBION, named in Greeke ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΚΗ, ΠΡΕΤΑΝΙΣ, ΑΛΒΙΩΝ, ΑΛΟΤΙΩΝ, the most famous Iland, without comparison, of the whole world, severed from the continent of Europe, by the interflowing of the Ocean, lieth against Germanie and France triangle-wise; by reason of three Promontories shooting out into divers parts: to wit, BELERIUM, .i. the Cape of S. Burien in Cornwall, Westward; CANTIUM, .i. the Fore-land of Kent, into the East; and TARVISIUM or ORCAS, .i. the point of Catnesse in Scotland, Northward. On the West side, whereas Ireland is seated, VERGIVIUS, .i. the Western Ocean, breaketh in; From the North, it hath the most vast and wide Hyperborean sea beating upon it; On the East, where it coasteth upon Germanie, enforced sore it is with the Germane sea; and Southward, as it lieth opposite to France, with the British. Disjoined from those neighbour-countries all about by a convenient distance euery way, fitted with commodious and open havens, for traffique with the universall world, and to the generall good, as it were, of mankind, thrusting it selfe forward with great desire from all parts into the sea. For between the said Fore-land of Kent and Calais in France it so advanceth it selfe, and the sea, is so streited, that some thinke the land there was pierced thorow, and received the seas into it, which before-time had been excluded: For the maintenance of which their conceit, they allege both Virgil in that verse of his, See in KENT.

Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos:

And Britans people quite disjoin'd from all the world besides.

Because Britaine, saith Servius Honoratus, was in times past ioyned to the maine. And also Claudian, who in imitation of him wrote thus:

——Nostra deducta Britannia mundo.

Britaine, a land, which severed is from this our [Romane] world.

Certes, that the outward face and fashion of this globe of Earth hath been with the inundation of Noahs flood, as also by other causes altered; that some mountaines thereby increased in heigth, many places, higher than others, setled low, and became even plaines and valleys; that waterie washes were dried vp, and drie grounds turned to be standing waters; yea, and that certein Ilands have been violently broken off from the firme land, carieth some likelihood of truth. But whether the same be true indeed, or whether there were any Ilands at all before the Deluge, it is not my purpose here to argue; neither take I pleasure, without good advisement, of Gods works to give my doome. That the providence of God hath ordeined divers things to one and the same end, who knoweth not? and verily, that parcels of the earth dispersed here and there within the sea, serve no lesse to adorne the world, than lakes spred upon the earth and hilles raised aloft, aswell Diuines as Philosophers have alwaies held.

Livius and Fabius Rusticus have likened the forme hereof unto a *long dish or *two edged ax, and so is it shapen indeed toward the South, as saith Tacitus, whereupon the fame went of the whole. But Northward, that huge and enorme tract of ground running beyond unto the furthermoſt point, groweth narrow and ſharpe like a wedge. So large, and of ſuch exceeding greatneſſe in circuit, they in olde time tooke it to be, that Cæſar, he who firſt of all the Romans diſcovered it, wrote, How he had found out another world; ſuppoſing the ſame ſo great, as that it ſeemed to conteine within it the Ocean, and not to be compaſſed about therewith: and Iulius Solinus Polyhiſtor hath left in writing, that for the largeneſſe thereof it deſerueth well neere the name of a ſecond world. Howbeit, this age of ours hath now at length by many and ſundry voyages, found out in ſome ſort the true dimenſion and juſt compaſſe of the whole Iſle. For, from the point Tarviſium unto the cape Belerium, the reaches and crooked turnings of the ſea-banks along the Weſt conſidered, there are reckoned much about DCCCXII miles: from thence, keeping the ſea ſide, as it bendeth Southward untill you come to the Fore-land of Kent, CCCXX miles: whence coaſting by the Germane ſea, with crooked creeks and inlets for DCCIIII miles, it reacheth to the foreſaid point Tarviſium: ſo that by this reckoning the whole Iland taketh in compaſſe MDCCCXXXVI miles. Which meaſure as it commeth farre ſhort of Plinies, ſo is it alſo ſomewhat leſſe than Cæſars. As for Schitinius Chius, I haue no reaſon once to name him, who hauing in Apollonius among other wonders tolde us ſtrange tales of fruits growing in Britaine without kernels, and of grapes without ſtone and ſeed, hath bounded it within the precinct of CCCC ſtadia and no more. Much better yet hath Dionyſius Afer in his Deſcription of the world, reported of the Britiſh Ilands that is to ſay, Britaine and Ireland in this wiſe,

*Scutulatæ longæ.

*Bipenni. See the Annotations of S. Hen. Savile, knight, upon this place in Tacitus.

The Panegyricke Oration pronounced unto Conſtantius, and untruly entituled unto Maximian.

Τάων τε μέγεθός τε ἀπείριτον· εἰδέ τις ἄλλη
Νήσοις ἐν πόντῳ Βρεττανίην ἐπιφαύσκει.

Now, for their greatneſſe verily, exceeding large they are;
And ſeeke through Ilands all, with Britiſh none may compare.

And together with him, Ariſtides and other Greeke writers accord, who by way of excellencie, have truly called Britaine for the greatneſſe thereof Μεγάλην νῆσον, that is, The great Iland.

Now, they that have more curiouſly compared the ſpaces of heaven above, together with the tracts of earth beneath, place Britaine under the 8. Climate, & include it within the 18. and 26 Parallel. They thinke alſo the longeſt day there, to be 18. Æquinoctiall houres and an halfe. But the Cape of Cornwall, reſpecting the convexitie of the earth, they deſcribe to be ſituate 16 degrees & 50 ſcruples from the furtheſt point Weſt: the longitude likewiſe of the Fore-land in Kent, to be 21. degrees; as for the latitude, in the ſouthcoaſt they meaſure it by 50 degrees, and that of Catneſſe Northward, by 59 & 40 ſcruples over. So that, according to this ſite, Britaine is ſeated aſwell for aire as ſoile, in a right fruitfull and moſt milde place. The aire ſo kinde and temperate, that not only the Summers be not exceſſive hote, by reaſon of continuall gentle windes that abate their heat (which as they refreſh the fruits of the earth, ſo they yeeld a moſt holſome and pleaſing contentment both to man and beaſt) but the Winters alſo are paſſing milde: For, the raine falling often with ſtill ſhowers, (to ſay nothing of the aire it ſelfe ſomewhat thicke and groſſe) diſſolveth the rigour of the cold ſo; and withall the ſea which compaſſeth it, with moderate warmth doth comfort the land in ſuch wiſe, as that the cold with us is much more remiſſe than in ſome parts of France and Italie. Whereupon it is, that Minutius Fœlix, proving that God by his providence hath a ſpeciall regard of the ſeverall parts of the world as well as of the whole, ſaith, That Britaine though it want otherwhiles the aſpect of the Sunne, yet refreſhed it is with the warmth of the ſea flowing round about it. Neither need you to marvell at his ſpeech, concerning the warmth of the ſea. The ſeas, quoth Cicero, ſtirred to and fro with the winds, do ſo wax warme, that a man may eaſily perceive, within that world of Waters there is incloſed a certein heat. To the temperateneſſe alſo of this Iland Ceſcenius Getulicus a very ancient Poet ſeemeth to have reſpect, when he verſified thus of Britaine;

De natura Deorum, lib. 2.

Non illic Aries verno ſerit æra cornu,
Quos ſtant nec Gemini præcedunt cornua Tauri,
Sicca Lycaonius reſupinat plauſtra Boötes.

Probus in Virgilij Georgic.

The * RAM unkindly ſmites not there, in Spring, the aire with horn, Nor * TVVINS, the horned * BULL of Crete, untimely go beforn,
Where DRIVER, hight Arctophylax, doth his drie waine up-turn.

* Aries.
* Gemini.
* Taurus.
* Bootes, otherwiſe called Arctophylax.

Cæſar likewiſe writeth thus; The places in Britaine be more temperate (by reaſon that the weather is not ſo colde) than in France. Semblably Cornelius Tacitus; No extremitie there is of colde: and he addeth moreover, and ſaith, *The ſoile, ſetting aſide the Olive, the Vine, and the reſt, which are * proper to warmer countries, taketh all kinde of graine, and beareth it in abundance: it ripeneth ſlowly, but commeth up quickly: the cauſe of both, is one and the ſame, to wit, the over-much moiſture of ground and aire. For the aire*, as Strabo writeth, is ſubject rather to ſhowres of raine, than to ſnow. Howbeit, the ground enriched ſo with all ſorts of corne, that Orpheus hath reported it to be the very ſeat of Ladie Ceres: for, that which we read in his Poëme thus,

* Uſually grow in hotter countries.

——— ἰδ' εὐρέα δῶματ' ἀνάσσης
Δήμητρος, ———
——— Lo, heere, the ſtately hauls
Of Ceres Queen. ———

is meant of this our Iland: yea, and it hath been the very barne, garner, and ſtore-houſe for victuals of the Weſt empire; from whence the Romans were wont yeerely to tranſport into Germanie, with a fleet of 800 veſſels bigger than barges, great ſtore of corne, for the maintenance of their armies, which there defended the Frontiers. But leſt I ſhould ſeeme to exceed over-much in the praiſe of my native countrie, heare in ſtead of me, that ancient Oratour, who with open mouth reſoundeth out the commendations thereof, in this maner: O happie Britaine, and more fortunate than all other lands beſide, which firſt ſaweſt Conſtantine Emperour! for good cauſe hath nature endowed thee with all the bleſſed gifts of aire and ſoile; wherein there is neither exceſſive colde of Winter, nor extreme heat of Summer; wherein there is ſo great plentie of graine, that it ſerveth ſufficiently both for bread and drinke: wherein the forreſts are without ſavage beaſts, and the ground void of noiſome ſerpents. Contrariwiſe, an infinite multitude there is of tame cattell with udders ſtrutting-full of milke, and loaden with fleeces: and verily, (that which for the uſe of our life we much eſteeme) the dayes there are very long, and the nights neuer without ſome light; whiles thoſe utmoſt plaines by the ſea ſide caſt and raiſe no ſhadowes on high, and the aſpect both of skie and ſtarres paſſeth beyond the bound of the night, yea the very Sunne it ſelfe, which unto us ſeemeth for to ſet, appeareth there, only to paſſe along and go aſide.

Zoſimus. Εὐπαρίαν τῆς τροφῆς.

Panegyric. to Conſtantius.

Hearken alſo, if it pleaſe you, to another Oratour ſpeaking unto Conſtantius the father of Conſtantine the Great in this wiſe: And, I aſſure you, no ſmall dammage was it to the Common-weale, as to loſe the bare name only of BRITAINE, ſo to forgoe a land ſo plentifull in corne, ſo rich in paſturage, ſo full of mines and veines of mettall, ſo gainfull in tributes and revenewes, ſo accommodated with many havens, and for circuit, ſo large and ſpacious.

Panegyric. to Conſtantius.

Moreover, the ſingular love and motherly affection of Nature to this Iland, a Poet of good antiquitie hath by way of a ſpeech made unto Britaine lively expreſſed thus, in this Epigram, which ſome have judged not unworthy to be divulged.

Tu nimio nec ſtricta gelu, nec ſydere fervens,
Clementi cælo temperiéque places.
Cùm pareret Natura parens, varióque favore
Divideret dotes omnibus una locis,
Sepoſuit potiora tibi, matrémque profeſſa,
Inſula ſis fœlix, plenáque pacis, ait.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid deſiderat uſus,
Ex te proveniet, vel aliunde tibi.

For aire, ſo milde and temperate right pleaſing is thy ſeat;
Where reigneth neither chilling colde, nor yet exceſſive heat.
What time Dame Nature brought things forth, and of her only grace, Beſtow'd her fauours manifolde and gifts on every place;

Digitized by Google

Like mother kinde, the better part aside for thee she laid;
Oh, happie Iland maist thou be and full of peace, she said:
What ever vaine excesse affects, what may mans need content,
Shall come from thee, or els to thee, from other lands be sent.

Fortunate Ilands.

In his Commentaries upon Lycophron.

1344.

This plentifull abundance, these goodly pleasures of Britain, have perswaded some, that those fortunate Ilands, wherein all things, as Poets write, doe still flourish as in a perpetuall Spring tide, were sometime heere with vs. For, this, doth one Isacius Tzetzes a Greeke Author of no small credit, affirme, and our ancestours seeme to have beleeved the same as a certaine truth. For, what time as Pope Clement the sixth, as we read in Robert of Avesburie, had elected Lewis of Spaine, to be the Prince of those fortunate Ilands, and for to aid and assist him, mustered souldiers in France and Italie; our countreymen were verily perswaded, That he was chosen Prince of Britaine, and that all the said preparation was for Britaine, as one, saith he, of the fortunate Ilands. Yea and even those most prudent personages themselues, our Ligier Embassadours there, with the Pope, were so deeply setled in this opinion, that forthwith they withdrew themselves from Rome, and hastned with all speed into England, there to certifie their countreymen and friends of the matter. Neither will any man now judge otherwise, who thorowly knoweth the blessed estate and happie wealth of Britaine. For Nature tooke a pleasure in the framing thereof, and seemeth to have made it as a second world, sequestred from the other, to delight mankinde withall, yea and curiously depainted it of purpose as it were a certaine portraict, to represent a singular beautie, and for the ornament of the universall world: with so gallant and glittering varietie, with so pleasant a shew are the beholders eyes delighted, which way so ever they glance. To say nothing of the Inhabitants, whose bodies are of an excellent good constitution, their demeanour right courteous, their natures as gentle, and their courage most hardie and valiant, whose manhood by exploits atchieved both at home and abroad, is famously renowmed thorow the whole world.

The first Inhabitants: & reason of the Name.

But who were the most ancient and the very first Inhabitants of this Ile, as also, from whence this word Britaine had the originall derivation, sundry opinions one after another have risen; and many we have seene, who being uncerteine in this point, have seemed to put downe the certaine resolution thereof. Neither can we hope to atteine unto any certeintie heerein, more than all other nations, which (setting those aside that have their originall avouched unto them out of holy Scripture) as well as wee, touching their point, abide in great darkenesse, errour and ignorance. And how, to speake truly, can it otherwise be? considering that the trueth, after so many revolutions of ages and times, could not chuse but be deeply hidden. For the first inhabitours of countreys had other cares and thoughts to busie and trouble their heads, than to deliver their beginnings unto posteritie. And say, they had been most willing so to do, yet possibly could they not, seeing their life was so uncivill, so rude, so full of warres, and therefore void of all literature; which keeping companie with a civill life, by peace and repose, is only able to preserve the memorie of things, and to make over the same to the succeeding ages. Moreover the Druidæ, who being in olde time the Priests of the Britans and Gaules, were supposed to have knowen all that was past; and the Bardi, that used to resound in song all valorous and noble acts, thought it not lawfull to write and booke any thing. But admit they had recorded ought; in so long continuance of time, in so many and so great turnings and overturnings of States, doubtlesse the same had been utterly lost, seeing that the very stones, pyramides, obelisks, and other memorable monuments, thought to be more durable than brasse, have yeelded long agoe to the iniquitie of time. Howbeit, in the ages soone after following, there wanted not such as desired gladly to supplie these defects; and when they could not declare the trueth indeed, yet at least way for delectation, they laboured to bring foorth narrations, devised of purpose, with a certeine pleasant varietie to give contentment, and delivered their severall opinions, ech one after his owne conceit and capacitie, touching the originall of Nations and their names. Unto which, as, there were many, who neglecting further search into the trueth, quickly yeelded connivence; niuence; ſo, the moſt ſort delighted with the ſweetneſſe of the Deuiſer; as readily gaue credence.

Digitized by Google

But, to let paſſe all the reſt, one Geffrey Ap Arthur, of Monmouth among vs (whom I would not pronounce in this behalfe liable to this ſuſpicion) in the reigne of K. Henrie the Second, publiſhed an Hiſtorie of Britaine, and that out of the Britiſh tongue, as he ſaith himſelfe: wherein he writeth, That Brutus a Trojane borne, the ſonne of Syluius, nephew of Aſcanius, and in a third degree nephew to that great Æneas deſcended from ſupreme Iupiter, (for the goddeſſe Venus bare him) whoſe birth coſt his mother her life, and who by chance ſlew his owne father in hunting (a thing that the wiſe Magi had foretold) fled his countrie and went into Greece; where he deliuered out of thraldome the progenie of Helenus K. Priams ſonne, vanquiſhed king Pandraſus, wedded his daughter, and accompanied with a remnant of Trojans, fell upon the Iland Leogetia: where by the Oracle of Diana, he was aduiſed to goe vnto this Weſterne Iſle. From thence thorow the Streights of Gebraltar, where he eſcaped the Mer-maydes, and afterward thorow the Tuskane ſea, he came as farre as to * Aquitaine, in a pight battell defeated Golfarius the Pict, king of Aquitaine, together with twelue Princes of Gaule; and after he had built the citie *Tours (as witneſſeth Homer) and made ſpoile of Gaule, paſſed ouer ſea into this Iland inhabited of Giants, whom when he had conquered, together with Gogmagog the hugeſt of them all, according to his owne name he called it Britaine, in the yeere of the world 2855: before the firſt Olympiad 334 yeeres; and before the natiuitie of Chriſt 1108. Thus farre Geffrey [of Monmouth]. Yet others there be, that fetch the name of Britaine from ſome other cauſes. Sir Thomas Eliot, by degree a worſhipfull knight, and a man of ſingular learning, draweth it from the Greeke fountaine, to wit Πρυτανεῖα. a terme that the Atheniens gave to their publike Finances or Revenues. Humfrey Lhuyd, reputed by our countrymen, for knowledge of Antiquitie, to carie, after a ſort, with him all the credit and authoritie, referreth it confidently to the Britiſh word PRID-CAIN, that is to ſay, a pure white Forme. Pomponius Lætus reporteth, that the Britons out of Armorica in France, gaue it that name. Goropius Becanus ſaith, that the Danes ſought heere to plant themſelues, and ſo named it BRIDANIA, that is, Free Dania. Others derive it from PRVTENIA, a region in Germanie. Bodine ſuppoſeth, that it tooke the name of BRETTA the Spaniſh word, which ſignifieth Earth: and Forcatulus, of BRITHIN, which, as we reade in Athenæus, the Greekes uſed for drinke. Others bring it from the BRUTII in Italy, whom the Græcians called Βρέττιοι. As for thoſe ſmatterers in Grammar, who keepe a babbling and prating that Britaine ſhould carie that name, of Brutiſh maners, let them be packing.

* Aquitaine. Brute.
* Vrbem Turonum.
In the yeere of the world. 2855.
Before the Nativitie of Chriſt, 1108.

Theſe are all the opinions (to my knowledge) that haue beene received touching the name of Britaine. But heerein, as we cannot but ſmile at the fictions of ſtrangers, ſo the deuices coined by our owne countrymen paſſe not currant with generall allowance. And verily, in theſe & ſuch like caſes, an eaſier matter it is to impeach the falſe, than to teach and mainteine a truth. For beſides this, that it were an abſurditie to ſeeke the reaſon of this name in a forren language; the general conſent of all Hiſtoriographers of better note, doth confute Lætus; who with one accord deliuer vnto us, that thoſe Armorican Britons departed hence, and ſo from us caried the name with them. Againe, Britaine flouriſhed under this name many hundred yeers before the names of Dania and Prutenia came up. But what hath the word Britannia to do with the Spaniards Bretta? which I doubt, whether it be Spaniſh or no: and why ſhould this Iland be ſo termed, rather than any other Land? That the drinke called Brithin was ever in uſe among our countrimen, can hardly be prooued: and to give name to our nation of the Greekes drinke, were ridiculous. As for thoſe Brutij in Italy, whom as Strabo witneſſeth, the Lucans called Βρέττιοι, as one would ſay, traiterous fugitiues, it can never be prooued, that they like runnagates ranne hither into Britaine. But to come now to our own countrimens conjectures. Eliots Πρυτανεῖα ſeemeth not probable; ſeeing that word was proper to the Atheniens; and conſidering the Greeks called this Isle Βρεττανία, not Πρεττανικὴν, Lhuyds Prid-Cain for Britain, seemeth not onely too farre fetched, but also ouer-hardly streined: to say nothing, how that word, Cain, came from the Latines Candidum, and so crept into the prouinciall language of the Britaines.

Digitized by Google

But as touching those reports of Brutus; were they true, certeine, and vndoubted, there is no cause why any man should bestow farther study and labor in searching out the beginning of the Britains: The thing is dispatched to our hand, and the searchers of Antiquitie are eased of their troublesome and painfull trauell. For mine owne part, it is not my intent, I assure you, to discredit and confute that storie which goes of him, for the upholding whereof, (I call Truth to record) I have from time to time streined to the heighth, all that little wit of mine. For that were, to strive with the streame and currant of Time; and to struggle against an opinion commonly and long since received. How then may I, a man of so meane parts, and small reckoning, be so bold, as to sit in examination of a matter so important, and thereof definitively to determine? Well, I referre the matter full and whole to the Senate of Antiquarians, for to be decided. Let euery man, for me, judge as it pleaseth him; and of what opinion soever the Reader shall be of, verily I will not make it a point much materiall.

And yet I see (that I may tell you so much aforehand, being as I am a plaine honest and diligent searcher after the truth) how men most judicious and passing well learned, goe about diuers waies to extenuate the credit of this narration; and so often as I stand in defense thereof, to come upon me fiercely with these and such like arguments. First, grounding their reason upon the time, they protest and say, that all is but fabulous (with reservation onely of the Sacred Historie) whatsoever is reported to have beene done before the first Olympius, to wit, the yeere 770. before the birth of Christ: like as these reports of Brutus, which are before the said time 300 yeeres and more. And this they averre by the authoritie of Varro, the most learned writer of all the Romans: who as he named the first age immediately after mans creation unto the Deluge, Ἄδηλον, that is, uncertaine, by reason of the ignorance thereof, so he termed the second, even from the said Deluge unto the first Olympias, Μυθικὸν, that is to say, Fabulous: because in that time there is related nothing else (for the most part) but tales, even among the Greekes and Latins, learned nations; much more then among the Barbarous and unlettered, such as in those daies they were in all this tract, every one. Then they alleage, that for the confirmation of this matter in question, the authoritie of sufficient writers, (which to the knowledge of things past maketh most, and is all in all) is altogether defective. Now, those they call sufficient writers, whose antiquitie and learning the greater it is, so is their credit the better accepted, who all of them, like as the ancient Britains themselves (by their saying) knew not so much as the name of Brutus. Cæsar, say they, sixteene hundred yeeres since, as he testifieth himselfe, *By all the enquirie that he could make found no more but this, that the inland part of Britaine was inhabited by those, who, they said, were borne in the very Iland; and the maritime coasts by such as from out of * Belgium passed ouer thither.* Tacitus also, a thousand and foure hundred yeeres agoe, who searched diligently into these particulars, wrote thus, What maner of men the first inhabitants of Britaine were, borne in the land or brought in, as among barbarous people it is not certainly knowen. Gildas, being himselfe a wise and learned Britaine, who lived a thousand yeeres since, hath not one word of this Brutus, and doubteth whether the old Britains had any records or writings, whereby they might convey unto posteritie, their owne beginning and Historie; professing that he wrote, by the relation which he had from beyond-sea, and not by any direction out of the writings of his owne country, or any records left by writers: which if there were ever any at all, either the enemies had burnt them, or else they were caried away farre off in some fleet of exiled persons, and so not extant. Ninius also, a disciple of Eluodugus, taking in hand to write a Chronicle, eight hundred yeeres ago, complaineth that the great Masters and Doctors of Britaine, had no skill, and left no memoriall in writing: confessing, that himselfe gathered whatsoever he wrote out of the Annals and Chronicles of the holy Fathers. To these they adjoyne Beda, William Censorinus.

The Fabulous Time or Age.

At this day called Nether-lands, or Low countries of Germany.

William of Malmesburie, and as many as wrote eleven hundred and threescore yeers since, who seeme not once to have heard of Brutus his name; so silent are they of him in all their owne writings.

Heereupon they have noted, that the name of that Brutus was never heard of in the world, before that in a barbarous age, and amid the thickest clouds of ignorance, one Hunibald a bald writer, fabled and feined, That Francio a Trojane, King Priams sonne, was the founder of the French nation. Hence they collect, that when our country-men heard once how the French-men their neighbours drew their line from the Trojans, they thought it a foule dishonour, that those should outgoe them in nobilitie of Stocke, whom they matched every way in manhood and prœsse. Therfore, that Geffrey Ap Arthur of Monmouth, foure hundred yeeres agoe, was the first, as they thinke, that to gratifie our Britains produced unto them this Brutus, descended from the gods, by birth also a Trojane, to be the author of the British nation. And before that time verily not one man, as they say, made any mention at all of the said Brutus.

They adde thus much moreover, That about the same time, the Scotish writers falsly devised Scota the Ægyptian Pharaoes daughter to be the Foundresse of their nation. Then also it was, that some misspending their wit and time, yea and offring violent abuse unto the truth, forged out of their owne braines, for the Irish, their Hiberus; for the Danes, their Danus; for the Brabanders, their Brabo; for the Gothes, their Gothus; and for the Saxons, their Saxo; as it were the Stock-fathers of the said nations. But seeing that in this our age, which hath escaped out of those darke mists of fatall ignorance, the French have renounced their Francio as a counterfet Progenitor: (Whereas the Frenchmen, quoth Turnebus a right learned man, stand highly upon their descent from the Trojans, they doe it in emulation of the Romans, whom they seeing to beare themselves proud of that Pedegree and noble stocke, would needs take unto themselves also the like reputation:) And for that the Scots, such as be of the wiser sort, have cast off their Scota; and truth it selfe hath chased away Hiberus, Danus, Brabo, and the rest of these counterfet Demi-gods, and Worthies of the same stampe: Why the Britains should so much sticke unto their Brutus, as the name-giver of their Iland, and to the Trojane originall, they greatly wonder: as who would say, before the destruction of Troie, (which hapned in the thousand yeere or thereabout after Noahs floud) there had beene no Britains heere: and as if there had not lived many valorous men before Agamemnon.

Furthermore, they avouch, that very many out of the grave Senate of great Clerks, by name, Boccace, Vives, Hadr. Iunius, Polydore, Buchanan, Viguier, Gnebrard, Molinæus, Bodine, and other men of deepe judgement, agree jointly in one verdict, and denie, that ever there was any such in the world as this Brutus: also, that learned men of our owne countrey, as many, acknowledge him not, but reject him as a meere counterfet. Among whom, they produce, first, Iohn of Weathamsted, Abbat of S. Albanes, a most judicious man; who in his Granarie wrote of this point long since in this maner: According to other histories, which in the judgement of some are of more credit, the whole Discourse of this Brutus is rather Poeticall than historicall, and, for divers reasons, built upon opinion more than truth indeed. First, because there is no where mention made in the Romane stories, either of killing the father, or of the said birth, or yet of putting away the sonne. Secondly, for that, after sundry authors, Aseanius begat no such sonne who had for his proper name Sylvius: for, according unto them, he begat but one only sonne, and that was Julus, from whom the house of the Julij afterwards tooke their beginning &c. And thirdly, Sylvius Posthumus, whom perhaps Geffrey meaneth, was the sonne of Aeneas by his wife Lavinia; and he begetting his sonne Aeneas in the eight and thirtieth yeere of his reigne, ended the course of his life by naturall death. The Kingdome therefore, now called England, was not heeretofore, as many will have it, named Britaine of Brutus the sonne of Sylvius. Wherefore, it is in their opinion a vaine piece of worke, and ridiculous enough, to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of the challenge. For it is manhood only, that ennobleth a nation; the minde it is also, with with perfect understanding, and nothing els, that gaineth gentilitie to a man. And there-

He flourished in the yeere 1440.

* Epist. 44. *fore Seneca writeth thus, in his * Epistles out of Plato, That there is no king but hee came from slaves, and no slave but he descended of kings. Wherefore, to conclude, let this suffice the Britans for the beginning of their Nobilitie, that they be courageous and valiant in fight, that they subdue their enemies on every side, and that they utterly refuse the yoke of servitude.*

In a second rancke they place William of Newborough a writer of much greater authoritie, who too too sharply charged Geffrey the Compiler of the British historie, for his untruth, so soone as ever it came forth, in these words: A certeine writer, quoth he, in these our dayes hath risen up, who deviseth foolish fictions and tales of the Britans, and in a vaine humor of his owne, extolleth them farre aboue the valorous Macedonians and Romans both: he hath to name Geffrey, and is surnamed Arthurius, for that the tales of Arthur taken out of the Britans olde fables, and augmented by inventions of his owne, with a new colour of Latine speech layd over them, he hath invested into the goodly title of an Historie. Who also hath adventured farther, and divulged under the name of autentike propheſies, grounded upon undoubted truth, the deceitfull conjectures and foredeemings of one Merline, whereunto hee added verily a great deale of his owne, whiles hee did the same into Latine. And a little after: Moreover, in his booke which he entituleth, The Britans Historie; how malapertly and shamelesly he doth in maner nothing but lie, there is no man that readeth the said booke can doubt, unlesse he have no knowledge at all of ancient histories. For, he that hath not learned the truth of things indeed, admitteth without discretion and judgement the vanitie of fables. I forbeare to speake, what great matter that fellow hath forged of the Britans acts, before the Empire, and comming in of Julius Cæsar,
Descript Cambria. c. 7. or els being by others invented, hath put them downe as autentike. Insomuch, as Giraldus Cambrensis, who both lived and wrote at the same time, made no doubt to term it, The fabulous story of Geffrey. Others there be, who in this narration of Brutus, laugh at the fooliſh Topographie set downe by this Geffrey; as also how falsly hee hath produced Homer as a witnesse: yea, and they would perswade us, that it is wholly patched up of untuneable discords and jarring absurdities. They note besides, that his writings, together with his Merlines propheſies, are (among other books prohibited) forbidden by the church of Rome to be published. Some againe do observe thus much, how these that most of all admire Brutus, are very doubtfull and waver to and fro about their Brutus. He, say they, that taketh upon him the name and person of Gildas, and annexeth certaine briefe glosses to Ninius, deviseth first, that this Brutus was a Consul of Rome; then, that he was the sonne of Sylvius, and lastly, of one Hesticio. And there wanteth not (as I haue heard say) a certaine Count-Palatine, who would needs have our Brutus to be called Brotus, because, forsooth, in his birth hee was the cause of his mothers death, as if Βροτὸς sounded so much in Greeke. In the judgement of others, they should have left the originall of Britans as probable, if they had fathered their progenie, either upon Brito the Centaure, whom Higinus Bretanus. mentioneth; or that Bretanus, of whose daughter Celtice, Parthenius Nicæus a verie ancient authour, writeth that Hercules begat Celtus, the father of the Celtæ, and from whom Hesychius deriveth the word Britaine.

As for these obſervations and judgements of other men, which I have recited, I beseech you, let no man commense action against me, a plaine meaning man, and an ingenuous student of the truth, as though I impeached that narration of Brutus; forasmuch as it hath been alwaies (I hope) lawfull for every man in such like matters, both to thinke what he will, and also to relate what others have thought. For mine owne part, let Brutus be taken for the father, and founder of the British nation; I will not be of a contrarie minde. Let the Britains resolve still of their originall, to have proceeded from the Trojans (into which stocke, as I will hereafter proove, they may truely ingraffe themselves) I will not gain-stand it. I wot full well, that Nations in old time for their originall, had recourse vnto Hercules, and in later ages, to the Tro-Livius. jans. Let Antiquitie heerein be pardoned, if by entermingling falsities and truthes, humane matters and divine together, it make the first beginnings of nations and cities cities more noble, ſacred, and of greater maieſtie: ſeeing that, as Plinie writeth, Euen falſely to claime and challenge deſcents from famous perſonages, implieth in ſome ſort a love of virtue. As for my ſelfe, I willingly acknowledge with Varro, the beſt learned of all Romans, ſuch originals as theſe, fetched from the gods, to be profitable; that valorous men may beleeve, although untruely, that they are deſcended from the gods, and thereby the minde of man aſſuredly perſwaded of ſome divine race, may preſume to enterpriſe great matters more boldly, act the ſame more reſolutely, and upon the very ſecuritie therof, performe all more happily. By which words nevertheleſſe, S. Auguſtine gathereth, that the ſaid moſt learned Varro confeſſeth (although not ſtoutly nor confidently, yet covertly) that theſe opinions are altogether truthleſſe. Auguſtinus de Ciuitate Dei. lib. 3. cap. 4.

Digitized by Google

Foraſmuch then, as all writers are not of one and the ſame minde, as touching the very name and the firſt inhabitants of Britaine, and I feare me greatly, that no man is able to fetch out the truth, ſo deepely plunged within the winding revolutions of ſo many ages, let the Reader of his candor and humanitie, pardon mee alſo among others, if modeſtly and without the prejudice of any man, I likewiſe interpoſe my conjecture; not upon any minde I have contentiouſly to wrangle, (be that farre from me) but in my deſire to ſearch out the truth; which hath wholly poſſeſſed mee and brought to this point, that in the queſtion now in hand, I had rather aske forgiveneſſe for my fault (if there be any) than commit no fault at all. Howbeit, to the end that the reaſon of this name, may if it be poſſible, more eaſily and with better ſucceſſe appeare, I will endeuour firſt (as I may) to finde out the moſt ancient Inhabitours of the Iland, albeit they lie ſo hidden in the utmoſt nooke and ſecreteſt cloſet of Antiquitie, as it were in a moſt thicke wood, where no pathwaies are to be ſeene, that very ſmall hope there is or none at all, to fetch thoſe things backe againe with all my diligence, which oblivion hath ſo long remooved out of the ſight of our anceſtours.

But to ſeeke for this matter farther off, and to omit Cæſar, with Diodorus and others, who would have the Britans to be * borne of themſelues in the very land and meere* Aborigines; that is, Homelings and not forren brought in: who alſo imagined, that men in the beginning ſprang out of the earth, like unto muſhromes and todſtooles: we are taught out of the ſacred Hiſtorie penned by Moſes, that after the Deluge, Sem, Cham and Iaphet, the three ſonnes of Noe, having multiplied their iſſue in great number, departed aſunder from the mountaines of Armenia, where the Arke had reſted, into divers parts and quarters of the earth, and ſo, propagated the nations thorowout the wide world. That ſome of their poſteritie came to this Ile after the families were by little and little ſpred and diſperſed abroad, both reaſon it ſelfe, and alſo the authoritie of Theophilus Antiochenus, doe iointly proove. When as, ſaith he, in old time, there were few men in Arabia and Chaldæa, after the diviſion of tongues they encreaſed and multiplied more and more. Heereupon ſome departed toward the Eaſt, ſome gat them to the ſpacious and open main-land: others went forward into the North, ſeeking there to ſeat themſelves: neither gave they over to poſſeſſe ground every where, untill they came as farre as to Britaine, ſituate in the Northren Climates. And Moſes himſelfe expreſly ſheweth the ſame, writing, that the Ilands of the Gentiles were by the poſteritie of Iaphet divided in their Regions. The Ilands of *Gentiles the Diuines call thoſe, which lie fartheſt off: and Wolfgangus Muſculus a Theologer, not of the loweſt ranke, thinketh that the nations and families which came from Iaphet firſt inhabited the Iſles of Europe, ſuch as (ſaith he) be England, Sicilie, &c. Now, that Europe fell unto Iaphet and his progenie, not Diuines onely, but Ioſephus alſo and others have recorded. For Iſidorus, out of an Ancient writer citeth this, The nations deſcended of Iaphet, poſſeſſe from the Mountaine Taurus Northward, the one halfe of Aſia, and all Europe ſo farre as to the Britiſh Ocean, leaving names to places and people both: Of which very many afterward became changed, the reſt remaine as they were. And we have ſeene that bleſſing of Noe, [God enlarge Iaphet, and let him dwell in the Tents of Sem, and let Chanaan be his ſervant] fulfilled in the people of Europe. For, Europe, which, as Plinie ſaith, bred αὐτόχθονας. * or Nations. Origen. lib. 9. cap. 2. Gen. cap. 9.

Digitized by Google

bred up a people conquerour of all nations, hath triumphed more than once over those other parts of the world which fell unto Sem and Cham: and in this part hath the of-spring of Iapheth spred it selfe farre and wide. For of his sonnes, Magog begat the Massagets, Iavan the Iönes, Thubal the Spaniards, and Mesech the Moschovits. But Gomer his eldest sonne, in these farthest and remotest borders of Europe, gave both beginning and name to the Gomerians, which were after called Cimbrians and Cimerians. For, the name of Cimbrians or Cimerians filled in some sort this part of the world: and not onely in Germanie, but also in Gaule spred exceeding much. They which now are the Gaules, were, as Iosephus and Zonaras write, called of Gomer, Gomari, Gomerai and Gomeritæ. From these Gomarians or Gomeræans of Gaule, I have alwaies thought that our Britans drew their beginning, and from thence, for a proofe of the said beginning, brought their name: the very proper and peculiar name also of the *Britains, hath perswaded me thereunto. For even they call themselves ordinarily Kumero, Cymro and Kumeri: like as a *British woman Kumeraes, and the tongue it selfe, Kumeraeg. Neither acknowledge they any other names: although some there be not of the greatest skill, who from hence have coined in the former age, these words, Cambri and Cambria. Yea, and that Grammarian whom Virgil in his Catalects so taunteth and tearmeth the Britain Thucydides, Quintilian saith was a Cimbrian. And whence, trow yee, should we thinke these names proceeded, but from that Gomer, and the Gomerians in Gaule next adjoining? which was the seat of the old Gomerians. That the Germanes came of Aschenaz, the Turks from Togorma, sonnes of Gomer, the learned doe verilie thinke, because the Iewes even at this day call these, Togormah; like as the former, Aschenas. That the Thracians Iönes, Riphæans and Moschi, &c. are the posteritie of Thirax, Iavan, Riphat and Moschus, no man denieth; for that the names sound not unlike: Semblably, that the Æthiopians were the seed of Chus, and the Aegyptians of Misraim, because they carrie the same names in their owne languages, no man there is but granteth. Why should not we then confesse, that our Britains or Cumerians, are the very posteritie of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination? For, the name accordeth passing well: and granted it is, that they planted themselves in the utmost borders of Europe: Which thing also, the very name of Gomer, imposed first not upon some light occasion, but even by Divine providence and inspiration, doth signifie: For Gomer in the Hebrew tongue, betokeneth vtmost Bordering. Neither let any man by way of reproch, object unto our Cumeri or Cimbri, what Sext. Pompeius hath written, That theeves in the French tongue are called Cimbri. For, albeit the Cimbri (among whom it is likely that our Cumeri were,) living in that courageous and bold age of the world, wherein martiall profesſe flourished, wandring (as Possidonius writeth), from these marches of Europe, warred by way of robberie, as farre as to the lake Mæotis; yet for all that, the word Cimber no more signifieth a theefe, than Aegyptius, one that is superstitious, or Chaldæus, an Astrologer, and Sybarita, a delicate dainty-mouth. But because those nations were so given, therefore they that are such beare their names. And in this point agreeth right with me, that singular ornament of learning Ioseph Scaliger. Neither let any man marvell, wherefore I call not Berosus heere to take my part, out of whom writers in these daies furnish themselves with so great meanes. Certes, to speake my minde at once, the edge of that Berosus his authoritie, who commonly goeth under that name, is in my account so blunt and dull, that I together with the best learned of our age, as namely Volaterran, Vives, Antonius Augustinus, Melchior Canus, and especially Gaspar Varrerius, thinke it to be nothing else, but a ridiculous figment of some craftie foister and jugling deceiver; which Varrerius in his Censure of Berosus Printed at Rome, is soone able to remoove out of the Readers mindes that errour of theirs so deepely setled, concerning this writer.

Gomeri, Cimerij, Cumeri, &c.

*i. Welch men.
*or Welch.

Lib. 8. cap. 3.

Phil. Melanct.

Ad Sextum Pompeium.

Berosus.

Censure upon Berosus.

This is mine opinion or conjecture rather of the Britains originall: For in things of so great Antiquitie, a man may more easily proceed by guesse, than vpon grounded reason pronounce sentence either way. And verily this their beginning from Gomer

and

Digitized by Google

and out of * Gaule, ſeemeth more ſubſtantiall, ancient and true, than that from Brutus and Troie. Nay, that this foundeth rather to a truth, and that our Britains are the very of-ſpring of the Gaulois, me thinks I am able to proove; by the name, ſite, religion, maners, and language: by all which the moſt ancient Gaules and Britaines have beene as it were in ſome mutuall ſocietie linked together. And that I may this doe, let me, I pray you, with favourable good leave range abroad for a while at my pleaſure.

* now France.

* now Frenchmen.

THE NAME.

As touching the name, becauſe I have ſpoken thereof before, thus much onely will I repeate, that as the ancient Gaules are called Gomeræans, Gomeritæ, Gomeri, and by contraction Cimbri: ſo likewiſe our Britaines be named Cumeri and Kimbri. Now that the Gaules were called Gomeri, Ioſephus and Zonaras (as I ſaid) doe jointly proove. That they were named alſo Cimbri, may be gathered out of Cicero & Appian. Thoſe Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainly termeth Gaules. C. Marius, quoth he, repreſſed the armies of the Gaules, entring in great numbers into Italy. But all Hiſtoriographers witneſſe, that they were Cimbrians: and the Habergeon of their King Beleus, digged up at * Aquæ Sextiæ, where Marius put them to flight, hath ſhewed the ſame: For engraven it was with ſtrange letters thus, BELEOS CIMEROS. Likewiſe, that they who under the conduct of Brennus ſpoiled * Delphi in Greece were Gaules, all writers with one voice and minde agree: and yet, that theſe were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyricks doth teſtifie; The Celts or Gaules, quoth he, whom they call Cimbrians. And heere will I neither cite the teſtimonie of Lucane, who calleth the hackſter, that was hired and ſent to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Livie and others affirme to have beene a Gaule; nor alleage Plutarch, who nameth the Cimbrians, Gallo-ſcythians, ne yet Reinerius Reineccius an excellent Hiſtorian, who conſtantly averreth out of Plutarch in his Sertorius, that the Gaules and Cimbrians uſed the ſame language. Neither will I urge and ſtreine to my purpoſe that onely word of the Cimbrians which remaineth among authors, and is produced by Plinie out of Philemon, to wit, Morimaruſa. i. the dead Sea, although it be meere Britiſh: For Mor with the * Britans ſignifieth Sea, and Marw, dead.

* Aix.

Forcatulus out of the Annales of France. 1235.

* now, Caltri, or Salona.

Morimaruſa.

* That is, Welch.

Seeing therfore, that theſe people agreed in the moſt ancient name, from whence paſſed the ſaid name into this Ile, but even with the firſt inhabitants, out of Gaule, lying ſo neere, and by a verie ſmall ſtreit of ſea ſevered from it? For the world was not all together and at once inhabited; but grant we muſt, that the countries neerer adjoining unto the mountaines of Armenia, (where the Arke reſted after the flood, and from whence mankinde was encreaſed) were peopled before others; and namely Aſia the leſſe, and Greece before Italy, Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. The conſideration whereof is moſt delectable, in that the higheſt Creator, hath ioined regions, and withall diſperſed the Ilands ſo, as there is no ſuch great diſtance betweene any of them, but that even thoſe which lie fartheſt off, may from ſome one neere adioining, be ſeene & plainly as it were diſcerned by the eie. And for no other purpoſe was this done; but that the nations when they ſhould over-abound, might diſcover and deſcrie ſome places to paſſe unto and disburden themſelves; ſo long, untill the univerſall world were to the glorie of the Creator repleniſhed with inhabitants every where. We ought therefore to be perſwaded, that the ancient Gomerians of Gaule (now France) either chaſed away by the purſuit of others, or caſt out for leſſening of the multitude, or elſe inflamed with a deſire to travell and ſee farre countries, (a thing naturally inbred in men) croſſed the ſea and came over firſt into this Ile, which from the continent they were able to kenne. And it ſtands to verie good reaſon alſo, that everie countrie received the firſt inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather than from ſuch as were moſt disjoind. For, who would not thinke, that Cyprus had the firſt inhabitors out of Aſia next unto it, * Crete and Sicilie out of Greece neereby, and Corſica out of Italy a neighbour countrie: and, not to goe farre, Zeland out of Germanie the neereſt unto it, as alſo Iſland out of Norway, rather than from the remote tracts of Tartarie and * Mauritania? In like maner, why ſhould not we thinke that our Britaine was inhabited at firſt by the Gaules

* The Site.

Eraſmus Michael of Navigation.

* or Candie.

* now Barbarie.

Gaules their neighbours, rather than either by the Trojans or Italians, the Albans and Brutians, so farre distant and remoove? Neither doe writers fetch the originall and infancie (as it were) of the Britaines from any other place, than their neighbour countrie Gaule. The inner parts of Britaine, saith Cæsar, is inhabited of them, whom they themselves report out of their records to have been borne in the Iland: the Sea coast, of those, who upon purpose to make warre had passed thither out of * Belgium in Gaule, who all in maner carie the names of those cities and States out of which they came thither, and after they had warred, there remained. For there were in Britaine like as also in Gaule, people named Belgæ, Atrebatij, Parisi, Cenomanni, &c. Semblably Tacitus, Generally, quoth he, if a man consider all circumstances, it is most likely that the Gaules being neighbours, peopled the land of Britaine next unto them. Yea and Beda, one that among all our writers favoureth the truth, At the first, saith he, this Iland had those Britaines onely to inhabite it (from whom also it tooke the name) who, by report, having sailed out from the tract of Armorica into Britaine, challenged unto themselves the South coasts thereof. Now, he calleth the tract of Armorica, the sea coasts of * Gaule opposite unto our Iland. This also seemeth to make for our purpose, that Cæsar reporteth, How Divitiacus the Gaule even in his remembrance, held a good part both of Gaule and also of Britanie under his government; as also, (that which is of greatest moment) Plinie among the maritime people, just over against Britaine, neere unto the County of Bullen, reckoned the * Britaines: like as Dionysius Afer a more ancient writer than he, in these verses,

* Where now are Holland, Zeland, Flanders, Brabant, Gelderland and Cleve.

* France.

Britaines in Gaule.

* Britannos, yet in some Copies of Plinie, wee reade Brigantes.

Τῆς ἤτοι πυμάτῳ μὲν ὑπὸ γλωχῖνα νέμονται
Ἀγχοῦ σὺν λάων μεγαθύμων ἔθνος Ἰβήρων,
Μίλικος ἐπ' ἠπείροιο τετραμμένον, ἧχι βερεῖα
Ὠκεανοῦ ψυχρὸς κέχυται ῥόος, ἔνθα Βρεταννοὶ
Λευκά τε φῦλα νέμονται ἀρειμανέων Γερμανῶν.

Word for word thus:

* Of Europe.

And verily, that utmost point and angle of this * part,
Inhabite the Iberians, people of hautie hart:
Neere Gebraltar, at Hercules his pillars cald of old,
Turning upon the maine in length, what way the current cold
Of Northren Ocean with strong tides doth interflow and swell,
Where Britaines, and those faire white folke, the martiall Gennans dwell.

For these words [where Britains] seeme to have respect unto those other, [Turning upon the main in length] and Eustathius, who did set foorth his Commentaries upon this author, understandeth it of the Britons in Gaule, in these words, Τῶν δὲ Βρεταννῶν τούτων παρώνυμοι ἀντίπεραν Βρεταννίδος νῆσοι, that is, And of these Britons, the Isles of Britaine over against them tooke their denomination. Howbeit, Avienus and Stephen in his booke of Cities, are of a contrarie minde. Moreover the same Religion was of both people observed; Among the Britans, saith Tacitus, there is to be seene in their ceremonies and superstitious perswasions an apparent conformitie with the Gaules. The Gaules, quoth Solinus, after a detestable maner of sacred rites, not to the honor but rather to the injurie of religion, offred mans flesh in their sacrifices. That the Britaines did the very same, Dio Cassius beside others reporteth in his Nero. Both Nations also had their Druidæ, as Cæsar and Tacitus very sufficient writers doe witnesse. Concerning which Druidæ, let not the Reader thinke much to runne over this whole passage out of Cæsar. The Druidæ are present at all Diuine service. The overseers they be of publike and private sacrifices, the interpretours also of their religious rites and ceremonies. To these a great number of yongue men doe flocke for to be taught, and those doe they highly esteeme and honor. For lightly they decide and determine all controversies; as well publike as private: And in case any hainous fact be committed, if there be a murder or man-slaughter, if variance arise about inheritance, if strife about the bounds of lands, they in their discretion judge of the matter; they appoint rewards, they award penalties, and punishments. If any either private person, or body politike stande not to their Decree, they put them by all sacrifices, as excommunicate. And this among them

Religion.

Druidæ.

Digitized by Google

*them is the most grievous punishment. They that be thus interdicted, are reckoned as godlesse and most wicked persons: All men decline from them, they avoid both meeting and talking with them for feare of taking harme by contagion from them. Neither have they the benefits of Law though they request it, nor be capable of any office, though they sue for it. Moreover, of all these Druides there is one President, who hath the greatest authoritie among them. When he is dead, looke who excelleth the rest in woorth and dignitie, he succeedeth him: But if there be many of equall estimation, chosen there is one by the voices of the Druides. Sometimes also they fall together by the eares, and take armes about this place of Presidencie. These Druides at one certaine time of the yeere hold a solemne Session within a consecrated place, in the marches of the Carnutes, a countrey held to be the middle of all France. Hither resort as unto the terme from all parts, as many as have any controversies or suits in law: and to their judgements and decrees they yeeld obedience. Their learning and profession is thought to have beene first found and devised in Britaine, and so from thence translated into France: and now also in these daies they that desire more exact knowledge thereof, goe thither for the most part, to be instructed therein. The Druides are wont to be freed from warfare: neither with the rest pay they tribute. Immunitie they have and exemption, as from war-service, so from all other charges whatsoever. Thus, many there be who being excited with so great rewards, and of their owne accord meet together at Schoole for to learne, and are thither sent by their kinsfolke, friends and parents. There by report, they learne by rote a great number of verses. And so they continue still scholars for certaine yeeres together; neither doe they thinke it lawfull to commit what they learne to writing; whereas otherwise in every thing almost, in publike also and private dealings, they use Greeke letters. This order they have taken, I suppose, for two reasons: because they would not have their doctrine divulged, nor their scholars by trusting to their written bookes, to neglect their owne memorie: a thing incident lightly to most scholars; who presuming upon the helpe of writings, use lesse diligence in learning without booke, and as little in exercising their memorie. This one point principally they are desirous to perswade their scholars, That our soules are immortall, and after death passe out of one man into another; and by this meanes they suppose men, setting behinde them all feare of death, are most of all stirred up unto vertue. Furthermore, concerning the starres and their motion, touching the greatnesse of heaven and earth, of the Nature of things, of the power and might of the immortall Gods, much dispute they make, and as many precepts they give to youth. Whereupon Lucan in this wise speaketh unto them:

* About Chartres.

The doctrine of the Druides found in Britaine.

Et vos barbaricos ritus, moremq; siniſtrum
Sacrorum, Druidæ, positis repetiſtis ab armis.
Solis noſſe Deos & Cæli ſydera vobis
Aut ſolis neſcire datum. Nemora alta remotis
Incolitis lucis. Vobis auctoribus, umbras
Non tacitas Erebi ſedes Ditiſq; profundi
Pallida regna petunt, regit idem ſpiritus artus
Orbe alio: longæ, canitis ſi cognita, vitæ
Mors media eſt. Certè, populi quos deſpicit Arctos, Fœlices errore ſuo, quos, ille timorum
Maximus, haud urget lethi metus: inde ruendi
In ferrum mens prona viris, animæq; capaces
Mortis: & ignavum eſt reditura parcere vitæ.

Yee Priests also hight Druidæ, your sacrices leaw'd
And barb'rous rites, which were forlet in wars surceasse, reneaw'd.
Yee onely know, or yee alone know not the gods above
And heavenly wights. Among high trees in groves remote, yee love
To dwell, and teach that soules of men their bodies parted fro, Passe not to silent Erebus where Pluto reign's below,
Among the pale and grisly ghosts: but spirit still the same Rul's lims and joints in other world; And death (if that yee frame Your precepts grounded sure on truth and knowledge) is no more,

Than middle point twixt future life and that which went before.
Certes those Northren people are right happie; whom we see Perswaded of such vaine conceits, wherein they nuzzeled be.
No feare of death which men most dread, can once their stomacks dant,
This maketh them so resolute, so bold and valiant:
Upon the pike and sword they runne, they passe not to be slaine;
T'is cowardise to spare that life, which will returne againe.

An oke also in the British or Welch tongue is called Derw.

By what name soever these were knowen to their Celts or Britains, it may seeme that this name of Druides came from a Greeke primitive head, to wit δρῦς, that is, an Oke, for that they held nothing more sacred than the Misselto of the Oke; whereupon Ovid writeth thus:

Ad viscum Druidæ, Druidæ, cantare solebant.
To Misselto go Druidæ, goe Druidæ, they did sing.

as who commonly dwelt within Oke-groves, and celebrated no sacrifice and divine service without the branches and leaves thereof. But this, will Plinie more amplie declare in these words of his: The Druidæ (for so they call their Diviners, Wisemen and estate of Clergie) esteeme nothing in the world more sacred than Misselto, and the tree whereupon it groweth, so it be an Oke. Now this you must take by the way; These Priests or Clergie men chuse of purpose such groves for their divine service, as stood onely upon Okes: Nay they solemnize no sacrifice, nor celebrate any sacred ceremonies without branches and leaves thereof: so as they may seeme well enough to be thereupon named Dryidæ in Greeke. And in very deed, whatsoever they finde growing to that tree, beside the owne fruit, they esteeme it as a gift sent from heaven, and a sure signe, that the God himselfe whom they serve, hath chosen that peculiar tree. And no marvell; for Misselto is passing geason, and hard to be found upon the Oke: But when they meet with it, they gather it very devoutly, and with many ceremonies. First, they principally observe that the Moone be just six daies old: for upon that day begin they their moneths and new yeeres, yea and their severall ages, which have their revolutions every thirtie yeeres, because she is thought then to be of great power and force sufficient, and is not yet come to her halfe light or end of her first quarter. It they call in their Language, All-heale, [for they have an opinion, that it healeth all maladies whatsoever.] Now when they are about to gather it, after they have duly prepared their sacrifices and festivall cheere under the said tree, they bring thither two yongue bullocks milke-white, whose hornes are then and not before bound up. This done, the Priest arraied in a surplise or white vesture, climbeth the tree, and wih a golden bill cutteth off [the Misselto] and they beneath receive the same in a white souldiours cassock. Then fall they to kill the beasts aforesaid for sacrifice, mumbling many oraisons and praying, That it would please God to blesse this gift of his, to their good unto whom he had vouchsafed to give it. Now this conceit they have of Misselto thus gathered, that what living creature soever, otherwise barren, drinketh thereof, it will presently thereupon become fruitfull; also that it is a soveraigne counterpoison and remedie against all venim. So superstitious are people oftentimes in such frivolous and fooliish toies as these.

Lib. 16. cap 4.

Heereto accordeth well that Diodorus Siculus in the same sense hath termed these Priests of the Gaules Σαρωνίδας, which word, (as all they know, who have skill in the Greeke tongue, betokeneth Okes. And Maximus Tyrius writeth thus of the Celts, i. the Gauls; That they worship Jupiter, whose symbol or signe, is the highest Oke. Furthermore it may seeme to proceed from these Druides, that our Saxons (as we reade in Alfricus) called a Diviner or wise man in their language, Dry. Of these if you be willing to learne more, I referre you to Mela, Lactantius, Eusebius De Præparatione Evangelica. and the Comedie Aulularia of Pseudo-Plautus.

Saronidæ.

Dry.

Bardi.

The Frenchmen or Gaules, had likewise among their religious persons, the Bardi, who to the tune of the Harpe sung Ditties in verse, conteining the famous exploits of brave and noble men. From whence it is, that the same Lucane before cited speaketh thus unto them,

Vos quoq; qui fortes animas, belló q; peremptas

Laudibus

Digitized by Google

Laudibus in longum, vates, dimittitis ævum,
Plurima securi fudistis carmina, Bardi.

And yee the Poets, Bardi call'd, who knights redoubted prise
Praise-woorthie most, that died in field, and them doe eternise;
Pour'd foorth now many a verse in song, and that in careleſſe wise.

And even those also do our* Britans still at this day terme by the very same name: For them they call Bard, who beſides the exercise of that function, doe especially addict themselves to the skill of Heraldry, and the drawing of Pedigrees. But whether the Britanes in like maner as the Gaules, beleeved, That they were descended from Pluto, we have no record to lead us. Whereas the Gaules did for that * cause, determine and end all their spaces of times, by reckoning nights and not daies, so as the day might in order follow the night, the very same have our Britans observed. For, that which the Latines call Septimana, and two Septimanæ, they terme with-nos, that is, eight nights, and Pimthec-nos, that is, fifteen nights.

*Welchmen.

*That is, their descent from Pluto.

Likewise both peoples seeme to have framed unto themselves, one and the same forme of Common weale and government. For, ruled they were not by one mans scepter: but right as Gaul, so Britaine also had many kings. And even as the Gauls in cases of greater waight and danger called an assembly of the whole nation and elected one chiefe governor: so did the Britans also, as it may be gathered out of these words of Cæsar, The soveraignty of command, and of managing the war, was by a common Counsel granted to * Cassivelaunus.

Their Republique or commonwealth.

*Cassibelinus.

Neither were these two Nations unlike in maners, customes and ordinances. For to let this passe, that both of them were most warlike, and exceedingly given to slaughter: certaine it is, that in joining of battels and adventuring of dangers, they were one as forward as the other: as may appeare by Strabo, Tacitus, Dio, Herodian and others. For maners and conditions, saith Strabo, the Britans are in part like to the Gauls: and anon he addeth, In fight for the most part they be fierce and cruell like unto certaine Gauls. And Tacitus according with him, The Britans, saith he, that were not vanquished by the Romans, remaine such as the ancient Gauls were. And in another place, Next neighbors to the Gauls and like unto them be the Britans.

Their Maners.

That the Britans fought, armed after the Gallish fashion, Mela doth report. The Britans in their wars use a number of Chariots as Strabo writeth, like as some of the Gauls.

The maner was of the one people and the other, in time of warre to range their battels apart by seuerall nations, that the distinct valour of them both might more evidently appeare. That the Gauls practised this, Cæsar witnesseth in these words: The Gauls being divided by their sundry cities and states kept the fourds and passages. Which also Tacitus affirmeth of the Britans in the battell of Caratacus, The nations stood by troupes and companies before the fortifications.

The Gauls, saith Strabo, were of a docible wit, and apt to learne: as also the Britans, whose wits Agricola in Tacitus preferred before the studets of Gaul, as being now curious to attain the eloquence of the Romane language, whereas they lately rejected the language.

The Gauls, Strabo reporteth to haue been of an ingenuous nature and single hearted: which Tacitus seemeth to note and observe in the Britans, writing that they are ready and willing to endure levies of men and mony, and all other burdens imposed by the Empire, if wrongfull insolences herein be forborne.

Cæsar reporteth, that the Gauls upon an unconstant and variable mind that they caried, loved evermore change and alteration in the government: The Britans likewise, saith Tacitus, were variable, given to factions and siding. By meanes of this inconstancie of the Gauls, which Cæsar more mildly calleth an Infirmitie, so great credulity crept into their minds, that the credulity of the Gauls grew to be a proverbe, and one Poet hath written thus thereof:

Et tumidus Gallâ credulitate fruar:
And full of this conceit will I Make vse of Gauls Credulitie.

Digitized by Google

Neither haue our Britans as yet therein degenerated from them, who moſt readily
* Old wives tales. give eare even to * Mileſian fables, and either through ſuperſtitious hope or like feare do preſently beleeue moſt fooliſh propheſies.

We read in Strabo, that the Gauls grieved exceedingly and tooke to heart the abuſe which they ſaw done unto their kinred. That there is the ſame Sympathie and fellow feeling in our Britans above all other nations, it is better knowen than can be uttered, and riſe in euery mans mouth.

The Gauls, as Cæſar recordeth, according as every one excelled others in noble birth and wealthy eſtate, ſo kept they about them a greater traine of ſeruants and dependants, whom they called Ambacti: which was the onely grace, countenance, and port they caried.
Ambacti. Neither know our Britiſh Noblemen or gentry of Wales at this day, any other ſhew of reputation: From whom, as it is thought, the Engliſh haue learned to lead after them ſo great a retinue of followers and ſeruing men: in which thing they haue not long ſince outgone all other in Europe.

That the Britiſh buildings were in every reſpect ſutable with thoſe in Gaule, and compaſſed round about with words, Cæſar and Strabo do ſhew unto vs.

The Gauls, as witneſſeth Strabo, ware chaines of gold about their necks: and Bunduica the Britiſh Lady, ſaith Xiphilinus, had likewiſe a golden chaine, and was clad in a garment of ſundry colours. And where at this day is that ornament more in uſe than in this Iſle and among our Britans?

That Britans and Gauls both, adorned their middle finger with a ring Pliny doth report.

The ſame Strabo maketh mention of the Gauls, That they nouriſhed the buſh of their heads; and Cæſar teſtifieth that the Britans went with long haire.

Bracha. It appeareth in many authors, That the Gauls uſed certain garments which in their mother tongue they termed Brachæ; that theſe were alſo common to our Britans, this verſe of Martial doth prooue;

Quàm veteres Brachæ Britonis pauperis:
Than Brachæ old of Briton poore.

I paſſe over that which Silius Italicus writeth of the Gauls:

Quinetiam ingenio fluxi, ſed primà feroces,
Vaniloquum Celtæ genus, ac mutabile mentis.
The Gauls though fierce at firſt, ſoone yeeld and hold not out, by kind;
A nation given to vanity of words and change of mind.

Becauſe theſe qualities are common to moſt nations, I might adde hereto other particulars, wherein theſe people haue jumped juſt together: but I feare me leſt malitious evilwillers would wreſt them to the detraction and ſlander of the ſaid nations. Beſides, that ſaying pleaſeth me exceeding well, All in a meane and within meaſure: and the argument perhaps which is drawn from common maners, may ſeeme not of the greateſt validity.

Language. Now are we come to the language, in which lieth the maine ſtrength of this diſputation and the ſureſt proofe of peoples originall. For no man, I hope, will deny, that they which joine in community of language, concurred alſo in one and the ſame originall. And if all the hiſtories that ever were had miſcarried and periſhed; if no writer had recorded, that we Engliſhmen are deſcended from Germanes, the true and naturall Scots from the Iriſh, the Britons of Armorica in France from our Britans; the ſociety of their tongues would eaſily confirme the ſame: yea and much more eaſily, than the authority of moſt ſufficient Hiſtoriographers. If therfore I ſhall proove, that the ancient Gauls and our Britans uſed one and the ſelfe ſame language, then the very truth will of force drive us to confeſſe, that they had alſo the ſame beginning. Neither paſſe I what Cæſar hath written, that the Gaules were of diuers languages: ſince that Strabo ſaith, They differed only in dialect. They did not all, quoth he, every where uſe the ſame tongue, but ſomewhat, little though it were, it varied. But that the language of the old Gauls was all one with the Britiſh (unleſſe haply in variety of dialect), Cæſar himſelfe doth ſhew, writing that the maner was of the French

or

Digitized by Google

or Gauls who desired further knowledge in the discipline and learning of the Druides, to goe over into Britaine unto our Druidæ. Now seeing that they had no use of books, it stands to good reason, that in teaching they spake the same tongue that the Gauls did. Which Cornelius Tacitus more plainly affirmeth; The British speech, saith he, and the French or Gaulish differ not much. Whence it is that Beatus Rhenanus, Gesner, Hottoman, Peter Daniel, Picardus, and all others that haue subscribed and done honor to venerable antiquity, are all become of this opinion: except some fewe, who will haue the Gaules to haue spoken the Germane language. But lest any man herein should cast dust in our eyes, let vs out of authors gather and conferre as many words as we can of the old Gaules, as it were ship-planks caught vp from a shipwracke (seeing that the said tongue is now even drowned under the waues of obliuion.) For very many words we shall see not hardly nor violently streined, but passing easily, and in maner without any wresting, to agree with our British, both in sound and sense. I haue made vse in these words of William Salisburies Glossary, and another old Manuscript.

Ausonius in this verse of his, writing of a fountaine at Burdeaux, Divona.

Divona Celtarum lingua fons addite Diuis:
Thou Fountaine added to the Gods in Gaulish Divona hight.

witnesseth, that Divona in the French language signifieth, Gods fountaine. Now doe our Britans call God, Dyw, and a Fountaine, Vonan: of which is compounded Divonan, and by the Latine Analogie, and for the verse sake, Divona. * That is, Welchmen.

That Iupiter, whom the Greekes, of Thunder call Βροντᾶος, and the Latines Tonans, that is, Thunderer was worshipped of the Gaules vnder the name of Taranis, there be writers, not a few that haue reported. But Taran with the Britans betokeneth Thunder. In which signification the Germanes seeme to haue named Iupiter, Thonder: For Iupiters day or Thursday, they call Thonderdach, which is as much, as The Thunderers day. Taranis.

The Gaules had another God, by Lucane named Hesus, and by Lactantius Heus; whom also the Author of Queroli termed Anubis latrans, that is, Barking Anubis; for that, painted he was in the forme of a Dog: and Huad with our welch Britans betokeneth a Dog. Hesus.

Most certaine it is that the Gaules worshipped Mercurie under the name of Teutates, as the Inuentor of Arts, and guide of their journeys: And Diw Taith in the British or Welch tongue, is as much as the God of Trauelling: And that Plato in his Phædrus and Philebus calleth Mercurie Theut, I am not ignorant. Howbeit I know there be some, who will haue Teutates to be the same that the Germanes called Tuisco in Tacitus, and is all one with Mars; as also that we the of-spring of Germanes name thereupon Mars day, Tuisday. Concerning these three Gods of the Gaules, take with you, if you please, these three verses of Lucane, Teutates. Tewsday or Tuisday. Lib. 1.

Et quibus immitis placatur sanguine diro
Teutates, horrensq; feris altaribus Hesus, Et Taranis Scythicæ non mitior ara Dianæ.

And they that vse with cursed bloud their Idol-gods to please,
Teutates fell, and Hesus grim, whom nought else may appease
But sacrifice of humane flesh: and Taranis likewise, Worship'd as curst Daina is, just after Scythicke guise.

That the foule Spirits named Incubi, were of the Gaules termed Dusij, because they practise that filthy uncleannes of theirs continually, Saint Augustine and Isidorus both doe testifie: But that which is continuall and daily, the Britans still doe expresse by the word Duth. Dusij.

Pomponius Mela writeth, That the religious women attending upon a certaine God, whom the Gaules worshipped, counted holy votaries of perpetuall virginitie, were called of the Gaules, Senæ, or Lenæ rather I would read if I durst. For, such consecrated Virgins, whom now folke name Nuns, the Britans, as it is in an old Glossarie, termed Leanes: whence a most ancient Nunnery, Lean-minister, now called Lemster, drew the name. Lenæ.

Digitized by Google

Geſſata. The Gaules, ſaith Polybius, in their owne tongue called their mercenarie ſouldiers Geſſata: and at this daie the Welſh-Britains doe call their hired ſeruants Gueſſin.

Geſſi. Valiant men were, as Seruius ſaith, named of the Gaules Geſſi: and Guaſſdewr among the Britains importeth the ſame that in Latin, Vir fortis & ſtrenuus, that is, a valorous and hardy man.

Geſſum. Hitherto may be referred Geſſum, which was a weapon proper to the Gaules, as Pilum to the Romanes, and Framea to the Germanes. But of this, anon.

Caterva. As Phalanx was properly the Macedonians Legion, ſo was Caterva peculiar to the Gauls, as we may ſee in Vegetius. Neither is this word growen out of uſe with the Britains, who uſe to call a troupe Caturfa, and war Kad, and the ſtrength of war which lieth in a Legion Kaderne, yea and Caterna, as is found in ſome Copies of Vegetius.

Cateia. To this Kad, may well be reduced Cateia, which was a kind of warlike weapon among the Gauls, as Iſidorus reporteth.

Geſſa. Geſſa, a Gauliſh weapon, Servius doth interpret to be a mans ſpeare, whereunto the Britiſh Cethilou ſeemeth to come neere, which Ninnius expoundeth to be as much as Stakes burnt at the end, and a warlike ſeede or generation.

Trimarcia. The Gauls whom Brennus marched with into Greece, named in their owne language that order of Horſe-fight which conſiſteth of three horſes [in a ranke] as ſaith Pauſanias, Trimarcia: For a horſe they called Marca: which in that very ſignification is meer and pure Britiſh. For Tri ſignifieth three, and March an horſe.

Thireos. Pauſanias in the ſame booke recordeth, that the Gauls termed their own country-ſhields Thireos: which even to this day the Britans name Tarian.

Ceton. Cæſar hath in his Iournels or Day-books written, as Servius ſaith, That he in Gaul being caught up of the enemy, and armed as he was carried upon his horſe backe, one of his enemies that knew him chanced to meet him, and inſulting over him ſaid, Cedos Cæſar: which in the Gauls tongue is as much as, Let goe Cæſar: now, among the Britans Geduch betokeneth as much.

Rheda. Rheda, a Gauliſh word, is of the ſame ſignification, ſaith Quintilian, that Caruta, that is, a charriot, or waggon, among the Latins. This word the Britiſh tongue doth not now acknowledge: howbeit, that it hath been in uſe among the Britans, Rhediad for a courſe, Rheder to run, and Rhedeeſa a race, do plainly ſhew: which words that they ſpring from the ſame ſtocke, no man need to make doubt. And what abſurdity were it from hence to derive Eporedia, a City of the Salaſſians, which Pliny writeth, tooke that name of Horſe-breakers.

Covinus. Another kind of wagon a chariot there was, uſed of both theſe people, which by one name they called Covinus, and the driver Covinarius. And albeit this word together with that kind of wagon it ſelfe bee quite growen out of uſe, yet the primitive thereof, as I may ſo ſay, remaineth ſtill among the Britans: in whoſe language the word Cowain ſignifieth to cary or ride in a wagon.

Eſſedum. Eſſedum likewiſe was a Gauliſh wagon or chariot rather, meet for the wars: which together with Cæſar, Propertius attributes to the Britans in this verſe, Eſſeda cælatis ſiſte Britanna jugis.

Stay there your Britiſh chariots with yokes ſo faire engrav'n.

Circius. Circius is a wind by name paſſing well knowen, unto which Auguſtus Cæſar both vowed and alſo built a temple in Gallia. That the word is Gauliſh, Phavorinus a Gaulois borne declareth in Agellius. Our Gauls, ſaith he, call the wind blowing out of their land, and which they find to be moſt fell and boiſterous, by the name of Circius, of the whirling and whiſling, I ſuppoſe, that it makes. Of all winds this is known to be moſt bluſtering and violent: now, Cyrch, with the Britans betokeneth force and violence, as may be ſeen in their Letany.

Penninum. The Pennine Alpes, which Cæſar calleth the higheſt Alpes, had this name impoſed upon them, as Livie writeth, not of Annibal Pœnus, that is, the Carthaginian, but of that Hill which with the higheſt top among the Alpes the Mountainers of Gaule conſecrated and named Penninus. But Pen with the Britans even in theſe daies ſignifieth the tops of hils: whence the higheſt mountains that we have, to wit, Pen-mon- maur,

Digitized by Google

maur, Pendle, Pen, Pencoh-cloud, and Pennigent gat their names. Neither haue the high mountaines Apennini in Italy their name from ought els. Apenninus.

The cities and States of Gaule coasting vpon the Ocean, were called, as Cæsar writeth, after the custome of the Gauls.

Aremoricæ: with whom the Britans accord in the same name for the same thing. Armorica. For, with them Ar-more, is as much as by the sea, or upon the sea: And in the very same sense Strabo nameth them in Greek Παραλιάτας.

In the raigne of Diocletian the Emperor, the rurall people in Gaule made a commotion. And to the crue of that faction of theirs they gave the name Baucadæ. And among the Britans, Swineheards and country gnoffs, be called Beichiad. Bauchadæ.

The inborne theeves of the land, the Gauls, saith Sidonius, named Vargæ: And I have found in the Glossarie of the Cathedrall Church of Lhandaff, that theeves in the British tongue were in old time knowen by the name of Veriad. Vargæ. Lib. 4. Epist. 6.

The Allobrogæ, saith that ancient and excellent Scholiast upon Iuvenal, were so named, because Broga in French signifieth a land or Territorie, and Alla, another: As one would say, Translated out of another place. But Bro in British, is a region or country, and Allan, without, or externall: so that the Etymologie in both tongues, holdeth very well. Allobroges.

There is an herbe like to Plantain called in Gaule Glastum, saith Plinie, wherewith the Britans died and coloured themselves, as writers testifie. This is the herbe which we terme Woad, and it giveth a blew colour: which colour at this day, the Britans terme Glasse. This was the Greeks Isatis, by the testimony of Plinie, and the Diars, vitrum, by the authority of Oribasius. Whereby, Pomponius Mela may easily be corrected, if instead of Ultro, you put Vitro: where he saith thus, Britanni incertum ob decorem, an ob quid aliud, ultro corpora infecti, that is, whether the Britans died their bodies with woad for a beautifull shew, or in some other respect, it is uncertaine. Glastum. Woad. Isatis. Vitrum, an herbe. Luteum in Cæsar. Pomponius Mela corrected.

The Gallathians who spake the same language, as S. Hierome witnesseth, that the ancient Gauls did, had a little shrub called Coccus; of which that deep red skarlet colour was made: and this very colour the Britans usually name Coch. Coccus.

That Bracha were garments common to French and Britains we have shewed before. Diodorus Siculus calleth such, unshorne, or undressed and of sundry colours. And even now adaies the Britans terme foule and ragged clothes, Brati. Bracha.

If Laina was an old Gallish word, as Strabo seemeth to tell us, when he writeth thus, The Gauls weave them cassocks of thickned wooll which they call Lainas; the Britans are not gone far from them, who in their tongue name wooll Glawn. Laina.

Bardus in the Gauls tongue signifieth a Songster; Festus Pompeius is mine author: and this is a meer British word. Bardus.

Bardocucullus, as we are taught out of Martial and others, was the cloake that the Gallish Bardi woore. And like as Bard, so the other part also of the foresaid word, remaineth whole among the Britans, who call such a cloke, Cucull. Bardocucullus.

Gaul, saith Plinie, yeelded a kinde of Corne of their owne, which they called Brance, and we Sandalum, a graine of the finest and neatest sort. Among the Britans likewise, meale of the whitest graine is named Guineth Wrane. Brance.

The herbe which the Greekes, of fiue leaues doe call Pentaphyllon, was named of the Gaules Pempedula, as sheweth Apuleius. Now, Pymp in British, is fiue, and Deilen, a leafe. Pempedula.

As the Gauls by Pymp meant the number of five, so by Petor, foure, as we learne out of Festus: who sheweth, that Petoritum was a chariot or wagon of the Gaules, so called of foure wheeles: and this word Pedwar in the British tongue signifieth foure. Petoritum.

Among wooden instruments, Canterium, in English a Leauer, was among the Gaules called Guvia, as Isidorus writeth: and now the same in the British language, is named Gwyf. Guvia.

Betulla, which we call Byrch, Plinie nameth a Gallish tree. He would if he liued now call it the British tree. For it groweth most plentifully in Britaine, and in the British tongue is named Bedw. Betulla.

Wine

Digitized by Google

Dercoma. Wine delayed with water, as we read in Athenæus, the Gaules called Dercoma: and among the Britans, Dwr, betokeneth water.

And euen ſo, (not to proſecute all that may be ſaid:) in Dioſcorides, the herbe Ferne, called in Latin Filix, and of the old Gauls, Ratis, is in the Britiſh tongue termed Redin. The Elder tree, in Latine Sambucus, in the old Gauliſh Scouies, is in Britiſh, Iſcaw. The herbe in Italy, Seratula, in old Gauliſh, Vetonica, the Britans and wee doe call Betany. That which in Plinie the Latines name Terra adeps, that is, the fat of the ground, the Gaules Marga, is of the Britans called Marle. The white or bright marle, named of the Latines Candida Marga, of the Gaules Gliſcomarga, might of the Britans be termed Gluyſmarl: For Gluys, with them is as much as Bright or Shining. A three-footed ſtoole, which the Latines name Sellula Tripes; the Gaules, as we read in Sulpitius Seuerus, Tripetia, is among the Britans termed Tribet. That which the Latines meane by Centum pedes, that is, a hundred foot, the Gaules in Columella underſtand by Candetum, and the Britans by Cantroed. A Birds bill, in Latine Auis roſtrum; the Gaules, as we read in Suetonius, called Becco, and the Britans name Pic.

Ratis. Scouies. Vetonica. Marga. Gliſcomarga. Tripetia. Candetum. Becco.

Neither ſhould I be as fancy-full as Goropius, if I reduced Suetonius his Galba, which ſignifieth exceeding fat, to the Britiſh word Galuus, that betokeneth, paſſing big: or Bulga in Valerius Flaccus for a leather Budget, unto the Britiſh Butſict: or the Soldurÿ in Cæſar, put for men * Deuoted, unto the Britans Sowdiws: or Plinie his Planarat, for a plough, unto Arat, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth a plough: or Iſidorus his Taxea for Lard, unto the Britans Tew, or Diodorus Siculus his drinke called Zithum, unto their Sider: or Ceruiſia, unto Keirch, that is, Otes, whereof the Britans in many places make that drinke (or rather to Cwrwf) which we in Engliſh terme Ale.

Galba. Bulga. Soldurÿ. * Vowing to die and liue one with another. Planarat. Taxea. Zithum. Ceruiſia. Ale, a drinke.

That all theſe were the ancient words of the ancient Gaules, appeareth euidently out of thoſe Authors; and you ſee how fitly they for the moſt part agree and accord as it were in conſent with our Britiſh words, in ſound and ſenſe both.

The Terminations or Ends of places Names.

Hereunto thus much moreouer may be added, that ſeeing the ancient names of places end with both people in the ſame termination, to wit, in Dunum, Briua, Ritum, Durum, Magus, &c. it may be gathered that theſe were not diuers nations. And euen from hence verily a ſound reaſon may be drawn, that we Engliſhmen are ſprung from the Germanes, for that the later and more moderne names of our townes end in Burrow, Berry, Ham, Steed, Ford, Thorp, and Wich, which carrie a iuſt and equall correſpondence unto the terminations of the Dutch townes; Burg, Berg, Heim, Stadt, Furdt, Dorp, and Wic.

Againe, the reaſon of certaine old Gauliſh words may be ſo fitly given out of our Britiſh tongue, the property and nature of the thing agreeing alſo thereunto, that of neceſſity we muſt confeſſe, either they were names impoſed by the Britans, or els the Britans ſpake French. But let it ſuffice to allege one or two for all.

Celta. The third part of Gaul, ſaith Cæſar, they inhabite, who in their owne language be named Celtæ, and in ours Galli, but of the Greeks Gallathæ. But whence they were called Celtæ and Gallathæ the beſt learned of all the French, could never as yet tell: But let them conſider and ſee, whether it come not of the Britiſh word Gualt, which even yet among the Britans betokeneth the haire or buſh of the head, as alſo Gualtoc, that ſignifieth Comata, that is, with long haire: whereof it may ſeeme that Celtica, Gallathæ, and Galli, are termes mollified by variety of pronuntiation. Now that the Celtæ were called Comati, of their long haire which ſtudiouſly they cheriſhed, all learned men doe jointly grant: and as for the letters, C. and K. Q. and G. how ſhould one (conſidering their force and native ſound) put a difference between them?

Lipſius, de Pronunciatione, pag. 66.

Garumna. That the famous and noble river * Garunne in France carieth a ſwelling ſtreame, and as if the waves were angry and chafed, whereupon Poets name it with theſe attributes, Validus, Aequoreus, and Rapidus Garumna, that is, the ſtrong, ſealike, and ſwift Garumna, it is ſo well known as nothing more: And all that doth Garw in the Britiſh tongue import.

Arar. The river * Arar paſſeth marvellous gently, ſo as by the eie uneth it can be diſcerned which way the ſtreame goeth, whereupon the Poets give theſe Epithets unto it;

Araris

Araris tardior, and Lentus Arar, that is, Slow and Still Arar. But Ara with the Britans betokeneth Still and Slow.

Rhodanus, into which Arar doth fall, runneth downe amaine with an exceeding swift, and violent current: and therefore it is termed, Incitus, Celer, and Praceps, that is, swift, quicke, running headlong: Which name, Rhodanus, disagreeth not much from the British Rhedec, that signifieth a speedinesse in running. Rhodanus. Rhosne.

That the Hils * Gebenna runne out farre into Gaule, in maner of a long continued ridge, Strabo and others doe make mention. And that Keuen among our Britans soundeth as much as the backe or ridge of an Hill, appeareth by the British Dictionarie: and I my selfe haue seene a long chain of hils in Yorke shire, which the Inhabitants there doe call the Kevin. Gebenna. * Montaignes de Avergne or Cemenne.

Considering that stones were in old time erected in Gaule by the high waies side, at the distance iust of euery * thousand and fiue hundred paces: seeing also that the Gaulike Leuca, or League, conteineth, as Iornandes writeth, just so many paces; and Leuch in the British tongue betokeneth a Stone, I would haue the learned Frenchmen say, whether the said Leuca tooke not that name thereof. About the Sea side of that part of France, which was called Narbonensis, where (as the fabulous report goeth) Hercules and Albion fought together, there lie so many stones euery where all abroad, that a man would verily thinke it had rained stones there: whereupon writers name it, the Stonie Strond, and stonie field: The French in these daies call it Le Craux. And yet they know not the reason of this name. But Stones in the British tongue, be termed Craig. * Mile and halfe. Leuca. Stony strond, or stonie field.

They that heretofore inhabited the maritime tract of Gaule, which is next unto us, were in their owne language called Morini: and seeing that the Sea is named Mor in British, it seemeth that thereupon they were so termed. For the Britans call such as dwell upon the Sea coast Morinwyr: like as Aremorica betokened long since in Gaulish, and now in British, By the Sea side. Morini.

Thus Arelate a most famous citie of Gaule, seated in a moyst and waterie soile, may seeme to haue taken that name of the verie site thereof: For Ar in British signifieth Upon, and Laith, Moysture. * Arles. Arelate.

Uxellodunum, saith Cæsar, was a towne having on euerie side a steepe accesse unto it, and situate upon an high Hill. But Uchell among the Britans is as much as steep or loftie, and Dunum with the ancient Gaules, betokeneth a high place or hill: as Plutarch hath taught us out of Clitiphon, in his booke of Riuers: and the same was also in use among the old Britans. * Cadenac in Quercy or Ysoldun. Vxellodunum. Dunum.

The Promontorie * Citharistes, Plinie placeth in Gaule neere unto Marsiles, where now is seene the towne Tolon: but if you aske our Welsh Britans, what is Cythara in their language, they will tell you by and by Telen. Cytharistes. * That is, an Harpe.

Againe, that no doubt may herein bee left behinde, seeing it is euident that the late French tongue is come from the Latine and Germane, yet so as therein neuertheless there remaine verie many words still of the old language: I haue heard of those that be skilfull in both tongues, that verie many of those French words, which cannot be reduced, either to the Latine or German Originall (and therefore may be thought of the old Gallique) doe come as neere vnto the British as is possible. As for example, the Frenchmen at this day use Guerir, and the Britans Guerif for To heale. The French say Guaine, the Britans Gwain, for a sheath: The French, Derechef, the Britans Derchefu, for againe: the French Camar, the Britans Cam, for crooked: the French Bateau, the Britans Bad, for a Boat: the French Gourmand, for an ouer-great-eater, the Britans Gormod, for Quermuch: the French Baston, the Britans Pastwn, for a Staffe or cudgill: French Accabler, the Britans Cablu, for to oppresse: the French Haure, the Britans Aber, for an Hauen: and Comb is still used of both the nations for a Valley. There are of this sort very many more, which haply the Reader may distaste, although they serue especially for this purpose now in hand.

But whereas Tacitus writeth, that the people of the Aestij, used the fashions and habit of the Sueuini, but in language came neerer to the Britans, that maketh nothing against my my Assertion. For the Languages most remote, in some points agree. And of late Augerius Busbequius, Ambassadour from the Emperour to the great Turke, hath observed many Dutch and English words in the Biland Taurica Chersonessus.

Digitized by Google

Epist. 4.

*Little Tartaria or Perocopsca.

Hereupon it may be concluded, that the ancient Gauls inhabitants of the country now named France and Britans of this Isle spake one and the same language: and by necessary consequence the originall of the Britans is to bee reduced unto the Gauls. For we must confesse, as I said before, that France or Gaul was peopled before Britain, as lying neerer unto Armenia: and as it was plentifull in come, so, by the testimony of Strabo, more fruitfull of men: Seeing also, that the Gauls sent out and planted their colonies all abroad, in Italy, Spaine, Germanie, Thracia and Asia: much more then by all reason and congruity in Britain so neere, and no lesse plenteous than the rest. Neither can it chuse but make for the Britans reputation even in the highest degree, to have derived their beginning from those ancient Gauls, who in martiall proesse have surpassed all others: with whom the Romans for many yeeres maintained war, not about superiority in glory, but for the very main-chance of life and living: and who (to use the Poets words rather than mine owne)

Per omnem
Invecti Europam, quasi grando Aquilone vel Austro Importata, gravi passim sonuere tumultu.
Scit Romanus adhuc, & quam Tarpeia videtis
Arx attollentem caput illo in monte superbum;
Pannones, Aemathij norunt, scit Delphica rupes:

Invasions made all Europe through; and like some storme uncouth
Of suddain haile, brought in by force of wind from North or South,
A foule stir kept, with hideous noise, what way they ever went.
The Romanes and their stately Towre, which rais'd with steep ascent
On Tarpie cliffe doth mount aloft, full well this yet do know Pannonians, Æmathians eke, with Delphick rocke also.

And a little after

Intravere Asiæ fines: prope littora Ponti
Ingentem crevere novam, quæ tenditur usque
Ad juga Pamphylum, Garamantica sydera contra, Inter Cappadoces posita & Bythinica regna:

They entred then the Asian bounds, nere Pontus shore they go,
And grew there to a nation new, extending close unto Pamphylian hils, where opposite the Garamants are seen, Seated the Cappadocians and Bithyne realme between.

Neither must we here passe over in silence those reasons which others have alleged to proove the Britans first rising from the Gauls. George Buc, a man both well descended and well learned, observeth out of Mekercus, that the Germans call a French man Wallon: And when the Saxons of Germany came hither, and heard the Britans speake Gaulike, they termed them Walli; that is, Galli, that is to say, Gaules. Buchananus saith moreover, that [Walch] doth not simply among the Germanes signifie a stranger, but rather in a better sense, a Gaul. And withall, he noteth thus much, that the French at this day doe name that country Galles, which we call Wales: also, that the ancient Scots divided all the British nations into Gaol, and Galie, that is to say, after his Interpretation, into the Gallaci and the Galli.

But if our Britans will needs be descended from the Trojanes, they shall not verily have me to gainsay them: and yet shall they in mine opinion ascribe their originall to the Trojanes best of all, by the old Gauls. For some say, as we read in Ammianus, that some few who after the destruction of Troy fled, possessed themselves of Gaule at that time void and unpeopled. But when we thus consider these languages, we cannot but highly admire and set foorth, the divine goodnesse of the most high Creatour toward our Britans, the posterity of that ancient Gomer: who although the Romanes, Saxons and Normans have subdued them and triumphed over them, yet hitherto have they they preſerved their old name and originall language ſafe and ſound: notwithſtanding the Normans ſought to aboliſh the ſame even by their lawes enacted for that purpoſe. Inſomuch as an old Britan, one of their nobility being demanded of Henrie the ſecond, King of England, what he thought of the Britans power and the Kings warlike preparation made againſt them, anſwered not impertinently after this maner; This Nation, quoth he, O King, may now by the aſſaults of your ſelfe and others be moleſted, and for the moſt part deſtroied or weakned, like as heretofore and oftentimes it hath been. But, be the diſpleaſure of man what it will, unleſſe the wrath of God concur withall, it will never be utterly waſted and conſumed. Neither ſhall any other nation or language elſe, (as I ſuppoſe) anſwer in the ſtraight day of judgement before that ſupreme Iudge (for this angle of the world) what ever may happen furthermore, than the Britiſh Britaine. Giraldus in his Topography of Wales.

The British tongue.

THE NAME OF BRITAINE.

BVt you will ſay, If Cumero be the primitive name of the Inhabitants, whence comes Albion, whence comes Britaine? which name hath ſo growne in ure that in ſome ſort it hath cauſed the other to be quite forgotten. But heare, I pray you, that, whereof I am moſt aſſured, becauſe it is moſt true. As the ſelfe ſame things, may be conſidered by divers circumſtances, ſo they may bee called alſo by ſundry appellations, as Plato teacheth in his Cratylus? if you run over all particulars ſeverally both new & old; you ſhall find, that every nation was of others called by divers names, from thoſe that they themſelves uſed. Thus they that in their native tongue had Iſraelites to their name, according to the Greeks were called Hebrews and Iewes, and by the Ægyptians Hueſi, as witneſſeth Manetho; becauſe they had Heardmen for their governours. So the Greeks named them Syrians, who, as Ioſephus writeth, called themſelves Aramæans. They that named themſelves Chuſians, were by the Grecians of their blacke faces called Æthiopians. Thoſe which after their own ſpeech were named Celtæ, the Greeks termed Galatæ, of their milke-white colour, as ſome would have it, or of their long buſh of haire, as I ſaid erewhile. So, they that nominated themſelves after their owne language Teutſch, Numidians and Hellenes, by the Romanes were named Germans, Mauri and Grecians. Even ſo in theſe daies, (not to ſpeake of many other), they which in their owne Idiome are called Muſelmans, Magier, Czecchi and Beſermans, are by all nations in Europe named Turkes, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Tartarians. And even we our ſelues in England, called in our naturall ſpeeche Engliſhmen, are named by the * Britans, Iriſhmen and the highland Scots, Saſſon, that is to ſay, Saxons. By the ſame reaſon we are to deem, that our anceſtours, which termed themſelves Cumero, were upon ſome other cauſe either by themſelves or others, named Britans: From whence the Greekes framed their Βρεττανία, and delivered the ſame as it were from hand to hand unto the Romans. This ground being laid let us enquire now into the names of our Iland. *Welchmen.

As for the name Albion I paſſe not much, conſidering that the Greeks gave it to this Iſle for difference ſake, ſeeing that all the Ilands bordering round about it were called Britaniſh and Britanies. The Iland Britain ſaith Plinie, renowmed in the Greek records and ours both, lieth betwixt North and Weſt over againſt Germany, France and Spaine, but with a great diſtance between them, they being the greateſt parts by far of all Europe. Albion it had to name when all the Ilands adiacent were called Britannies. Whereupon Catullus writing againſt Cæſar ſaid thus; Albion. Britannia.

Hunc Gallia timent, timent Britannia.

Him Gaule doth feare, him Britannies dread.

Who alſo in the ſame traine of verſes, calleth it the utmoſt Iſle of the weſt. And it may ſeem that this name Albion, ſprung from the vanity, the fabulous inventions, and that unconſtant levity of the Greeks in coining of names, which they themſelves termed ἀτεχνον ψευσιλογίαν. For ſeeing they have in fabulous wiſe named Italy Heſperia of Vide Ioſeph. Scalig. in Catull.

Heſperus

Digitized by Google

Heſperus the ſonne of Atlas; France Gallatia of a ſonne of Polyphemus: I cannot otherwiſe beleeve, but that in the ſame veine alſo of fabling they called this Iland Albion, of Albion Neptunes ſonne: which thing Perottus and Lilius Giraldus have put downe in writing. Unleſſe a man would derive it rather of Ἀλφὸν, which, as Feſtus witneſſeth, in Greek ſignifieth White, whereupon the Alpes alſo have their appellation. For environed it is with white rocks, which Cicero termeth Mirificas moles, that is, wonderous Piles: and hereof it is that upon the coined peeces bearing the ſtampe of Antoninus Pius and Severus, Britaine is pourtraied ſitting upon rocks in womans habit. And the Britiſh Poets themſelves name it Inis wen, that is, The white Ile. To ſay nothing of Orpheus in his Argonauticks, (if ſo be they are his), who called the Iland next unto Hibernia or Iërnis, that is, Ireland, which muſt needs be this of ours, Ἀδικεῖον χέρσον that is, the white land: and which a few verſes before, he may ſeeme to have named Νῆσον ἀδικίεσσαν, for λελικίεσσαν. Fracaſtorius alſo writing how that peſtilent day-fever in Britaine, which commonly we call the Britiſh or Engliſh ſwet, hapned by occaſion of the ſoile, as if the ſame had ſtood much upon plaſter, ſuppoſeth that this Iland gat the name Albion of the ſaid plaſteriſh ſoile. As for that prety tale, how Albion was ſo called of Albina, one of thoſe thirty daughters of Diocleſian the King of Syria, which at their very wedding ſolemnity, ſlew their husbands, and beeing brought hither by ſhip without rower tooke poſſeſſion of this Iland firſt, and conceived by ſpirits, brought foorth a breed of giants, who can abide to heare it without indignation, as the moſt loud lie of ſome leaud loſſell?

The ſhape or pourtraicture of Britain.

De morbis lan. tagroſis lib. 1. Sweating ſickneſſe.

Neither is there any cauſe wherefore I ſhould ſo curiouſly ſearch, why Britain, in that ancient * Parodia againſt Ventidius Baſſus, is named Inſula Cæruli, conſidering that it is compaſſed round about with the Ocean, which the Poets call Cærulus and Cærulum. Whereupon Claudian of Britaine, writeth thus:

* A Canticle or Sonet.

Inſula Cæruli.

Cuius veſtigia verrit
Cærulus
Whoſe feet the Azur Sea
Doth ſweepe.

ROMANIA.

I paſſe ouer to ſpeak of Ariſtides, who named it The great, and the furtheſt Iſland. That it was called alſo Romania, Gildas after a ſort doth intimate, who writeth, that ſubdued it was of the Romanes ſo, as that the name of Romane ſervitude ſtucke to the ſoyle thereof: and by and by after, ſo as it might not bee counted BRITANIA, but ROMANIA: and one or two pages after, ſpeaking of the ſame, The Iſland, quoth he, keeping indeed the Romane name, but neither their cuſtome nor law. And proſper Aquitanus in expreſſe words called it the Romane Iſland: hereto may be referred alſo thus much, that when the Statues of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperors were by lightning ouerthrowne, the Soothſayers anſwered out of their learning, that an Emperour ſhould ariſe out of their family, who among other things was to ſet preſidents ouer Taprobane, and to ſend a Proconſull to the Romane Iſland, which the learned underſtand of our Britaine, that was a Prouince * Præſidiall, and neuer Proconſular, as afterwards wee will declare. But that ſometime it was named Samothea of Samothes the ſixth Sonne of Iaphet, beleeve it who that will, for me. Out of whoſe ſhop and forge this comes, I wote full well: even from Annius Viturbienſis forſooth, who under a goodly title, as the maner is of craftie retailers, hath in the name of Beroſus publiſhed, and thruſt upon credulous perſons his owne fictions, and vaine inventions.

Vopiſcus in Florianus.

* Haply, governed by Preſidents.

Samothea.

But touching the name and originall of Britaine, the truth by reaſon of the diuers and ſundry wits of men is verie doubtfull and wavering. In which point, that I may lawfully interpoſe mine owne coniecture, I will by way of Preface, beſeech our Britans to ſpeake and thinke favorably of me, that while they are deſirous to learne, they would be willing to pardon, and not debarre me of that courſe, which Eliot, Leland, Lhuid, and the reſt haue taken. For if it was lawfull for Humfrey Lhuid a moſt learned Britan, without any prejudice at all to Brutus, (nay if hee were commended rather for it,) to derive the name of Britaine otherwiſe, than from Brutus; let it not bee imputed as a haynous offence unto me, who am unwilling to impugne the Storie of Brutus,

Digitized by Google

Brutus, to deduce it from somewhat else, if I can. And that out of the very British tongue, and from nothing else, which as it is least mingled with other languages, and withall most ancient, so in this search it seemeth greatly to helpe and further us. For, ancient tongues are reputed passing necessarie, for the searching out of Originals: and Plato teacheth us, That the first names being through the long continuance of time growen out of use, are preserued in barbarous tongues, as being more ancient than others. And although those things so farre remote from all memorie, are over-cast with such mists and darkenesse, that the truth seems rather to be wished than hoped for: yet for all that, will I doe my best to trace out the truth, and declare as briefely as I can, what my iudgement is: not minding to put downe ought prejudiciall to any man, but most willing, if any one shall bring more probable matter, to welcome and embrace the same. For I affect and loue the truth not in my selfe more than in another, and in whom soeuer I shall see it, I will most willingly and gladly entertaine it. In his Cratylus.

First, by the Readers good leave, I will take this for granted and prooved, that ancient Nations in the beginning, had names of their owne: and that afterwards, from these, the Greeks and Latines, by wresting them to the analogie or proportion of their speech, imposed names upon regions and countreys: to speake more plainly, That people were knowne by their names, before regions and places, and that the said regions had their denominations of the people.

Who can deny that the names of the Iewes, Medes, Persians, Scythians, Aalmans, French or Gauls, Betulians, Saxons, Englishmen, Scots, &c. were before Iewry, Media, Persia, Scythia, Alamaine, France or Gaule, Betulia, Saxonie, England, Scotland? &c. And who sees not, that these words sprang out of the other? Of the Samnites, Insubres and Belgæ, wee read that Liuie and Cæsar first named the countreys themselues * Samnitium, Insubrium, and Belgium. * Or Samnium.

Of the Franci in the time of Constantinus Maximus, as is to be seene in his coynes, the place where they were seated took the name of Francia first: & from the Burgundi Sidonius Apollinaris first framed Burgundie. In the same sort we must of necessitie think, that this our Iland Britaine, tooke denomination from the Inhabitants, or from the Gaules their neighbours: That these first Inhabitants were called Brit or Brith, some things induce me to thinke: First and formost, that verse which goeth about, under the name of Sibylla: Brit.

Ἔσεται ἐν Βρίτταις καὶ ἐν Γαλλοις πολυχρύσοις
Ὠκεανὸς κελάδων πυρὶ μιξιος αἵματι πολλῶ.

Twixt Brits and Gaules their neighbours rich, in gold that much abound,
The roaring Ocean Sea with bloud full filled shall resound.

Moreover, the authoritie of Martial, Iuvenal and Ausonius. Procopius also, who nameth this Isle BRITTA. In like maner the old Inscriptions set up by the Britans themselues, wherein are read, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITTIUS. COH. BRITTON. ORDINIS BRITTON: and at Rome in the Church of Saint Mary the round NATIONE BRITTO: as also in this which is seene at Amerbachium in Getmanie, which I will put downe here underneath because it maketh mention of Triputium, a place in Britaine, not knowen.

* Centurionis.

BRIT. The Saxons alſo themſelues called the Britans in their language Bpit-ƿ, and Witichindas the Saxon euery where nameth the Britans Brita: ſo that the word BRIT is doubtleſſe the primitive, from whence Brito is derived, and from whence the firſt glimpſe of light leading to the word Britaine, ſeemeth to appeare.

Conſidering now that Nations deuiſed their names of that, wherein they either excelled others or were knowen from others: whether in regard of their firſt founders honour; as the Iönes of Iauan, the Iſraelites of Iſraël, the Chananites of Chanaan the ſonne of Cham: or whether in reſpect of their nature, conditions, and inclination; as the Iberi, after the Hebrew Etymologie, becauſe they were miners; the Heneti, for that they were ſtraglers; the Nomades, becauſe they gaue themſelues to the breeding and feeding of Cattell; the Alemans or Germanes, for that they were eſteemed valiant men; the French or Frankners, for being free; the Pannonians, for wearing coats with cloth-ſleeves, as Dio conceiteth it; the Aethiopians of their black hue; and the Albanes, becauſe they were borne with white haire: whereupon, (marke I pray you) as Solinus ſaith, The colour of the haire upon the head gaue name unto a people: Seeing alſo that our countrey men, who were (by a name common to them and their neighbours) called Cimbri and Cumeri, had no marke whereby they might be diſtinguiſhed and knowen from the borderers, better than by that maner of theirs to paint their bodies: for the moſt ſufficient Authors that be, as Cæſar, Mela, Plinie, and the reſt doe ſhewe, that the Britans coloured themſelues with woade, called in Latine Glaſtum (and Glaſſ at this day with them ſignifieth Blew.) What if I ſhould coniecture, that they were called Britans of their depainted bodies? For, whatſoeuer is thus painted and coloured, in their ancient countrey ſpeech, they call Brith. Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould thinke this Etymologie of Britans to be harſh and abſurd; ſeeing the very words ſound alike, and the name alſo as an expreſſe image repreſenteth the thing, which in Etymologies are chiefly required. For Brith and Brit, doe paſſing well accord: and that word Brith among the Britans, implieth that which the Britans were indeed, to wit, painted, depainted, died, and coloured, as the Latine Poets deſcribe them; and Διολόφωτοι, that is, having their backs pide, or medly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them.

Glaſſ.

Britons, whence they tooke their name.

Brith, what it is?

Cynegetic. lib. 1.

Neither will it be impertinent, (as ſmall a matter as it is) to note here, that as I haue obſerued, in the names, of well neere all the moſt ancient Britans, there appeareth ſome ſignification of a colour: which no doubt, aroſe from this kinde of painting. The red colour is of the Britans called Coch and Goch, which in my iudgement lieth couched in theſe names, Cogidunus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The ſame Britans call the blacke colour, Dû, which after a ſort ſheweth it ſelfe in Mandubratius, Cartimandua, Togodumnus, Bunduica, Cogidunus. The white colour is with them named Gwin, the very prints, as it were, and expreſſe tokens of which word, me thinks I ſee in Venutius and Immanuentius. Gwellw among them ſignifieth that, which Color aqueus among the Latines doth, that is to ſay, a wan or wateriſh colour: and this appeareth evidently in the names of Vellocatus, Caruillius and Suella. Glaſſ in the Britiſh tongue, is asmuch as Blew, which is ſeene in the name of King Cuniglaſus. For Gildas interpreteth it to be all one with Fulvus, or as ſome copies haue Furvus Lanio, that is, a Lion tawnie, or coale blacke Butcher. Aure, which betokeneth, a faire yellow of golden colour, bewraieth it ſelfe in Cungetorius and Aruiragus. A lively and gallant colour is with them called Teg, which maketh ſome little ſhew in Praſutagus and Carattacus. But if we be perſwaded, that the Britans borrowed the names of mingled colours, together with the very ſimple colours themſelues of the Romanes; for certaine it is that they tooke from the Romanes, Weriſh, for Viridis, that is, Greene: Melin, for Melinus, that is, a Quince yellow colour: then if I thinke that there lieth cloſe ſome note of the colour Praſinus, that is, Leeke-blade-greene, in Praſutagus; and of the red vermillon or Sinopre colour, called of the Latins Minium, in the name of Aclis minius, King Cinobelinus his ſonne, no man I hope will ſtand againſt mee. Moreover Rufina, that moſt learned Britiſh Ladie, tooke that name of the colour Rufus, that is, ſad red: like as Albane the firſt martyr in Britaine of Albus, that is, White. And if any

Old Britans names, draw from colours.

Digitized by Google

any one that is skilfull in the old Britiſh tongue, would examine the reſt of Britiſh names, which in the ancient Writers are not paſt foure or fiue more in all, wee may well ſuppoſe, that he ſhall finde in thoſe names, as few as they be, ſome ſignification of a colour. Neither muſt we omit this obſeruation, that the commoneſt names at this day among the Britans, Gwin, Du, Goch, Lhuid, were impoſed upon them, from the white, blacke, red, ruſſet, or tawny colour. So that now it may be thought no ſuch wonder, that the whole nation it ſelfe, drew the denomination from painting: conſidering verily, that they in generall painted themſelues: and the verie Inhabitants, both in times paſt, and alſo in theſe our dayes impoſed upon themſelves their names, of Colours. But now to the matter, if haply, all this hath beene beſide the matter.

* That is, Welch men.

This alſo is certeine, that in ſtories a Britan is called in the Britiſh tongue Brithon. I care not for the note of aſpiration, ſeeing that the Britans (who, as Chryſoſtome ſaith, had a hiſſing or liſping pronuntiation) delight in aſpirations, which the Latines have carefully avoided. Now, as Brito came of Brith, ſo did Britannia alſo in my opinion. Britannia, ſaith Iſidore, tooke that name from a word of the owne nation. For what time as the moſt ancient Greeks (and theſe were they that firſt gave the Iland that name) ſailing ſtill along the ſhore, as Eratoſthenes ſaith, either as rovers, or as merchants, travelled unto nations moſt remote and diſioyned far aſunder, and learned either from the inhabitants themſelves, or els of the Gauls, who ſpake the ſame tongue, that this nation was called Brith and Brithon; then they unto the word BRITH added TANIA: which, as we find in the Greek Gloſſaries, betokeneth in Greek, a region: and thereof they made a compound name βριτανία, that is, the Britons-land, for which they have written falſe, βρεττανία: But Lucretius and Cæſar, the firſt Latines that made mention thereof, more truly Britannia. That this is ſo, I doe the more firmely beleeve, becauſe that beſides our Britaine, a man ſhall not find, over the face of the whole earth above three countries of any account and largeneſſe, which end in the termination TANIA: and thoſe verily lying in this weſt part of the world, namely, MAVRITANIA, LVSITANIA, and AQVITANIA. Which names, I doubt not but the Greeks made and delivered to the Latines, as who firſt diſcovered and ſurveied theſe lands. For, of Mauri they framed Mauritania, as one would ſay, the country of the Mauri, which the home-bred people of that land, as Strabo witneſſeth, called Numidia: of Luſus the ſonne of * Liber, Luſitania, as it were the land of Luſus: and Aquitania, perhaps ab aquis, that is, of waters, as Ivo Carnotenſis is of opinion, being a region ſeated upon waters: in which ſenſe, as Plinie writeth, it was before time named Armorica, that is, coaſting upon the ſea. As for Turditania and Baſtitania, names of ſmaller countries, they may hereto alſo be reduced, which likewiſe were in this weſterne tract, to wit, in Spaine, and may ſeem to ſignifie as much as the regions of the Turdi and the Baſti. Neither is it a ſtrange and new thing, that a denomination ſhould be compounded, of a forren and a Greek word, put together. Names are compounded, ſaith Quintilian, either of our own, that is, Latin, and of a ſtrange word put together, as Biclinium, that is, a roome with two beds or two tables: and contrariwiſe, as Epitogium, that is, a garment worne upon a gowne; Anticato, that is, a booke written againſt Cato: or of two forren words joined in one, as Epirrhedium, a kind of wagon. And this maner of compoſition is moſt uſuall in the names of countries. Came not Iceland by compoſition of the Iriſh word Erin, and the Engliſh word Land? Did not Angleterre that is, England, grow together of an Engliſh and of a French word? and did not Franckland (for ſo our Saxons named Francia or France) proceed from a French and Saxon word? Came not Poleland likewiſe from a Polonian word, which among them betokeneth a plaine, and a Germane? Laſtly, was not Denmarke compounded of a Daniſh word, and the Dutch March, which ſignifieth a bound or limit? But in ſo plaine and evident a matter I will not uſe any more words. Neither have we cauſe to wonder at this Greek addition TANIA, ſeeing that S. Hierome in his queſtions upon Geneſis, proveth out of moſt ancient authors, that the Greeks inhabited along the ſea coaſts and Iſles of Europe thorowout, as far as to this our Iland. Let us read, ſaith

In ſerm. Pentecoſt.

TANIA
So at this day the Germans unto the names of countries put to Lande, as Gelderland, Frieſland, Pomerland, &c.

* Or Bacchus.

Lib. 1.

Digitized by Google

he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and thoſe of Siſinius Capito, as alſo the Greek writer Phlegon, with the reſt of the great learned men, and we ſhall ſee, all the Ilands well neere and all the ſea coaſts of the whole world, yea and the lands neere unto the ſea, to have been taken up with Greeke inhabitants, who, as I ſaid before, from the mountaines Amanus and Taurus even to the Britiſh Ocean, poſſeſſed all the parts along the ſea ſide.

That the Greeks came to Britain.

And verily, that the Greeks arrived in this our region, viewed and conſidered well the ſite and nature thereof, there will be no doubt and queſtion made; if we obſerve what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Taurominites (of whom more anon) who was in Britaine in the C L X yeere before Cæſars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an inſcription, Vnto Vlyſſes, in Greek letters; and laſtly, if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romanes time, hath delivered in writing as touching the diſtance of Thule from Britaine. For who had ever diſcovered unto the Greeks, Britaine, Thule, the *Belgick countries, and their ſea coaſts eſpecially, if the Greeks ſhips had not entred the Britiſh and German Ocean, yea and related the deſcription therof unto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of ſix daies ſailing beiond Britain, unleſſe ſome of the Greeks had ſhewed the ſame? Who ever told them of Scandia, Bergos and Nerigon, out of which men may ſaile into Thule? And theſe names ſeem to have been better knowen unto the moſt ancient Greeks, than either to Plinie or to any Romane. Whereupon Mela teſtifieth, That Thule was much mentioned and renowmed in Greeke letters: and Plinie likewiſe writeth thus; Britain an Iland famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of us. By this meanes therefore, ſo many Greek words have crept into the Britiſh, French, & withall, into the Belgicke or low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Bayfius, and Budæus do make their vant and glory in this, that their Frenchmen have been of old φιλελλῆνες that is, Lovers and Studious of the Greeks, grounding their reaſon upon few (French) words of that Idiome, which reteine ſome marks and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrian Iunius joyeth no leſſe, becauſe in the Belgicke words there lie covertly Greek Etymologies: then may the Britans make their boaſt, in whoſe language many words there be derived from the Greeks. Howbeit, Sir Thomas Smith Knight, ſometime Secretary to Queen Elizabeth, a man moſt learned every way, thinketh verily, that this hapned hereupon, for that when all Europe beſides was much troubled and ſhaken with wars, very many of the Greeks flocked hither for refuge, as it were into a ſanctuary.

* The Low countries.

Greek words in the Britiſh Language.

In his book of Engliſh Orthographie.

Thus have you, as touching the Originall and name of Britain mine error or conjecture, whether you will, which if it ſwerve from the truth, I wiſh it were by the truth it ſelfe reformed. In this intricate and obſcure ſtudy of antiquity, it is thought praiſeworthy, ſomewhat to erre: and remember we ſhould withall, that ſuch things as at the firſt ſight being ſlightly thought upon are deemed falſe, after a better review and further conſideration often times ſeem true. Now if any man ſhould ſummon me to appeare before the Tribunall of Verity, I have no other anſwer at all to make. And as for our countrimen the Britans, ſuch as be of the learneder ſort, I doe moſt earneſtly beſeech and deſire them to employ all their labour, induſtry, wit and underſtanding in the ſearching out herof, ſo long, untill at laſt, the truth with her owne cleare bright beames, may ſcatter and diſſolve all miſts of conjectures whatſoever.

THE MANERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE BRITANS.

The Maners of Britans.

AS concerning the Britans, what Acts at the firſt they exploited, what forme of common-wealth they vſed, after what orders and lawes they lived, M. Daniel Rogers, a very good man, excellently well learned, and my eſpeciall friend, promiſed in his writings to informe us: but for that he beeing cut off by untimelie death, hath performed nothing, take here theſe few notes as touching their ancient maners and cuſtomes collected word for word out of ancient authors.

Cæſar.

Digitized by Google

Cæsar. The Britans use for their mony, brazen peeces, or * rings of iron duly weighed and tried to a certain just poise. To taste of hare, hen, and goose, they thinke it unlawfull: howbeit, these they keep for their delight and pleasure. Of them all, those are most civil and curteous by far, that dwell in Kent, which is a country altogether lying upon the sea coast: neither doe these inhabitants differ much in custome from the Gaules. The Inlanders for the most part sow no corne, but live of milke and flesh; and clad themselves in skins. But the Britans all in generall depaint themselves with * woad, that maketh a blew colour; and hereby they are the more terrible to their enemies in fight. The haire of their heads they weare long, and shave all parts of the body, saving the head and upper lip. Ten or twelue of them together use their wives in common, and especially brethren partake with brethren, and parents with their children: but looke what children they beare, theirs they are reputed who first maried them virgins. In battell for the most part they were wont to employ their charioters. First these ride about into all parts of the battell, and fling darts: and with the very fearfull sight of horse, and with the ratling noise of the wheeles, they do most part breake the ranks and put them in disarray, and when they have once wound themselves within the troupes of the horsemen, they alight from their chariots, and fight on foot. The chariot-guiders in the meane time depart a little out of the medly, and bestow themselves so, that if the other be overcharged with the multitude of enemies, they may readily and without let retire in safety. Thus in their battels, they performe the nimble motion of horsemen, and steadinesse of footmen: by daily practise and experience so readie in their service, that they were wont to stay in the declivity of a steepe hill their horses being in their full carriere, quickly turne short and moderate their pace, run along the spirepole and beame of the chariot, rest upon the yoke and harnesse of their steeds, and from thence leape againe into the chariots most speedily at their pleasure. These charioters would retire also many times of purpose, and when they had trained and drawen our men a little way off from their legions, dismount from their chariots and incounter them on foot, having thereby the vantage of them in fight. Furthermore, they never fought thicke and close together, but thin and with great distances between, having set stations or wards of purpose, so as one might succour another, receiving the wearied, and putting foorth new and fresh supplies.

* Annulis. Some read, Laminis, that is, thin plates.

* Luteo.

Essedarij.

The maner of their Essedaries or Charitiers fight.

Strabo. The Britans be taller of stature than the Gauls: their haire not so yellow, nor their bodies so well knit and firme. For proofe of their talnesse, I saw my selfe at Rome very youths and springals, higher by halfe a foot than the tallest men. Mary, they had but bad feet to support them. As for all other lineaments of the body, they shewed good making and proportionable feature. For disposition of nature they partly resemble the Gauls: partly they be more plaine, more rude and barbarous; insomuch that some of them for want of skill, can make no cheeses, albeit they have plenty of milke: others againe, are altogether ignorant in gardening and planting of orchyards, yea and in other points of husbandry. Many Lords and Potentates they have among them. In their wars they use a number of chariots, like as some of the Gauls. Woods stand them in stead of Cities and townes: for when they have by felling of trees, mounded and fenced therewith a spacious round plot of ground, there they build for themselves halles and cottages, and for their cattell set up stals and folds; but those verily for the present use, and not to serve long.

Cæsar likewise. A towne, the Britans call some thicke wood, which they have enclosed and fortified with a ditch and rampier, made for a place of refuge and retrait, to avoid the incursions of the borderers.

Diodorus Siculus. The Britans live after the maner of the old world. They use chariots in fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Trojane war. Their houses are for the most part of reed or wood. Their corne they inne and house with eare and all: threshing out thereof from hand to mouth as their need requires. Faire conditioned people they are, plaine and of upright dealing, far from the subtlety and craft of our men. Their food whereupon they live is simple, and nothing dainty nor like the full fare of rich men. Their Iland is replenished with people.

Pomponius Mela. Britain bringeth forth nations and Kings of Nations; but they be all uncivill, and the farther they are from the continent, the lesse acquainted they be with other kind of riches: onely in cattell and lands they be wealthy. Their bodies are died with woad, whether it be for to make a gallant shew, or for what els, it is uncertain. They pick quarels of war at their pleasure to satisfie their owne willes, and so oftentimes molest one another: but principally upon an ambitious desire of rule and soveraignty, and an encroching minde they have to enlarge their owne possessions. Their fight is not only with horse or footmen, but also with wagons and chariots harnessed and armed after the Gaulike maner, such as they call Covinos: and in those they use axeltrees armed at both ends with hookes and sithes.

Digitized by Google

Glasto vel vitro. See before.

Cornelius Tacitus. *The Britans neerest unto * Gallia resemble likewise the Gaules: either because they retaine still somewhat of the race from which they descended, or that in countries butting one against another the same aspects of the heavens doe yeeld the same complexions of bodies. But generally, if a man consider all, it is most likely, the Gaules which lay neerest peopled the land unto them. In their ceremonies and superstitious perswasions, there is to be seen an apparent conformity: The language differeth not much: Like boldnesse to challenge and set into dangers: when dangers are come, like feare in refusing: Saving that the Britans make shew of more courage, as being not mollified yet by long peace. For the Gaules also were once, as we read, redoubted in war, till such time as giving themselves over to ease and idlenesse, cowardise crept in, and shipwracke was made both of manhood and liberty together. And so is it also befallen to those of the Britans which were subdued of old: The rest remaine such as the Gaules were before. Their strength in the field consisteth of footmen. Yet some countries there, make war in wagons also. The greater personage guideth the wagon, his waiters and followers fight out of the same. Heretofore they were governed by Kings, now they are drawen by petty Princes into Partialities and Factions: and this is the greatest helpe we Romans have, against those puissant Nations, that they have no common counsell. Seldome it chanceth that two or three States meet together and concur to repulse the common danger: So, whilst one by one fighteth, all are subdued.*

* France.

In another place. An usuall maner it was with the Britans to seeke for the direction of the Gods, by looking into the inwards of beasts: and to make warre under the conduct of women; neither mattereth it whether sex beare rule ouer them. Whereupon learned men thinke Aristole spake of the Britans, were he writeth, That certaine warlike nations beyond the Celtes, were subject to the government of women.

Politic. lib. 2. cap. 7.

Dio Nicæus, out of the Epitome of Xiphilinus, as touching the Britans in the North part of the Island. They till no ground: They live upon prey, venison and fruits. For of fish, although there is exceeding great plenty thereof, they will not taste: their abode is in tents, naked and unshod: Wives they use in common, and the children borne of them they all doe foster among them: the Comminaltie for the most part doth governe: most willing they be to practise robbing. In warre, their seruice is out of Chariots: the horses they have, be little and swift of pace: their footmen runne most speedily: whiles they stand, they bee strongest: the armour and weapons that these use, are a shield and short speare, in the neather part whereof, there hangeth a round bell of brasse like an apple, that when it is shaken, they might with the sound terrifie and maskre the enemies: they have daggers also. But principally, they can endure hunger, cold, and any labour whatsoever. For, sticking fast in the bogs up to the head many dayes together, they will live without food; and within the woods they feed upon the barks and roots of trees. A certaine kinde of meat they provide ready for all occasions, whereof if they take but the quantitie of a Beane, they are not wont either to be hungry or thirstie.

Herodian. They knowe no use at all of garments, but about their belly onely and necke, they weare yron; supposing that to be a goodly ornament, and a proofe of their wealth, like as all other Barbarians esteeme of gold. For why? their very bare bodies they marke with sundry pictures, representing all maner of liuing creatures; and therefore it is verily, that they will not be clad, for hiding (forsooth) that painting of their bodies. Now they are a most warlike nation, and very greedy of slaughter, content to bee armed onely with a narrow shield and a speare, with a sword besides hanging downe by their naked bodies. Unskilfull altogether how to vse either corslet or helmet, supposing the same to be an hindrance unto them, as they passe ouer the bogs and marish grounds: through through the hot vapours arising, from whence the skie and aire is there most part foggie.

The rest of the particulars, which are very few, I will lightly gather, and crop here and there. Plinie writing of Magicke: But what should I (quoth he) rehearse these things, in an art that hath passed over the Ocean also, so far, as beyond which, nothing is to be discovered but aire and water? And even at this day verily, it is in Britaine highly honoured, where the people are so wholly deuoted unto it, and that with all complements of ceremonies, as a man would thinke the Persians learned all their Magicke from them. The Britans Art Magicke.

The same Plinie. There groweth an herbe in Gaule like unto Plantaine, named Glastum, that is, Woad, with the juice whereof, the women of Britaine, as well maried wiues, as their young daughters anoint and die their bodies all ouer; resembling by that tincture the colour of Aethiopians, in which maner they use at some solemne feasts and sacrifices to goe all naked. Again, There is not a daintier dish of meat known in Britain, than are the Chenerotes, fowles lesse than wilde geese. Also, The Britans wore rings on their middle finger. Likewise, The Britans manured their grounds with Marle in stead of dung. Glastum. Chenerotes. Brants or Soland geese.

That they inamelled or branded themselves (as it were) with certaine marks which Tertullian termeth Britannorum stigmata, that is, The Britans marks, Solinus sheweth: The Countrey (saith he) is partly peopled with Barbarians, who by the meanes of artificiall incisions of sundry formes, haue from their childhood diuers shapes of beasts incorporate upon them: and thus having these their markes deeply imprinted within their bodies, looke how a man groweth more and more, so doe these pictured characters likewise waxe. Neither doe these sauage Nations repute any thing to signifie their patience, more than by such durable skars to cause their limbs to drinke in much painting and colour. Their maner of painting.

Dio. The Britans worshipped as their Goddesses, Andate, that is, Victorie and Adraste. Andates.

Cæsar and Lucan. Ships they had, of which the Keeles, the footstocks also, or upright standards were made of slight timber: the rest of the body framed of windings and oysier was couered ouer with leather. The Britans Navigation.

Solinus. How long so ever they held on their course under sayle, so long the Saylers forbare to eat. They used a drinke made of barley: and so doe wee at this day, as Dioscorides writeth, who nameth Curmi wrong for Kwrw, for so the Britans call that, which wee terme Ale. Curmi.

Many of them together had but one wife among them, as Eusebius recordeth in Euangelica Preparatione 6.

Plutarch reporteth, That they lived one hundred and twentie yeeres, for that the cold and frozen countrey wherein they dwelt, kept in their naturall heat.

But what those ancient times of cruell Tyrants were, whereof Gildas writeth, I know not, unlesse he meaneth them that in this countrey tooke vpon them the sway of gouernment against the Romans, and were at that time called Tyrants: for soone after, he addeth thus much out of S. Hierome: Porphyrie raging in the East-parts as a mad dog against the Church, annexed thus much to his furious and vain stile: Britaine (saith he) a province plentifull of tyrants. The Tyrants of Britaine.

Neither will I speake of their ancient religion, which is not verily to be counted religion, but a most lamentable and confused Chaos of Superstitions: For when Satan had drowned the true doctrine in thicke mists of darkenesse, The ugly spectres of Britaine (saith that Gildas) were meere Diabolical, exceeding well neere in number those of Aegypt: whereof some wee doe see within or without desert wals, with deformed lineaments still, carrying sterne and grim lookes after their wonted maner. The religion of the Britans.

But, whereas it is gathered, that the Britans were together with Hercules at the rape of Hesione, and that, out of these verses which they take to be made by Cornelius Nepos, whiles he describeth the mariage of Telamon and Hesione:

——Et in aurea pocula fusi
Inuitant sese pateris plebs mista, Britanni.

Mid cups of gold, a medly sort thus lying all along,
Boll after Boll quaft lustily, and Britans them among.

That

Digitized by Google

That is altogether poeticall, and I can cleerely by good evidences, as it were, under hand and seale proove, that the author thereof, was not, as the Germans would have it, Cornelius Nepos, but one Ioseph of Excester: as who hath made mention of our King Henrie the second, and Thomas, Archbishop of Canterburie.

Brodæus Miscellan. lib. 3. cap. 4.

Whether Ulysses entred thus farre, whose arriuall in Caledonia, a certaine altar engraven with Greek letters, as Solinus saith, hath testified, Brodæus maketh doubt: and I would judge, that erected it was rather in the honour of Ulysses, than by Ulysses himselfe: although they avouch Ulysses to bee the very same Elizza, that was Iaphets sonne. For, apparent it is out of Histories, and alreadie I haue said as much, that the most ancient Greeks undertooke long voiages by sea and land: no marvell then it ought to seeme, if there be also some names and monuments of theirs found in divers places. And often times they derived those names, not so much from their owne denominations, as from Worthies, who were held in as much reverence, if not more, among them, as were either Confessors or Martyrs among Christians. Like as therefore the names of Saint Iohn, Saint Dominicke, Saint Francis, and infinit other Saints departed, are imposed upon new-found places, so also that it hapned time out of minde with the Greeks, who will denie? But who among all the Worthies, made either more wandring voiages, or of longer continuance at Sea, than did Ulysses? No marvell then, if Saylers made vowes very often unto him above all others; and unto those places where they arrived and landed, did consecrate according to their vowes, names from him. Thus * Ulyssippo upon the mouth of the river Tagus tooke the name: and thus elsewhere other monuments of Ulysses, Laertes and their companions; which are not properly to be referred unto Ulysses as the founder: but we must think, that by the Greeks who discovered strange and forraine coasts, they were dedicated in the honour of that Worthy, who of all others had trauelled and seene most.

Ulysses neuer in Britaine.

*Lisbon.

Whereas Iohn Tzetzes in his Treatise entituled, Varietie of Stories, hath written, that our British Kings bestowed upon that renowned Cato the elder, who had perpetuall conflict with the maners of the Roman people, certaine presents for his vertues sake; let him make good and save his owne credite himselfe: yet thus much all the world knoweth, how that Writer is full fraught with fables.

Neither would I have you beleeve, that Alexander the Great came out of the East Indies, to Gades, and so forward to Britaine, howsoever Cedrenus, malgree all other Historiographers, writeth thus: Ἐκεῖθεν δὲ ὡρμᾶτο Ἄφασιν καὶ τὰ ἑσπέρια καὶ τὰ Βρεττανήσια ἔθνη γενόμενος, χιλίας ὁλκάδας κατασκευασάμενος: that is, And from thence being come unto Phasis, Gades, and the British nations, and having furnished himselfe with a thousand hulkes &c. Of the same stampe is that also which Trithemius reporteth out of Hunnibald, that King Bassanus put away his wife, the King of the Orkneys daughter, in the 284. yeere before the birth of Christ, and thereupon he with the aid of the Britans King, made warre upon Bassanus.

King Alexander the Great, neuer in Britaine.

Nor let any man thinke that Hannibal ever warred in Britaine, becausse wee read thus in Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth Book, τοῦτο δ' ἐστιν ἐν ὀλίγῳ, συγκλειομένῳ ὑπ' Βρεττανίας εἰς πάνυ βραχεῖς τόπους ἀννίβα. Thus much in briefe, now that Hannibal was enclosed within the streits of Britain.

Hannibal neuer in Britain.

For the place is corrupt, and for βρεττανίας it should bee red βρεττιανὰς, as it is in Dio, book 42. For in both places there is speech of the Brutij in Italie. And yet I may not deny, but that about this time the Greeks came to our Iland. For, Athenæus in describing out of Moschion a most ancient author, that ship of Hiero, at the hugenesse and workmanship whereof all men wondred, reporteth, that the maine mast thereof was with much adoe found by a certaine swineheard in the mountaines of Britaine, and by Phileas Taurominites the Mechanick conveied into Sicilie. But I feare, lest the Criticks judge that the true reading here also should be βρεττιανὰς for βρεττανίας, and likewise understand it of the Brutian mountaine in Italy.

King Hiero his ship.

But it seemeth, that the Britans were entermingled with the Cimbri and the Gaules in those expeditions which were made into Italy and Greece. For, besides the Britans with the Cimbri in their expeditions.

Digitized by Google

the name common to them both, it is recorded in a moſt ancient Britiſh Booke entituled Triadum, wherin mention is made of three mighty hoſts leauied from among the Britans, That a certain forrain captain leavied a marvellous puiſſant army from hence, which having waſted a great part of Europe, at the laſt ſat him downe and abode hard by the Greekiſh ſea (meaning perhaps Gallatia). That Brennus a King ſo famous in Greek and Latin writers both, was a Britan, there be that thinke they can eaſily proove. For mine owne part, thus much only I know, that his name is not yet grown out of uſe with the Britans, who in their language call a King Brennin, whether in honorable memory of him I dare not determine. Certes, that Britomarus the militare captaine among them, of whom Florus and Appian ſpeake, was a Britan, the very name doth evince, which ſignifieth as much, as A great Britan. Neither will I wreſt to my purpoſe for to make the ſaid Brennus a Britan borne, that place of Strabo, wherein he writeth, That Brennus was by birth a Prauſian. Ne yet dare I (whereas Ottho Friſingenſis writeth, That the Briones, a generation of the Cimbri, ſeated themſelves at the head of the river Dravus,) change Briones into Britones. And yet what dare not our Criticks do now adaies?

The books of Triades.

Brennus.

Brennin.

Britomarus a Britan.

Lib. 2. cap. 13.

But yet truly, to ſpeake my mind once for all: As, the Romanes for all they grew to that greatneſſe above others, were not for a long time knowen, either to Herodotus or to the Greeks; the Gaules alſo and the Spaniards for many yeeres utterly unknown to the old Hiſtoriographers: ſo of this minde I have alwaies been, that late it was ere the Greeks and Romanes heard of the Britans name. For, that little booke, Of the world, which commonly goeth abroad under the name of Ariſtotle, and maketh mention of the Britans, of Albion and Hierne, is not ſo ancient as the time wherin Ariſtotle lived, but of later daies by far, as the beſt learned men have judged. Polybius verily, the famous Hiſtorian, who accompanying that noble Scipio travelled over a great part of Europe CCCLXX. yeeres or thereabout before Chriſts nativitie, is the ancienſt author, as far as I remember, that mentioneth the Britan Iles, where he writeth: Of the vtmoſt Ocean, the Britan Iles, the plenty of tynne, gold and ſiluer in Spaine, old writers with different opinions, haue reported much. But they ſeeme to have been little more than by name may bee gathered by this he writeth before in the ſame booke. Whatſoever, ſaith he, between Tanais and Narbo bendeth Northward, to this day there is no man knoweth: and whoever they be, that either ſpeake or write any thing thereof, they doe but dreame. And no leſſe may they ſeem to do in theſe daies, who in a prodigall humour of credulity are perſwaded, that Himilco beeing commanded by the State of Carthage to diſcover the Weſterne ſea coaſts of Europe, entred into this Iſle many yeeres before that time, ſeeing we have no records of the ſaid navigation, but only a verſe or two in Feſtus Avienus. But why it was ſo late ere Britain was known, the reaſon may ſeem to be, partly the ſite of the Iland ſo remote and diſioyned from the continent: and in part, for that thoſe old Britans, then barbarous as all other people in theſe parts, and living cloſe to themſelves, had no great commerce and traffique with other nations. And ſurely in this point Dio is of the ſame opinion. The anciente ſt, ſaith he, as well of Greeks as Romans knew not for certeine ſo much as that there was any Britain at all: and thoſe of later times after them, made queſtion whether it were the maine or an Iland: and much writing there was pro & contra of both opinions, by thoſe who verily had no aſſured knowledge thereof (as who had neither ſeen the country nor learned of the native inhabitants of what nature it was) but relied only vpon bare conjectures every one according to his time and diligence emploied that way. But the firſt Latin writer to my knowledge, that made mention of Britain, was Lucretius in theſe verſes concerning the difference of aire:

Late ere Britaine was known to the Greeks.

Lib. 3.

Nam quid Britannum cælum differre putamus,
Et quod in Ægypto eſt, quà mundi claudicat axis?

For aire, what difference is there in Britain Ile thinke we,
And Ægypt land, where Artick pole to ſtoupe men plainly ſee?

Now that Lucretius lived but a little before Cæſar, no man denieth: at what time we are taught out of Cæſar himſelfe, that Diuitiacus King of the *Soiſſons, and the moſt moſt mightie Prince of all Gaule governed Britaine. But this is to be underſtood of the maritime coaſts. For Cæſar himſelfe witneſſeth, that no part of Britain, ſave only the ſea ſide, and thoſe countreys which lie againſt Gaule, was knowen unto the Gauls. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth, that Brtaine had experience of no forreiners rule: for neither * Dionyſius, nor Hercules, nor any other Worthy or Demigod have we heard to haue attempted war upon that people. Now Cæſar, who for his noble Acts is called Divus, was the firſt that ſubdued the Britans, and forced them to pay a certaine tribute.

*In France.

* Bacchus.

From his time and no further off, muſt the Writer of our Hiſtorie fetch his beginning, of his worke, if he throrowly weigh with judgement what the learned Varro hath in times paſt written, and my ſelfe already heretofore ſignified: Namely, that there bee of times three differences: the firſt from the creation of man unto the Flood or Deluge, which for the ignorance of thoſe daies is called ΑΔΗΛΟΝ, that is, Obſcure and uncertaine: the ſecond from the floud to the firſt Olympias, (being 3189. yeres after the Creation, and 774 before Chriſt) which in regard of many fabulous narrations reported in that time, is named ΜΥΘΙΚΟΝ, that is, Fabulous: the third from the firſt Olympias unto our daies, and that is termed ΙΣΤΟΡΙΚΟΝ, that is, Hiſtorical, becauſe the Acts therin done, are contained in true Hiſtories. And yet I am not ignorant, that albeit the learned nations (ſetting aſide the Hebrews) have attained to the knowledge of nothing before this age, yet the Britiſh Hiſtory of Geffrey, tooke beginning three hundred and thirtie yeeres before the firſt Olympias, being a very rude and ignorant age in theſe parts, which he called Fabulous. And even from hence, for feare leſt the ground-worke being ill laid, the reſt of the building would go on no better, becauſe both the preſent place ſeemeth to require it, and alſo from it the chiefe light may ariſe to the traine of the narration enſuing; let me ſummarily gathering matter here and there briefly deliver the acts of the Romans in Britaine, not out of feined fables, which were vanitie to recite, and meere folly to beleeve, but out of the incorrupt and ancient moniments: wherein, I will not intercept matterof glorie and commendation from them, who ſhall take in hand to purſue this argument in more ample maner.

Cenſorinus de Die Natali.

Three times or ages of the world.

Vncertaine.

Fabulous.

Hiſtoricall.

ROMANS IN BRITAINE.

Brit. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſtorye: 2.

WHen Fortitude and Fortune were ſo agreed, or Gods appointment rather had thus decreed, that Rome ſhould ſubdue all the earth, Caius Iulius Cæſar, having now by conqueſts over-runne * Gaule, to the end, that by a ſucceſſive traine of victories atchieved both by land and ſea, he might joyne thoſe Lands together which nature had ſevered, (as if the Romane world would not ſuffice) caſt an eie unto the Ocean; and in the foure and fiftieth yeere before the incarnation of Chriſt, endevoured to make a journey into Britain; either for that in all his Gauliſh warre, there came under-hand aid from thence, or becauſe the Britans had received the * Bellovaci that were run from him, or as Suetonius writeth, allured with hope of the Britiſh pearles, the bigneſſe and weight whereof he was wont to peiſe and trie by his hand; or rather upon an ardent deſire of glorie: which we may moſt eaſily beleeve, conſidering that he reiected the Embaſſadors of the Britans, who having intelligence of his deſignement, repaired unto him, and promiſed to putin hoſtages, and to become obedient to the Roman Empire.

Iulius Cęſar.

*France.

Pomponius Sabinus out of Seneca.

* Thoſe about Beauvois or Beauvoſin.

But his entrance into the Iſland, I wil compendiouſly ſet down, even in his own very words: Conſidering the coaſts, ports, and landing places of Britaine, were not well knowne unto Cæſar, he ſent C. Voluſenus before with a galley, to diſcover what hee might; who, having taken what view of the countrey hee could in five daies ſpace, returned. In the meane time, the reſolution of Cæſar being made knowen unto the Britans by merchants, many particular States ſent their Embaſſadours to him into Gallia, promiſing both to put in pledges, and

Digitized by Google

and also to submit themselves unto the Roman Empire. Having then exhorted these to continue in that mind still, he sent them home backe againe, and together with them Comius of * Arras, a man in those countreys of great authoritie, (for the * Atrebates had before time departed out of Gaule, and planted themselves there) to perswade the said Cities and States to accept of the friendship and protection of the people of Rome. No sooner was hee set a shore, but the Britans cast him into prison and hung irons upon him. Meane while, Cæsar having gotten together and put in readinesse about foure skore ships of burden, for the transporting of two Legions, and eighteen other besides, which hee appointed for the horsemen, put out to sea from the countrie of the * Morini at the third watch, and about the fourth houre of the day arrived upon the coast, at an unfit landing place: For the hilles lay so steepe over the sea, that from the higher ground a dart or javelin might easily be cast upon the shore beneath. Having therefore at one time both wind and tide with him, he waighed anchor, and sailed eight miles from that place unto a plaine and open shore, and there he rid at anchor. But the Britans perceiving the Romanes determination, sent their horse and chariots before, and there kept the Romans from landing. Here the Romanes were exceeding much distressed; For, the ships were so great, that they could not ride neer unto the shore, where the sea was ebbe: the souldiers in strange and unknown places, being loden with heavy armour, were at one instant to leape down of necessity from those tall ships, withall to stand amid the very billowes, and to fight with their enemies: whereas contrariwise the Britans were perfect in the knowledge of those places, lightly appointed, as having all parts of their bodies at liberty, fought either from the dry shore where they had sure footing, or wading not far into the water. Hereupon the Romanes being terrified, behaved not themselves with the like courage and alacrity as before time. But after that Cæsar had caused the Gallies to be removed from those hulkes, to be rowed and laid against the open side of the Britans, and so from thence the enemy to be beaten backe, and displaced with slings, ordinance, and shot of arrowes; the Britans being troubled with the strange forme of those Gallies, the stirring of the Oares, and the unusuall kind of their engines, recuked. Then the Aegle-bearer of the tenth Legion, earnestly beseeching the Gods, that it might fall out happily for the Legion: Leape down, quoth he, my fellow souldiers, unlesse ye will forsake your standerd and betray it into the enemies hands: For mine own part, I will be sure to do my devoir both to the common-weale and also to my Generall: so foorthwith he cast himselfe into the sea, and began to advance the * Aegle against the enemy: then, all the rest followed hard at his heeles (But if we beleeve *Iulian, Cæsar himselfe was the first that came downe from his ship). The fight on both parts was very eagre. But the Romanes encombred with their heavy armor and weapons, tossed with the waves, not able to get any firme footing, and put out of array, were wonderfully troubled; untill such time as Cæsar had caused the shipboats, pinnaces and smaller vessels to be manned with souldiers; and when he saw need of helpe sent them to rescue such as were overcharged. As soone as the Romanes got footing on the dry land, they made head together, charged the Britans and put them to flight: but they were not able to follow them in chace, for want of the horsemen, that were not yet arrived in the Iland. The Britans being overthrown in this battell, presently dispatched Embassadors unto Cæsar to treat of peace, and together with them the foresaid Comius of Arras, whom they had detained bound in prison: and withall, laid the fault upon the multitude and excused all by their own ignorance. Cæsar soone pardoned them, and commanded hostages to be delivered unto him: which they presently performed in part, and gave their word to bring in the rest. Thus was peace concluded foure daies after that Cæsar was landed in Britain.

* Atrebatens. Those of Arras, and the territorie about it.

* The coast of Picardy.

* That is, the main standard.

* In Cæsaribus.

At the same time, those eighteen ships which transported the horsemen, approching so neere the coast of Britanny that they were within view, by reason of a sudden tempest that arose, were cast upon the west part of the Iland: from whence with much adoe they recovered the continent of France. In the same night also it hapned, that the Moone being in the full and the tides very high; both the Gallies which were drawn up to the shore, were filled with the tide, and the ships of burden also that lay at anchor, so shaken with the tempest, that they became altogether unserviceable. This being known to the Princes of Britain, when they understood also, that the Romanes now wanted horsemen, shipping, and provision

proviſion of corne, they rebelled and reſolved to cut off their proviſion of graine. Cæſar ſuſpecting that which fell out indeed, brought corne daily out of the fields into his campe, and with the timber and other ſtuffe of thoſe twelve ſhips which were moſt weatherbeaten and diſmembred, repaired the reſt. While theſe things were in action, the ſeventh legion, being ſent out to fetch in corne, and buſie in reaping, the Britans ſuddenly ſet upon, and ſo with their horſemen and chariots all at once, encompaſſed them round about.

Eſſedarij, Chariotiers.

*The maner of their fight from out of theſe chariots, is thus, as I related a little before: Firſt, they ride up and downe into all parts, and caſt their darts; and with the verie terrour of the horſes, and ratling of the wheeles, often times diſorder the rankes, and when they have wound themſelves between any troups of horſemen, they forſake their chariots, and fight on foot. In the mean time the guiders of the chariots, drive a little aſide out of the battell, and place their chariots ſo, as that if the other chance to bee overcharged with the multitude of enemies, they might have an eaſie paſſage unto them again. Thus they performed in all their fights the nimble motion of horſmen, & the firm ſtability of footmen: ſo ready with daily practiſe and exerciſe, that in the declivity of a ſteepe hill, they could ſtay their horſes in the very full carriere, quickly turn ſhort, & moderat their pace, run along the beam or ſpire of the Chariot, ſtand upon the yoke & harneſſe of the horſes, yea, and from thence whip in a trice into their chariots again. But by the cõming of Cæſar to reſcue them in ſo good time, the Romans tooke heart a freſh, and the Britans ſtood ſtill, who having conceaved good hope to free themſelves for ever, preſuming upon the ſmall number of the Romane forces, together with the ſcarſitie of corne among them, had aſſembled a great power, and were come to the campe of Cæſar. But he received them even before the camp with a battell, put them to rout, ſlew many of them, and burnt their houſes far and neere. The ſame day came meſſengers from the Britans to Cæſar, intreating peace, which they obteined: upon condition, that they ſhould double the number of their hoſtages, whom hee commanded to bee brought into Gaule. And ſtreight after, becauſe the * Aequinox was at hand, hee put to ſea, hoiſed ſaile from Britaine, and brought all his ſhips ſafe unto the continent of France. And thither, two onely of all the States of Britaine ſent hoſtages unto him, the reſt neglected it. Theſe exploits thus performed, upon the relation of Cæſars Letters, the Senate decreed a ſolemne proceſſion for the ſpace of twentie daies: although hee gained nothing to himſelfe, nor to Rome, but the glorie onely of an expedition enterprized.*

*In Autumne or September, when daies and nights are equall.

Dio. lib. 39.

*The yeere next enſuing, Cæſar having gotten together a great fleet, for what with ſhips for convey of corne and victuals, and what with other private veſſels that every man had built for to ſerve his owne turne, there was 800. ſaile and above, and the ſame manned with five Legions, and 2000. horſemen, he launched from the port called * Iccius, and landed his forces in that part of the Iſle, where he did the yeere before. Neither was there an enemie to be ſeene in the place. For albeit the Britans had been there aſſembled with a great power, yet terrified with ſo huge a number of ſhips, they had ſecretly withdrawen themſelves into the upland countrie. Here Cæſar encamped in a place convenient, and left two cohorts, and three hundred horſmen as a garriſon or guard for his ſhips. Himſelfe having by night marched forward twelve miles, eſpied the enemies: who having gone forward as farre as to the river, began to give battell: but beaten backe by the cavallery, they conveied themſelves into a wood, and there lay hid, as lodged in a place ſtrongly fortified, both by nature and mans hand. But the Romanes with a Teſtudo, or targnet-roofe, which they made, and a mount that they raiſed againſt their fortifications, tooke the place, and drave them out of the woods; neither followed they them with any long purſuit, for that they were to fortifie the campe in that very place.*

*Neere Callais.

The next day, Cæſar divided his forces into three regiments, and ſent them out to purſue the Britans: but ſtreightwayes called them back againe, for that hee had intelligence by meſſengers of ſuch a tempeſt at ſea the night before, that his navie was ſore beaten, run one againſt another, and caſt on ſhore. And thereupon himſelfe in perſon returned to the ſhips, and with the labor of ten daies haled them all up to land, and enclоſed them and his campe together within one and the ſame fortification, & ſo goeth to the place from whence he was returned. Thither alſo had the Britans aſſembled themſelves with greater forces, under the conduct of Caſſiuellaunus or Caſſibelinus, unto whom, in a publike counſell of all the Britans, the Caſſibelinus.

Digitized by Google

the whole government and managing of the warre was committed; whose cavallery and
A charioters together, gave the Romanes a sharpe conflict in their march, wherein many of both sides lost their lives: But the Britans after some intermission of time, whiles the Romans were busie in fortifying their campe, charged fiercely upon those that kept ward before the campe; unto whom when Cæsar had sent for rescue two cohorts, and those the principal and choysest of two legions, they most boldly, and with full resolution, brake through the thickest of the enemies, and from thence retired in safety. The next morrow, the Britans shewed themselves here and there in small companies from the hils; but about noone they made an assault upon three legions, and all the horsemen sent out for to forage; yet beaten
B backe they were, and a great number of them slaine. Now by this time were all their auxiliarie forces that had met together, departed; neither encountred they afterward the Romanes with their maine power. Cæsar then marched with his army to the river Thames, and so to the confines of Cassivelaunus: Vpon the farther banke of this river, yea and under the water, they had covertly stucke sharpe stakes, and embattelled themselves with a great power. But the Romanes went and waded over with such violence, notwithstanding they had but their heads cleere above the water, that the enemy was not able to endure the charge, but left the bank, and betooke themselves to flight: not skared, as Polyænus writeth, at the sight of an Elephant with a turret upon his backe.

The river Tames.

Cassivellaunus having now no courage to contend any longer, retained only foure thou-
C sand Charioters with him, and observed the Romanes iourneys: and so often as their horsemen went foorth and straied out in the fields for forage or booty, he sent out his chariots, and kept them from ranging all abroad. Meane while, the * Trinobantes submit themselves unto Cæsar, and intreated that he would defend Mandubratius (whom Eutropius and Beda out of the Pagnorents of Suetonius now lost, call Androgorius, and our Britans Androgeus) from the oppression of Cassivellaunus, and send him unto them to be their soveraign. Of them Cæsar required and received forty hostages, and corne for his army, and therewith sent Mandubratius. Then the * Cenimagni * Segontiaci, * Ancalites, * Bibroci and * Cassij, following the example of the Trinobantes yeeld unto Cæsar: By whom he understood, that Cassivellaunus his towne was not far off, fortified with woods and bogs: which as he assaul-
D ted in two severall places, the Britans flung out at a back-way: but many of them in their flight were taken and put to the sword.

Trinobantes. *Where now Essex and Middlesex lie. Mandubatius, who also is named Androgeus. Now Suffolk, Norfolke, Cambridge, Huntingdonshires.

Whiles these things were a doing, foure pety Kings that ruled Kent, to wit Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus and Segonais, by a mandate from Cassivellaunus did set upon the campe where the Romanes navy was kept, but by a sally that the Romanes made, they were driven backe: and Cingetorix one of the said Kings was taken prisoner. Then Cassivellaunus, having received so many losses, and troubled most of all with the revolt of the states, sent Embassadour to Cæsar by Conius of * Arras, tendring unto him a surrendry. Whereupon Cæsar, being determined to winter in the continent of France, commanded pledges to be brought unto him, and imposed a yeerly tribute that Britain should pay unto the peo-
E ple of Rome. But withall he inhibited Cassivellanus and commanded him to doe no harme either to Mandubratius or the Trinobants. And thus with a great number of captives he embarked his army, and transported it backe at two severall passages. Thus much Cæsar of his own war in Britain.

* About Holeshot and Silecester. *The Hundred of Henly upon Tames. * The hundred of Bray and Caishow * Atrebas.

But Eutropius out of some writings of Suetonius now not extant, addeth thus much moreover. Sceva one of Cæsars souldiers, with foure other fellow servitours, crossed over Sceva.
sea before, in a small barke unto a rocke nere the Iland, and by the reflow or ebbe of the Ocean the while, was there left. The Britans many in number set upon the Romanes beeing but few: howbeit the rest who here and there had been his companions returned in a ship: Sceva tarieth behind still undanted, notwithstanding he was overlaid with darts from every F side: First he made resistance with his pike or massie speare: and at length tooke him to his sword and fought alone with many of them. When he was weary and wounded, and had withall lost his helmet and target after many a stroke, with two habergeons he swam unto Cæsars campe, and craved pardon of his Generall for his fool-hardy rashnesse: whom Cæsar advanced to the honor and degree of a Centurian.

When Cæsar came first into this Ile, (as Cotas, one who then in the campe had

Digitized by Google

Athenæus. the ſecond place, hath put downe in a Greek Commentary of his, concerning the Romane Common-wealth) of ſuch temperance he was, and ſo far ſhort of the pompe of our age, that he had no more ſervants and attendants ordinarily in his domeſticall retinue, but three. A

What time as Cæſar, ſaith Seneca, trauelled into Britaine, and could not containe his owne felicitie within the Ocean, he heard that his daughter was departed this life, drawing with her a traine of publike calamities. But he paſſed over this griefe of heart as lightly as he was wont all things elſe. Being returned with conqueſt out of Britaine, he dedicated unto Venus Genitrix in her temple, a breaſt-plate made of Britiſh pearles. Some of his Britiſh priſoners, he appointed for ſeruices in the Theater, and about theſe rich hangings of Tapeſtrie there, wherin he had woven in colours his victories in Britaine. Which the Britans were wont, being themſelves therein wrought, to remoove and take away; whereupon Virgill, B

Plinie.

Cornius Honoratus.

Purpureaq; intexti tollant aulæa Britanni.

Let Britans purple Tapiſtrie remoove, wherein themſelves are wrought.

Neither were the Britans appointed to the miniſteries, and offices only about the Theater, but alſo (I note it by the way) to the Emperors Licter, at it appeareth manifeſtly by an antique inſcription of this age, wherein there is made mention of a Decurio, over the Britiſh Licter-bearers. Of this victorie of Cæſar, an old Poet hath thus written: C

In the Gardens of the Cardinall de Carpento.

Vis inuicta viri reparatâ claſſe Britannos
Vicit, & hoſtiles Rheni compeſcuit undas.

Lo here the mans undaunted heart! with navie rigged new,
He Britans vanquiſh'd, and fell waves of Rhene he did ſubdue.

Hitherto may be referred thoſe verſes alſo of Claudian, touching the valour of the Romanes.

Nec ſtetit Oceano, remiſſaq; ingreſſa profundum, Vincendos alio quæſivit in orbe Britannos.

In Ocean rhode it reſted not, nor put to ſea for nought,
But Britans in their other world, for conqueſt ſake it ſought. D

Moreover Cicero in a certaine Poëme now loſt, which hee entituled Quadrigas, caried Cæſar in poeticall Chariots of triumph, through the midſt of all praiſe and commendation, for his acts atchieved in Britaine, as Ferrerius of Piemont perſwadeth us: for thus he writeth, Pingam Britanniam coloribus tuis, penecillo autem meo, that is, I will depaint Britaine in your colours, but with mine owne pencill. Howbeit in the judgement of others, he terrified onely the Britans with a fortunate fight, or as Lucane (who nothing favoured the houſe of the Cæſars) wrote;

Territa quæſitis oſtendit terga Britannis.

He ſought the Britans, and for feare to them his backe he ſhew'd. E

And Tacitus a right grave and ſubſtantiall author, writeth, That he diſcovered onely, but delivered not unto the Romanes, Britaine: and Horace implieth, that he ſcant touched them at all, when to flatter Auguſtus, hee ſaith, That the Britaine was not medled withall, in theſe words:

Intactus Britannus ut deſcenderet
Sacrâ catenatus viâ:

Or that the Britans heretofore not dealt withall in fight,
Might, chained now, the ſacred ſtreet deſcend, in all mens ſight.

And Propertius,

Te manet invictus aut Romano Marte Britannus.

The Britans yet unconquered by Romanes, ſtay for thee. F

So farre it is off, that it ſhould be true which Velleius Paterculus, a flattering Hiſtorian of the Emperours Court wrote, Bis penetrata Britannia à Cæſare, that is, twiſe Cæſar paſſed through Britaine, when as hee ſcarce made entry into it: For, many yeres after this entrance of Cæſar, this Iſland was left to the free government of their owne Kings, and uſed their owne Lawes.

Dio.

Auguſtus

Digitized by Google

A Auguſtus ſeemeth of purpoſe, and with good aduiſe to have neglected Britaine; when as he called that * Conſilium, as Tacitus ſaith, that is, Policie, or a point of ſtate; haply becauſe it was thought the beſt pollicie, and ſafeſt for the State, That the Romane Empire ſhould be kept; & held within bounds, to wit, the Ocean, the rivers Iſter and Euphrates limits ſet by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine, (for ſo Auguſtus himſelfe ſpeaketh in Iulian;) that is, invincible; and leſt, as a ſhip of exceeding great bulke, it might not poſſibly be well governed and managed, but endangered through the own unweldy hugeneſſe ſinke anone, and fall downe at once, which uſually befalleth unto over-great States: or, as Strabo is of opinion, he deſpiſed it, ſeeB ing neither any cauſe at all of feare, nor hope of much profit from the Britans; and yet it ſeemed, that no ſmall damage would bee preſented from other nations, lying round about the ſaid Iſland. But what cauſe ſo ever it was, certes, after Iulius, and the edge of Romane armes turned upon the Common-wealth it ſelfe, Britaine was a long time forgotten, even in time of peace. Nevertheleſſe at laſt Auguſtus departed from Rome, with a purpoſe to transferre the warre into Britaine: At which verie time Horatius framed this kinde of praier unto the Goddeſſe Fortune at Antium.

Serves iturum Cæſarem in ultimos
Orbis Britannos.

Save Cæſar now that readie is, a journey long to take,
C Againſt the Britans moſt remote, a conqueſt there to make.

But after he was come into Gaule, the Britans ſent Embaſſadors unto him to crave peace: and verily the Britiſh Princes and Potentates, having by Embaſſages and dutifull ſervices obtained his amity, dedicated preſents and oblations in the Capitol: and brought the whole Iland in a maner to be familiar unto the Romanes, and as it were their owne: ſo as they could endure taxes and impoſts, which now are nothing grievous unto them, raiſed out of ſuch merchandiſe and commodities as are ſhipped to and from out of Gaule and Britannie: and thoſe be Ivory workes, Bits and bridles, chaines and wreathes, * veſſels of the mettall Electrum* and of glaſſe, with other baſe and common wares of like ſort. And therefore there needs no garizon for that D Iland. For it would require one Legion at the leaſt, and ſome horſemen, if tributes were to be levied from thence: and the ſaid tributes would but countervaile the charges of maintaining a gariſon there: for of neceſſity by impoſing a tribute, the revenewes comming by tollage and pondage and ſuch like impoſts, would be leſſe: and if any violent courſe were uſed, ſome perill or other muſt be looked for. The yeere following likewiſe, Auguſtus intended a ſecond expedition into Britain, becauſe there was ſome variance about the Covenants: but by occaſion of ſome inſurrection made in Spaine by the Cantabri and others, that iourney was ſtaied. Neither hath any man reaſon to beleeve Landinus, or Servius, or Philargyrus, who have recorded that Auguſtus triumphe over the Britans, and that out of theſe verſes of Maro.

Strabo.

Electrina.*
A pale and whitiſh gold.*

E Et duo rapta manu diverſo ex hoſte trophæa,
Bisq; triumphatas utroq; a littore gentes.

And trophees twaine caught by ſtrong hand from divers enemies hoaſts,
And nations twice triumphed of likewiſe from both the * coaſts.

 Of Eaſt and Weſt.*

Surely, in regard of that ſurrendry of the Britons, Horace wrote thus;

Cælo tonantem credidimus Iovem
Regnare: Præſens Divus habebitur
Auguſtus, adjectis Britannis Imperio, gravibuſq; Perſis.

We thought before, that Iupiter in heaven above doth raigne
F For thundring there: but now ſhall be on earth Auguſtus here Reputed God, becauſe he did to Romanes Empire gaine
Both Britans and fierce Perſians, of whom they ſtood in feare.

Tiberius nothing tranſported with an inordinate deſire of extending the Empire, ſeemeth to have reſted in that Counſell of Auguſtus; For hee brought out a booke written with Auguſtus his own hand, wherein was contained the whole wealth and Tiberius.

Digitized by Google

eſtate of the common-weale, what number as well of Romane Citizens as Allies were in armes, how many Navies, Kingdomes and Provinces, what tributes and impoſts [belonged to the ſtate] with a reſolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the bounds. A
Which adviſe and reſolution of Auguſtus contented him ſo well, as Tacitus reporteth, that he would attempt nothing in Britaine, nor maintaine any garizon or deputies there. For whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what coaſts or countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it ſeemeth that the Britans entertained amity with the Romanes. For when as at the ſame time Germanicas ſailed the Ocean, ſome of his companie by force of tempeſt driven to this Iland, were by the Princes thereof ſent backe againe.

C. Caligula. That Caius Cæſar caſt in his mind to enter this Iland, it is certain: but that by his B ſhittle braine, ſudden repentance, and wonderfull attempts againſt Germany, it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which Suetonius in Caligula. he hovered) with the fame of ſome mighty peece of worke, he made a bridge between Baie and the Piles of Puteoli, three miles, and 600. paces in length. But having atchieved no greater exploit, than taken to his mercy Adminius the ſonne of Cino-Adminius. bellinus king of the Britans, who being by his father baniſhed, had fled over ſea with a ſmall power and traine about him, he ſent magnificent and glorious letters to Rome, as if the whole Ile had been yeelded up into his hands: warning and wiſhing the poſts ever and anon, to ride forward in their wagon, directly into the market place and the Curia: C and in no wiſe to deliver the ſaid miſſives unto the Conſuls, but in the temple of Mars, and that in a frequent aſſembly of the Senate.

After this to the Ocean he marcheth, as if he minded to tranſlate the war over into Britaine: Where even upon the very ſhore he embattelled his ſouldiers: himſelfe tooke ſea in a Galley, and after he had lanched out a little way from the land, returned againe: and then mounting up an high pulpit, ſat him down, gave his ſouldiers the ſignet of battell, and commanded the trumpets to ſound: and ſo on a ſudden charged them to gather cockles, muskles and other ſmal ſhel-fiſhes. Having gotten theſe ſpoiles (as one indeed wanting enemies ſpoiles for to adorne a Trophæe) he waxed proud as if he had conquered the Ocean: and having Dio. rewarded his ſouldiers, he brought ſome of thoſe cockles, and the other ſhel-fiſh to Rome, D that there alſo he might ſhew the bootie which he had gotten. In token and memoriall of this brave high turret, out of which, as from a watch-tower, there might blaze all night long, lights and fires for the better direction of ſhips at ſea in their courſe. The ruines whereof are ſometimes ſeene at a low water in the ſhore of Holland, and by the people there inhabiting is called Britenhuis. Who alſo find oftentimes ſtones engraven with let-
* Watch-tower. ters: of which one had theſe Characters, C. C. P. F. which they (I wote not how truly) expound thus Caius Caligula Pharum Fecit, that is, *Caius Caligula this * Pharus made*. But of this watch-tower more at lage, I will write in my diſcourſe of Britiſh Iſlands.

Claudius. Afterwards, the inland parts of Britaine, waſted rather with Civil wars and facti- E ons, than by the force of the Romans, after ſundrie overthrowes and ſlaughters of both ſides, came at the length by little and little under the ſubjection of the Romans. For, while the States fought ſeverally one by one, they were all vanquiſhed: running ſo one upon anothers deſtruction, that untill they fell to utter confuſion, they had not in groſſe, a feeling of the particular loſſes that each one ſuſtained. And thus farre forth alſo wrought ambition in them, that many became falſe and diſloiall, yea, and ſome fled from their countrey-men, making choiſe of the Romanes protection, ſwearing allegeance unto them, and practiſing by all means to ſubject their natiue coun-Bericus. trey, unto their government. Among whom the principall was one Bericus, who moved and perſwaded Claudius the Emperour, to give the attempt upon Britaine, which F none aſſaied to doe ſince the time of Iulius Cæſar, and which then was up in a broile and commotion, for that the ſaid Fugitives were not rendred again unto them. Where-
A. Plautius. upon he commanded Aulus Plautius, at that time Prator, to goe with an armie into Bri-
Dio. taine: who had much adoe to withdraw the ſaid armie out of Gaule, as being much diſcontented to make warre without the compaſſe of the world, and therefore drawing out the time

Digitized by Google

A time in length with many delaies. But when * Narcissus sent from Claudius, began to mount up into the Tribunall of Plautius, and to make a speech unto the host, the soldiers more incensed with indignation streightwaies cried all at once, Io. Saturnalia (for the maner is of Slaves, during the Saturnalia, to celebrate that festivall time in the habit of their Masters) and so presently with willing hearts followed Plautius. The forces being divided into three parts, for feare lest if they arrived all in one place, they might be put by their landing; caried backe by a gale of wind, found some trouble in their passage: yet taking heart againe, because as they sailed along, there was seene a fire-drake in the Element shooting from the East to the West, they were conveied over into the Island, and no man stopped B them. For the Britans supposing verily, in regard of those things which I have related, that they would not come, had not assembled themselves: and therefore without any conflict, they lay hidden within bogs, marishes, and woods, in hope by lingering delaies to wearie the Romanes, that they should be forced without any service exploited to retire hence, like as it had befallen unto Iulius Cæsar. Wherefore, Plautius tooke great paines in seeking of them out. After he had found them (now they were not free States, but ruled under divers kings) first he discomfited Caractacus, afterward Togodumnus, the sonnes of Cinobellinus for their father was deceased. When these were fled, part of the * Bodunni, who were subject to the * Catuellani, he received into his protection: and having left a garrison there, he went forward to a certaine river: but because the Britans thought the Romans could not possibly passe C over without a bridge, they lay entamped more carelesly on the farther side thereof. Plautius therefore, sent the Germanes, who were wont to wade thorow the most swift and violent rivers, even in their verie armour. These comming upon the enemies at unawares, hurt not a man of them, but wounded the horses onely that drew their chariots, who when they were troubled and disordered, the men were not able to sit them. Then sent he Flavus Vespasianus, (who afterwards became Emperour) and his brother Sabinus with him as Lieutenant, who likewise having passed over the river, surprised very many of the Barbarians, and slew them. Neither fled the rest away, but the morrow after joyned battell, wherein the victorie remained doubtfull: untill such time as C. Sidius Geta, at the very point to have been taken prisoner by the enemies, vanquished them so, as that for his good service, D triumphall honours were granted unto him, although he had not been Consull. From thence the Barbarians retired themselves to the river Thames, where it discharged it selfe into the sea, and with the flowe thereof riseth high.

This river they soone passed over, as being skilfull of such places as would affoord them firme footing, and were passable fords. And the Romans in pursuing them were in danger. Soone after, when the Germanes had swum over a second time whiles some of them passed over at a bridge, higher up the river, environing the Barbarians on every side, they made a great slaughter of them: but when unadvisedly they followed after the rest, they fell upon blind bogs and lost many of their men. Hereupon, and for that the Britans by occasion of Togodumnus his death abated not their courage one whit, but rather prepared themE selves to fight the more fiercely in revenge of his death, Plautius for feare went no farther: but setting a guard to keep what he had gotten, sent for Claudius, having a warrant and commandement so to doe, in case he were overlaid with any extraordinary violence. For which expedition among much other Equipage, Elephants also were gotten togither and prepared. Claudius advertised of these newes, committed the affaires of the City, and the souldiers likewise to the charge of Vitellius (upon whom, as also upon himselfe, he had conferred a Consulship for six moneths). Then went he downe in person by water from Rome to Ostra, and so from thence sailed to Marshils: and travelling the rest of the way partly by land and part by sea, came to the Ocean, embarked, crossed the chanell into Britain, and went directly forward to his forces expecting him by the Thames side. When he had reF ceived them into his owne charge, and passed over the river, he fought a set battell with the Barbarians, assembled against his comming, and obtained victory. Then tooke he in * Camalodunum the roiall seat of Cunobellinus, and many thence he drave, others upon their yeelding he tooke to mercy. For these acts performed, divers times he was stiled Imperator, a thing directly against the Romanes custome, for, lawfull it is not in one war to assume that name oftner than once. Furthermore, Claudius disarmed the Britans, and committed as

* A freed servant of Claudius.

* Otherwise to Duobuni, Glocester shire, and Oxford shire.

* Or Catieuchlani, that is, Buckingham shire, and Hartford shire.

Elephants.

* Now Maldon.

Digitized by Google

*well them to be governed, as the reſt to be ſubdued, unto Plautius. Himſelfe made ſpeed to Rome, ſending before him Pompeius and Silanus his ſonnes in Law, with tidings of this victorie. Thus much Dio. A

* That had married his daughters.

Howbeit Suetonius reporteth, that part of the Iland he tooke into his hands upon ſubmiſſion without any battell or bloodſhed. Sixteen daies or thereabout himſelfe ſtaied in Britain: in which time he remitted unto the Gentry and Nobility of the Britans the confiſcation of their goods: For which benefit of his, they frequented his temple and adored him as a God. Thus returned he to Rome, in the ſixt moneth after that he went foorth from thence.

So great a matter it was and of ſuch conſequence to have conquered even ſo ſmall a parcell of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in the honor of Claudius, yeerly Games, triumphall Arches both in Rome and alſo at * Geſſoriacum in Gaul, and a moſt honorable and ſtately triumph: to the beholding whereof the governors of Provinces alſo, yea and certaine baniſhed perſons were permitted to come into Rome: a Navall coronet was fixed upon the loover of the Palace, as it were the enſigne of the Britiſh ſea ſubdued by him: the Provinces brought in Crownes of gold, and * Gallia Comata one above the reſt, waighing 9. pounds: and the hither part of Spaine another of 7. pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitoll by the ſtaires on his knees, ſupported and heaved up by his ſonnes in Law on either ſide. He entred in triumphingwiſe the * Adriaticke ſea, embarked in a veſſell more like to ſome exceeding great houſe than a ſhip. Unto his wife Meſſalina was allowed by the Senate the higheſt place to ſit in, as alſo to ride in a Carroch, or hanging coach. After this, he ſet foorth triumphall plaies and games, having taken upon him for that purpoſe the Conſular office and authority. The ſolemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when he was gone aſide from the ſight, others had the charge thereof. Horſe runnings for the prize hee promiſed as many as thoſe daies would admit: Howbeit above ten there were not: for between every courſe of horſes, Beares were killed, champions performed their devoirs, and choice boyes ſent for out of Aſia danced the warlike dance in armor. Moreover, upon Valerius Aſiaticus, Iulius Silanus, Sidius Geta and others, in regard of this conqueſt, he heaped Triumphall ornaments. He ſuffered Licinius Craſſus Frugi to follow after himſelfe in this triumph, mounted upon a trapped courſer with a rich capariſon, and arraied in a robe of Date tree worke. Upon Poſidius the Eunuch hee beſtowed a ſpeare ſtaffe without an head: upon C. Gavius, cheines, bracelets, horſetrappings, and a coronet of gold, as is to be ſeen in an ancient marble at Taurinum.

* Bologne.

* France.

* Venice Gulfe.

B C D

In the meane time Aulus Plautius went on with the reliques of this war, and ſped ſo well in his battels, that Claudius paſſed a decree, that he ſhould ride in pety triumph ovant: and when he was entred into the City, himſelfe went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way both going and comming. And Veſpaſian even then ſhewed by the deſtinies, whom Claudius aſſumed unto him to beare a part of this Britiſh war, partly under the conduct of Claudius himſelfe, and partly of Plautius, fought thirty battels with the enemy: two moſt mighty nations, and above twenty townes together, with the Iſle of * Wight he ſubdued. For which worthy exploits, he received triumphall ornaments, and within a ſhort ſpace two ſacerdotall dignities, with a Conſulſhip beſide which hee bare the two laſt moneths of the yeere. Titus alſo ſerved here in quality of a Tribune under his father, with exceeding commendation for his induſtry and valour, (for valiantly he delivered his father when he was beſieged): and no leſſe report of his modeſt cariage: as appeareth by a number of his Images and titles to them annexed, thorowout the Provinces of Germanie and Britaine. The reſt of the Occurrences which hapned in Britain afterward unto the very latter end of Domitian, Tacitus, who beſt can do it will declare by his own words to this effect.

Veſpaſian.

* Vectem. Sueton. in Veſpaſian. cap. 4.

E

Sueton. in Tit. cap. 4.

F

P. Oſtorius Proprator.

P. Oſtorius Proprator in Britan was welcomed at his firſt landing with troubles and tumults. The enimies ranged all over the Allies country, and uſed ſo much the greater violence, for that they thought the new captaine as unacquainted with the army, (the winter

Digitized by Google

A ter also being now begun) would not come foorth to encounter. But he knowing well that the first successes alwaies breed either feare or confidence, gathered with all speed his readiest cohorts, advanced toward the enemy; and having slaine those which made head against him, pursued the rest that were dispersed for feare they should ioine againe: and lest an hatefull and faithlesse peace might give neither captaine nor souldier any rest; he went about to disarme as many of them as he suspected, and by raising forts and setting garisons upon the two rivers *Aufona and the *Severn to restrain and hem in the Britons. Which the Iceni first of all refused, a strong nation and unshaken with battels, because of their owne motion they had sought our alliance and amity. And at their instigation, the B people adioining chose a place to fight in, compassed about with a rude and rusticall rampire, having a narrow entrance of purpose to hinder the comming in of horsemen. This sense the Romane captaine, albeit he had under his conduct the power of his allies, alone without the maine forces of the Legion assaieth to breake thorow: And having bestowed his cohorts in rankes setteth the troupes of horsemen in like readinesse to performe their service. Then after the signall given, they broke open the said rampire, and disordered the enemies encumbred and penned within their own hold. And they knowing in their own conscience they were no better than rebels, and seeing all passages for escape stopped up shewed great valour and courage in defending themselves. In which fight M. Ostorius the lieutenants sonne deserved the honor of saving a Citizen.

*Aufonas, or Ausonas.
*The Nenn at Northampton.
*Sabrina.
Iceni.

C Vpon the discomfiture and slaughter of these Iceni, they that wavered between war and peace became setled and were quiet: and so the army was led against the *Cangi. Whose territory they wasted, harried and spoiled all over: whiles the enemies durst not shew themselves in the field, or if privily and by stealth they attempted to cut off the taile of our armie as they marched, they paid for their craft and deceit. Now by this time were the Romanes come well neere to the sea coast that looketh toward Ireland, when certain troubles and discords sprung up among the *Brigantes, brought their leader backe, being certainly resolved to attempt no new matters, before he had setled the old. But as for the Brigantes, some few being put to death that began first to take armes, he pardoned the residue, and all were quieted. The *Silures could neither by cruelty nor faire meanes bee reclaimed but
D they would needs warre; and therefore no remedy there was but to keepe them under with garisons of Legionary souldiers. Which to performe more easily, the colonie called Camalodunum consisting of a strong company of old souldiers was brought into the countries by conquest subdued, for succour and sauegard against Rebels, and an inducement to traine the Associats to observe the lawes. Certaine Cities and States were granted by way of Donation to King Cogidunus, according to the ancient custome of the people of Rome, that they might have even Kings to be instruments of servitude and thraldome.

*Cangi.
Cheshiremen as some think.

*Brigantes.
Yorkshire, Lancashire, Bishoprick of Durham, Westmorland, Cumberland.
*Southwales, as Herefordshire, Rudnorshire, Brecknockshire, Monmouthshire, and Glamorganshire.
Camalodunum a colonie.

Then went the Romanes from thence against the Silures, who besides their owne stoutnesse trusted much in the strength of Caractacus, a man whom many dangerous aduentures which he had waded thorow, and as many prosperous exploits by him atchieved, had so lifted up,
E that he caried the reputation and præeminence above all the British Commanders. But hee in subtill craft, and knowledge of the deceitfull waies, having the advantage of us, though otherwise weaker in strength of souldiers, translateth the warre into the country of the *Ordovices: and there, joyning to him as many as feared our peace, resolveth to hazard the last chance, having chosen a place for the battell, where the comming in, and going forth, with all things else might be incommodious to us, but for his very advantageous. Then, against the high hilles, and whersoever there was any easie passage, and gentle accesse, he stopped up the way with heaps of stones raised in maner of a rampier: withall, there ranne hard by a river, having a doubtfull foord, and the severall companies of his *best souldiers had taken their standing before the fortifications. Besides all this, the leaders of every nation went about, exhorted and encouraged
F their men, by making lesse all causes of feare: and kindling in them good conceits of hope, with all other motives and inducements to warre. And verily Caractacus bestirring himselfe, and coursing from place to place, protested, That this was the day, this the battell, which should begin either the recovery of their libertie for ever, or else perpetuall bondage. And here, he called upon his ancestors by name, who had chased Cæsar the Dictator from hence, through whose valour they were freed from the Romane axes, and tributes, and enjoyed still the bodies of their Caratacus.

*Ordovices.
Northwales, as Montgomeryshire, Merioneth-shire, Carnarvanshire, Denbighshire, and Flintshire.
*Majorum, or nationum, that is, of Nations or States.
*Maiorum, or Nationum, of the Nations.

Digitized by Google

their wives, and children undefiled. As he uttered these and such like speeches, the generall A multitude of the souldiers made a noise about him, and bound themselves by oath every one according to the religion of his countrey, that they would not give way and yeeld for any weapons or wounds whatsoever. This couragious and cherefull alacritie of theirs, astonied the Romane captaine, considering the river just before his face, the rampier beside which they had cast up, the high hils over their heads, nothing but terrible, and full of defendants, put him into a wondrous fright. Nevertheless the souldiers called hard for battell, crying still, that there was nothing which valour could not overcome. The Præfects and Tribunes also with like words, much enforced the ardour and courage of the whole armie. Then Ostorius having viewed round about what places were unpassable, and what yeelded passage, advanceth forward his men in B boiling heat of choler, and easily wadeth over the river. Being come to the banke and rampier aforesaid, so long as the voley of darts continued on both sides, our men received more wounds, and in greater number were slaine. But after that by making of a targnet roofe of fence, those rude and ill fashioned joynts of stones were plucked asunder, and the fronts of both armies came close to hand-strokes, without ods; the Barbarians fled to the hill tops. But thither also, as well the heavie corselets, as the light armed souldiers brake in: whiles these shot their darts and javelins at them, the other preassed thicke and close together upon them: Contrariwise the Britans rankes were broken and disordered, as who had neither head-peece nor coat of fence. If they thought to resist our auxiliarie forces, they were beaten downe with the arming swords and massie pikes of the Legionarie souldiers: if they turned to make head against them, C they were likewise slaine with the Speares, and bastard swords of the auxiliaries. A noble and renowmed victorie this was. The wife and daughter both of Caractacus, were taken prisoners, his brethren also yeelded themselves. Himselfe, as generally there is no trusting to succour in adversitie, craving defence and protection of Cartismandua Queene of the Brigantes, was by her taken, bound with yrons, and delivered to the Conquerours, nine yeeres after the warre began in Britaine. Whereupon the fame of him being carried over into the Ilands, and spread abrode thorowout the Provinces adioyning, was famous also in Italie: in so much as they desired to see who he was that so many yeeres had defied and contemned our forces. Neither was the name of Caractacus meanly esteemed of at Rome. And Cæsar whiles he extolled his owne worth and honour, made the conquered Prince more glorious. For why, the people also was assembled and D called, as to see a notable spectacle. The cohorts of the Emperours guard stood all armed in good order within an open plaine lying before their campe. Then as King Caractacus his vassals and dependants marched before, the caparisons, chaines, and whatsoever he had wonne in wars against strangers, were brought in a shew: then, his brethren, wife and daughter: and last of all himselfe was shewed to the people. The prayers of all the rest were by reason of feare, base, and nothing savouring of nobilitie: but Caractacus, neither hanging downe his head, nor with words craving any mercy, when he stood before the Emperours tribunall, spake in this wise.

If my moderation in prosperity had been as great as my nobility and fortune was, I had come rather as a friend into this City, than a Captive: neither would you haue disdained to receive me with covenants of peace, being a Prince descended of Noble Progenitors, and E a commander over many nations. My present state, as it is to me dishonorable, so to you it is magnificent. I have had horses, men, armour and wealth: what marvell if against my will I have forgone them all? For if yee will be rulers over all men, it followeth that all men must abide servitude. If presently I had yeelded and been delivered into your hands; neither had my fortune nor your glorie been renowmed: and oblivion would have followed my punishment. But if you save me alive, I shall be an example of your clemencie for ever.

What became of his daughters, Tacitus?

Vpon these words Cæsar pardoned him, his wife and brethren. And they being all unbound, did their reverence likewise unto Agrippina, (who sat aloft not far off in another high seat to be seene), giving her the like praises and in the same degrees of stile as they F did the Emperor himselfe. Surely a strange and unexampled precedent among all our ancestors, that a woman should sit and command the Romane ensignes. But shee carried her selfe as a fellow and associate in the Empire, gotten by her progenitors. After this, the Lords of the Senate were called together, who made long and glorious discourses as touching the captivity of Caractacus. Neither was this, as they affirmed, lesse honorable, than when Pub.

Scipio

Digitized by Google

A Scipio ſhewed Siphax: Luc. Paulus Perſes, or whoſoever els exhibited, conquered Kings unto the people. As for Oſtorius, decreed it was hee ſhould be honoured with triumphall ornaments.

Theſe conqueſts of Britain, writers have numbred among the moſt famous monuments and teſtimonies of the Romanes proweſſe. And thereupon Seneca writeth thus; Claudius might make his boaſt that he firſt vanquiſhed the Britans: for Iulius Cæſar did but ſhew them only to the Romans. And in another place, writing of the ſame Claudius

Ille Britannos
Vltra noti
Littora Ponti,
B Et cæruleos
Scuta Brigantes,
Dare Romuleis
Colla catenis
Iuſſit, & ipſum
Noua Romana
Iura ſecuris
Tremere Oceanum.

The Britans, thoſe, that ſeated are beyond the known ſea-coaſt,
C And Brigants with blew-painted ſhields, he forced with his hoaſt,
To yeeld their necks in Romane chaines as captive to be led,
And even the Ocean this new poure of Romane ax to dread.

And Seneca the Tragicke poet in his Octavia, verſified in this maner concerning Claudius,

Cuiq; Britanni
Terga dedere, ducibus noſtris
Antè ignoti juriſq; ſui.

And unto whom the Britans ſhew'd their backs, who er'ſt unknowen
To all our Captaines liv'd by lawes and cuſtoms of their owen.

D And in the ſame tragedie, for that he had paſſed over the Thames, En qui oræ Tamiſis primus poſuit jugum.

Ignota tantis claſsibus texit freta:
Interq; gentes barbaras tutus fuit,
Et ſæva maria; conjugis ſcelere—Occidit.

Behold, who firſt the mouth and coaſt of Thamis, did ſubdew
And ſpread with mightie fleets thoſe Firths, the like that never knew:
With nations rude, in raging ſeas, who lived ſafe and ſound,
By wicked hand of curſed wife his death at home he found.

Semblably Ægiſippus, ſaith thus of Claudius, Witneſſe hereof is Britaine, which li- E ing without the world, is by the might of Romans reduced into the world. Whom the former age knew not, the Romans victory hath diſcouered: and even they now are become ſervants, who knew not what ſervitude was: being borne only for themſelves, and alwaies free unto themſelves: even they who being by the interflow of the ſea divided from the power of their ſuperiors, could not ſtand in feare of them whom they knew not. A greater matter therfore it was, to have paſſed over to the Britans, than to have triumphed over the Britans. And in another place, Britaine alſo, which lieth hid amidſt the waues, begained to the Romane Empire by force of armes: by the triumph over which Iſland, Rome was thought to be more wealthy, Claudius reputed more warie and politick, and Nero eſteemed more fortunate. Alſo in another paſſage, which deſerveth moſt of all to be put downe here, The very Elements alſo, have done homage to the name of F the Romans: to whom likewiſe even the round world hath ſworne alleageance already, which is encloſed and bounded with the Romane Empire: and in one word is of many called the Romane World. For if we ſearch into the truth, the whole armie it ſelfe is compriſed within the Empire of the Romans: upon which the Roman valour, having gone forward ſtill beyond the Ocean, hath ſought for it ſelfe another world, and in Britaine an Iſland remote from the confines of Lands hath found out for it ſelfe another poſſeſsion. To conclude, they who are denied

denied the benefit, not onely of the free burgesie of Rome, but in maner also of all converse with men, are directed and awarded thither, there to dwell as persons banished out of the world. The Ocean now hath reined up his bounds: For the Romans know how to seeke into his inward secret parts. And Iosephus in the person of Titus, speaketh thus to the Iewes: What greater wall and barre than the Ocean? wherewith the Britans being fensed and inclosed, doe yet adore the Romans forces.

Moreover, as touching this argument, that renowmed Ioseph Scaliger, in his Catalects, hath saved and freed from rust and mouldinesse certaine verses of a most learned Poet though vnknown: which, because they are not every where to be found, I will not think much of my pains to put down: for they are as good as good may be. Now, that they be sundry Epigrams, and therefore distinctly to be considered, Iohn Obsopæus the German, a passing learned young man, hath out of ancient (manuscripts) parchments very lately, enformed me:

Antonius Delrio readeth otherwise in some places: the divers readings therefore, I have here set to.

Ausonius nunquam tellus violata triumphis,
Icta tuo, Cæsar, fulmine procubuit
*Oceanusq; tuas ultra se * respicit aras,*
*Qui finis mundo est * non erit imperio.*

That Land whose honour never felt, by Roman triumph, wrong
By dint late of thy thunder-bolt, ô Cæsar, lay along:
The Ocean seeth * beyond it selfe thine altars, to adore,
* That, will * not bound their Empire; now, which did the world before.

* Prospicit, that is, seeth before him.
* Nunc, now. Or before, * prospicit it respicit, behinde.
* Non, if Nunc, reade thus.
* That will be now thine Empires bound, which was of world before.

Victa priùs nulli, jam jam spectata triumpho,
Illibata tuos gens jacet in titulos.
Fabula visa diù, medioq; recondita ponto
Libera victori jam modò collo dedit.
*Euphrates Ortus, Rhenus * includerit Arctos,* Oceanus medium venit in imperium.

* recluserat.

A people erst vntouch'd, unfoil'd, and conquered of none,
Late seen in triumph, to thy stile hath title added one:
Thought but a tale long time, as hid in mid-sea past all view,
To Victors yoke now yeelded necke, that never bondage knew.
How ever Rhene shuts up the North, Euphrates Easterne land,
It skils not, now that th'Ocean sea is whole at thy command.

Libera non hostem, non passa Britannia Regem,
Aeternum nostro quæ procul orbe jacet;
Fælix adversis, & sorte oppressa secunda
Communis nobis, & tibi, Cæsar, erit.

Britaine most free, which enemie and Monarch never felt,
Far dissite from this world of ours, wherein we ever dwelt;
An happie state in adverse times, but wonne in prosperous daies,
Shall be, ô Cæsar, common now to thee and us alwaies.

Ultima cingebat Tibris tua, Romule, regna:
Hic tibi finis erat, religiose Numa.
Et tua, Dive, tuum sacrata potentia cœlo
Extremum citra constitit Oceanum.
At nunc Oceanus geminos interluit orbes
Pars est imperij, terminus ante fuit.

Thy Kingdomes all, ô Romulus, Tibris sometime did bound

Past

A Past it, ô Numa prince devout, thou had'st no foot of ground:
And even thy power right sacred now, and heav'nly though it be,
O Cæsar, staied within precinct of thine owne Ocean sea:
But now the Ocean interflow's two worlds, by double shore,
And parcell of our Empire is, which was the bound before.

Mars pater, & nostræ gentis tutela Quirine,
Et magno positus Cæsar uterq; Polo.
Cernitis ignotos Latia sub lege Britannos,
B Sol citra nostrum flectitur imperium.
Vltima cesserunt adaperto claustra Profundo
*Et jam Romano * cingimur Oceano.* *Cingitur.

O father Mars, ô Romulus, Protector of our race,
And Cæsars both, late deified, in heav'n who have your place.
The Britans erst unknown, ye see the Latian lawes embrace
And short of our large Seignory the Sun turnes in his race.
The furthest frontiers soone gave way, when seas once opened were
The Romane Ocean now it is, wherein enclosed we are.

C Opponis frustrà rapidum Germania Rhenum,
Euphrates prodest nil tibi, Parthe fugax.
Oceanus jam terga dedit, nec pervius vlli
Cæsareos fasces, imperiumq; tulit.

In vaine opposest thou for fense, swift Rhene, ô Germany
Euphrates (Parthian) boots thee nought, thou that in fight dost flie.
For, th'Ocean is already fled, which passable to none
Hath now the Cæsars government, and Romes rule undergone.

D Illa procul nostro semota, excluságq; cælo,
Alluitur nostrâ victa Britannis aquâ,*
Semota, & vasto disjuncta Britannia Ponto *Semoto.
Cinctaq; inaccessis horrida littoribus:
Quam pater invictis Nereus vallaverat undis
Quam fallax æstu circuit Oceanus.
*Brumalem sortita * plagam: quà frigida semper* *Polum.
Præfulget stellis Arctos in occiduis.
Conspectuq; tuo devicta Britannia, Cæsar,
E Subdidit insueto colla premenda jugo
Aspice, confundit populos impervia tellus,
Conjunctum, est quod adhuc orbis, & orbis erat.

That Britain from our clime far set and thence excluded quite,
Conquerd of late is washed yet, with water ours by right.
Britain, I say, far set apart, and by vast sea dijoin'd, Wall'd with inaccessible banks and craggy clifts behind;
Which father Nereus fenced had with billowes most invincible
And Ocean likewise compassed with ebs and flowes as fallible.
F Britain that hath a wintry clime alotted for her seat,
Where cold North-Beare shines alway bright with stars that never set.
Even at thy sight and first approach ô Cæsar soone subdu'd,
Submitted hath her necke to beare strange yoke of servitude.
Behold, the earth unpassable of nations makes commixtion,
What heretofore was world and world is now conjoind in one.

Now

Now let Tacitus proceed in his Story. Vntill this time all went well with Ostorius: but A soone after, his fortune stood in doubtfull termes: either for that upon the displacing of Caractacus as if thereby all had been subdued and the war ended, the Romanes intended not so carefully their military service: or because the enimies in compassion of so puissant a king, were more fervently enflamed to revenge. For they environed the Camp-master and those Legionary cohorts which were left behind to build fortresses in the Silures country: And if the villages and forts next adioining had not speedily come in to rescue, they had been put to the sword every man. Nevertheless the Camp-Master, with eight Centurions and all the forwardest maniples of common souldiers were slaine; and not long after, they put to flight our foragers, and the very troupes of horsemen that were sent out to succour them. Then B Ostorious setteth out certaine companies lightly appointed, and yet thereby could not stay their flight, had not the Legions come in and undertook the battell. By their strength they fought with small ods on either hand, but afterward we had the better of it, and the enemy betooke himselfe to his heeles and escaped with small losse, because the day was far spent. After thus, they had many skirmishes, and for the most part in maner of rodes and robberies; in woods, on marishes, rashly or with foresight it skilled not: according as it fell out, either as occasion by chance, or their own hearts served them: one while for anger, another while for booty: sometime by commandement from their captaines, and sometimes again without their warrant and privity: but principally thorow the wilfull obstinacie of the Silures, C who were exasperated with a speech of the Romane Generalls, that was bruted abroad and came to their eares: which was this, That as the Sugambri were rooted out and transported over into Gaule, so the name of the Silures should utterly be extinguished. And in this heat they intercepted two auxiliary bands, as they thorow the avarice of their Præfects forraied and spoiled without advised circumspection. Also by large giving away of spoiles and prisoners, they drew the rest of the Nations to revolt. And then Ostorius wearied with care and griefe of heart yeelded up his vitall breath. Whereat the enemies reioiced, as at the death of a captain not to be despised, who though he died not in battell, yet was toiled out and spent by reason of the wars.

A Didius Avitus Gallus, Propretor.

But Cæsar having intelligence of his Lieutenants death, lest the province should be destitute of a governour, appointed A. Didius in his place. He being thither come with great D speed, yet found not all in good state. For in the meane space, the legion whereof Manlius Valens had the charge, met with an unlucky and disasterious fight. The fame whereof the enemies had made greater than it was, to terrifie the captaine which was comming: who also in the like policie multiplied all that he heard, to win more praise by appeasing those troubles, or to purchase pardon more easily, if they continued still. The Silures were they that wrought us this displeasure and damage, whereupon they overran the province far and nere, untill such time as by Didius his comming they were driven backe.

Nero.

About this time Claudius departed this life: and Nero succeeded him in the Empire, one who had no heart at all to attempt any thing in warfare: nay he was minded once to withdraw the forces out of Britain: Neither gave he over that intent of his but only for shame, E
*lest hee might have been thought to deprave the glory of Claudius. After that Caractacus was taken, Venutius a very expert man above the rest in military affaires, borne under the state of the Iugantes, long time trusty to us, and defended by the Romanes poure, having to wife Queen Cartismandua, by occasion soone after of a divorce, and then of open war between them, rebelled also against us, and proceeded to plaine hostility. At the first, the quarrell was only between them two: untill Cartismandua by pollicie and craft had intercepted the brother, and nere kinsmen of Venutius. Whereupon our enemies, kindled with rage, and pricked forward with an ignominious indignity, lest they should be brought under the yoke of a womans government, with a strong power of choise youth, by force of armes invaded her kingdome, which was foreseen by us: and thereupon were cohorts sent F to aid her, and they fought a hot battell: The beginning whereof was doubtfull, but the end more ioifull. The Legion also which Cesius Nasica commanded fought with like successe. For, Didius [yee must thinke] being stricken in yeeres, and having many honours heaped upon him, thought it sufficient to execute his charge and keep off the enemy by the ministery of others. For what was woon by others he held: only a few fortresses he built forward Venutius.

*Or haply, Brigantes.

farther

farther into the country: whereby he might purchase the name of enlarging his office. These exploits although they were atchieved by two Proprators Ostorius and Didius in many yeers, yet I thought good to ioine together, lest being severed, they should not so well have been remembred.

After Didius Avicus, there succeeded Verannius, who having with small rodes spoiled the Silures, was hindred by death for warring any farther: a man whiles he lived carrying a great name of precise severity, but in his last will he shewed himselfe manifestly ambitious. For after much flattering of Nero, he added this, That he would have subdued the Province unto his obedience, if he had lived the next two yeeres. Verannius Propretor.

But then Suetonius Paulinus governed the Britains, one in martiall skill, and opinion of the people (which suffereth no man without a concurrent) striving to match Corbulo; desirous to equall the honour which he won in recovering Armenia, by subduing the enemies that stood out in this country. And therefore he maketh all the preparation hee can to invade the Ile of* Mona, peopled with strong inhabitants, and a receptacle of traiterous fugitives. To this purpose he buildeth flat-botom-vessels, for the shalowes and uncertaine landing places. Thus the footmen passed over: and then followed the horsemen by the foord, or if the waters were any thing high, by swimming they put the horses over. Against them the enemies stood upon the shore in divers places embatelled, thick in array, well appointed with men and weapons; with women also running among: who all in blacke and mournefull array, with their haire about their eares, carried firebrands before them in their hands like the Furies of hell. The Druidæ likewise round about them, lifting up their hands to heaven, and pouring out deadly and cursing praiers, with this so strange and uncouth sight, amazed the souldiers so, as that they stood still as stockes and stirred not a foot, as if they would expose their bodies to receive all wounds presented unto them. But afterwards, being encouraged by their Captain, and animating one another, that they should not feare a flocke of women and frantick people, they displaied their ensignes and advanced forward. Downe they went with such as encountred them and thrust them within their own fires. This done, they planted garizons in their townes, and cut down their woods and groves consecrated to their execrable superstitions. For they accounted it lawfull, to offer sacrifice upon their altars with the blood of captives, and to aske counsell of their Gods by inspection of mens fibres and entrailes. Paulinus Suetonius Propretor. *Angleſey. Druidæ. *Victualiæ victu, that is, over the vanquished.

As Suetonius was busie in these actions, newes came unto him that the province was suddenly revolted. Prasutagus King of the Iceni, in welth surpassing all others, had set down in his will Cæsar with two of his daughters to be his heires, supposing by this kind of flattery to curry favour, and to make his kingdome and house most secured from all iniuries. Which fell out far otherwise: in so much as his Kingdome by Centurions, his house by slaves were spoiled and reputed lawfull booties. And to begin withall, his wife Boadicia was whipped, and his daughters defloured. The chiefest of the Iceni, as if the whole country had been given them by way of gift, are turned out of their ancient inheritances, and the kings kinsfolke reputed as slaves. By reason of which contumelious indignity, and for feare of worse, considering they had been reduced into the forme of a province, the Britans began among themselves to cast and thinke upon the miseries of servitude, to lay together their wrongs and oppressions, in ripping of them up to aggravate them by constructions to the highest, in these termes: that no other good was to be looked for by sufferance, but that more grievous burdens should be imposed upon them still, as men ready to beare all willingly. That whereas in times past, their states had but one King a peece, now there were two thrust upon them: the Lieutenant, cruelly to sucke their blood, and the Procurator as greedy to preie upon their substance: That the variance of these rulers was the torment; and their agreement the undoing of the poore subiects: the one vexing by souldiers and centurions, the other by extortions and reprochfull abuses: so that now there was nothing safe from their unsatiable avarice, nothing freed from their unbrideled lust. In war and battell yet, the stronger man commonly is he that maketh spoile; but now cowards for the most part, and weaklings are they that dispossesse them of their dwelling houses, bereave them of their children, enioine them to muster, as if they were men that knew not to do any thing els, save only to die for their country. For otherwise, what a small handfull thinke ye of souldiers have Prasutagus. Boodicia, who also is named Boadicia Boudicia, Voadica, and Bunduica come over to ſerve, if the Britans would fall to reckon themſelves? Thus Germany had ſhaken off the yoke of obedience, and yet were defended by a river only, and not by the Ocean: as for theſe Romanes, what motives have they of war but their owne covetouſneſſe, riot, and wanton luſt? whereas we have our native country, our wives and children to provoke us thereto. Surely they would retire and be gone as ſometime Iulius, their canonized God, went his waies, if we would endevour to follow the valour and proëſſe, of our anceſtors, and not be diſmaid with the doubtfull event of one skirmiſh or two: and commonly in ſuch as are diſtreſſed and in miſery, there is more ſtomacke to attempt, and greater reſolution to continue. And even now the Gods alſo take pity of the Britans poore eſtate, who keepe the Romane Generall out of the way, and confine the Lieutenant with his hands full in another Iland: and themſelves being aſſembled to adviſe together, had attained to the hardeſt point of all in an action of that nature, wherein without queſtion it is more dangerous to be taken conſulting, than in the very action.

Digitized by Google

With theſe and ſuch inducements, inciting and quickning one another, they take armes under the conduct of Booäicia a Ladie of the roiall bloud (for in matter of government in chiefe the Britans make no diſtinction of ſex) *having ſtirred up the Trinobantes to Rebellion, and as many as yet, not broken to the yoke of ſervitude, had in ſecret conſpiracies vowed to recover and reſume their liberty, bearing a moſt bitter hatred againſt the old ſouldiers. For thoſe who newly brought into the Colonie Camalodunum, thruſt the ancient inhabitants, out of their houſes, diſceiſed them of their Lands, Liuings, calling them captives and ſlaves, whiles the new ſouldiers favoured and maintained the inſolent outrages of the old, in regard of conformitie in life and hope of like licenciouſneſſe. Beſides, a Temple erected in the honour of Claudius of ſacred memorie, as an Alter of perpetuall dominion over them, was an eie-ſore, and the prieſts choſen under colour of religion, waſted and conſumed all their wealth. Now, it was not thought any hard peece of worke to raze and deſtroy that Colonie, not fenſed with any fortifications: a thing not circumſpectly foreſeene of our captaines, whiles they had greater care of pleaſure, than profit. Amid theſe occurrences, the linage of victorie ſet up in Camalodunum, fell downe without any apparant cauſes, and turned backward, as if it would give place to the enemies. And certaine women diſtempered with ſome fanaticall furie, went ſinging by way of propheſie, that deſtruction was at hand. And ſtrange noiſes abroad were heard into their Counſell houſe, their Theater reſounded with hideous howlings, and a ſtrange ſpecter, or apparition was ſeene in the arme of the ſea * there, a ſigne foretelling the ſubverſion of that Colonie. Furthermore, the Ocean bloudy in ſhew, and the ſhapes of mens bodies left after an ebbe, as the Britans conſtrued favourably to feed their owne hopes, ſo the old ſouldiers interpreted to the increaſe of their feare. But becauſe Suetonius was farre off, they craved helpe of Catus Berianus the Procurator: who ſent unto them not paſſing two hundred, and thoſe but badly armed: and within the towne the number of ſouldiers which was not great, truſted to the fence of the Temple. And by reaſon that thoſe among them, which being privy to the ſecret conſpiracy aforeſaid, troubled their deſignments, hindred them, they had neither made trench or rampier before the towne, nor ſent away their old folke, and women, keeping the luſtie young men onely, and ſo being ſecure, as it had been in the time of perfect peace, ſurpriſed they were at unwares, and enclo-ſed round about with a multitude of barbarous people. And verily all other things were violently ſacked or conſumed with fire: the Temple onely excepted, wherein the ſouldiers had gathered themſelves round together, which alſo was two dayes together beſieged and ſo forced. Alſo, the Britains in this traine of victorie, encountring Petilius Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion as he was cõming with aid, put the legion to flight, & ſlew al the footmen. Cerealis himſelfe with the Cavallery eſcaped to the camp, & ſaved himſelfe within the fortifications. Vpon which overthrow, & in regard of the provinciall peoples hatred, drivẽ thorow the avarice of the Romans to take armes, Catus the Procurator paſſed over in great haſte for feare, into Gaule. But Suetonius with conſtant reſolutiõ, paſſing thorow the mids of his enemies, went to Londiniũ, a town verily by the name that it caried of a Colony, nothing famus, but for concourſe of merchãts, & * proviſiõ of neceſſaries moſt of al other frequented. Being thither come, he ſtood doubtful whether to chuſe it for the ſeat of war or no. And cõſidering wel the ſmal number of ſouldiers that he had, & by good proofs thaught Petilius paid for his raſhnes, he determined with the damage of one town to ſaue al the reſt whole. Nether could he be won by the weeping & pitifull tears of thoſe that beſought his*

The Colony Camalodunum, that is, Maldon.

See Vipſilinus in Nero.

*Haply, the Firth of Fameſa.

Pætilius Cerealis.

*London.

*Commeatuum.

Digitized by Google

A his aide, but he would needs put out the signall of a remoove, and receive all followers, as part of his armie to march along with him. As many therefore as weakneſſe of ſex, wearieſomneſſe of age, or pleaſantneſs of the place held backe, were all put to the ſword by the enemie. The like calamitie befell unto the free towne * Verulamium: becauſe the Barbarians leaving the caſtles and forts of garriſon ſouldiers, made ſpoile of the richeſt and fatteſt: and carrying their pillage into ſome place of ſafetie, as men glad of booty, went on ſtill to ſuch as were of note and marke above the reſt. And thus to the number of ſeventie thouſand Roman citizens & aſſociats together, by true report, were knowen to have been ſlaine in thoſe places before named. For there was no taking of priſoners, no ſelling of them, nor any other commerce and trafficke of warre, B but killing, hanging, burning and crucifying, ſuch haſte they made to make havocke of all, as if they were to requite the meaſure they had ſuffered, and anticipate in the meane while all revenge.

*Verulamium, nere to Saint Albans.

Now by this time Suetonius having with him the fourteenth Legion with the old ſouldiers, of the twentieth, and the auxiliaries from the parts next adjoyning, was well neere ten thouſand ſtrong, when he reſolved to lay aſide all further delaies, and to trie the chance of a maine battell. And ſo he chooſeth a place with a narrow entrance like a gullet, and encloſed behind with a wood: being well aſſured, that he had no enemies but in front, and that the plaine lay open without feare of ambuſh. The Legionarie ſouldiers therefore, being marſhalled in thicke rankes, and cloſe together, with the light armours about them, the horſemen were placed on either hand C like wings. But the Britaine forces came leaping forth all abrode by troupes and companies, in ſuch a multitude as never the like elſe where at any other time, and with ſo fierce courage, as that they would needs bring their very wives with them, and place them in carts which they had beſtowed in the utmoſt parts of the plaine; to be witneſſes of the victorie.

*Militarium or militaribus. *Deferentes in tutum, or defendentibus in tutum, that is, whiles the defendants ſtood not with ſafety upon their guard. *Vexillarij.

Boodicia, having her daughters before her in a chariot, ever as ſhe came to any ſeverall nation (for it was the cuſtome verily of the Britans to make warre under the conduct of women) proteſted and told them, that ſhe was come then, not as a Ladie deſcended of ſo noble progenitors, to make either Kingdome or riches her quarrell, but as one of the common people, in revenge of her libertie loſt, here bodie ſore whipped, and her daughters chaſtitie aſſailed by uncleane handling: That the Romans luſt and concupiſcence, was growen to ſuch a paſſe, that they ſpared no body, no not aged perſons, nor left their Virgins undefiled. How be it, the Gods (ſaith D ſhe) are with us, & favor juſt revenge. For, the legiõ that came into the field, and durſt hazarde battell, was cut in pieces: the reſt are either hidden within campe and hold, or elſe ſeeke means to eſcape by flight: ſo that they will never abide ſo much as the noiſe and crie of ſo many thouſands, much leſſe then their violent charge, and cloſe hand fight. If then they would weigh with her the power of their armed forces, and withall the motives of war, reſolve they ſhould either to vanquiſh in that battell, or to die: for her owne part, being but a woman, this was his reſolution: the men might line if they pleaſed, and ſerve as ſlaves.

Neither could Suetonius himſelfe, in ſo great an extremitie, hold his tongue: For although he preſumed and truſted much upon valour, yet enterlaced he exhortations and prayers. That they ſhould contemne the lowd and vaine threats of the Barbarians. Among whom there were E more women to be ſeene, than luſty young men. Unwarlike as they were and unarmed, they would preſently give ground, when they came once to feele and acknowledge the weapons, and valour of thoſe conquerours, by whom ſo often they had bin put to flight. For even in many legions, a few they be that carrie away the honour of the battell: and to their greater glorie it would turne, if with a ſmall power they wonne the fame of a whole armie. Onely this they muſt remember, marſhalled cloſe together as they ſtood, firſt with launcing their Iavelins, & afterwards with the boſſes and pikes of their bucklers, and with their ſwords to continue in beating downe and killing them, and never to thinke all the while of any bootie: for after victorie once gotten, all would come to their ſhare. Theſe words of the Captaine, gave ſuch an edge, and kindled their courage ſo: the old ſouldiers alſo experienced in many battels, had ſo beſtirred themſelves, F and were ſo ready to let their darts fly, that Suetonius aſſured of the event, gave ſignall of battell. And firſt of all, the Legion not ſtirring one foot, but keeping the ſtreights of the place aforeſaid, as a ſure defence, after that the enemies approching neerer within the juſt reach of ſhot, had ſpent all their darts, ſallied out as it were in pointed battels. The auxiliarie ſouldiers likewiſe were of the ſame ſtomack, & the horſemẽ ſtretching out their long launces, brake what was in their way, and made head against them. The residue shewed their backs, and had much adoe A to flie and escape, by reason of the carts and wagons placed round about the plaine, which had blocked up the passages on every side. And the souldiers forbare not the execution so much as of the women: the verie horses and draught beastes, were thrust thorow with darts, which made the heape of dead bodies the greater. This was a day of great honour and renowne, comparable to the victories of olde time: for, some report, that there were slaine few lesse in number, than fourescore thousand Britans: but of our souldiers, there died not all out foure hundred, and not many more hurt. Boodicia ended her life with poison. And Pœnius Posthamus campe-Master of the second Legion, understanding of this prosperous successe of the fourteenth and twentith Legions, because he had defrauded his owne Legion of the like glorie, and, contrarie to the order of service, refused to obey the Captaines commandement, B thrust himselfe thorow with his owne sword.

*Sonoras. or Sonores, that is, the loud noiſes.

Digitized by Google

After this, the whole armie being rallied together, kept the field still, and lay encamped for to end the residue of the warre: and Cæsar augmented their forces by sending out of Germanie two thousand Legionarie souldiers, eight cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thousand horsemen:
by whose comming, they of the ninth Legion, had their companies supplied, and made up with the Legioners. The cohorts and cornets of horse, were appointed to lodge in new wintering places: and all those nations of the enemies, which were either doubtfull or knowen adversaries, were wasted with fire and sword. But nothing distressed them so much as famine, being negligent in sowing of corne, by reason that of all ages they were given to warre: for that also C they made full account to live of our provision, and as all other fierce and stout nations, slowly give eare to peace, because Iulius Classicianus, being sent to succeed Catus, and at variance with Suetonius, hindred the common good with private grudges, and had given it out abrode, that they were to expect and tarie for a new Lieutenant, who without any hostile rancour and pride of a Conqueror, would gently entreat and use with all clemencie such as yeelded unto him.
Withall, he sent word to Rome, that they should looke for no end of warre, unlesse some one or other succeeded Suetonius, upon whose overthwartnesse, he laid all his ill proceedings, and attributed all fortunate successe to the happy fortune of the common weale.

To see therefore in what state Britanie stood, Polycletus one of Neroes freed men was sent: for, good hope he had, that by his authority there should not only be wrought a perfect D agreement between the Lieutenant and the Procurator, but also that the rebellious minds of the Barbarians would be woon to peace. Neither failed Polycletus, being with his mighty hoast burdensome to Italy and Gaule, after he had passed the Ocean sea, to shew himselfe terrible even to our souldiers also. But to the enemies hee was but a laughing stocke: who, whiles liberty was still fresh on foot among them, knew not what the poure of these freed men was: and they made a marvell of it that a Captain and an armie, which had atchieved so great a war, should yeeld to obey slaves. But of all these things the best was made to the Emperor. And Suetonius being busied still in these affaires, for that he had lost afterwards some few Gallies upon the shore and the gallie slaves in them, as if the war continued still, was commanded to deliver up the armie to Petronius Turpilianus, who now was new- E Petronius Turpilianus, Propretor. ly out of his Consulship, as unto a man more exorable, unacquainted with the delinquencies of the enemies, and therefore more ready to accept of their repentance: who neither, incensing the enemy, nor provoked by him, colouring a lazie and idle life with the honest name of peace, after he had dared and done no more, but composed former troubles and de-Trebellius Maximus Propretor. bates, delivered the charge of the province unto Trebellius Maximus.

But he, a man unfit for action, and altogether unexpert in war-service, by a kind of courteous and mild regiment entertained the country in quiet. For now the Britans also had learned the good manners, not rudely to repulse the sugred assaults of flattering vices; and the disturbance of civil dissentions comming between, ministred a lawfull excuse for his doing nothing. But much discord arose among them whiles the souldier, accustomed to war- F fare, waxt wanton with ease, and grew to be mutinous: and he for his nigardly sparing and base taking of bribes, was both despised and hated of the armie. This hatred of theirs against him, was enflamed by Roscius Calius Lieutenant of the twentith Legion, an ancient enemy of his, but now by occasion of civill dissentions, they were fallen out farther, and brake into more hainous termes. Trebellius obiected ever and anon to Calius, and charged him

Digitized by Google

A him with factious behaviour, and confounding the order of discipline: Calius againe, that Trebellius had spoiled and beggered the Legions. But in the meane time, whiles the Lieutenants thus iarred, the modest cariage of the armie was marred: and the discord at length grew so great, that Trebellius being driven away with the railing of the Auxiliaries also, in cohorts and wings sorting themselves to Calius side, was glad, as a man forsaken, to give place and flee to Vitellius. The Province although the Consular Lieutenant Generall was absent remained in quiet: whiles the Lieutenants of the Legions supplied the charge in right of equall authority: But Calius indeed bare the greater stroke, because he was of more boldnesse.

B Whiles the Civill war between Galba, Otho and Vitellius grew hot, Vectius Bolanus was by Vitellius sent to succeed him. Neither troubled he Britanny with any discipline. The same default continued still against the enemies, and the like licentiousnesse in the campe: saving only that Bolanus a good honest harmelesse man, and not odious for committing any crime, had woon himselfe love and good will in lieu of obedience: and albeit Vitellius sent for aids out of Britanny, yet Bolanus made no hast, for that Britain was never quiet enough. As for the Iland, that great favour and reputation in warlike affaires, which Vespasian had gotten, being Lieutenant there of the second Legion under Claudius, did easily win it unto him, yet not without some stir of the other Legions: wherein many centurions and souldiers who had bin advanced by Vitellius were loth to change that Prince whom they had prooved C already. And besides, the souldiers of the fourteenth Legion, called the subduers of Britan, removed from thence by Nero to the Caspian wars, and in the quarell of Otho vanquished, were by Vitellius sent backe into Britanny, and called away againe by Mutianus letters.

Vectius Bolanus Propretor.

For all this civill war, no quarrell nor mutinies there were in the Britain armie. And to say a truth, during all the troubles of civill wars, no Legions behaved themselves more harmelesse, either because they were far off and severed by the Ocean, or for that they were taught by continuall service and souldery, to hate the rather all hostility and dealing with enemies. Howbeit by meanes of these dissentions and rumors still of civill war, the Britans tooke heart and rebelled, through the procurement of Venusius: who besides a naturall fierceneſſe of courage, and hatred of the Romane name, was incensed particularly by private D unkindnesses between him and his wife Queen Carthismandua. This Carthismandua was Queen of the Brigantes, of high and noble linage, who upon the delivery of King Caractacus whom she tooke by fraude and sent to furnish and set out the triumph of Claudius (that glorious spectacle I meane in maner of a triumph, wherein Caractacus was shewed) had woon favour with the Romans and greatly increased her strength. Whereupon ensued wealth: of wealth and prosperity riotous and incontinent life: in so much, that casting off Venusius her husband, and intercepting his kinsfolke, she ioined her selfe in mariage with Vellocatus his harnesse-bearer, and crowned him King: which foule fact was the overthrow immediatly of her house. The good will of the country went generally with the lawfull husband: but the Queens intemperate affections were peremptory and violent in maintaining her minion the adulterer. Whereupon Venutius, by the helpe of friends which he procured, and E the revolt of the Brigantes themselves, made war upon Carthismandua, and brought her into great extremities. Then upon her instant praier unto the Romanes for aid, our garizons, cohorts and wings were sent to defend her: which after sundry skirmishes with diuers event, delivered the Queens person out of perill, but the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the war unto us.

Cartismandua.

Now when as the state of Rome City, was for Vespasian governed by Mutianus, he made Iulius Agricola who was gone to side with Vespasian, and had behaved himselfe with great integrity and courage, Lieutenant of the two and twentith Legion in Britany, a Legion which slowly had sworne allegeance to Vespasian, In which province his predecessor by F report seditiously demeaned himselfe. For the said Legion was out of awe, or rather it overawed even Lieutenants generall that had been Consuls. Neither was the ordinary Legions Lieutenant, who had been but Prator, of power sufficient to restrain and keep it under, whether it were through his own weakneſſe, or the stubborne disposition of the souldiers, it is not certain. Thus, being elected both to succeed and revenge, he shewed an example of most rare moderation in making choice to be thought rather to have found them, than to have Vespasian Emperor. Iul. Agricola. Lieutenant over the twentith Legion.

Digitized by Google

made them dutifull ſouldiers. And albeit that Vectius Bolanus Lieutenant Generall of Britannie for the time being, governed in a gentler and milder maner, than was fit for ſo fierce a province: Yet under him Agricola cunningly conforming himſelfe to that humor, and not unlearned to ioine profitable counſels with honeſt, tempered the heat of his owne nature that it might not grow upon him ſtill. A

But when as Veſpaſian recovered together with the reſt of the world Britannyalſo, brave captaines, good ſouldiers were ſent, and the enemies hope was greatly abated. For ſtraightwaies Petilius Cerialis ſtrooke a terror into them, by invading at his firſt entry the Brigantes, thought to be the moſt populous ſtate of the whole province. Many battells were fought, and ſome bloody: And the greateſt of the Brigants he either conquered or waſted. B

Petilius Cerealis Proprætor.

And whereas Cerialis would doubtleſſe have dimmed the diligence and fame of another ſucceſſor, Iulius Frontinus a great man ſuſtained alſo as he might, after ſuch a predeceſſor that waighty charge with reputation and credit: who ſubdued the puiſſant and warlike people of the Silures, where he had beſide the vertue of the enemy, ſtruggled with the ſtreits and difficult places.

Iulius Frontinus Proprætor.

In this eſtate Agricola found the Province, and the wars thus far proceeded in, when as about the middeſt of ſummer he paſſed the ſeas: at what time the ſouldiers, as if the ſeaſon were paſt, attended an end for that yeere of their ſervice, and the enemy occaſions to begin for to hurt. The Ordovices a little before he entred the land, had hewed almoſt wholly in peeces a wing which lay in their borders. Vpon which beginning the country being awaked, as men deſirous of war allowed the example: and ſome ſtaied to ſee how the new Lieutenant would take it. C

Iul. Agricola Proprætor.

Then Agricola, although the Summer was ſpent, and the bands lay diſperced in the Province, and his ſouldiers had fully preſumed of reſt for that yeere, which hindred much, and croſſed directly his undertaking of warre, moſt men alſo being of opinion, rather to keepe and aſſure the places ſuſpected, all this notwithſtanding, reſolved fully to encounter the danger: having gathered therefore the enſignes of the Legions, and ſome few Auxiliaries, becauſe the Ordovices durſt not deſcend into indifferent ground, himſelfe before the voward, to give others like courage in the like danger, led up in battell-ray to encounter the enemie. And having ſlaughtered almoſt the whole nation, knowing full well that fame muſt with inſtance be followed, and as the firſt fell out, ſo the reſt would ſucceed, he deliberated to conquer the Iſland * Mona, from the poſſeſſion whereof, as before I have rehearſed, Paullinus was revoked by the generall rebellion of Britannie: But as in purpoſes not reſolved on before, ſhips being wanting, the pollicie and reſoluteneſſe of the captaine deuiſed a paſſage over. For he commanded the moſt choiſe of the Aid-ſouldiers, to whom all the foords and ſhallowes were knowen, and who after the uſuall practiſe of their countrie, were able in ſwimming to governe all at once themſelves, their armour and horſes, laying aſide their cariage, to put over at once, and ſuddenly invade them. Which thing ſo amazed the enemie, attending for a fleet, for ſhipping, for tide, that they ſurely beleeved nothing could be hard or invincible to men that came ſo minded to war. Whereupon they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Thus Agricola at his firſt entry into his province (which time other conſume in vaine oſtentation or ambitious ſeeking of complements) entring withall into labors and dangers became famous indeed and of great reputation. D E

*Angleſey.

Neither abuſed Agricola the proſperous proceeding of his affaires to vanity or braving in ſpeeches, as to terme it an exploit or a conqueſt, thus to have kept in order perſons ſubdued before: or to bedeck with lawrell his letters of advertiſement; but by ſtopping and ſuppreſſing the fame he augmented it the more: whiles men began to diſcourſe, upon what great preſumptions of future ſucceſſe, he ſhould make ſo light an account of ſuch great actions already performed, as not to ſpeake a word of them.

Now as touching civill government: Agricola knowing right well the diſpoſition and mind of the Province, taught alſo by the experience of others, that armes availe little to ſettle a new conquered ſtate, if iniuries and wrongs be permitted, determined to cut off all cauſes of wars. And beginning at home, his own houſe firſt of all he reformed and reſtrained, a point of as much hardneſſe with many, as to governe a province. He committed no maner of publike affaires to bond men or freed; he admitted no ſouldier about his perſon either F

upon

A upon private affection of partiall suiters, or upon the commendation and intreaty of centurions, but elected simply the best, presuming the same to be the most faithfull. He would see into all things, but not exact all things to the rigor: Light faults he would pardon, and the great severely correct: not alwaies proceeding to punish, but often content with repentance: chusing rather not to prefer unto office and charge such as were like to offend, than after offence to condemne them. The augmentation of corne and tributes, he mollified with equall dividing of charge and burden, cutting away those pety extortions, which grieved the subiect more than the tribute it selfe. For, the poore people were constrained in a mockery to wait at the barnes fast locked against them, and first to buy the corne, then after to sell it at a price. Severall waies were entoined, and far distant places by the purveiors commandement: that
B the country should cary from the neereſt ſtanding-camps to thoſe which were far off and out of the way, till that which lay open to all, and at hand, was turned in fine to the gaine of a few. By repreſſing theſe abuſes preſently in his first yeere, a good opinion was conceived from him of peace, which either by the negligence or connivence of former Lieutenants was now no leſſe feared than war.

At this time died Veſpaſian, unto whom for theſe victories of the leaders, and his own vertue under Claudius, Valerius Flaccus before his Poëme thus ſpeaketh;

Tuq; ô pelagi cui major aperti
Fama, Caledonius poſt quam tua carbaſa vexit
C Oceanus, Phrygios prius indignatus Iulos.

And thou, for ſeas diſcovery whoſe fame did more appeare, Since time thy ſhips with ſailes full ſpred in Northren Ocean were,
Which of the Trojan Iulij erſt did ſcorne the ſailes to beare.

But when that Noble Titus, THE LOVELY Dearling AND IOY OF THE WORLD ſucceeded his father, Agricola when ſummer was once come, aſſembling his army together, Titus Emperor.
thoſe ſouldiers of his who in marching behaved themſelves in modeſt ſort he commended, the looſe and diſſolute ſtraglers he checked. The places for pitching the campe he deſigned himſelfe, the firths he ſounded, and the thickets he proved firſt in his own perſon: not ſuffering in the meane ſeaſon any corner in the enimies country to be quiet: but waſting and ſpoi-
D ling with ſudden excurſions and roads: But when he had throughly terrified them, then would he again ſpare and forbeare, alluring therby their minds to friendſhip and peace. Vpon which kind of proceeding, many ſtates that ſtood upon termes of equality before that day, gave hoſtages and meekly ſubmitted themſelves, receiving garizon, and permitting to fortifie which he ſo wiſely and with ſuch great foreſight and reaſon performed that nothing was ever attempted againſt them: whereas before, no new fortified place in all Britanny eſcaped unaſſailed.

The winter enſuing was ſpent in moſt profitable and politick deviſes. For, whereas the Britans were rude and diſperſed, and therfore prone upon every occaſion to war, he to in-
E duce them by pleaſures unto quietneſſe and reſt, exhorted them in private, and helpt them in common to build temples, houſes and places of publike reſort, commending the forward and checking the ſlow: impoſing therby a kind of neceſſity upon them whiles ech man contended to gaine honor and reputation thereby. And now by this time the Noble mens ſons he tooke and inſtructed in the liberall ſciences, preferring the wits of the Britans before the ſtudents of France, as being now curious to attain the eloquence of the Romane language, whereas they lately reiected their ſpeech. After that, our attire grew to be in account & the Gowne much uſed among them. So, by little and little they fell to theſe provocations of vices; to ſumptuous galleries and bathes, yea & exquiſite banquetings: which things th' ignorāt termed civility being indeed a part of their bondage. In the third yeer of his wars, he diſcovered new countries, waſting along till he came to the firth of * Taus. Which thing ſo terrified the enemies; * Taus Firth, Twede as ſome thinke.
F that although the army was toiled out with cruell tempeſts, yet durſt they not aſſaile them: & the Romans moreover had leaſure and ſpace to fortifie there. They which were skilfull that way, obſerved, that never any Captain did more adviſedly chuſe his places. No caſtle planted by Agricola ever was, either forced by ſtrength, or upon conditions ſurrēdred, or as not defenſible, forſakē. Many times they iſſued foorth: for, againſt a long ſiege, they were ſtored with a whole yeers proviſion. So, they wintred there without feare, every gariſon garding it ſelfe and needing no helpe of their neighbours, the enemies assaulting sometimes, but in vaine, without successe, and driven thereupon to despaire. For, the losses of Summer they were commonly wont before, to repaire with winter events: but now, Summer and winter alike they went to the worse. In all these actions, Agricola never sought to draw unto himselfe, the glorie of any exploit done by another: but were it Centurion, or of other degree, he would faithfully witnesse the fact, and yeeld him alwaies his due commendation. By some, he is said to have been somewhat bitter in checks and rebukes: and indeede, the man was, as toward the good of a most sweet disposition, so to bad and lewd persons unpleasant and sower enough. But this choler passed away with his words: closeneſſe in him and silence you needed not to feare: he esteemed it more honest to offend, than to hate. A

and

The fourth Summer was spent in perusing, and ordering that which he had over-run. And if the valiant minds of the armies, and glorie of the Romane name, could have permitted or accepted it so, they needed not to have sought other limit of Britannie. For, Glotta and Bodotria two armes of two contrarie seas, shooting a mightie way into the land, are onely divided asunder by a narrow partition of ground: which passage was guarded and fortified then with garrison and castle: so that the Romanes were absolute Lords of all on this side, having cast out the enemie, as it were, into another Iland. B

* The Firth of Dunbriton.
* Edenborough Irith.

The fifth yeere of the warre, Agricola first taking sea there, went over, and subdued with many and prosperous conflicts nations before that time unknowen: and he furnished with forces, that part of Britannie, which lieth against Ireland, more in hope, than for feare. For Ireland, if it might have been wonne, lying betweene Britannie and Spaine, and fitly also for the French sea, would aptly have united, to the great advantage of the one and the other, these strongest members of the Empire together. In bigneſſe it is inferiour to Britannie: howbeit, bigger than the Islands of our sea. The soile, and temperature of the aire, the nature and fashions differ not much from the British. The ports and places of accesse, are better knowen by reason of more commerce and frequenting of merchants. Agricola had received before, a Prince of that countrey driven out by civil dissention, whom under colour of curteſie and friendship, he retained till occasion should serve. I have heard him oftentimes say, that with one Legion, and some few Aides, Ireland might be woon and possessed: that it were also a strength for our British affaires, if the Romane forces were planted each-where, and libertie banisht, as it were, quite out of sight.

Ireland. C D

About this time died Titus, who for these valiant Acts exploited by Agricola, was the fifteenth time named Imperator, as Xiphilinus writeth, and an ancient peece of coine witnesseth with him. Then Agricola under Domitian in the summer which began the sixth yeere of his office, because a generall rising in armes of all the farther Nations, beyond Bodotria was feared, and passages were all beset with a power of the enemies, manned a fleet to search the Creeks and Harboroughes of that ample region, which lieth beyond it. Which being by Agricola then first taken, and emploied as a part of his strength, followed after along, and made a goodly brave shew, while at one time warre both by sea and land went forward. And oft it so chanced, that the horseman, footman, and sea-souldier met, and made merrie in the same campe one with another, extolling and magnifying, each their owne proweſſe and adventures: making their vaunts and comparisons souldier like, the one of the woods and high mountaines, the other of dangerous tempests and billowes: the one, of the land and enemie conquered, the other of the Ocean subdued. The Britans, as by the prisoners was understood, were amazed also at the sight of the navie; as though now the secrets of their sea were discloſed, and no refuge remained if they were overcome. Whereupon the Caledonians arming with great preparation, and greater bruit thereof, as the manner is of matters unknowen, having of themselves first set in hand to assault our Castles, braved our men, and put them in feare as Chalengers: in so much that some of our side, who would seeme to be wise, but were dastards in deed, counselled the Generall to retire on this side Bodotria, and that the best course was to depart of their owne accord, than to be repelled with shame: in the meane while Agricola takes knowledge, that the enemies meant to divide themselves, and to give the onset in severall Companies: whereupon left he should be incloſed about, and entrapped by their multitude, and skill in the countrey, he also marched with his armie divided in three. Which when it was knowen to the enemie, they on a sodaine changing advise, and uniting their forces together, joyntly assaulted

E F

A faulted by night the ninth Legion, as being of weakeſt reſiſtance: and having ſlaine the watch, partly aſleepe, and partly amazed with feare, brake into the campe. And now were they fighting within the verie trenches, when Agricola having intelligence given him by Spies, what way the enemies had taken and following with all their footſteps, commanded the higheſt horſemen and foot men to play on their backs, and maintaine the skirmiſh, and the whole armie anone, to ſecond them with a ſhout. And when it drew neere to day, the glittering of the enſignes was ſeene. So the Britans were quailed with a duple danger: but the Romans recovered courage againe, and being paſt perill of their perſons, fought now for their honour, freſhly aſſailing their late aſſailers. And verily within the ſtreights of the gates, the conflict was ſharpe and

B cruell, till in the end the enemies were forced to flie; whileſt both our armies contended: the one would ſeem to have helped their fellowes, the other to have needed none other to helpe them: and if the bogges and woods had not covered their flight, that one victorie had ended the warre. Vpon this battell ſo manfully fought, ſo famouſly wonne, the armie preſuming, that to their proweſſe all things were eaſie and open, cried, To lead into Caledonia, and to find out the limit of Britanie with a courſe of a continued Conqueſts: and even thoſe who ere while were ſo warie and wiſe, waxt forward enough after the event, and grew to ſpeake bigly: ſuch is the hard condition of warres; If ought fall out well, all challenge a part, misfortunes are ever imputed to one. Contrariwiſe, the Britans preſuppoſing that not valour, but the cunning of the General, by uſing the occaſion had carryed it away, abated no whit of their ſtomacke; but armed their youth,

C tranſported their children and wives into places of ſafetie, and ſought by aſſemblies and religious rites, to eſtabliſh an aſſociation of their Cities and States together. And ſo for that yeere both parties departed away incenſed.

The ſame ſummer, a cohort of Vſipians, levied in Germanie, and ſent over into Britanie, committed a hainous and memorable Act. For having ſlaine a Centurion, and certaine ſouldiers intermingled among their manciples, and ſet over them for direction in diſcipline, they fledde and embarked themſelves in three pinnaces, compelling by force the Maſters of the ſaid veſſels, to execute their charge: and onely one doing his office, the other two being ſuſpected, and thereupon ſlain, this ſtrange going out, and putting to ſea, the fact as yet not noiſed abrode, was gazed and wondered at: afterwards being driven uncertainly hither and thither, and having skirmi-

D ſhed with the Britans ſtanding in defenſe of their owne, often prevailing and ſometimes repulſed, they came at laſt to that miſerie, that they were enforced to eat one another, firſt the vveakeſt, then as the lot lighted. Thus after they had floated round about Britanie, and loſt their veſſels for lacke of government, they vvere intercepted firſt by the Suevians, then by Friſians, as Pirats and Rovers. Now, ſome of them there vvere, that being bought by merchants as ſlaves, and by change of Maſters brought to our ſide of the river, grevv into a name by giving firſt notice of ſo great and ſo rare an adventure.

 Thoſe about Zutphen.*

 Britaine is ſailed round about.*

In the beginning of Summer, Agricola vvas deepely touched vvith a grieuous miſchance that happened in his owne houſe: for, he loſt his owne Sonne about a yeere old. Which infortunate hap, he neither bare out, as moſt of theſe great men do in the like caſe, vaine-glorioſly, nor

E tooke it againe ſo impatiently with ſorrovv and lamentation, as women are wont: and amidſt his mourning, uſed the vvarre as one of his remedies. Therefore having ſent his fleete afore, vvhich by ſpoiling in ſundry places, ſhould induce a greater and more uncertaine terrour upon his enemies, hee made readie, and followed after vvith his armie, joyning thereto ſome of the valianteſt Britans, vvhom by long experience in peace, he had found moſt faithfull, and ſo came as farre as to the mount Grampius, vvhere the enemies vvere lodged before. For the Britans nothing danted with the event of the former battel, and attending for nothing elſe but revenge or ſervitude, and being taught at length, that common danger muſt be repelled vvith concord, by embaſſages and leagues made, had raiſed the povver of all their Cities and States together. And novv by this time there vvere entred into the field, the vievv being taken, above

F thirty thouſand armed men: beſide an endleſſe number of youth, vvhich daily flocked to them ſtill, yea, and luſty old men renovvmed in vvarre, and bearing every one the badge due to their honour: at what time, among many other leaders, Galgacus for his valour and birth the principall man, ſeeing the multitude thus aſſembled hotly to demand battell, is ſaid to have vſed this ſpeech unto them: When I view and conſider the cauſes of this vvarre, and our preſent neceſſitie, I have reaſon, me ſeemes, to preſume, that this day, and this your agreeing conſent, will give

 Grantzbani.*

Galgacus.

Digitized by Google

*give a happy beginning to the freedom of the whole Iſland. For, both have we all hitherto liued in liberty; & beſides, no land remaineth beyond, no, nor ſo much as ſea for our ſafegard: The Romane navie, thus as you ſee, hoovering vpon our coaſts: ſo that Combat and armes, which valiant men deſire for honour, the daſtard muſt alſo uſe for his beſt ſecuritie: the former battels which have with divers events been fought againſt the Romanes, had their hope and refuge reſting in our hands: Becauſe we, the flower of the Britiſh Nobilitie, and ſailed therefore the furthermoſt in, never ſeeing the coaſts of the countries which ſerve in ſlaverie, have kept even our eies unpolluted, and free from all contagion of tyrannie. Beyond us is no land, beſide us none are free; us hitherto this very corner, and the inward receſſe, as it were, of fame hath defended. Now the uttermoſt point of Britannie is laid open: & things, the leſſe they have bin within knowledge, the greater is the glory to atchieve them. But no nation now is there beyond us; nothing but water, nothing but rockes, and the Romans even among thē, more infeſt than al beſides. Whoſe intolerable pride in vain ſhall a man ſeeke to avoide with any obſequious ſervice, and humble behauiour: Robbers as they be of the world, who having now left no more land to ſpoile, ſearch alſo the ſea. If their enemies be rich, they covet their wealth: if poore, they ſeeke to gaine glorie: Whom neither the Eaſt nor the Weſt, is ever able to ſatisfie: the onely men of all memorie, that ſeeke out all places, be they wealthy, or be they poore with like affection. To take away by maine force, to kill and to ſpoile, they falſly terme Empire and government: when they lay all waſte as a wilderneſſe, that they call peace. That every man ſhould hold his owne children and blood moſt deere, Nature hath ordeined: and even thoſe are preſſed for ſouldiers, and carried away to ſerve as ſlaves elſwhere. Our wives and ſiſters, if they bee not violently forced as in open hoſtilitie, are in the meane time under the colour and title of friends, and gueſts often abuſed. Our goods and ſubſtance, they draw from us for tribute, our corne for proviſion. Our verie bodies and hands they weare out and conſume, in paving of bogs, and ridding of woods, with a thouſand ſtripes and reprochfull indignities beſides. Slaves yet, which be borne to bondage, are bought and ſold once for all, and afterwards fedde and found at their owners expences. But Britannie daily buyeth, daily feedeth, and is at daily charge with her owne bondage. And as in a private retinue of houſhold ſervants, the freſh man and laſt commer, is laughed and ſcoffed at by his very fellowes: even ſo, in this old ſeruitude of the whole world, our deſtruction only is ſought, as being the lateſt and vileſt in account of all other. For, fields we have none to manure, no mines to be digged, no ports to trade in, for which purpoſes and emploiments we ſhould be reſerved alive. And as for the manhood and fierce courage of the ſubiect, it pleaſeth not much the ielous Soverain. And this very corner being ſo ſecret and far out of the way, the more ſecurity it yeeldeth to us, in them it works the greater ſuſpicion. So ſeeing all hope of pardon is paſt, at the length take courage, to defend and maintain your ſafety as well as your honor, things moſt deere and pretious unto you. The Trinobantes, led by a woman fired a Colonie, forced campe and caſtle; and if ſuch a lucky beginning had not ended in ſloth and ſecurity, they might with eaſe have ſhaken off the yoke. We as yet were never touched, never foiled nor ſubdued: as men therefore that mind to maintain their freedome, not for the preſent but for ever, let us ſhew ſtraitwaies in the firſt ioining, what maner of men Caledonia reſerved in ſtore for her ſelfe. Or do yee thinke the Romanes to be as valiant in war, as they are wanton in peace? No, it is not by their own vertue, but by our iarrings and diſcords they are grown into fame, and the faults of their enemies they abuſe to the glory of their own armie, compoſed of moſt divers nations, and therefore as by preſent proſperity holden together, ſo if fortune once frown, it doubtleſſe will diſſolve: unleſſe ye ſuppoſe, the Frenchmen and Germanes, and (to our ſhame be it ſpoken) many of our own Nation which now lend their lives to eſtabliſh a forrain uſurper, and yet have been enemies longer than ſervants, to be led and induced with any true harted and lotall affection. Nay, it is feare and terror, weake links and bonds of love: Remove them once, thoſe which ſhall ceaſe to feare, will ſoone begin to hate. All things to incite unto victory are on our ſide. No wife to encourage the Romanes, no parents to upbraid them if they flee: moſt have either no country at all, or els ſome other. A few fearfull perſons trembling and gazing all about at the ſtrangeneſſe of heaven it ſelfe, of ſea, of woods and all things els, the * Gods have delivered, mewed up as it were and fettered, into our hands. Let*

Trinobantes.

A the vain shew and glistering of gold and silver terrifie us, which neither defendeth nor offendeth. And even amongst our enemies in the field we shall find of our side. The Britans will agnize their own cause. The French will call to remembrance their freedome and former estate: the rest of the Germanes will leave and forsake them as of late the Vsipians did. And what els then have we to feare? the Castles are empty, the colonies peopled with aged and impotent persons: the free Cities discontent and in factions, whiles those which are under, obey with ill will, and they that doe govern, rule against right. Here is the Generall, and here is the army: There are the tributes, there be the mettall mines, and other miseries inseparably following them that live under the subiection of others: which either to continue and endure for ever, or straight to revenge, it lieth this day in this field. Wherfore, as ye are going to bat-
B tell, beare in your minds both the freedome of your ancestors, and the bondage of your posterity.

This speech they cheerfully received, as well with a song after their barbarous maner, as with confused acclamations and dissonant noises. And as the companies clustered together and glittering armour appeared, whiles the boldest avanced forward, and withall, the ranks were putting themselves in array; Agricola, albeit his souldiers were glad of that day, and scarce with words could be withholden, supposing it best to say somewhat, encouraged them in this wise.

Fellow souldiers and companions in armes: Your faithfull service and diligence these 8.
C yeeres so painfully shewed, by the vertue and fortune of the Romane Empire, hath conquered Britanny. In so many iournies, in so many battells, we were of necessity to shew our selves either valiant against the enemy, or patient and laborious almost above and against nature it selfe. In which exploits we have hitherto borne our selves both, so that neither desired I better souldiers, nor you other Captain. Insomuch as we have exceeded the limits, I of my predecessor, and you of yours. The end of Britannie we have found, not by fame and report, but we are with our armes and pavilions really invested thereof. Britain I say, is found and subdued. In marching, when the passage over bogs, or mountains and rivers toiled you out, how oft have I heard every valiant souldier say, when will the enemy present himselfe? when shall we fight? Lo, they are now put up out of their holes; and hither they are come. Your wish, lo, is here, and place for your vertue: yea and all things to follow in an easie and D expedite course if you win: but all against you, if you leese. For, as to have gone so much ground, escaped through the woods, passed over the firths is honorable forward; so, if we do flee, the vantages we have this day will become our greatest disadvantage. For we are not skilled so well in the country, we have not the like store of provision: but hands we have and weapons, and therein all things included. For my part, I am long since resolved, that it is not safety either for souldier or generall to shew their backs, and therefore a commendable death is better than life with reproch; and commonly, safety and honour are dwelling together: or if ought should mishappen, even this will be a glory, to have died in the uttermost end of the world and nature. If new nations and souldiers unknown were in the field, I would
E by the example of other armies embolden and encourage you: now, recount you your own victorious exploits, and aske your own eies. These are the same men, which the last yeere assailed one legion by stealth in the night, and were by a blast of your mouth overthrowen: These of all other Britans, have been the most nimble in running away, and therfore have scaped the longest alive. For, as in forests and woods, the strongest beasts are chased away by main force, the cowardly and fearfull are scared with the very noise of the hunters: so the most valiant of the British nation, long since have been by you dispatched and slaine, the rascall herd of dastardly cowards only, remaineth: whom at length ye have found, not as having intended to stay and make head, but at last overtaken, and by extreme passion of feare standing as stocks, presenting occasion to us in this place of a worthy and memorable victorie. Make an end ther-
F fore once for all of your warfare: and to fifty yeers trauells let this day impose a glorious conclusion: Approve to your country, that the Armie could never iustly be charged, either with protracting the war, or pretences for not accomplishing the conquest.

As Agricola was yet speaking, the souldiers gave great tokens of fervencie, and when he had ended, seconded the speech with a ioyfull applause, and ran streightwaies to their weapons. Agricola seeing them sufficiently animated, and rushing furiously forward, ordered his men in this maner. With the Auxiliary footmen being eight thousand, he fortified the middle battell: three thousand of their horse he put on both sides in the wings: commanding the Legions to stand behind before the trench of the camp to the greater glory of the victory, if it were obtained without shedding any Roman blood, otherwise, for assistance and succour, if the vantgard should be repelled. The Britans were marshalled on the higher ground, fitly both for shew, and also to terrifie: The first battalion standing on the plaine, the rest in the assent of the hill, knit and rising, as it were, one over another. The middle of the field was filled with the clattering of chariots and horsemen. Then Agricola perceiving the enemy to exceed him in number, and fearing lest he should be assailed on the front and flancks both at one instant, displaied his army in length: and although by that meanes his battell would become disproportionably long, and many advised him to take in the Legions, Yet being more forward to hope, than yeelding to feare, he reiected the counsell, and leaving his horse avanced himselfe before the ensignes on foot. A B

in

Digitized by Google

In the first encounter before the ioining, both sides discharged and threw: Wherein the Britans both employing art, and shewing resolution with their great swords and little targuets avoided our shot, or shooke them off; darting withall great store of theirs against us: till at length Agricola spying his vantage, exhorted three Batavian cohorts, and two of the Tungrians to presse forward and bring the matter to handy strokes and dint of sword: a thing, which they in respect of long service were able readily to performe: and contrariwise to the enemy preiudiciall and hurtfull, by reason of their small bucklers and huge swords. For the swords of the Britans being blunt-pointed were no way for the close or for the open fight. Now as the Batavians began to deale blowes and lay about them, to strike with the pikes of their bucklers, to mangle their faces, and having overborne in the plaine all that resisted, to march up the hill, the rest of the cohorts gathering heart, upon emulation, violently bet down all about them, and many halfe dead or wholly untouched were left, for hast of winning the victory. C

In the meane time, the troups of the horsemen began to flee: and the charettiers mingled themselves with the battell of the footmen: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now distressed themselves, by the unevennesse of the ground, and thicke rankes of their enemies. Neither was the forme of this fight, like a loose skirmish of horsemen to and fro. But standing still, and maintaining their places, they sought withall by maine weight of horses to breake in and beare down one another. The wandring waggons also and masterlesse horses affrighted, as feare caried them, over-bare many times, those which met them, or thwarted their way. Now, the Britans, which stood aloofe from the battell, on the heighth of the hils, and at their good leasure disdained our fewnesse, began to come downe by little and little, and to wheele about the backs of our men that were now in traine of winning the field; but that Agricola suspecting as much, opposed against them foure wings of horsemen purposely retained about him, for sudden dispatch, and all chances of war; and so, by repulsing them back, as sharply as they ran fiercely to assaile, put them in rout. Thus the counsell of the Britans turned upon their own heads, and the wings by commandement of the leader turning quite from the battell in front, followed the enemy at the back, and pursued the chase. Then might you have seen in the open fields a grievous and pitifull spectacle, coursing, wounding, taking, and killing of them that were taken, when others were offred. Now whole regiments of the enemies according to their severall dispositions, armed though they were, and more in number, turned their backs to the fewer: others unarmed sought their own death, offring themselves voluntarily to the slaughter. Every where there lay scattered, weapons, bodies, and mangled limbs, and the ground was every where embrued with blood: and sometime even in them that were overcome, appeared both anger and valour: For, when they approached the woods, uniting themselves; they entrapped unawares some of the formost of our men which unadvisedly followed, not knowing the country. And but that Agricola with his presence every where assisted at need, setting about them certain cohorts of his bravest and most ready footmen, as it were in forme of a toile, and commanding some of his horsemen to forego their horses where the passes were narrow, and others, where the wood was thin to enter on horseback, no doubt we had taken some blow by our overmuch boldnesse. But after they saw our men again in strong array and good order to follow the chase, they fled, not in troupes D E F

A troupes as before and attending ech other, but vterly disbanded and single, and eschuing all company, toward the far remote and desert places. The night and our satiety of blood made an end of the chase. Of the enemies side ten thousand were slaine: three hundred and forty of ours. Among st whom was Aulus Atticus Captain of a cohort, upon a youthfull heat of his own, and through the fierce spirit of his horse, being carried into the mids of his enemies. That night, the winners for their parts solaced themselves with the victory and spoile: and the Britons scattering out of order, crying and howling, (men and women together) take and draw with them their hurt persons, call unto them that were not hurt, forsake their own houses, and in despite also set them on fire themselves: chuse out holes for to lurke
B in, and streightwaies forsake them; communicate some counsels together, and then have some glimmering of hope: sometime at the sight of their deerliest beloved moved to pity, more often stirred to rage: and certain it is, that some, as by way of compassion and mercie, slew their own wives and children. The day following discovered more plainly the greatnesse of the victory. Every where desolation and silence: no stirring in the mountaines: the houses fired and smoking a far off: no man to meet with our spies; who being sent abroad into all quarters found by their footsteps the flight was uncertaine, and that they were no where in companies together. Whereupon Agricola, because the summer was spent, and
C the war could not conveniently be divided; bringeth his armie into the borders of the * Horrestians: where receiving hostages he commanded the Admirall of his navie to saile about Britaine, lending him souldiers and strength for that purpose, and the terror of the Romane name was gone already before. Himselfe, with easie and gentle iournies, to terrifie the new conquered nations with the very stay of his passage, disposed his footmen and horsemen in their wintering places: and withall the navy with prosperous wind and successe arived at the port * Trutulensis, from whence it departed, and coasting along the neerest side
D of Britaine returned thither againe. Then and never before, the Romane fleet having doubled the point of the utmost sea discovered and reported, Britaine to be an Iland, and withall found out and subdued the Iles of Orkney, before that time never known, which Orosius and as many writers as follow him ascribe falsly unto Claudius. This state of affaires in Britaine Agricola signified by letter without any amplifying termes, to Domitian: who after his manner, with a cheerfull countenance and grieved heart, received the newes: being inwardly pricked to think that his late counterfet triumph of Germany, wherin certain slaves bought for mony were attired and their haire dressed as captives of that country, was had in derision and iustly skorned abroad: whereas now, a true and great victory, so many thousands oftentimes being slaine, was famous and currant in every mans mouth: that it were indeed a most perilous point if a private mans name should be exalted above the name of the Prince. Mary then in vaine had he suppressed the study of Oratory, and all other worthy politick arts,
E if he should in military glory be despised by another: For, other matters might more easily be passed over; but to be a good commander of an army was a vertue above private estate; and peculiar for a Prince. With these and the like cares being tormented, and musing much in his closet alone, which was a token and signe of some cruelty intended, he thought it yet best for the present to dissemble and put over his malice, untill the heat of Agricola his glory, and love of his souldiers were somewhat abated: for, as yet he remained in charge. Wherefore, he commanded that all the honors of triumph all ornaments, image triumphall and what els usually was conferred in lieu of triumph, should in senate be awarded unto him in most ample and honorable termes: and sending a successor, caused withall a bruit to be spred, that the province of Syria then lying void by the death of Atilius Rufus a consular Lieutenant, and reserved for men of great quality, was purposed unto him And a common opinion went, that Domitian sending one of his most secret and trusty servants to Agricola, sent withall the patent of Syria with instruction, that if he were in Britaine it should be delivered: and that
F the same man meeting Agricola as he crossed the seas, without speaking unto him or doing his message, returned again to Domitian. Whether this were true or fained and surmised probably, as correspondent to the Princes disposition, I cannot affirme: But in the meane season Agricola had delivered to his successor the Province in good and peaceable state. And lest his arrivall at Rome should be noted, by reason of the multitudes of people, which would goe out to see & to meet him, cutting off that courtesie of his friends, he entred the City by night,

*Now called Anguse, as some thinke.

*Some read, Rhutupensis, which is supposed to be Richborow neer Sandwitch. Britain is for certain avouched to be an Iland. The Ilands Orkneys.

Digitized by Google

and by night came to the palace as he was willed. Where, being admitted to the Princes presence, and received with a short salutation and no speech, he sorted himselfe with the rest of the waiters. A Salustius Lucullus Lieutenant generall over Britaine. Arviragus the Britan.

Agricola had for his successor, as others thinke, Cn. Trebellius, but, as I take it, Salustius Lucullus, whom Domitian straight after slew, because he suffered certain spears of a new fashion to be called Lucullææ. At which time also, Arviragus flourished in this Iland, and not in the daies of Claudius, as Geffrey of Monmouth dreameth. For these verses of Iuvenall are to be understood of Domitian:

——Omen habes magni clarig; triumphi:
Regem aliquem capies, aut de temone Britanno
*Excidet * Arviragus——* B

*The old scholiast upon Iuvenal calleth him Arbila.

A powrefull Osse and signe thou hast, presaging triumph great:
Some king (sure) thou shalt prisoner take in chace or battell heat:
Or els Arviragus shall lose his British roiall seat.

Rufina, a British Dame.

There flourished likewise at Rome Claudia Rufina, a British dame, passing well learned, and withall as beautifull, whom Martiall commendeth in these verses;

Claudia cæruleis cum sit Rufina Britannis
*Edita, cur * Latia pectora plebis habet?*
Quale decus formæ? Romanam credere matres
Italides possunt, Atthides esse suam. C

*By the like phrase in another Epigram he saith, Abderit ana pectora plebis habet; speaking of a doltish and grosse headed fellow.

Sith from blew Britans Claudia Rufina doth descend,
How comes a learned Latian grace her person to commend?
What beauty? Italian dames may her a Romane make:
And Attick wives again full well, her for their daughter take.

This was, as Iohn Bale and Matthew Parker Arch-bishop of Canterbury have written, the very same woman, of whom S. Paul maketh mention in his latter Epistle to Timothy) neither is the computation of times repugnant, howsoever others be of a contrary opinion.

Britaine become a Province. Britaine a Presidiall Province. *Governed under Emperors, with garisons lying in it. Comes, here, as much as a Lieutenant generall. What legions served in Britaine. Dio. 55.

Thus under the Empire of Domitian, when that farther part therof, as being rough and unfruitfull, was left unto the barbarous Britans, this hither side was reduced full D and whole into the forme of a province: Which was not governed by any Consular or Proconsular deputy, but was counted *Præsidialis, & appropriate to the Cæsars: as being a province annexed unto the Roman Empire after the division of Provinces ordeined by Augustus, and had Propretors of their own. Afterwards when as Constantinus Maximus had set down a new forme of Common-weale, under a Prefect or Provost of Pretors degree of Gaule, there was set over it a vicegerent, and together with him in matters of war the *Count or Earle of Britaine, an Earle or Count of the Saxony coast by Britaine: and a Duke or Generall of Britain, besides Presidents, Auditors or Receivers and such others. Moreover, out of those 29. Legions, which the Romans had appointed thorow their Imperiall government, three of them lay in garison E to restrain that Province, to wit, the second Legion Augusta, the sixt Legion victrix, and the twentith victrix. But this is meant of the time of Severus: For before, we learn out of Authors, that other Legions there were, and more in number. And although Strabo writeth that there was need of no more than one band of souldiers, to the keeping of Britaine in subiection, yet in the raigne of Claudius there were placed here, the second Legion Augusta, the ninth Legion Hispanienſis, and the fourteenth named Gemina Martia victrix. Yea and about the time of Vespasian, Iosephus sheweth, that foure Legions served in this Iland: Britaine, saith hee, is compassed about with the Ocean, and almost as big as our world. The Romanes there inhabiting, have brought it under their dominion, and foure Legions doe keep in subiection an Iland, peopled with so great F a multitude. And doubtlesse, the standing guards and Camps of Legions and Romane souldiers, were many times the Seminaries, as it were and Seed-plots of Cities and townes, as in other Provinces, so also in this our Britaine. Thus was the yoke of subiection laid upon the Britans, first by a garison of souldiers, which alwaies with terror were ready to command the Inhabitants, afterwards by tribute and impostes: and in that

The beginning of Cities. The Romane yoke.

Digitized by Google

A that respect forced they were to have Publicans, that is to say, greedy cormorants and horsleeches, who sucked their blood, confiscated their goods and exacted tributes in the name of the dead: Neither were they permitted to use the ancient lawes of their country, but magistrats were sent from the people of Rome, with absolute power and commission to minister iustice even in capitall matters. For, Provinces had Propretors, Lieutenants, Presidents, Pretors and Proconsuls. Every city also and State had their municipall magistrates. The Pretor proclaimed yeerly solemne sessions and Assies, at which he determined the waightier causes sitting aloft upon a high Tribunall seat, and guarded with his Lictors about him proudly executed hee his iurisdicti- Rowardus in Protribunal.
B on: rods and whipping cheere were presented to the backs, the ax and heading to the necks of the common people, and every yeere they were forced to receive one new ruler or other allotted unto them. Neither was this sufficient: they maintained discord and dissension among them, some also they favoured above the rest, that they might have them to be the instruments of this their servitude.

This yoke of the Romanes although it were grievous, yet comfortable it proved and a saving health unto them: for that healthsome light of Iesus Christ shone withal upon the Britans, whereof more hereafter, and the brightnesse of that most glorious Empire, chased away all savage barbarisme from the Britans minds, like as from other nations whom it had subdued. For Rome, as saith Rutilius,

C ——Legiferis mundum complexa triumphis
Fœdere communi vivere cuncta facit:
Compassed the world with triumphs bringing lawes;
And all to live in common league doth cause.

And in another place speaking unto the same Rome most truly and in right elegant verses;

Fecisti patriam diversis gentibus unam.
Profuit iniustis te dominante capi.
Dumq; offers victis proprij consortia juris,
Vrbem fecisti quod prius orbis erat.
D Thou hast of divers nations one entire country framed,
Happy it was for lawlesse folke, that they by thee were tamed.
For offering use, to them subdu'd, of thine own proper lore,
One civill state thou mad'st of that, which was wild world before.

For, to say nothing of the rest of the Provinces, the Romanes having brought over Colonies hither, and reduced the naturall inhabitants of the Iland unto the society of civill life, by training them up in the liberall Arts, and by sending them into Gaule for to learne perfectly the lawes of the Romanes (wherupon Iuvenal

Callia causidicos docuit facunda Britannos, Gaule eloquent of Britans hath good pleading lawyers made.)

E governed them with their lawes, and framed them to good maners and behaviour so, as in their diet and apparell they were not inferior to any other provinces: they furnished them also with goodly houses and stately buildings, in such sort, that the reliques and rubbish of their ruines doe cause the beholders now, exceedingly to admire the same: and the common sort of people doe plainly say, these Romane works were made by Giants, whom in the North parts they use to call in their vulgar tongue Eatons, for Heathens (If I be not deceived) or Ethnicks. Certes, they are works of exceeding great admiration, and sumptuous magnificence: but especially the Picts wall, whereof I will write more in due place: and those Causeies thorowout the whole land, a wonderfull peece of worke, what with dreining and drying up the meres in some places, and what with casting up banks where low vallies were, in others: so fenced and paved with stone, and withall of that breadth, that they can well receive and with roome enough, waines meeting one the other. Now what maner of Causeies these were, let Galene tell you.

The works of the Romans in Britain.

The Picts wall.

Highwayes made by the Romanes.

The waies, quoth he, Trajanus repaired, by paving with stone, or raising with banks cast up such peeces of them as were moist and miry; by stocking up & ridding such as were rough Galen. lib. 9. cap. 8. Methomedend.

Digitized by Google

and overgrowen with bushes and briers: by making bridges over rivers that could not be waded thorow: where the way seemed longer than needed, by cutting out another shorter: if any where by reason of some steepe hill, the passage were hard and uneasie, by turning it aside thorow easier places: now in case it were haunted with wild beasts, or lay wast and desert, by drawing it from thence thorow places inhabited, and withall, by laying levell all uneven and rugged grounds. But now adaies these of ours, being dismembred, as it were, and cut one peece from another in some places, by reason that the countrey people digge out gravell from thence, are scarcely to be seene; yet elsewhere, leading thorow pastures and by-grounds out of the rode way, the bankes are so high, that evidently they shew themselves. A

These causeys or Street-waies, the Romanes called, Vias Consulares, Regias, Praetorias, Militares, Publicas, Cursus publicos, and Actus, as is to be seene in Ulpian and Iulius Frontinus. Ammianus Marcellinus termeth them Aggeres itinerarios & publicos: Sidonius Apollinaris, Aggeres, and Tellures inaggeratas: Beda and the latter writers, Stratas, that is, Streets. B

Our Chroniclers, doubtlesse herein deceived, doe hold, that there were but onely foure such causeys as these: of which, the first was Watling-street, so called of one Vitellian, (I wote not what he was,) who had the charge thereof (and indeed the Britans named Vitellian, in their tongue Guetalin) and Werlam-street, for that it went thorow Verolamium, which elsewhere also, the people dwelling neere vnto it, named, High dike, High ridge, Forti.-foot-way, and Ridge-way. The second, they commonly cal Ikenild-street, because it began in the Icenes country: The third, the Fosse, for that (as men thinke) it was fensed on both sides with a ditch: and the fourth Ermin-street by a German word, of Mercurie (whom as I am enformed by Iohn Obsopœus) a great learned man) under the name of Erminsul, that is, the Columne of Mercurie, the Germans our ancient progenitors, worshipped. C pl 440. 402.

Now, that Mercurie had the charge of waies, his name Ἑρμῆς among the Greeks, may shew sufficiently: as also his Statues with foure sides, called in old time Hermæ, which were set everywhere upon high waies. It hath been generally thought, that one Mulmutius (I know not what he should be) many hundred yeeres before the birth of Christ, made these causeys: but so far am I from beleeving it, that I dare confidently avouch, the Romans by little and little founded and raised them up. Whilest Agricola, saith Tacitus, governed Britaine, severall waies were enjoined, and farre distant places [by the purveyors commandement) that the countrey should carrie from the neerest standing camps, or wintering places, to those that were farre off, and out of the way: And the Britans complained, as the same Tacitus writeth, That the Romanes wore out, and consumed their bodies and hands, in cleering of woods, and paving the Fens, with a thousand stripes and reprochful indignities. Also we read in ancient Records, That in the daies of Honorius and Arcadius, there were made in Britain certain beaten high waies from sea to sea. That this was the Romans worke, Beda witnesseth: The Romans inhabited (saith he) within the wall (which, as I rehearsed before, Severus had made overthwart the Iland) toward the southerne side, which the cities, churches, and street-waies there made doe witnesse at this day. About the making of such causeys and high waies, the Romanes were wont to exercise their souldiers, and the common multitude, lest being idle, they should grow factious, & affect alteration in the State. The Romanes, as Isidorus writeth, made Causeys in sundry places, almost thorow the world, both for the direction of journeys, and also because the people should not be idle: and to the making and paving of such causeys, prisoners were many times condemned, as may be gathered out of Suetonius, in the life of Caius. And there are to be seene in Spaine, the Causeys called Salamantica or Argentea, as also in France certaine Rode waies, called Via militares, paved by the Romanes; to say nothing, of the way Appia, Pompeia, Valeria, and others in Italie. D E F

Sueton. in Octauius.

Along these Causies and high waies, Augustus placed young men at first, as posts within small distances one from another: and afterward swift wagons, to give notice with all speed, and out of hand, what was doing in every place. Neere, or upon these

Cawsies,

Digitized by Google

A Cawſies, were ſeated Cities and Manſions, which had in them Innes furniſhed with all neceſſaries belonging to this life for trauailers and way-faring perſons to abide and reſt in: as alſo Mutations. For ſo they called in that age, the places where ſtrangers, as they journeied, did change their poſt-horſes, draught beaſts, or wagons. He therefore that ſeeketh not about theſe Rode waies for thoſe places, which are mentioned in the Itinerarie of Antoninus, ſhall no doubt miſſe the truth, and wander out of the way. A Manſion. A Mutation.

Neither, think much of your labour, in this place to note, that the Emperors erected at euery mile, and along theſe Cawſies certaine little pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters or Letters cut in them, to ſignifie how many miles: Whereupon B Sidonius Apollinaris, writeth thus:

Antiquus tibi nec teratur agger;
Cujus per ſpatium ſatis vetuſtis,
Nomen Cæſarum viret columnis.

That ancient cauſey, doe not decay,
Where on good old pillars along the way,
The Cæſars name ſtands freſh for ay.

Neere alſo unto theſe high waies, on both ſides were Tombs and Sepulchers, with inſcriptions graued upon them in memoriall of brane and noble men, that the paſſen- C gers by, might be put in mind, that as thoſe ſometimes were mortall men, ſo themſelues are now. For the repairing likewiſe of the ſaid cawſeys, as wee may ſee in the Code of Theodoſius title, de Itinere muniendo, that is, Of making and mending waies, They all were willing upon a good and profitable deuotion, who could doe beſt, and make moſt ſpeede in this buſineſſe. Furthermore, in our owne ancient lawes, there is mention made, de pace quatuor Cheminorum, that is, Viarum ſub majori judicio, that is, Touching the peace of the foure Rhode-waies in ſome higher Court. Varr. lib. de lingua Latin. Codex Theodoſij. The Lawes of S. Edward.

Vnder the raigne of Nerva, the writers have diſcontinued the Storie of Britannie. But in the time of Trajane, the Britans may ſeem to have reuolted and rebelled: and euident it is out of Spartianus, that ſubdued then they were. Moreouer, while Adrian D was Emperour, Iulius Severus ruled the Iſland: and when he was called away againſt the Iewes, who then were in an uprore, the Britans could not have been kept in their allegeance to the Romanes, had not Adrianus come among them in perſon: who being then Conſull the third time, in the yeere of Chriſt 124, ſeemeth by the prowеſſe of his armie to have diſcomfited his enemies. For I have ſeene in one peece of money of his coining, the ſtampe of an Emperour with three ſouldiers, whom I judge to repreſent three Legions, with this Inſcription. EXER. BRITANNICUS: and another bearing this inſcription RESTITUTOR BRITANNY. This Prince reformed many things thorowout the Iſland: and was the firſt that built a wall between the barbarous Britans, and the Romans foureſcore miles in length: laying the foundation therof within E the ground of huge piles or ſtakes, and faſtning them together, in manner of a ſtrong hedge or mound. For which expedition of his, Florus the Poet plaied upon him, thus: Nerva. Trajanus. Adrianus, Emperour. Iul. Severus, Proprætor. Spartianus.

Ego nolo Cæſar eſſe Ambulare per Britannos,
Scythicas pati pruinas.

I will in no wiſe Cæſar be,
To walke along in Britanie
The Scythicke froſts to feele and ſee.

Vnto whom, Adrianus wrote backe in his wiſe:

Ego nolo Florus eſſe, Ambulare per tabernas,
F Latitare per popinas,
Culices pati rotundos.

And I will never Florus be,
To walke from ſhop to ſhop, as he;
To lurke in Tauernes ſecretly,

Digitized by Google

And there to feele the Rome-wine fly. A

Cl. Priſcus Licinius, Proprætor of Britannie.

At this time M. F. CL. PRISCVS LICINIVS, was the Propræter of Britannie, and emploied in the Iourney of Iurie with Hadrian; as appeareth by this antique Inſcription in a broken Marble.

M F. CL. PRISCO.
ICINIO. ITALICO. LEGATO. AVGVSTORVM
PR. PR. PROV. CAPPADOCIÆ
PR. PR. PROV. BRITANNIÆ LEG. AVG. B

LEG. IIII. GALLICLÆ. PRÆF. COH. IIII. LINGONVM. VEXILLO. MIL.
ORNATO. A. DIVO. HADRIANO. IN EXPEDITIONE IVDAIC.

Q. CASSIVS. DOMITIVS. PALVMBVS. C

Antonius Pius, Emperour.

Under Antonius Pius (by whoſe ordinance as many as were in the Roman world, became Citizens of Rome) this warre brake out againe into a light fire, which he ſo quenched by driving the barbarous Britans further off, under the conduct of Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant, and by making another wall of turfe, that thereupon he was ſurnamed BRITANNICVS: and he deſerved ſingular commendation, for that he had fined the Brigates with the loſſe of one part of their Lands, who had infeſted with roades Genounia, a neighbour Province under the protection and allegeance of the Romans. And at this time, as we collect out of Iabolenus, Seius Saturnius was Archigubernus of the Navie in Britannie: But whether by this title, hee were an Admirall of the ſaid Navie, or a principall Pilot, or the Maſter of a ſhip, I would have the Lawyers to tell.

Lollius Vrbicus Propretor.

Capitolinus. Pauſanias in Arcadicis.

Digeſt. lib. 36. Archigubernus.

D

But the Britans, giving occaſions ſtill of quarrels and warres, one after another began a commotion under Antoninus Philoſophus: for the appeaſing whereof, Calphurnius Agricola was ſent, and ſeemeth to have ended the ſame with fortunate ſucceſſe. Which commendation for the diſpatching of this warre, Fronto, for Romane eloquence comparable to the beſt, and ſecond to none, would needes give unto Antoninus the Emperor. For albeit he ſitting ſtill, and holding his Court in the verie pallace of Rome, gave out onely his commiſsion and warrant for to make this ware, yet he proteſteth, that like unto the Pilot ſitting at the helme to ſtere a galley, he deſerved the glory of the whole courſe and ſailing in that voyage. At the ſame time there ſerved alſo in the warres of Britannie, Helvius Pertinax brought hither out of the Parthian warre, and here ſtayed.

Antoninus Philoſophus, Emperour.

Calphurnius Agricola, Proprætor.

Eumenius. Capitolinus.

E

Whiles Commodus was Emperour, Britannie, was all of a Garboile, full of warres, and ſeditious troubles. For the barbarous Britans, having paſſed over the wall, made great waſte, and hewed in peeces the Romanes, both Captaine and Souldier. For the repreſſing of which rebels, Vlpius Marcellus was ſent: who had ſo fortunate an hand in taming their audacious ſtomacks, that his proweſſe was ſoone defaced, and depraved with envie, and himſelfe called backe. This Captaine was of all others moſt vigilant: and being deſirous that the reſt about him might be as watchfull, he wrote every evening xij. tables throughout, ſuch as commonly are made of the Linden-tree wood: and commaunded one of his attendants about him, to carry the ſame unto divers of the ſouldiers, ſome at one houre of the night, and ſome at another, whereby they might thinke their generall was ever awake, and ſo themſelves might ſleepe the leſſe.

Commodus Emperour.

Vlpius Marcellus Proprætor.

Xiphilinus out of Dio.

F

Of whoſe temperance thus much alſo is reported: And albeit otherwiſe his nature was able to reſiſt ſleepe, yet that he might do it the better, he brought to paſſe by faſting and abſtinence,

Digitized by Google

A ſtinence. For to the end that he would not feed of bread to the full, he cauſed it to be brought from Rome to him into the campe; that by reaſon of the ſtaleneſſe of it, he could not eat any whit more than was needfull. But when he, I ſay, was called back, all licentious wantonneſſe brake into the Campe, and the forces in Britanny, letting the raines looſe of military diſcipline, became unruly, and refuſed the command and government of Commodie, although by ſome of his flatterers he was ſtiled Britannicus. Moreover, they that ſerved in Britanny ſuborned and ſent a thouſand and five hundred of their own rank into Italy againſt Perrennius, a man that not only caried an outward ſhew and countenance, but of all the Emperors minions could indeed do moſt with him: accu-
B ſing him that he had made captaines over ſouldiers certain of the gentlemens degree, and put Senators out of place, and withall that he had laid wait to take away the Emperors life. Commodus gave eare to this information, and beleeved it, whereupon he delivered the man into their hands: who after he had with many indignities been whipped, loſt his head, and was proclaimed a traitor to his country. Howbeit theſe ſeditious ſturs Helvius Pertinax repreſſed, not without great danger, being himſelfe almoſt ſlaine, and for certain left for dead among thoſe that were ſlaine.

Helvius Pertinax Propretor.

Now when Britanny was in peaceable eſtate, Clodius Albinus received it from Commodus, and withall afterwards for his worthy exploits in Britanny the name of Cæſareus: but ſoone after, becauſe in a publique aſſembly he had made an invective
C againſt the government of the Emperors, Iunius Severus was placed in his roume.

Clodius Albinus Propretor. Capitolinus. Iunius Severus Propretor.

At which very time, the thick miſts of ſuperſtition being ſkattered (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus Emperors, as Beda writeth but under Commodus, when Eleutherus was Biſhop of Rome) the heavenly light and brightneſſe of Chriſtianity, by the meanes of King Lucius ſhone upon this Iland. Which Prince, (as we find in the ancient *reports and lives of Martyrs, uſually read in the Church) admiring the integritie and holy life of the Chriſtians, made petition unto Eleutherus the Pope, by the mediation of Elvan and Meduan two Britans, that both himſelfe and his ſubiects might be inſtructed in chriſtian religion. Then ſent he hither forthwith, Fugatius and Donaitanus, two holy men, with letters, which at this day be extant, and (as very many are per-D ſwaded) are not forged but authenticall, as bearing date, when L. Aurelius Commodus was ſecond time Conſull with Veſpronius: Which holy men inſtructed the King and others in the myſteries of chriſtian religion. Hereupon it is, that Ninnius writeth thus of this King, King Lucius quoth he, is ſurnamed Lever Maur, that is [a Prince] of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now for thoſe that call theſe matters of King Lucius into queſtion (as many doe in theſe daies) as if there had been at that time no King in Britanny, which they ſuppoſe was full and whole reduced into a province before, I wiſh them to call to remembrance thus much, That the Romanes by ancient cuſtome had in their Provinces Kings as the inſtruments of bondage; that the Britans even then, refuſed to obey Commodus; and that themſelves poſſeſſed and E held freely, thoſe parts of the Iland which were beyond the foreſaid wall, had there, Kings of their own, and that Antoninus Pius a few yeeres before, having ended war, permitted Kingdomes to be ruled by their own Kings and provinces by their own Comites.* What ſhould let then, but that Lucius might be King over that part of the Iland, unto which the Romanes forces never came? And verily, that which Tertullian hath put down, who wrote much about thoſe daies, if wee thorowly weigh his words, and the time, may very aptly be referred to the Britans converſion unto Chriſt: Thoſe places, quoth he, among the Britans, which yeelded the Romanes no acceſſe, are now ſubdued unto Chriſt: and ſomewhat after. Britanny is encloſed within the compaſſe of the Ocean. The nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are beſet by the Romanes, for feare
F they might paſſe beyond the limits of their countries. What ſhould I ſpeake of the Romanes, who with garizons of their Legions fortifie their empire? neither are they able to extend the poure of their dominion, beyond thoſe very nations. But the kingdome and name of Chriſt reacheth farther ſtill, it is beleeved in every place, and is worſhipped of all thoſe people above named, &c.

Capitolinus.

Lieutenants Generall, or Governors.

Againſt the Iewes. cap. 7.

But our Eccleſiaſticall writers who have emploied both time and diligence in the conſideration

Chriſtian Religion in Britanny. K. Lucius. *Mattyrologijs.

Digitized by Google

consideration of this point endevor and labour to prove, and that out of ancient au- A thors of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and infancie of the Church, Britanny had received christian religion: and namely that Ioseph of Arimathea a no-Bale. Matthew Parker, Iohn Fox. ble Senator, sailed out of Gaule into Britanny, and that Claudia Rufina the wife of Aulus Pudens, which woman, as it is credibly thought, S. Paul nameth in his later Epistle to Timothy, and whom the Poet Martiall so highly commendeth, was a Britan borne. They cite also the testimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Bishop of Tyre, who in his Synopsis hath recorded, that Simon Zelotes, after he had travelled through Mauritania, was at last slaine and buried in Britanny:
as also that Aristobulus, whom S. Paul mentioneth in his Epistle to the Romanes, was B made Bishop of Britanny: (whereto Nicephorus inclineth) notwithstanding he spea-Brutij in Italy. keth of Britiana and not of Britannia. They report likewise upon the authority of Si-
*The same that Calendar or Almanack with vs. meon that great Metaphrast, and of the Greeks *Menology, that S. Peter came hither and spred abroad the light of Gods word: out of Sophronius also and Theodoret, that
S. Paul after his second imprisonment in Rome, visited this our country. Whereupon Venantius Fortunatus if he may be beleeved as a Poet, writeth thus of him, unlesse he speaketh of his doctrine.

Transijt Oceanum, & quà facit Insula portum
Quasq; Britannus habet terras, quasq; ultima Thule.

Pass'd over Seas, where any Ile makes either port or bay, C
And lands, so far as Britans coast or cape of Thule lay.

But to this purpose maketh especially that which erewhile I alleged out of Tertullian; as also that which Origen recordeth, How the Britans with one consent embraced the Faith, and made way themselves unto God by meanes of the Druida, who alwaies did beat upon this article of beleefe, That there was but one God. And verily of great moment and
4. upon Ezechiel. importance is that with me, that Gildas writeth, after he had mentioned the rebelli-
Vnder Nero. on of Boodicia, and treated of the revenge thereof, Meane while, quoth he, Christ, that true Sun, shining with his most glittering brightnesse upon the universall world, not from the temporall skie and firmament, but even from the highest cope of heaven, exceeding all times, vouchsafed first, his beames, that is to say his precepts and doctrine in the time as we D know of Tiberius Cæsar, unto this frozen Iland full of Ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the visible sunne. Chrysostome likewise, (to note so much by the way) writeth of the christian religion in this Iland, as followeth: The British Ilands seated without this sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the poure of the word (for even there also be Churches founded, and altars erected) of that word, I say, which is planted in the soules, and now also in the lips of all people. And the same Chrysostome in another
In a Sermon upon the Pentecost. place: How often have folk in Britanny fed of mans flesh? but now with fasting they refresh the soule. Likewise S. Hierome; The Britan devided from our world, if he proceed in reli-
Epitaph, of Marcella, Widow. gion, leaving the western parts toward the Suns setting, will seek Hierusalem, a City known E unto him by fame only, and relation of scriptures. But now passe we forward from the Church to the Empire.

When Commodus was slaine, Pertinax being called to the Empire, sent presently Albinus again over into Britanny. But after that Pertinax within eight hundred and Pertinax Emperor. two daies was made away, Didius Iulianus, (who likewise was within a while killed) Severus Emperor. at Rome, Pescennius Niger in Syria, Clodius Albinus in Britanny, and Septimius Severus in Pannonia, all together at once take upon them the soverainty of the Empire.
Severus being next unto Rome, hasteneth first to Rome, and, with consent of the soul-diers and Senate, proclaimed Emperor, straightwaies (because he would not leave an Albinus Emperor. enemy behind at his back) craftily createth Albinus, Cæsar: This Albinus, chiefe commander of the forces in Britanny and Gaule, and having stamped mony with his F image upon it, set up his statues, and conferred upon him the honorable dignity of a Consull, wisely with good foresight dulceth and kindly intreateth the men. Then maketh he an expedition into the East against Niger, whom in plaine field hee gave *Afterwards Constantinople. battell unto, vanquished and slew. The City *Bizantium after 3. yeeres siege he forced and woon: the Adiabenes, Arabians and other nations hee brought to his subie-iection.

Digitized by Google

A jection. Being now puffed up with pride, for theſe fortunate victories, and impatient of a companion in government, he ſent under-hand murderers of purpoſe to diſpatch Albinus: but ſeeing his ſecret practiſes tooke not effect, hee openly proclaimeth him Traitor, and an enemie to the State, and with all the ſpeed he could make, haſteneth into Gaule againſt him: where Albinus with the choice and chiefe ſtrength of the Britiſh armie made head neere unto * Lyons. The Albinians fought moſt valiantly, in ſo much as Severus himſelfe, throwing from him his purple robe, began with his men to flie. But when the ſaid Britiſh forces, as if now the victorie had been in their hands, diſplaied their rankes in thinner arraies, and ran furiouſly upon their enemies B backs, diſcomfited and in rout, Lætus, one of Severus his Captaines, who with his freſh and unfoiled troupes, waited untill then, for to ſee the iſſue of the battell (having heard withall that Severus was ſlaine) with a purpoſe and reſolution now to take the Empire upon him, charged upon them, and put them to flight. And Severus, having by this time rallied his men, and reſumed the purple Robe aforeſaid, followed likewiſe fiercely upon them, and having ſlain Albinus with a number of other, obtained a moſt fortunate victorie.

* Lugdunum.

Upon this, Severus (having alone the Soveraignetie of the whole world) ſent firſt Heraclianus to ſeize upon Britaine, and to rule it: then Virius Lupus, as Proprætor and Lieutenant (whom Vlpian the Civill Lawyer nameth Præſident of Britaine) who, C as we ſhall relate in place convenient, built many new Caſtles there: howbeit, driven he was in the end to redeeme his owne peace, at the hands of the Maatæ, with a great ſumme of money, after hee had recovered ſome few priſoners, conſidering that the Caledonians kept not their word, who had promiſed to keepe under the ſaid Maatæ. And being not able after many loſſes and calamities ſuſtained, to repreſſe the ſudden rodes, and aſſaults made by the enemies, of neceſſitie he ſent for Severus himſelfe: who gladly and thankefully taking hold of this good occaſion, to withdraw and weane his ſonnes (given to licentious rioting) from the delightſome pleaſures of Rome-Citie, and therewith to augment his owne ſtile with the addition of Britannicus; albeit, he was above threeſcore yeeres of age, and gowtie beſides, fully D reſolveth with his two ſons, Baſsianus (whom he had named Antoninus, & Auguſtus) Geta Cæſar, and the Legions, to enter Britaine. The Britans forthwith ſent Embaſſadours unto him for peace. Whom after he had of purpoſe detained with him a good while, till he might prepare all things meet for warre, he ſent away as they came without obtaining their ſuit: and leaving his ſonne Geta, (whom hee created Auguſtus at his firſt arrivall in Britaine) in the hither part of the Province which continued in obedience to the Romanes, for the civill juriſdiction and adminiſtration of the affaires there: himſelf with Antoninus went into the further parts, where being occupied in cutting downe woods, making bridges, and drying up the meres, he fought no battell: howbeit, what with the ambuſcadoes of enemies, and what with ſickE neſſe, he loſt fiftie thouſand of his men: Thus writeth Dio. But Herodian hath rerecorded, that in certaine light skirmiſhes, whiles the barbarous Britans kept the fennie bogs, and moſt thick woods, out of which they might more ſafely aſſaile the Romans, he had the upper-hand. Yet he enforced them in the end to a league, with this condition, that they ſhould yeeld unto him a good part of their Countrey. And that which is the greateſt honour and ornament of his Empire, he fenced it with a wall overthwart the Iſland, from one coaſt of the Ocean to another. For theſe victories, he ſtamped certaine peeces of money with this inſcription, VICTORIA BRITANNICA, aſſumed the ſurname of BRITANNICVS MAXIMVS; and his ſonne Geta named Britannicus bare it, as appeareth by his coines. Howbeit, the Britans afterward (having F broken covenant) began to rebell, and make alteration in the ſtate, whereupon his wrathfull indignation againſt them brake out into ſuch termes, as that in an aſſembly of his ſouldiers, he gave them in charge to make a generall maſſacre of them all, uſing theſe verſes out of Homer, to this effect:

Heraclianus, Proprætor.

Virius Lupus, Proprætor. Digeſt. lib. 28. Tit. 6.

Who inhabited the countrey now Northumberland.

Let none eſcape your bloudy hands, but be they ſure to die,
Spare not the verie babes unborne, in mothers wombe that lie.

The

Digitized by Google

Theſe rebels when he had in ſome ſort repreſſed by the helpe of his own forces, he A ſickned, not ſo much upon any bodily diſeaſe, as for griefe and ſorrow of mind, occaſioned by the deſperate and unreclaimable miſdemeanour of his Sonne Antoninus, who once or twice gave the attempt to kill him with his owne hand: and ſo he yeelded up his vitall breath at Yorke, uttering at the point of death theſe his laſt words, A troubled ſtate of Common weale I found in every place: but, I leave it now in peace and quietneſſe, even among the Britans. His body here was in militarie ſort carried forth by his ſouldiers, beſtowed in a funerall fire, and honoured with a ſolemne juſting, and running at Tilt, performed by his owne ſouldiers and ſonnes. I might peradventure be cenſured for my vanitie, if I ſhould relate in this place the prodigies that went B before his death, and namely, as touching the ſootie and black hoſtes or Sacrifices, as alſo the coronet made of the deadly and mournefull cypreſſe, which a ſcurrile Bufſon and jeſter preſented unto him with theſe words, Thou haſt been all, now bee a God:
but after what maner he was canonized a God, I will not thinke much of mine owne paine, to annex hereunto, conſidering that the knowledge thereof may delight the reader alſo.

The Apotheoſis, or Deification of the Emperor.

A Cuſtome the Romanes have, to conſecrate thoſe Emperours that die, their Sonnes or Succeſſours ſurviving. And whoſoever are in this wiſe honoured, be canonized and regiſtred in the Roll of their Divi, that is, Gods. Now, during this complement, they hold a generall mourning thorow the whole citie, and the ſame mixed with a feſtivall ſolemnitie. C Herodian.

For, after the Princes death, they burie the bodie honourably, and with ſumptuous funerals, according to the maner of other men: But withall, they frame an image of waxe, reſembling in all points the party deceaſed, and lay the ſame openly at the entry of the palace, upon a moſt ample and ſtately bed of Ivorie, erected on high, and covered with cloth of gold. And verily, that image lieth with a paliſh and wan colour like unto a ſicke man: About the bed on both ſides, there ſit a great part of the day, the whole bodie of the Senate on the right hand, arraied in their blacks: and on the left hand certaine Dames and Ladies, who are by the place and dignitie of the husbands, or parents worſhipfull. And there is not one of them ſeen to weare any gold about them, nor to be adorned with jewels, but clad in white and ſlender garments, they repreſent mourners. This do they for ſeven daies together: during which D time, the Phyſitians reſort daily into him to touch his pulſe, and conſider of his diſeaſe, and thereupon as of their patient, judicially pronounce, that he groweth worſe and worſe. This after a ſevenight, when it ſeemed that hee was departed, certaine of the nobleſt, and moſt choice yong gentlemen, as well of the Senators as knights degree, take up the foreſaid bed upon their ſhoulders, and carrie it thorow the high ſtreet, called Sacra, into the old Forum, where the Roman Magiſtrats had wont to lay down their rule and government. Here, on both ſides were certain greeſes or ſteps in maner of ſtaires raiſed: upon which, on the one hand was placed a quire of boies of nobleſt birth, and of the Patritian degree, and on the other, a company of women likewiſe of noble parentage, ſinging in commendation of the dead Prince, hymnes and ſonets, entuned in a ſolemne, and mournfull note. Which done, they take up the ſaid bed E or hearſe againe, and carrie it out of the Citie into Campus Martius: where, in the broadeſt place of the ſaid field, a frame of turret foure ſquare with equal ſides was raiſed, and the ſame made in maner of a tabernacle, of no other matter than main great peeces of timber. And verily within it was all over filled with dry fewell: but without, adorned with rich hangings woven with gold wire between, with divers ivory portraicts of imagerie, and ſundry curi-
*Gal. *ous pictures. Over this frame there ſtoode another ſomewhat leſſe: howbeit, in forme and furniture verie like unto the former, with windowes and dores ſtanding open. And ſo a third and fourth turret, ſmaller every one than that next beneath it, and others likewiſe ſtill one after another, untill you come to the laſt and utmoſt, which is the leaſt and higheſt of all the reſt. The maner of this whole building a man may well compare to theſe F lanternes or light towers ſtanding by haven ſides, and are commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct ſhips at ſea in their courſe to ſafe harboroughs. The hearſe then being mounted up into the ſecond tabernacle, they get together ſpices and odours of all ſorts, likewiſe all the ſweet ſmelling fruits, herbes juices and liquors, that the whole world can yeeld, and thereon powre the ſame forth

by

Digitized by Google

A by heap-meale. For there is not a nation, city or ſtate, nor any perſon of worth and marke above the reſt, but ſtrive avie every one to beſtow in honor of the Prince, thoſe laſt gifts and preſents. Now when there is a mighty heape of the ſaid ſpiceries gotten together, ſo that the whole roome is filled therewith, then all the Gentlemen of the Knights order, firſt ride about that edifice, marching in a certain meaſure: and therewith in their courſes and recourſes obſerve a warlike kind of motion round, in iuſt meaſure and number. The open chariots likewiſe are driven about by courteours in purple robes of honor ſitting therupon to guide and direct them with viſards on their reſembling faces, of all the redoubted captaines and renowmed Emperors of Rome.

B Theſe ceremonies thus performed, the Prince that next ſucceedeth in the Empire, takes a torch and firſt himſelfe ſets it to the tabernacle aforeſaid: then, all the reſt from every ſide put fire under, ſo that foorthwith every place beeing full of the ſaid dry fuell and odors, kindle and catch fire mightily. Then ſtraightwaies from the higheſt and leaſt tabernacle, as it were out of ſome lover or high turret together with the fire put underneath, an Eagle was let flie, and the ſame was ſuppoſed to carry up the Princes ſoule into heaven. And ſo from that time forward was the Emperor reputed and by the Romanes adored among the reſt of the Gods. Thus much by way of digreſſion and beſide the matter: now let us returne.

Antoninus Caracalla.

Antoninus Caracalla the ſonne of Severus, purſued the reliques of the war by his C captaines for a while in Britaine: but ſoone after he made peace, ſurrendring to the enemy their territories and caſtles. Howbeit in a ſpirit of ambition he aſſumed to himſelfe in his ſtile the name of BRITANNICVS, yea and of BRITANNICVS MAXIMVS. His brother Geta likewiſe, took upon him the title and addition of BRITANNICVS. For we have ſeen his mony coined with this Inſcription, IMP.CÆS.P.SEPT. GETA PIVS.AVG.BRIT.PONTIF.TRI.P.III.COS.II.PP.

Nonius Philippus Propretor.

From this time forward, writers have in long ſilence paſſed over the affaires of Britaine: For Alexander Severus was not ſlaine, as ſome would have it, in Sicilia a town of Britaine, but in Gaule. This certaine evidence only have wee out of an antique ſtone, that Nonnius Philippus was here Propretor under Gordianus the yonger.

Gallienus Emperor.

D Whiles Gallienus the Emperor gave himſelfe over to all maner of riotouſneſſe, the State of Rome either through the careleſſe managing of affaires, or by ſome inclination of the Deſtinies lay diſmembred as it were and maimed in all parts: and a heavy rent there was and revolt of this province from the Romane Captaine. For thirty tyrants there were who in divers places uſurped rule and dominion: among whom Lollianus Victorinus, Poſthumus, the Tetrici and Marius bare ſoveraign ſway, as I ſuppoſe, in this Iland: For their coines are here in great abundance digged up daily.

Panegyrick unto Conſtantius.

Thirty Tyrants.

Bonoſus.

Vnder Aurelian, that notable bibber Bonoſus, a Britan borne entred upon the Empire together with Proculus, who claimed to himſelfe all Britaine, Spaine and *Bracata Gallia, which provinces Florianus had for two moneths governed, but being in a E long and bloody battell vanquiſhed by Probus, he hanged himſelfe, whereupon this ieſt went commonly on him, There hangs a tankard, and not a man.

*Now, Languedoc Province and Daulphine.

Probus Emperor. Zoſimus.

Howbeit Probus was welcommed into Britaine with new troubles and commotions: For one, whom Probus himſelfe, induced by the commendation of his familiar friend Victorinus Maurus, had promoted to an office of ſtate, practiſed a revolt. For which he fell out by way of expoſtulation with Victorinus, who having gotten leave to depart unto the ſaid party, and feining that he fled and was eſcaped from the Emperor, beeing kindly entertained of the tyrant ſlue him in the night, and returned to Probus, and therewith was the province rid of theſe broiles. But who this Tyrant was no man hath related: Howbeit, he may ſeem to be that Cl. Corn. Lælianus, whoſe F peeces of coine are found in this Iland, and not elſewhere. Moreover, Probus ſent hither the Burgundians and Vandals whom he had ſubdued, and granted them places to inhabit: who afterwards, ſo often as any one went about to raiſe ſedition, ſtood the Romanes in good ſtead. Now, whereas Vopiſcus writeth, that Probus permitted the Britans to have vines, there is a right learned man that feareth leſt hee have inconſideratly put this down in writing, as if this land were unfit for vineyards; and yet it hath Lælianus Emperor.

Burgundians and Vandals in Britain.

vines,

Digitized by Google

vines, and for certain it is knowen, that it had very many. In regard of so many tyrants A Hierome. rising up in these daies within this province, Porphyrie, who lived in this age, cried out in these termes, Britaine a fertile Province of tyrants.

Carus and Carinus Emperors. After this, Carus Augustus the Emperor allotted by decree this our country, together with Gaule, Spaine and Illyricum unto his sonne Carinus. That he warred here, some there be that slightly indeed, but how truly I wot not, gather out of these verses of Nemesianus;

Nec taceam quæ nuper bella sub Arcto,
Fœlici Carine manu confeceris, ipso
Pene prior genitore Deo: B

Neither may I the wars in silence hide
Dispatcht of late with happy hand in North,
By thee, Carine, thy father Deifi'd;
Who dost well nere surpasse in works of worth.

Diocle sian and Maximian Emperors. Bononium Galliæ. Under Diocle sian, Carausius a Menapian borne, a man of very base parentage, howbeit inventive and active withall, who for his valour shewed in battels at sea became renowmed, was ordained Captaine of *Bologne in Gaule to put back & drive away the Saxons and Frankners that troubled the seas. This Carausius having at first from time to time taken many of the Barbarians prisoners, and yet neither brought in all the booty and pillage into the Emperors treasury, nor made restitution of goods unto C the Provincials: afterwards when as hee vanquished and subdued but few of them, began deeply to be suspected, that of set purpose he admitted the Barbarians to enter, to the end in their passage by he might intercept them with booty, and so by this occasion enrich himselfe: whereupon Maximian Augustus the Emperor gave commandement that he should be killed. Whereof he having certain intelligence, tooke

Carausius Emperor. upon him the Imperiall ensignes and seized Britain into his own hands, withdrew the navy that lay in defence of Gaule, built many ships after the Romane maner, adioyned to himselfe the Romane Legion, kept out the companies of forrain souldiers, assembled and drew together the French Merchants to muster, fortified Bologne with a garison, conveied away and tooke to his owne use the publike revenewes of Britain D and Batavia, allured by the spoiles of whole provinces no small power of barbarian forces to be his associates, and the Franks especially, whom he trained to sea-service, and in one word, made all the sea coasts every way dangerous for passage. To the vanquishing of him, Maximianus set forward with a puissant army, out of which *som

The Thebane Legion. there were who in the very voiage suffered death gloriously for Christs sake: but when he was come to the sea-side, being skared partly for want of sea-souldiers, and partly with the rage of the British Ocean, staied there; and having made a fained peace with Carausius, yeelded unto him the rule of the Iland, considering he was taken to be the meeter man, both to command and also to defend the Inhabitants against the warlike nations. Hereupon it is, that wee have seen in the silver coines of E Carausius two Emperors ioining hands, with this circumscription, CONCORDIA

* Of the Augusti, that is Emperors. AVGG. But Maximian turned his forces upon the Frankners, who then held *Batavia, and had secretly under hand sent aid unto Carausius: whom hee surprized on such a sudden, that he forced them to submission. In this meane while, Carausius governed

*Now Holland. Britain with incorrupt and unstained reputation and in exceeding great peace: against the Barbarians, as writeth Ninnius the disciple of Elvodugus, hee reedified the wall betweene the mouthes of Cluda and Carunus, and fortified the same with 7. castles, and built a round house of polished stone upon the bank of the river Carun, which took name of him, erecting therewith a triumphall arch in remembrance of victory. Howbeit Buchanan thinketh verily it was the Temple of Terminus, as we will write in Scotland. F

When Diocle sian and Maximian, as well to keep that which was woon, as to recover what was lost, had taken to them Constantius Chlorus and Maximianus Galerius to be Cæsars: Constantius having levied and enrolled an armie, came with great speed and sooner than all men thought to Bologne in France, which also is called Gessoriacum, a towne that Carausius had fortified with a strong garison; and they laid

Digitized by Google

A laid ſiege unto it round about: by pitching logs faſt into the earth at the very entry, and piling huge ſtones one upon another in maner of a rampire, he excluded the ſea, and tooke from the towne the benefit of their haven: which damme, the ſtrong and violent current of the Ocean beating againſt it forcibly for many daies together, could not breake and beare down: no ſooner was the place yeelded, but the firſt tide that roſe made ſuch a breach into the ſaid rampire that it was wholly diſiointed and broken in ſunder. And whiles he rigged and prepared both here and elſewhere an Armada for the recovery of Britain, he rid Batavia which was held by the Francks, from all enemies, and tranſlated many of them into the Romane nations, for to till their
B waſte and deſert territories. The Panegyrick of Eumenius.

In this meane time Allectus a familiar friend of Carauſius, who under him had the government of the State, ſlew him by a treacherous wile, & put upon himſelf the imperial purple robe. Which when Conſtantius heard, he having manned and armed divers fleets, drave Allectus to ſuch doubtfull termes, as being altogether void of counſell, & to ſeek what to doe, he found then and never before, that he was not fenſed with the Ocean, but encloſed within it. And withall, hoiſting up ſaile in a tempeſtuous weather and troubled ſea, by meanes of a miſt which over-ſpread the ſea, he paſſed by the enemies fleet unawares to them, which was placed at the Iſle of Wight, in eſpiall and ambuſh to diſcover and intercept him: and no ſooner were his forces
C landed upon the coaſt of Britaine, but he ſet all his owne ſhips on fire, that his Souldiers might repoſe no truſt in ſaving themſelves by flight. Allectus himſelfe, when he eſpied the Navy of Conſtantius under ſaile, & approching toward him, forſook the ſea ſide, which he kept, and as he fled, lighted upon Aſclepiodotus Grand Seneſchal of the Prætorium: but in ſo fearful a fit, and like a mad man, he haſtned his owne death, that he neither put his footmen in battell ray, nor marſhalled thoſe troupes which he drew along with him in good order, but caſting off his purple garment, that he might not be known, ruſhed in with the mercenary Barbarians, and ſo in a tumultuarie skirmiſh was ſlaine, and hardly by the diſcoverie of one man found among the dead carcaſes of the Barbarians, which lay thicke ſpread every where over all the plaines and hils.
D But the Frankners, & others of the barbarous ſouldiers, which remained alive after the battell, thought to ſacke London, and ſo to take their flight and be gone: at which verie inſtant, as good hap was, the ſouldiers of Conſtantius, which by reaſon of a miſty and foggy aire, were ſevered from the reſt, came to London, and made a ſlaughter of them in all places thorowout the citie, and procured not only ſaferie to the citizens in the execution of their enemies, but alſo a pleaſure in the ſight thereof. C. Allectus, Emperour.

By this victorie was the province recovered, after it had been, by uſurpation, held ſeven yeeres or thereabout, under Carauſius, and three under Allectus. Whereupon Eumenius unto Conſtantius, writeth thus; O brave victorie of much importance, and great conſequence; yea, and worthy of manifold triumphs, whereby Britaine is reſto-
E red, whereby the nation of the Frankners is utterly deſtroyed, and whereby upon many people beſide, found acceſſarie to that wicked conſpiracie, there is impoſed a neceſsitie of obedidience, and allegeance, and in one word, whereby, for aſsurance of perpetuall quietneſſe, the ſeas are ſcoured and cleanſed. And as for thee, ô invincible Cæſar, make thy boaſt and ſpare not, that thou haſt found out a new world, and by reſtoring unto the Romane puiſſance, their glorie for proweſſe at ſea, haſt augmented the Empire with an Element, greater than all Lands. And a little after, unto the ſame Conſtantius: Britaine is recovered ſo, as that thoſe nations alſo which adjoyne unto the bounds of the ſame Iſland, become obedient to your will and pleaſure.

In the laſt yeeres of Diocleſian and Maximian, when as the Eaſt Church had been Perſecution in Britaine.
F for many yeeres already polluted with the blood of martyrs, the violence of that furious perſecution went on, and paſſed even hither alſo into the Weſt, & many Chriſtians ſuffered martyrdome. Among whom, the principall were *Albanus of *Verlam; Iulius and Aaron of Iſca, a citie called otherwiſe * Caër Leon &c. of whom I will write in their proper place. For then the Church obtained victorie with moſt honourable and happie triumph, when as with ten yeeres maſſacres it could not be vanquiſhed. *S. Alban. *Neere Saint Albans in Monmouthſhire.

Digitized by Google

Constantius Chlorus, Emperour.

When Diocleſian and Maximian gave over their Empire, they elected that Conſtantius Chlorus for Emperour, who untill that time had ruled the State, under the title of Cæſar: and to him befell Italie, Africke, Spaine, France, and Britaine: but Italy and Africke became the Provinces of Galerius; and Conſtantius ſtood contented with the reſt. This Conſtantius, what time as hee ſerved in Britaine under Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Cœlus, or Cœlius a Britiſh Prince, on whom he begat that noble Conſtantine the Great, in Britaine. For ſo, together with that great Hiſtoriographer Baronius, the common opinion of all other writers with one conſent, beareth witneſſe: unleſſe it be one or two Greeke authors of late time, and thoſe diſſenting one from the other, and a right learned man, grounding upon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximian to put her away, for to mary Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena, which in antike Inſcription is called *VENERABILIS and PIISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Chriſtian piety, for cleanſing Ieruſalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord ſuffered, and for finding the Saving Croſſe of Chriſt, is ſo highly commended of Eccleſiaſticall writers. And yet both Iewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominy and reproch * Stabularia; becauſe ſhee (a moſt godly Princeſſe) ſought out the crib or manger wherin Chriſt was borne, and in the place where ſtood that hoſtelry, founded a Church. Hereupon S. Ambroſe: They ſay that this Lady was at firſt an Inholder or Hoſteſſe, &c. Well, this good hoſteſſe Helena, haſtned to Ieruſalem and ſought out the place of our Lords paſſion, and made ſo diligent ſearch for the Lords crib: This good hoſteſſe was not ignorant of that hoſt, which cured the wayfaring mans hurts that was wounded by theeves: This good hoſteſſe choſe to be reputed a dung-farmer, that ſhe might thereby gaine Chriſt. And verily no leſſe praiſe and commendation goeth of her husband Conſtantius for his piety and moderation; A man, who having utterly reiected the ſuperſtition of the ungodly, in worſhipping divers gods, willingly of himſelfe acknowledged one God, the Ruler of all things. Whereupon, to try the faith and beleefe in God of his owne Courtiers, hee put it to their free choice, either to ſacrifice unto thoſe gods, and ſo to ſtay with him, or els to refuſe and depart: But thoſe that would depart rather than renounce and forſake their faith to God, hee kept with him ſtill: caſting off all the reſt, who he ſuppoſed would prove diſloial unto him, ſeeing they had abandoned their beleefe in the true God. This moſt noble and worthy Emperor, in his laſt Britiſh expedition againſt the * Caledonians and the Picts died at Yorke, leaving behind him his ſonne Conſtantine Emperor, his ſucceſſor and Cæſar elect.

Baronius, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

Helena. * Venerable, and right devout Empreſſe.

*Inne-keeper or Hoſteſſe.

Of the death of Theodoſius.

Euſebius.

* Thoſe in Albanie, in the North of Scotland.

Some few daies before the death of Conſtantius, his ſonne Conſtantius rode from Rome to Yorke on poſt horſes: and the reſt which were kept at the charges of the State, he maimed and lamed all the way as hee went, becauſe no man ſhould purſue him, and there he received his fathers laſt breath. Whereupon an ancient Orator ſpake thus unto him: Thou entredſt this ſacred palace not as a competitor of the Empire, but as heire apparent and ordained already, and foorthwith that fathers houſe of thine ſaw thee, the lawfull ſucceſſor. For, there was no doubt but that the inheritance duly belonged unto him, whom the deſtinies had ordained the firſt begotten ſonne unto the Emperor. Yet for al that, conſtrained in maner by the ſouldiers, and eſpecially by the means of Erocus King of the Almanes, (who by way of aid accompanied him) advanced hee was to the Imperiall dignity. The ſouldiers regarding rather the publike good of the common-wealth, than following his affections, inveſted him in the purple robe, weeping and ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, becauſe hee would avoid the endevor of the armie that called ſo inſtantly upon him, &c: but the felicity of the common-wealth overcame his modeſty. And hereof it is, that the Panegyriſt crieth out in theſe words; O fortunate Britaine and more happy now than all other lands, that haſt the firſt ſight of Conſtantine Cæſar!

See Suidas, why he was called Poore.

Conſtantine the Great, Emperour.

Panegyrick oration unto Conſtantine the Great.

And now Cæſar at his very entrance, having firſt purſued the reliques of that war, which his father had begun againſt the Caledonians and other Picts, and ſet upon thoſe Britans more remote, and the Inhabitants of the Ilands lying there, the witneſſes as one ſaid of the Suns ſetting, ſome of them he ſubdued by force and armes,

others

A others (for you muſt thinke he aſpired to Rome and higher matters) by offering fees and ſtipends he allured and drew to be aſſociates: and there were beſides of them; whom of open enemies he made his friends, and of old adverſaries his very familiars: Afterwards, having vanquiſhed the Frankners in Batavia; & that with ſo great glory; that he ſtamped certain golden peeces of coine, (whereof I have ſeene one) with the image of a woman ſitting under a Trophee and leaning with one hand upon a croſſe-bow or a brake, with this ſubſcription; FRANCIA: and this writing about it; GAVDIVM ROMANORVM: Having alſo overthrown the Barbarians in Germany, won unto him the Germane and French Nations: and leavied ſouldiers out of Britaine, B France and Germany, to the number in all of 90000. foot, and 8000. horſemen, he departed into Italy, overcame Maxentius, who at Rome had challenged to himſelfe the Empire, and having conquered Italy and vanquiſhed the Tyrant he reſtored unto the whole world the bleſſed gifts of ſecure liberty, and as wee find in the Inſcription of an Antiquity, INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE, CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVSTIS REMP. VLTVS EST ARMIS, that is, By inſtinct of the divine power, with great magnanimity and the helpe of his own army, at one time in the behalfe of the common-wealth, he was by lawfull war revenged as well of the tyrant himſelfe, as of his whole faction.

Gelaſius Cizicenus lib. 1. Act. Concil. Nican. cap. 3.

C Howbeit, that he returned again into Italy, Euſebius implieth in theſe words: Conſtantine, quoth he, paſſed over to the Britans incloſed on every ſide within the banks of the Ocean: whom when he had overcome, hee began to compaſſe in his mind other parts of the world, to the end he might come in time to ſuccour thoſe that wanted helpe. And in another place: After he had furniſhed his armie with mild and modeſt inſtructions of piety, he invaded Britain, that he might likewiſe inſtruct thoſe who dwell environed round about with the waves of the Ocean bounding the ſuns ſetting as it were with his coaſts. And of Britain are theſe verſes of Optatianus Porphyrius unto Conſtantine, to be underſtood:

Omnis ab Arctous plaga finibus horrida Cauro,
Pacis amat cana & comperta perennia jura,
D Et tibi fida tuis ſemper bene militat armis;
Reſq; gerit virtute tuus, populoſq; feroces
Propellit, cedit q; lubens tibi debita rata,
Et tua victores ſors accipit hinc tibi fortes,
Teq; duce invictæ ſuſtollunt ſigna cohortes.

From Northern bounds, the land throughout where bleak North-weſt winds (blowen Lov's lawes of peace right ancient, and ever during knowen:
Preſt alwaies in their loialtie for ſervice in thy right,
With valiant and couragious heart, doth all thy battels fight.
Thus, Nations fierce it drives to rout, and doth in chaſe purſue,
E Yeelding to thee right willingly all paiments juſt and due:
Victors from hence moſt valorous, thy lot it is to have,
And under thee unfoiled bands, advance their enſignes brave.

About this time as evidently appeareth by the Code of Theodoſius, Pacatianus was the Vicarius of Britaine: for by this time the Province had no more Proprætors nor Lieutenants, but in ſtead thereof was a Vicar ſubſtituted.

Pacatianus Vicegerent of Britain, in the thirteenth yeer of Conſtantine the Great.

This Emperor Conſtantine, was right happy for very many praiſes, & thoſe (I aſſure you) moſt juſtly deſerved: for he not onely ſet the Romane Empire in free eſtate, but alſo having ſcattered the thicke cloud of Superſtitions, let in the true light of Chriſt, by ſetting open the Temples to the true God, and ſhutting them againſt the falſe.

F For now no ſooner was the bluſtering tempeſt and ſtorme of perſecution blowen over, but the faithfull Chriſtians, who in the time of trouble and danger had hidden themſelves in woods, deſerts, and ſecret caves, being come abroad in open ſight, reedifie the Churches ruinat: to the very ground, the Temples of holy Martyrs they found, build, finiſh, and erect, as it were, the banners of the victorie in every place, celebrate feſtivall holidaies, and with pure heart and mouth alſo, performe their ſacred ſolemnities. And thereupon is he renowned med under theſe titles. IMPERATOR FORTISSIMUS AC BEATISSIMUS, PIISSIMVS. FOELIX. URBIS LIBERATOR. QUIETIS FVNDATOR. REIPUBLICAE INSTAURATOR. PUBLICAE LIBERTATIS AUCTOR. RESTITVTOR URBIS ROMAE ATQUE ORBIS. MAGNUS. MAXIMUS. INVICTVS. INVICTISSIMUS. PERPETUUS. SEMPER AUGUSTUS. RERUM HUMANARUM OPTIMUS PRINCEPS. VIRTUTE FORTISSIMUS ET PIETATE CLEMENTISSIMUS. And in the Lawes, QUI VENERANDA CHRISTIANORUM FIDE ROMANUM MUNIVIT IMPERIUM. DIVUS. DIVAE MEMORIAE. DIVINAE MEMORIAE. &c. That is, Moſt valiant and bleſſed Emperour. Moſt pious. Happie. Redeemer of Rome Citie. Founder of Peace. Reſtorer of Rome Citie and the whole world. Great. Moſt great. Invincible. Moſt invincible. Perpetuall. Ever Auguſtus. The beſt Prince of the World. For vertue moſt valiant, and for pietie moſt mercifull. Alſo, Who fortified the Romane Empire with the reverend Faith of the Chriſtians. Sacred. Of ſacred Memorie; Of Diuine memorie, &c. And hee was the firſt Emperour, as farre as I could ever to this time obſerve, who in coines of money and publike workes, was honoured with this inſcription, DOMINUS NOSTER, that is, Our Lord. Although I know full well, that Diocleſian was the firſt after Caligula, who ſuffered himſelfe openly to be called LORD.

Gildas.

Howbeit, in this ſo worthy an Emperour, his politike wiſedome was wanting in this point, that he made the way for barbarous people, into Britaine, Germanie, and Gaule. For when he had ſubdued the northerne Nations, ſo, as that now he ſtood in no feare of them, and for to quell the power of the Perſians, who in the Eaſt parts threatned the Romane Empire, had built Conſtantinople a new Citie: thoſe Legions that lay in defence of the Marches, he partly tranſlated into the Eaſt, and in their ſtead built forts and holds, and partly withdrew into cities, more remote from the ſaid marches: ſo that ſoone after his death, the Barbarians forcing the townes and fortreſſes, brake into the Provinces. And in this reſpect there goeth a very bad report of him in Zoſimus, as being the main, and firſt ſubverter of a moſt flouriſhing Empire.

The Romane civill government in Britaine, under the latter Emperors. As LL. chiefe Iuſtices, Grand Seneſchals, or high Stewards.

Seeing moreover, that Conſtantine altered the forme of the Romane government, it ſhall not be impertinent in this verie place to note ſummarily, in what ſort Britaine was ruled under him, and afterward in the next ſucceeding ages. He ordained foure Præfects of the Prætorium, to wit, of the Eaſt, of Illyricum, of Italie, and of Gaule: two * Leaders or Commanders of the Forces, the one of footmen, the other of horſemen in the Weſt, whom they termed Præſentales.

* Magiſtros Militum.

Vicar of Britaine.

For civill government there ruled Britain, the Præfect of the Prætorium, or Grand Seneſchall in Gaule, and under him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his vicegerent, and honoured with the title Spectabilis, that is, notable or remarkable. Him obeied reſpectively to the number of the Provinces, two Conſular Deputies, and three Preſidents, who had the hearing of civill, and criminall cauſes.

For militarie affaires, there ruled the Leader, or Commander of the footmen in the Weſt: at whoſe diſpoſition, were the * Count or Lieutenant of Britaine; the Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon-coaſt along Britaine, and the Duke of Britaine, ſtiled every one, Spectabiles, that is, Remarkable.

* Comes.

* Spectabiles.

Comes of Britaine.

The Count Lieutenant of Britaine, ſeemeth to have ruled the inland parts of the Iſland: who had with him ſeven companies of footmen, and nine comets or troups of horſemen.

Comes of the Saxon ſhore.

The Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon coaſt, namely, who defended the maritime parts, againſt the Saxons, and is named by Ammianus, Comes maritimi tractus, that is, Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coaſt, had ſeven companies of footmen, two guidons of horſemen, the ſecond Legion, and one cohort.

Duke of Britaine.

The Generall of Britain, who defended the Marches or Frontiers againſt the Barbarians, had the command of eight and thirty garriſon forts, wherin kept their Stations 14000. foot, and 900. horſemen. So that in thoſe daies, (if Pancirolus have kept juſt computation) Britaine maintained 19200 footmen, and 1700 horſemen, or much thereabout, in ordinarie.

Beſides

Digitized by Google

A Beſides all theſe, Comes ſacrarum Largitionum, that is, The Receiuer of the Emperours Finances or publique reuenues, had vnder him in Britaine, the Rationall or Auditor of the ſummes and reuenues of Britaine: the * Provoſt of the Auguſtian, that is, Emperours Treaſures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Gynegium or Draperie in Britaine, in which the clothes of the Prince, and ſouldiers were woven. The * Count alſo of private Reuenues had his Rationall, or Auditour of priuat State in Britaine: to ſay nothing of the ſword, Fenſe Schoole, Procurator in Britaine, (whereof an old inſcription maketh mention,) and of other officers of an inferiour degree.

* Reſembling the Lord Treaſurer.

* Comes rerum priuatarum: as one would ſay, Keeper of the prime purſe.

When Conſtantine was dead, Britaine fell vnto his Sonne Conſtantine: who B vpon an ambitious humour, and deſire of rule, breaking into the poſſeſſions of other men, was ſlaine by his brother Conſtans. With which victorie he was ſo puffed up, that he ſeized Britaine, and the reſt of the Prouinces into his owne hands, and with his brother Conſtantius came into this Iſland. And thereupon Iulius Firmicus, not that Pagane the Aſtrologer, but the Chriſtian, ſpeaketh in this wiſe vnto them: Ye haue in Winter time (a thing that neuer was done before, nor ſhall be againe) ſubdued vnder your oares the ſwelling and raging billowes of the Britiſh Ocean. The waues now of the ſea, vnto this time well neere vnknowen vnto vs, haue trembled, and the Britans were ſore afraid to ſee the vnexpected face of the Emperour. What would yee more? the very Elements as vanquiſhed, haue giuen place vnto your vertues.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

Conſtans, Emperour.

C This Conſtans it was that called a Councell to Sardica, againſt the Arians: vnto which there aſſembled three hundred Biſhops, and among them the Biſhops of Britaine; who hauing condemned the Heretikes, and eſtabliſhed the Nicæne Creed, by their voices and iudgements, approoued the innocencie of Athanaſius. But this Prince being youthfull, caſt behinde him all care of the Empire, and became drowned in pleaſures: and thereby growing grieuous to the Prouincials, and nothing acceptable to his ſouldiers, was by Magnentius, * captaine of the Iouij and Herculij, as he hunted, beſet in a towne called Saint Helens, and there killed; fulfilling thereby a propheſie, which was, That he ſhould end his life in his grandmothers lap, of whom that towne indeed tooke the name.

Athanaſius in Apolog. 2.

Magnentius called alſo Taporus.

* Comitem.

D This Magnentius hauing a Britan to his Father, but borne among the Læti, a people in France, when he had now ſlaine Conſtans, inueſted himſelfe in France into the Imperiall dignitie, and wonne Britaine vnto him to take his part: but hauing been for three yeeres together courſed by his brother Conſtantius, who ſharply made war vpon him, laid violent hands on himſelfe: a fortunate Prince as euer any was, for ſeaſonable temperature of the weather, for plentie of fruits, and ſecuritie from dangers of Barbarians, points which are by the vulgar people reputed to make eſpecially for the glorie of Princes. But why this Magnentius ſhould be called Taporus in an old antiquitie of ſtone, digged vp long ſince at Rome, let other men enquire: For thus it is read, ſpeaking of the Obeliske, erected in the birque or ſhew-place.

E Interea Taporo Romam vaſtante Tyranno,
Auguſti jacuit, donum ſtudiumq; locandi.
Meane while that Tyrant Taporus of Rome did havocke make,
* Auguſtus gift vnplaced lay, none would it vndertake.

Angelus Rocha.

* The Emperours.

At this time, the Generall of all the warre-forces thorowout Britaine, was Gratianus ſurnamed Funarius, the father of Valentinian the Emperour. And called hee was Funarius, for that being yet but a ſtripling, or young ſpringall, as he went about with a rope to ſell, he gaue not ground to five ſouldiers that did ſet vpon him, and aſſaied with all their force to ſnatch the ſame from him. This Gratianus being returned to his owne home, and diſcharged of his militarie oath, was fined by Conſtantius in F the confiſcation, and loſſe of his goods, becauſe he was reported to haue lodged Magnentius, and giuen him entertainment.

Gratianus Funarius.

Am. Marcellinus.

When Magnentius was dead and gone, Britaine ſubmitted it ſelfe to the gouernment of Conſtantius: and foorthwith was hither ſent Paulus the Notarie a Spaniard borne, one verily vnder a ſmooth countenance lying ſecret and cloſe, but exceeding ſubtill to deuiſe and find out all the caſts and wily meanes to endanger men: That he might bring Conſtantius. Paulus Catena.

Digitized by Google

certain martiall and militarie men within danger who had conſpired with Magnentius, when A as they could not chuſe nor make reſiſtance, after he had outrageouſly come over them in manner of a flood he ſuddenly ſeiſed upon the fortunes and eſtates of many. Thus went he on ſtil making ſpoile, yea and undoing a great number, impriſoning ſuch as were free borne, and greeving their bodies with bonds, yea & bruſing ſome of them with manacles, and al, by patching and peecing many crimes together laid to their charge, which were as falſe as might be. Whereupon was committed ſo wicked an act as branded the daies of Conſtantius with a perpetuall note of infamy. There was one Martin that ruled thoſe provinces as Vicar or vicegerent, who greevouſly lamenting the miſeries and calamities of the innocent, and beſeeching the ſaid Paulus oftentimes, that the guiltleſſe might be ſpared, when hee ſaw that hee could B not prevaile, threatned to depart, to the end, that this malicious inquiſitor, and perſecutour, at leaſtwiſe for feare thereof, might give over at length, to enveagle and induce into open dangers, men bred and nuzzeled in quiet peace.

Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 14.

Martin, Vicar of Britaine.

Paulus, ſuppoſing heereby, that his trade decaied, (as hee was a vengible fellow in linking matters together, whereupon he came to be ſurnamed Catena, that is, a Chain) drew in the ſaid Vicar himſelfe, (who ſtill maintained the defence of thoſe whom hee had tendred and ſpared,) to have his part in common perils: And hee went very neere to bring him alſo priſoner bound, with tribunes, and many others, before the Emperours privie Counſell. At which extremitie of miſchiefe ſo imminent, hee being thorowly provoked, caught up a dagger, and aſſaulteth the ſame Paulus: but becauſe his right hand failed him, ſo C that he was not able to give him a deadly wound, hee ſtabbed himſelfe into the ſide with the ſaid weapon drawen as it was. And ſo by this foule kinde of death departed he this life; (a right juſt man) after he had aſſaied to ſtay, and delay the wofull and pitious caſes of many. Which wicked parts thus committed, Paulus, all embrued with blood, returned into the Princes Court: bringing many with him over-laden with chaines, as being men dejected, and plunged into miſerable calamitie, and heavie plight. At whoſe comming the rackes were made readie: the executioner prepared dragges and tortures: and of them many were proſcribed, and outlawed, ſome baniſhed, and other ſuffred puniſhment by ſword. At length himſelfe alſo under Iulian being burnt quicke, by the judgement of God the Revenger of ſuch outrageous crueltie, paide moſt juſtly for his deſerts. D

What torturing Inſtrument this Eculeus was, ſee in Carolus Sigonius. De Iudicijs lib. 3. cap. 17.

After this when as in Britaine, (Ammianus Marcellinus is mine Author,) upon the breach of peace, by the rodes of Scots and Picts, (ſavage nations) the places neere bordering upon them, appointed for the Frontiers, were forraied, and the provinces wearied with calamities paſt, that came ſo thick one in the neck of another, and put in frightfull perplexitie, Iulian whom Conſtantius had declared to be Cæſar, and collegue inthe Empire, wintering about Paris, and diſtracted with ſundry cares, feared to go and aid the provinciall people beyond-ſea, as we reported that Conſtantius before time had done, leſt hee ſhould leave Gaule without a governour: conſidering withall, that the Alamans were even then alſo incited, and ſet upon crueltie and hoſtilitie; thought good therefore it was to ſend over into theſe parts, for to compoſe E and ſettle all matters, one Lupicinus, * Maſter at that time of the Armour: a warlike Knight, I aſſure you, and skilfull in militarie affaires; but a man of a haughtie ſpirit, and ſetting up his eie-browes aloft like hornes, and withall ſpeaking bigge, and (as folke ſay) in a tragicke Key upon the ſtage: concerning whom, the queſtion was a long time, whether he were more covetous than cruell. Having raiſed therefore an aid of light appointed men, to wit, the Heruleans, Batavians, and many companies of the * Mæſians, the foreſaid Generall in the heart of Winter, came to Bologne: and there having gotten ſhipping, and embarked all his ſouldiers, obſerving a good gale of a forewind, arrived at Rhutupiæ, a place over againſt Bologne, and ſo ſet forward to London: that, from thence after counſell taken, according to the qualitie F of his buſineſſe, he might haſten the ſooner to give battell.

* Lupicinus, Magiſtrum Armorum.

* Now Bulgarians.

Rhutupiæ. London.

Under this Conſtantius, who mightily favoured the Arians, their hereſie crept into Britaine, wherein from the firſt yeeres of the great Conſtantine, a ſweet concent and harmonie of Chriſt the head, and his members had continued, untill ſuch time, as this deadly and perfidious Arianiſme, like to a peſtiferous Serpent from the other ſide of the ſea, caſting

The hereſie of Arius.

Gildas.

Digitized by Google

A casting up her venome upon us, caused brethren dwelling together, to be disjoyned piteously one from another: and thus, the way as it were, being made over the Ocean, all other cruell and fell beasts whereſoever, ſhaking out of their horrible mouthes the mortiferous poiſon of every hereſie, inflicted the deadly ſtings and wounds of their teeth upon this our countrey, deſirous evermore to heare ſome noveltie, but holding nought at all ſtedfaſtly. In favour of theſe Arians, Conſtantius ſummoned foure hundred Biſhops of the weſt Church, to Ariminum: for whom the Emperour, by his commandement, allowed corne and victuals. But that was thought of the Aquitanes, French and Britans, an unſeemely thing: refuſing therefore that allowance out of the Emperours coffers, they choſe rather to live at

B their own proper charges. Three onely out of Britaine for want of their owne, had maintenance from the State, refuſing the contribution offered unto them from the reſt: reputing it more ſafe, and voide of corruption, to charge the common treaſure, than the private ſtate of any perſon.

Sulpitius Severus.

These calleth Hilarius, The Biſhops of the Provinces of Britaine, in an Epiſtle unto the Biſhops.

After this, when Conſtantius was departed this world, Iulianus that Apoſtata, who had taken upon him the title of Auguſtus againſt Conſtantius, firſt drave out Palladius, who had been maſter of Offices, into Britaine, and ſent away Alipius, who had governed Britain as Deputy Lieutenant, to reedifie Ieruſalem: but fearfull round balles of flaming fire breaking foorth nere unto the foundations, skared him from that enterpriſe, and many a thouſand of Iewes who wreſtled in vaine againſt the decree of God,

C were overwhelmed with the ruines. This diſſolute *Auguſtus, and in his beard only a Philoſopher, feared (as hath erewhile been ſaid) to come and aid the poore diſtreſſed Britans: and yet from hence he caried out every yeere great ſtore of corne to maintain the Roman gariſons in Germany.

Iulian the Emperor. Amm. Marcellinus.

*Or Emperor.

When Valentinian the Emperor ſteered the helme of the Romane Empire, what time as thorow the whole world the trumpets reſounded nothing but the warlike Alarme, the Picts, Saxons, Scots and Attacots vexed the Britans with continuall troubles and annoiances. Fraomarius then King of the Almanes was tranſlated hither, and by commiſſion made Tribune or Marſhall over a Band of the Almanes, for number and power in thoſe daies highly renowmed to repreſſe the incurſions of theſe barba-

D rous nations. *Nevertheleſſe Britain was through the generall conſpiracie of thoſe Barbarians afflicted and brought to extreme diſtreſſe, Nectaridius Comes or Lieutenant of the maritime tract ſlaine, and Bulchobaudes the Generall by an ambuſh of the enemies circumvented. The intelligence of which occurrences when it was brought unto Rome with great horror, the Emperor firſt ſent Severus, being even then Lord High Steward of his houſhold, to redreſſe what was done amiſſe, in caſe his hap had been to have ſeen the wiſhed end: who being within a while after called away, Iovinus went to the ſame parts, ſent back Proventuſides in poſt, minding to crave the helpe of a puiſſant armie. For, they avouched that the urgent neceſſary occaſions required ſo much. At the laſt, ſo many and ſo fearefull calamities were by daily rumors reported as touching the ſame Iland, that Theodoſius was elected, and Valentinian Emperor.

Ammianus Marcellinus lib. 27. and 28.

*This place of the text is haply corrupted.

E appointed to make ſpeed thither, a man of approved skill in warlike affaires moſt fortunately atchieved, who having levied and gotten unto him a couragious campany of yong gallants, to furniſh as well Legions as cohorts, put himſelfe in his iourney, with a brave ſhew of confidence leading the way. At the ſame time the Picts divided into two nations the Dicaidones and Vecturiones, the Attacots likewiſe a warlike people, and the Scots, ranging in divers parts did much miſchiefe where they went. As for the cohorts of Gaule, the Frankners and Saxons confining upon them, brake out and made rodes where ever they could either by land or ſea, and what with driving booties, with firing townes, and killing poore captives, made foule worke there. To ſtay theſe woefull miſeries, if proſperous fortune would have given leave, this moſt vigorous and valiant Captain intending a voiage to the ut-

Theodoſius.

Picts. Scots. Attacots.

B *moſt bounds of the earth: when he was come to the ſea ſide at Bologne, which lieth divided from the oppoſite tract of land, by a narrow ſtreit, ebbing and flowing, where the water is wont to ſwell on high with terrible tides, and again to fall downe flat and lie like even plaine without any harme of ſailer or paſſenger, from thence having ſailed, and leiſurely croſſed the ſaid ſea, he arrived at Rhutupia a quiet rode and harbour over againſt it: From whence after that the Batavians, Herули, Iovij and Victores, companies confident of their ſtrength

*Called the ſleeve.

* Ribcheſter by Sandwich, or Richborow.

and

London called Augusta.

and power who followed) were come, hee departed: and marching toward London, an old A towne, which the posterity called Augusta, having divided his troupes into sundry parts he set upon those companies of roving and robbing enemies, even when they were heavy laden with booty and pillage. And having quickly discomfited those that drave before them their prisoners bound, and cattell, he forced them to forgoe the prey, which the most miserable tributaries had lost. In the end, after full restitution made of all, save only some small parcels bestowed upon his wearied souldiers, he entred most ioifully into the city, overset before with distresses and calamities, but now suddenly refreshed; so farforth as hope of recovery and safety might effect: and there beeing raised up with this luckie hand, to adventure greater exploits, and yet casting with himselfe proiects promising security, he staied doubtfull of the future event; as having learned by the information B of revolting fugitives and confession of captives, that so great a multitude of sundrie nations, and a stiffe-necked people of so fell and fierce a disposition, could not possibly be vanquished but by secret wiles and sudden excursions. Finally, after proclamations published, and promises made of impunity, he summoned as well the traiterous run-agates as many others that went with free pasport dispersed sundry waies, to present themselves ready for service. Vpon which Summons given, so soone as most of them were returned, he as one pricked forward with so good a motive, and yet held backe Civilis.

by heavy cares, called for Civilis by name, (who was to rule Britain as Deputy), to bee sent unto him; a man of a very quicke hasty nature, but a precise keeper of justice and righ- C Dulcitius.

teousnesse: likewise for Dulcitius, a redoubted Captaine and right skilfull in feats of armes.
Afterwards, having gotten heart and courage to him, he went from Augusta, which in old time they called Londinum, well appointed with industrious and considerate souldiers, and so brought exceeding great succour to the ruinate and troubled estate of the Britans, gaining before hand all places every where for his advantage to forelay the Barbarians in ambush, and giving commandement of no service to the very common souldiers, but he would himselfe cheerfully take the first assay thereof. In this sort performing as well the offices of an active and hardy souldier, as the carefull charge of a right noble Generall, having discomfited and put to flight divers nations, whom insolent pride fed with security incited and set on fire to assaile and invade the Romane Empire, he having laid the foundation of quiet peace D for a long time, restored both cities and castles, which verily had received manifold damma-ges, to as good a passe as ever they were at. Now there had hapned whiles he atchieved these exploits, an horrible act like to have bred some great danger, but that in the very first enterprise it was quenched and suppressed. There was one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud spirit, brother to the wife of that pestilent Maximinus, first Deputy Lieutenant, & after President, for some notable offence banished into Britain; who being impatient of rest like a noisom beast rose up in cõmotion against Theodosius, practising mischievous plots and an insurrection, upon a certain swelling pride and envie, for that he perceived him alone able to withstand his horrible designes. Howbeit, casting all about for many meanes both secret and apert, whiles the puffing humour of his infinite and unsatiable desire still E encreased, he solicited as wel the banished persons as souldiers, when he spied his opportunity, promising reward, for to allure and draw them on to some actuall attempt. And now as the time drew neere when these enterprises should be put in execution and take effect, the Generall being advertised of all these proiects, and forwarder of the twaine to adventure, resolute also upon an high mind to take revenge of such as were attaint and convict, committed verily Valentinus with some few of his inward complices unto Captain Dulcitius, for to be put to death: but fore-casting withall, the future events, (as hee was a man in militarie skill surpassing all others of his time) he would not suffer any farther inquisition and examination to be had of the conspirators, for feare lest by striking a terror among so many, the tempestuous troubles of the provinces which were well appeased, might revive again. Tur- F ning himselfe therefore from this businesse to the reforming of many enormities, which of necessity were to be regarded, and having cleered all dangers (for evidently seen it was that fortune was so propritious and good unto him, as that she never forsooke but sped his enterprises) he reedified the Cities and those garison forts whereof we spake; he fortified also the frontires with standing watches and strong forefenses. Thus having recovered the province which

Valentine stirreth up sedition in Britain.

Digitized by Google

A which had yeelded ſubjection to the enemies, hee ſo brought it to the former ancient ſtate, that upon his own motion to have it ſo, it both had a lawfull governour to rule it, and afterward alſo was called VALENTIA, for the Princes will and pleaſure. The Areans a kind of men inſtituted by thoſe of ancient times (concerning whom I have related in the Acts of Conſtans the Emperor) fallen by little and little unto vices, he removed from their ſtations, as being openly convict that they were allured by great receits, or promiſe at leaſt waies of much reward, to have divers times diſcovered unto the Barbarians whatſoever was done or debated among us. For, this indeed was their charge, to run to and fro by long journeies, to intimate and make known unto our captaines all ſtirs that the people neere adioining were B about to make. Thus, after he had with very great approoſe exploited theſe acts above reherſed, and others the like; he was ſent for to the Princes-court, and leaving the Provinces in much iollity, no leſſe honored was he for his many and important victories, than either Furius Camillus or Papirius Curſor. And ſo being honorably accompanied and attended upon with the love and favor of all men as far as to the narrow ſeas, with a gentle gale of wind he paſſed over and came to the Princes camp, where with ioy and praiſe he was received. For theſe deeds of his ſo bravely atchieved, in honor of him, there was an image ſet up, reſembling a man of armes on horſeback, as Symmachus giveth us to underſtand, ſpeaking to his ſonne Theodoſius the Emperor in this wiſe. The author, quoth he, of your kindred and ſtock, Captain Generall ſometime in Africk and Britain both, was among other C ancient titles conſecrated by the moſt honorable order with images of Knighthood: And Claudian in his commendation with full pen wrote poetically thus;

Ille Caledonijs poſuit qui caſtra pruinis,
Qui medio Libyæ ſub caſſide pertulit æſtus.
Terribilis Mauro, debellator q; Britanni
Litoris, ac pariter Boreæ vaſtator & Auſtri.
Quid rigor æternus? Cæli quid ſydera proſunt?
Ignotum q; fretum? maduerunt Saxone fuſo
Orcades, incaluit Pictorum ſanguine Thule,
Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Hiberne.

D In frozen Caledonian fields he that encamped lay,
And in his hameſſe, Liby heats endured day by day:
The blacke Mores eke who terrified, and conquerd Britiſh coaſt,
Who North and South ſubdu'd alike, and waſted with his hoſt.
What did the laſting cold to them and froſty climats gaine,
Or ſeas unknown? embrued all with blood of Saxons ſlaine
The Orkneis were, with Pictiſh blood well heated Thule was,
And ycie Ireland, Scots by heapes bewail'd with Out-alas.

In another place likewiſe of the ſame Prince.

E ——Quem littus aduſtæ
Horreſcit Libyæ, ratibuſq; impervia Thule,
Ille leves Mauros, nec falſo nomine Pictos
Edomuit, Scotum q; vago mucrone ſequutus
Fregit Hyperboreas remis audacibus undas;
Et geminis fulgens utroq; ſub axe trophæis
Tethyos alternas reſluas calcavit arenas.

Of whom the ſcorched Libyan coaſt doth ſtand in deadly feare,
And Thule, where no paſſage was for ſhips their ſaile to beare.
The nimble Mores he t'was that tam'd, and Picts likewiſe ſubdu'd,
The Picts, I ſay, by right ſo cal'd: and when he had purſued
F The Scot with ſword from place to place, the Hyperborean wave
With venterous ores he brake: and ſo in two fold trophees brave
All glittering under both the poles, he marched to and fro
The ſands upon, where either ſea by turnes doth eb and flow.

And concerning him Pacatus Drepanus: What ſhould I ſpeake, quoth he, of the Scot, driven backe again by him unto his fennes and bogs? The Saxon conſumed with battels at ſea, Gratianus Emperor. &c.

Digitized by Google

&c. After him, Gratian took upon him the Empire, who alſo proclaimed Theodoſius, A the ſon of that Theodoſius (of whom we haue ſpoken already) Emperor: Wherat Max-Maximus the Tyrant. Zoſimus. Oroſius. imus a Spaniard borne, his concurrent, and withall deſcended in right line from Conſtantinus the Great, who alſo had before time been Generall over the army in Britain, was ſo highly diſcontented, that he took upon him the purple robe: or as Oroſius reporteth, was againſt his will by the ſouldiers ſaluted Emperor; a valiant man, vertu-*Emperor. ous, & worthy of the title of *Auguſtus, but that againſt his allegeance, he had by way of tyranny & uſurpation attained to the place. Who at the firſt couragiouſly vanqui-Proſper Tyro. ſhed the Picts & Scots, that uſed to make many inrodes into the Province: afterwards with al the flower & ſtrength wel neer of Britiſh forces, arived in the mouth of Rhene, and procured unto himſelfe the whole puiſſance of the German armies: ordained the B roiall ſeat of the Empire to be at * Triers (whereupon ſtiled hee was by the name of *Treviri. Gregorius. Turonenſis. Trevericus Imperator) and ſpreading, as Gildas ſaith, his wings the one as far as to Spaine, the other into Italy, with the terror only of his name, levied tributes and penſions for ſouldiers pay, of the moſt fell and ſavage nations in Germanie. Againſt whom Gratianus having led an armie, after five daies skirmiſhing, beeing forſaken of his owne ſouldiers, and put to flight, ſent Saint Ambroſe Embaſſadour to treat for peace: which he obtained indeed; but the ſame full of treacherous guile.
Cedrenus. For, Maximus ſuborned, and ſent under-hand one Andragathius, riding in a cloſe litter or carroch, with a rumour ſpread abroad, that therein rode the wife of Gratian. Unto C which, when Gratian was come for love of his wife, and had opened the ſaid litter, forth leapes Andragathius, with his companie, and ſlew him outright in the place.
Whoſe bodie for to demand, was Ambroſe ſent a ſecond time: howbeit, not admitted, becauſe he refuſed to communicate with thoſe Biſhops, that ſided with Maxi-mus. Who being lifted up, and proud of theſe things hapning to his minde, appointed his ſonne Victor to be Cæſar, dealt cruelly with Gratians captaines, and ſetled Zoſimus. the State in France. Theodoſius Auguſtus, who governed in the Eaſt, at the requeſts or mandates rather of his Embaſſadours, acknowledged him Emperour, and exhibited his jmage unto the Alexandrines for to bee ſeene in publike place. And now having by violence, and extortion entred upon the eſtates of all men, with the utter un- D doing of the common-wealth, hee fulfilled his owne greedy avarice. Hee made the defence of Catholike Religion his pretence to colour his tyrannie; Priſcillian, and Priſcillianiſts. certaine of his Sectaries convict of hereticall and falſe doctrine in the Synode, or Sulpitius Severus. Councell of Burdeaux, and appealing unto him, hee condemned to death; although *Turonum. Martin that moſt holy biſhop of * Tourain or Tours, moſt humbly beſought to for-beare ſhedding the bloud of thoſe poore wretches: avouching that it was ſufficient to deprive ſuch as were judged heretikes, and put them out of their Churches, by the definitive ſentence of Biſhops: and that it was a ſtrange and unexampled hainous deed, that a ſecular Iudge ſhould determine cauſes of the church. And theſe were the firſt, that being executed by the civill ſword, left a foule and dangerous precedent E to poſteritie. After this he entred Italie with ſo great terrour, that Valentinian, together with his mother, were glad to flie unto Theodoſius, the cities of Italie received him, and did him all the honour that might bee: but the Bononians above the reſt, among whom this Inſcription is yet to be ſeene,

DD. NN. MAG. C. MAXIMO, ET FL.
VICTORI, PIIS, FELICIBVS, SEMPER
AVGVSTIS. * B. R. NATIS.

*Bono Reip.

To our Great Lords, C. Maximus & Fl. Victor, Pious, Happie, Alwaies Auguſti, borne for the good of the Common-wealth. F

Meane while Nannius and Quintinus, Maſters in militarie skill, unto whom Maxi-mus had committed the infancie of his ſonne, and the cuſtodie of Gaule, gave the Sulpitius Alexander. Frankners, who annoied Gaule with their incurſions, a mightie great overthrow, and forced them to give hoſtages, and deliver into their hands the Authors of the warre.
As for Valentinian, he earneſtly beſought Theodoſius, to ſuccour him diſpoiled of his empire

A Empire by a tyrant, from whom for a good while, he could have none other answer, but this, That no marvel it is, if a seditious servant became superiour to that Lord, who casteth off the true Lord indeed. For Valentinian was corrupted with Arianisme. Howbeit, wearied at length with his importunate praiers, he setteth forward in warlike maner against Maximus, who in the same time abode in Aquileia, very secure & fearlesse. For he had before-hand fortified the streits between the mountains with garisons, and the havens with shipping, so that with great alacritie, and much confidence at the first he welcomed Theodosius with one battel before Syscia in Pannonia: & afterwards most valiantly received him with another, under the leading of his brother Marcellus; but B in both of them he sped so badly, that he withdrew himselfe secretly into Aquileia, where by his owne souldiers, as he dealt money among them, taken he was, and devested of his imperiall ornaments, brought before Theodosius, who immediatly delivered him into the hangmans hand to be executed, after that he had now worne the purple robe five yeeres. Whereupon Ausonius writeth thus in praise of Aquileia:

Zonaras.

Zosimus.

*Sisseg.

Non erat iste locus: meritò tamen aucta recenti,
Nona inter claras Aquileia cieberis urbes
Ital a ad Illyricos objecta colonia montes,
Mœnibus & portu celeberrima: sed magis illud
Eminet, extremo quòd te sub tempore legit,
C Solverat exacto cui justa piacula lustro
Maximus, armigeri quondam sub nomine lixæ.
Fœlix qui tanti spectatrix læta Triumphi,
 Punisti Ausonio Rutupinum Marte Latronem.*

*Or, sudisti.

This was no place of name: but since that fresh desert gave grace,
Thou Aquileia of cities faire, shalt be the ninth in place,
A Colonie Italian, gainst hils Illyrian set,
For strong wals, and commodious haven right well renowm'd: but yet
This passeth all the rest, that he his choice of thee, did make Against his latter daies, who did revengement justly take D Of Maximus: a base campe-Squire that sometimes knowen to be,
Had now usurped five yeeres past, and ruled with tyrannie.
Right happy thou, of Triumph such that had'st the joyfull sight, Killing this Robber *Rhutupine by maine Italian might.

*British, or of Britaine.

Andragathius, whose state was now most desperate, cast himselfe from shipboard headlong into the Sea. Victor the sonne of Maximus, was in France defeated, taken prisoner and slaine. But those Britans, who tooke part with Maximus, as some writers doe record, forcibly invaded Armorica in France, and there planted themselves. Now Theodosius presently after his victorie, entred Rome with his Sonne Honorius in triumph, and published an Edict to this effect: No man so hardy, as to challenge or claime that honour, which the bold Tyrant had granted: but that such presumption should be condemned, and reduced unto the former estate. And Valentinian, in these E words; All judgements and awards whatsoever, that Maximus the most wicked and detestable Tyrant that ever was, hath given forth to be promulged and enacted, we reverse and condemne. But Saint Ambrose in his funerall Sermon of Theodosius, crieth out in these termes: That Eugenius and Maximus, by their wofull example, doe testifie in hell, what a heavy thing it is to beare armes against their naturall Princes. To speak in a word, this victorie was held to be so worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward, solemnized that day everie yeere, as festivall.

Procopius.

There succeeded Theodosius in the West Empire his sonne Honorius, a child ten F yeeres old; over whom was ordained as Tutor and Protector Flavius Stilicho, a man passing famous for a long time, as who being an inward companion of Theodosius in all his warres and victories, and by degrees of militarie service, advanced unto high authority, and the Princes affinitie, in the end cloied and glutted with prosperitie, and carried away through ambition, miserably lost his life. This man surely for certaine yeeres, had a provident regard of the Empires good estate, and defended Britaine Honorius, Emperour.

Digitized by Google

taine against the invasion of Picts, Scots, and Vandals. And hereof it is, that Britaine speaketh thus of her selfe in Claudian: A

Me quoq; vicinis pereuntem gentibus, inquit,
Munivit Stilicho, totam quum Scotus Hibernem
Movit, & infesto spumavit remige Thetis.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem
Scotica, nec Pictum tremerem, ne littore toto Prospicerem dubijs venientem Saxona ventis.

And me likewise at hand, quoth she, to perish, in despight
Of neighbour Nations Stilicho protected gainst their might,
What time the Scots all Ireland mov'd, offensive armes to take, B
And with the stroke of enemies ores, the Sea much fome did make.
He brought to passe, (his care was such) that I the Scotish warre
Should feare no more, nor dread the Picts, ne yet ken from a farre, (Along the shore whiles I looke still when wavering winds will turne)
The Saxons comming under saile, my coasts to spoile and burne.

And thus for that time Britaine seemed safe enough from any danger of enemies. For in another place, that Poet writeth thus:

——Domito quod Saxona, Thetis
Mitior, aut fracto Secura Britannia Picto. C

What either seas more quiet now, that Saxons conquer'd are,
Or Britannie become secure, since Picts subdued were.

And when Alaricus King of the Gothes, hovered about Rome, seeking meanes to assault and spoile it, that Legion which in the marches kept Station against the Barbarians was called from hence, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth up the aids sent for from all parts.

Venit & extremis legio prætenta Britannis,
Quæ Scoto dat fræna truci, ferroq; notatas
*Perlegit * exanimes Picto moriente figuras.*

* Or, exangues.

The Legion also came which did for British frontiers lie D
In garrison, that curbs fell Scots, and doth peruse with eie
Those yron-brent markes in Picts now seene, all bloodlesse as they die.

* Fastidius. Genadius. Chrysanthus. Nicephorus.

In these daies flourished Fastidius a Bishop of Britain, and wrote bookes of divine learning, I assure you. Chrysanthus likewise the sonne of Bishop Martian, who having been a Consular deputy of Italy under Theodosius, and made *Vicar of Britain, deserved that praise and admiration for his good managing of the common-weale that he was against his will enstalled at Constantinople Bishop of the Novatians, who having made a schisme in that Church, and calling themselves * Cathari, had Bishops apart of their own and sectaries, who stoutly but impiously denied, that such as after baptisme received, fell by relapse into sinne, could not returne againe and bee saved. E This is that Bishop, who as we read in histories, of all ecclesiastical revenues and profits, was wont to reserve nothing for himselfe but two loves of bread only on the Lords day.

* Lieutenant, or Deputie.

* Pure.

Tripartite Historie.

When as now the Romane Empire began to decline and decay, and barbarous Nations every way made foule havocke of the provinces all over the Continent; the British armes fearing lest the flame of their neighbors fire might flash out and catch hold likewise of them; supposing also that they stood in need of some Generall and Soveraign commander, to expell the Barbarians, addressed themselves to the election of Emperors. First therefore, they enthronized in the roiall seat Marcus, and him they obeied, as one that in these parts bare the chief soveraignty. But afterward having made F him away, because his cariage was not answerable unto theirs, they bring foorth and set up Gratian, a countryman of their owne: him they crowned and arraied in the regall purple, and him they dutifully attended upon, as their Prince. Howbeit upon a mislike that they tooke to him also, at foure moneths end, they deprive him of his Empire, take away his life, and made over the Soveraignty of State to one Constantine, a Marcus, Emperour.

Gratian, Emperour.

Constantine, Emperour.

souldier

A ſouldier of the meaneſt place, only becauſe his name imported, as they thought, the oſſe of good luck. For they conceived aſſured hope, that he by the fortunate name of Conſtantine, would likewiſe conſtantly and fortunately govern the Empire and diſpatch all enemies, like as that Conſtantine the Great had done, who in Britain was advanced to the Imperiall dignity. This Conſtantine putting to ſea from Britain, landed at Bologne in France, and eaſily induced withal the Romane forces as far as to the Alpes to ioine with him in his war. *Valentia in France he manfully defended againſt * Valençe.
the puiſſance of Honorius Auguſtus the Roman Emperor: the Rhene which long before had been neglected, he fortified with a gariſon: Upon the Alpes, as well *Cottiæ B and *Peninæ, as thoſe toward the * maritime coaſts, where ever there was any paſ- * Monte Gene-ſage, he built fortreſſes: In Spaine, under the leading and name of his ſonne Conſtans, vre, or Mont whom of a Monk he had denounced Auguſtus or Emperor, he warred with fortunate Cenis.
ſucceſſe: and afterwards by letters ſent unto Honorius, requeſting to bee held excu- * Monte Ma-ſed for ſuffering the purple forcibly to be done upon him by the ſouldiers, received at jore de S. Ber-his hands of free gift, the Imperiall robe. Whereupon he became prouder than be- nardo.
fore, and after he had paſſed over the Alpes intended to march directly to Rome: but * Montagna di hearing that Alaricus the King of the Goths (who had ſided with him) was dead, he Carrara & Lu-retired himſelfe to Arles, where he planted his Imperiall ſeat, commanded the Citie nigiana, in the to be called Conſtantina, and ordained therein, that the aſſemblies for Aſſizes of 7. Countie of C provinces ſhould be held. His ſonne Conſtans hee ſendeth for out of Spaine, to the Tendar. end that meeting together they might conſult as touching the State. Who leaving the furniture of his Court and his wife at *Cæſar Auguſta, & committing the charge * Carragoça. of all matters within Spaine to Gerontius, came ſpeedily without intermiſſion of iourney to his father. When they had met together, after many daies, Conſtantinus ſeeing no feare of any danger from Italy, gave himſelfe wholly to gluttony and bellicheere, and ſo adviſeth his ſonne to returne into Spaine. But when he had ſent his forces to march before, whiles he abode ſtill with his father, newes came out of Spaine, that Maximus one of his vaſſals and followers was by Gerontius ſet up and advanced to the Empire; and having about him a ſtrong power and retinue of barbarous D nations prepared to come againſt them. Whereat they being affrighted, Conſtans & Decimius Ruſticus, who of the Maſter of Offices was now become the Prefect, having diſpatched Edobeccus before unto the Germane nations, together with the Frankners, Almans & all the militarie forces, went into France, intending out of hand to returne unto Conſtantinus. But as for Conſtans, Gerontius intercepted him by the way at Vienna in France, and killed him: Conſtantine himſelfe he beſieged within Arles: to raiſe this ſiege and to aſſaile him in hoſtile maner, when one Conſtantius ſent from Honorius made haſte with an army, Gerontius fearefully fled: whereupon his ſouldiers for anger and indignation beſet his houſe round about, and drave him to thoſe hard ſtreits, that firſt he cut off Alanus his moſt truſty friends head, then he laid E violent hands upon Nunnichia the ſaid Alanus wife, who earneſtly deſired to die with her husband; and laſt of all periſhed himſelfe. Conſtantinus being very ſtraitly ſhut Nicephorus.
up, and withal utterly dejected & caſt down with the unfortunate fight of Edobeccus, Calliſtus.
after he had been beleaguerd foure moneths, and raigned likewiſe 4. yeres, laid away his purple habite, entred into a Church, and took the orders of prieſthood, and ſoone after, having ſurrendred Arles, was led captive into Italie, and there beheaded, together with a ſonne of his, whom he had named * Nobiliſſimus, and a brother called * As one Sebaſtian. From that time returned Britaine, under the Empire of Honorius, and would ſay, was refreſhed a while, through the wiſedome and proweſſe of Victorinus, who then Heire appa-ruled the Province, and repreſſed the outroades of Picts and Scots. In commenda- rent.
F tion of whom, in Rutilius Claudius, are theſe verſes extant, anſwerable in worth to Victorinus the Author. Rector or Ruler of Bri-taine.

Conſcius Oceanus virtutum, conſcia Thule,
Et quacunq; ferox arva Britannus arat.
Quà Præfectorum vicibus frenata poteſtas
Perpetuum magni fœnus amoris habet.

Extremum pars illa quidem diſceſsit in orbem, A Sed tanquam medio rector in orbe fuit.
Plus palma eſt illos inter voluiſſe placere,
Inter quos minor eſt diſplicuiſſe pudor.

The Ocean maine his vertues knowes, and Thule witneſſe will,
And all the fertile fields likewiſe, that Britans fierce doe till.
Where ever Rulers power by turnes ſucceſſive bridled is,
Of much good love continuall increaſe he doth not miſſe.
That part indeed divided was from all the world beſide,
And yet as if in mids thereof it were, he did it guide. B
The greater priſe and praiſe it is to ſeeke there for to pleaſe,
Where to controll leſſe feare it were, leſſe baſhment to diſpleaſe.

When Rome was forced by Alaricus, Honorius calleth Victorinus home with his army: and forthwith the Britans took arms, and engaging themſelves into danger for the ſafety of themſelves, freed their owne cities and States from the barbarous people, that waited all opportunities to annoy them. Semblaly, that whole maritime tract of * Armorica, and the reſt of the Gaulois Provinces, accompanied the Britans, and in like manner delivered themſelves, caſting out the Romane Preſidents, and ſetting up a certain proper common-wealth at their owne pleaſure. This revolt and rebellion of Britaine, together with the French Provinces happened in the time that Conſtantine C uſurped the Kingdom, conſidering that the Barbarians, taking advantage of his negligence in government, boldly, and without reſtraint overcame thoſe Provinces. Howbeit within a while after, the States of Britain importuned Honorius for ſuccor: whom he without ſending any aid at all, adviſed by his Letters to ſtand upon their owne guard, and look to themſelves. The Britans upon the receit of Honorius Letters, were ſtirred up, and put themſelves in armes to defend their owne cities: but being not able to match the Barbarians that came upon them ſo on every ſide, they beſought Honorius what they could, and obtained at his hands, that a Legion ſhould bee ſent to their reſcue and ſuccour. Which being come over hither, defeated and overthrew a great number of the enemies, chaſed the reſt out of the marches of the Province, D and took order for a wall or rampier of turfe to be made, from the Firth of Edenburgh, unto Cluid, which ſtood them in ſmall or no ſtead. For by occaſion that the ſaid Legion was called backe to the defence of France, the barbarous enemies returne, breake downe with eaſe the frontier bounds, and in all kind of outrage and crueltie in every place carry, harrie and make havocke of all. Then were diſpatched a ſecond time in lamentable ſort ambaſſadours, with their garments rent, and heads covered with ſand (marke the maner of it) for to crave aid of the Romanes: unto whom, by the commandement of Valentinian the Third, were appointed certain regiments of ſouldiers, conducted by Gallio of Ravenna, which moſt valiantly vanquiſhed the Barbarians, and in ſome ſort gave comfort to the poore diſtreſſed and afflicted Province. E They made a wall directly by a ſtreight line, and that of ſtone (not as the other) at the publike charges of the State, and with private mens purſes together, joyning with them the miſerable inhabitants, after the wonted maner of building, to wit, traverſing along the land * from one Sea to another, betweene thoſe cities which haply were placed there for feare of enemies; to the feareſull people they gave good inſtructions, and exhortations to play the men, and left unto them paternes, ſhewing them how to make armour and weapons. Vpon the coaſt alſo of the Ocean, in the tract of the South countrey, what way they had ſhips (becauſe even from that ſide alſo they ſtood in feare of thoſe barbarous and ſavage beaſts) they planted turrets, and bulwarks with convenient ſpaces diſtant one from another, yeelding farre and faire proſpect into the ſea: and ſo the Romans gave them a finall farewell, never to returne againe.

* Bretagne, little Britaine, or Llydaw.

Zoſimus.

Hiſtor. Miſcel.

Gallio Ravennas.

Gildas. Bed. l. 1. c. 12.

* Betweene the mouth of Tine and Elen.

Now was the State everie where in a moſt wofull and pitious plight to ſee unto: to ſee the Empire drooping with extreame age, lay along maimed, diſmembred, and as it were, benummed in all the limmes and parts thereof: the Church likewiſe moſt greeuouſly aſſailed by Heretikes (who amid the burning broiles of warre, caſt and ſpread

Digitized by Google

A ſpread their venome all abroad. Among whom Pelagius borne in this Iſland, taught here, to the prejudice of Gods meere grace, That we might attaine to perfect righteouſneſſe by our owne works. One Timothie alſo, impiouſly diſputed among the Britans, againſt the divine and humane nature both, in Chriſt. Sigebert Gembl. Anno 428.

Now alſo was the Romane Empire in Britaine, come to her full and finall period, to wit, the foure hundreth, ſeventie, and ſixth yeere after Cæſars firſt entrie: what time, in the raigne of Valentinian the Third, the Romanes having tranſported their forces with the foreſaid Gallio, for the defence of France, and buried their treaſure within the ground, left Britaine bereft of her youth, waſted with ſo many muſters and B levies, diſpoiled of all ſuccour and defence of garriſon, unto the cruell rage of Picts and Scots. Hence it is, that Proſper Aquitanus wrote thus, and that right truely: At this time, by reaſon of the Romans weakneſſe, the ſtrength of Britaine was utterly ſpent, and brought to nought. And our Hiſtoriographer of Malmsburie: When the Tyrants had left none in the countrey, but halfe Barbarians; none in the cities and townes, but ſuch as wholly gave themſelves to belly-cheere: Britaine deſtitute of all protection by her vigorous young men, bereaved of all exerciſe and practiſe of good arts, became expoſed, for a long time, to the greedy and gaping jawes of Nations confining upon her. For ſtraightwaies, by the incurſions of Scots and Picts, many a man was ſlaine, villages burnt, cities undermined and ſubverted, and thorowout all laid waſt with fire and ſword. The Ilanders in great C trouble and perplexitie, thinking all other meanes ſafer, than triall by battell; partly betooke them to their heeles, and for their ſafetie fled unto the mountaine-Countrey: partly, after they had buried their treaſure within the ground, whereof much is digged up in theſe daies, purpoſed to goe to Rome for to crave aide. But as Nicephorus truely wrote, Valentinian the Third, was not onely unable to recover Britaine, Spaine, and France, provinces plucked away from his Empire already, but alſo loſt Africk beſide. Not without juſt cauſe therefore Gildas in this age cried out thus: Britaine was deſpoiled of all her armed men, her militarie forces, her Rulers (cruell though they were,) and of a mightie number of her ſtout and couragious youths. For, beſide thoſe whom that Uſurper Maximus, and the laſt Conſtantine led way with them, it appeareth evidently by antike inſcriptions, and D the booke named Notitia Provinciarum, that theſe companies underwritten ſerved the Romans in war, here and there diſperſed over their Provinces, which alſo were from time to time evermore ſupplied out of Britaine.

Ala Britannica Milliaria.
Ala IIII Britonum in Aegypto.
Cohors Prima Aelia Britonum.
Cohors III. Britonum.
Cohors VII. Britonum.
Cohors XXVI. Britonum in Armenia.
Britanniciani ſub Magiſtro peditum.
E Invicti juniores Britanniciani } inter auxilia Exculcatores jun. Britan. } Palatina.
Britones cum Magiſtro Equitum Galliarum, Invicti Iuniores Britones intra Hiſpanias.
Britones Seniores in Illyrico.

Hereupon, no marvell it is, if Britaine exhauſted daily with ſo many, and ſo great levies of ſoulders, lay expoſed unto the Barbarians, and hereby prooveth that ſentence of Tacitus true; There is no ſtrength in the Romane armies, but it is of forraine ſtrangers.

In writing of theſe matters, concerning the Romanes government in Britaine, F which continued (as I ſaid) CCCCLXVI. yeres, or much thereabout, whiles I conſider and thinke otherwhiles with my ſelfe, how many Colonies of Romans were in ſo long a time brought hither, how many ſouldiers continually tranſported over hither from Rome to lie in garriſon, how many ſent hither to negotiate either their own buſines, or the affaires of the Empire, who joyning in mariage with Britans, both planted themſelves, and alſo begat children here (For, Whereſoever the Romane winneth, ſaith Seneca, The Engliſh-Saxon Chronicle.

Yet called Gaule.

How the Britans are deſcended from the Trojans.

Digitized by Google

neca, there he woneth, and inhabiteth:) I enter oft times into this cogitation, That A Britans may more truely ingraffe themſelves into the Trojans ſtocke, by theſe Ro-
* The people of Auvergne in France. manes, who are deſcended from Trojans, than either the * Arverni, who drawing
* Trojan. their diſcent, from * Ilian bloud, have named themſelves, the Romans brethren; or
* Burgundians. the Mamertines, * Hedui, and the reſt, who grounding upon a fabulous originall, have fathered themſelves upon the Trojans. For Rome, that common Mother (as he ſaith) called thoſe her Citizens,

Quos domuit, nexuq; pio longinqua revinxit:
Whom ſhe ſubdued, ſhe by a gratious knot
United people farre diſſite and remote. B

And meet it is we ſhould beleeve, that the Britans and Romans in ſo many ages, Tacit. Hiſtor. lib. 4. by a bleſſed and joyfull mutuall ingraffing, as it were, have growen into one ſtocke
* Thoſe of Colein, and thereabout. and nation: ſeeing, that the * Ubij in Germanie within 28. yeeres after that a Colonie was planted, where now Colein is, made anſwere as touching the Roman Inhabitants there, in this wiſe: This is the naturall Countrey, as well to thoſe that being conveied hither in times paſt, are conjoyned with us by mariages, as to their off-ſpring. Neither can we thinke you ſo unreaſonable, as to wiſh us for to kill our parents, brethren, and children. If the Ubij and Romans in ſo ſmall a time became parents, brethren, and children one to another, what ſhould we judge of Britans and Romans linked and conjoyned Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 28. ſo many yeeres together? What alſo may we ſay of the Burgundians, who for that C they mingled their bloud with the Romans, whiles they held for a ſmall time the Romans Provinces, called themſelves a Roman off-ſpring: not to rehearſe againe what I have ſaid before, That this Iſland hath beene named Romania, and Inſula Romana, that is, The Romane Iſle.

Thus much have I ſet downe ſummarily, and in compendious maner gathered out of the ancient monuments of Antiquitie, rejecting all fabulous fictions, as touching the Romans Regiment in Britaine, their Lieutenants, Propretours, Preſidents, * Vi-
* Deputies. cars, and * Rectors. But more exactly and fully, [might I have done it] if Auſonius
* Regents. had performed his promiſe, and that come unto our hands: who ſaid, he would reckon up ſuch, as D

Aut Italûm populos Aquilonigenaſq; Britannos
Præfecturarum titulo tenuere ſecundo.
That ruled Nations Italike, and North-bred Britans all, Entituled with happy ſtile, Lieutenants Generall.

But ſeeing it is agreed upon among all learned men, that there ariſeth very much light to the illuſtration of ancient Hiſtories, out of ancient Coines, I have thought good in this place to exhibite unto the Reader certaine peeces of money, as well of thoſe Britans, who firſt came under ſubjection of the Romanes, as of Roman Emperours; ſuch eſpecially as appertaine to Britaine, and thoſe out of the Cabinet of the right Worſhipfull Sir Robert Cotton of Conington Knight, who hath from all E places with curious and chargeable ſearch, gotten them together, and of his courteſie with heart and good will, imparted the ſame unto me.

THE

Digitized by Google

A

CONIECTVRES AS TOVching the Britiſh Coines.

TO the Britans Coines, the portraicts whereof I have here ſhewed, you looke, haply, that I ſhould adjoyne ſome briefe notes alſo. But what to adjoyne of ſuch things as the revolution of ſo many ages paſt, hath altogether overcaſt with darkneſſe, to profeſſe plainely, I ſee not: and
B your ſelfe, when you ſhall read theſe ſlender gheſſes of mine, will avouch with me, that I walke in a mirke and miſtie night of ignorance.

That the old Britans uſed braſſe money, or rings, or elſe plates of yron tried to a certaine juſt weight, I have declared already before, out of Cæſar: and there be, who averre, that they have ſeene ſome of theſe found in little pitchers. Beſides theſe, found there are otherwhiles in this Iſland, peeces of gold, ſilver, and braſſe of ſundry faſhions, and as different in poiſe: all for the moſt part of the one ſide hollow: ſome without letters, others with expreſſe inſcriptions of letters; of which ſort, I could never heare that any have been digged up elſewhere, untill
C ſuch time as Nicolaus Fabricius de Petriſco, a right noble young Gentleman of Provance in France, one for ſuch antiquities, and old Medals or peeces of money, paſsing skilfull and of iudicious inſight, verie lately had ſhewed me the like found in France. But to come unto theſe of ours, which I have here propoſed.

The firſt, is a coine of Cunobelinus, who flouriſhed in the daies of Auguſtus and Tiberius: wherein, if I deceive not my ſelfe, are engraven the heads of two-faced Ianus: peradventure, becauſe even at that time Britaine began to caſt off and leave their barbarous rudeneſſe. For we read, how Ianus was the firſt, that changed babarous maners into D civill behaviour, and therefore was depainted with two fore-heads, to ſignifie, that he had of one ſhape made another.

The ſecond alſo is Cunobelinus Coine, ſhewing his face, and inſcription [of the one ſide] and the Coiner or Mint-maſter on the other, with this word TASCIA ſet to it, which word among the Britans, betoken- TASCIA.
eth a Tribute Penye, as Maſter David Powell, a man moſt skilfull in the Britiſh language hath enformed me: and is derived perhaps of the Latine, Taxatio. For, the Britans acknowledge not X. for their letter. And by the ſame reaſon the inſcription of MONETA, is ſeen oft times in peeces of Roman money.

E In like maner, the third is a Coine of the ſame Cunobelinus, with an horſe and CVNO: with a corne eare alſo, and CAMV, (as it ſhould ſeeme) for Camalodunum, which was the Roiall citie and ſeat of Cuno- See in Eſſex.
bolinus.

See in Hartford ſhire.

The fourth with VER, may be thought a Coine of the Verlamians.

The

Digitized by Google

The fifth againe, is one of Cunobelinus his peeces. A

The ſixth, becauſe it giveth no light by letters, I wote not what to make of it.

The ſeventh, a Coine of Cunobelinus, having this inſcription, TASC. NOVANEL, with a womans head; whether it ſhould imply a tribute peece of the Trinovants, over whom he was ruler, I cannot avow: on the other ſide, Apollo with his Harpe, and CVNOBELIN, putteth me in remembrance of that, which elſewhere I have obſerved as concerning the God Belinus: namely, that the * Gauls in old time wor ſhipped Apollo under the name of Belinus: which Dioſcorides alſo doth confirme, writing in plaine and expreſſe termes, that the herbe * Apollinaris, with the juice whereof the Gaules were wont to annoint their arrowes, is in the Gaules tongue, called Belinuntia. So that, upon this I may bee bold in ſome ſort to conject, that the name of Cunobelinus, as alſo of Caſsibelinus, is drawen from the worſhip of Apollo, like as the names of Phœbitius and Delphidius. If not rather, like as Apollo for his buſh of yellow haire, is named in Greek, ξανθὸς, in Latin, Flavius, that is, yellow: ſo likewiſe among the Britans, and Gaules, Belin. For that which is yellow, in * Britiſh ſpeech they call, Melin, Belin, and Felin: and for the ſame cauſe, that ancient Belinus, Cunobelinus, and Caſsibelinus, who alſo goeth under the name of Caſſivelaunus, may ſeeme to be ſo named, as one would ſay, Yellow Princes. For that Cuno is a name of dignitie, the * Britans confeſſe, and a thing which is eſpeciall and principall, they terme at this day, Cynoc. Certes, that it hath been a name of honour, Cungetorix, Cunobelinus, Cuneglaſus, Cuneda, and Cunedagius, Princes names among the Britans; like as Cyngetorix, Convictolitanus, and Conetodunus, among the ancient Gaules, doe after a ſort make good and declare. Neither am I ignorant that Gildas hath tranſlated Cuneglaſus, in Latine, Lanionem fulvum vel furvum, that is, A Lion tawney, or darke hued Butcher: whom others have interpreted, Principem Cæruleum, ſive vitrei coloris, that is, A Prince blew, or of a blewiſh, or woad-colour: like as Cuneda, Principem bonum, that is, A good Prince. That the Germans Koning, and our King, came from Cuno, I dare not yet ſuppoſe. Let it ſuffice, by theſe my ſundry gheſſes, to have thus dallied, leſt I lay open my ſelfe to the ſcorne of others.

God Belinus.

* Ancient inhabitants of France.

B

* Henbane.

* Welch.

C

Cuno.

* Welchmen.

* Vitrei coloris.

D

The eighth, with a chariot horſe, and a wheele or ſhield under-neath, having in the reverſe BODVO; may ſeeme to be a Coine of the Nation called * Boduni: or elſe of Queen Bodicia, who is diverſly named Voadicia, and Bunduica.

* Or Dobuni, Gloceſter ſhire, and Oxford ſhire.

The Ninth, wherein is repreſented an horſeman, with ſpeare and ſhield, and theſe letters in ſcattering wiſe, CAERATIC. I would deeme to be a Coine of that warlike Prince Caratacus, whoſe praiſes Tacitus highly extolleth. E

The tenth, upon the one ſide whereof, under an horſeman, is the inſcription REX, and on the other COM, both I and ſome others are pleaſed

A sed with this conceit, that it was a coine of Connius* Atrebatensis whom Cæsar mentioneth. Of Arras.

The eleventh, which doth represent a little halfe moon with this Inscription, REX CALLE, is not much unlike the name of that most famous and frequented City, CALLENA. *Or Gallena; that is, Wallengford.

The twelfth hath a winged head with this word ATEVLA: and in the reuerse a Lion and this Inscription, VLATOS. What the meaning might be of these words, I seeke and seek, but in vaine. Indeed by this very same portrature and image, I have seen upon peeces of Roman mony
B the goddesse Victorie expressed. But, that Victorie should be in the British tongue called ATEVLA, I never yet could find. Mary, that they named Victorie, Andate, I have out of Dio reported already: and whether the same were ANDARTA, worshipped of the* Vocontij in Gaule, let some other say, for I dare not. Victoria. Andate. *Those of the County of Beaufort.

Here also may you behold the thirteenth, with this word DIAS in an eight-angled figure, & an horse on the contrary side: the fourteenth with a swine, & these letters VANOC, the head also of a goddesse, haply Venus; or else of Venutius, whom Tacitus speaketh of. The fifteenth, with an head and helmet upon it; and this inscription, DVRNACO: and *In Octagono.
C whether that were Dumnacus a Prince of the Andes whom Cæsar doth mention, I wot not. The sixteenth with an horse, and this word ORCETI. The seventeenth with the image of Augustus and TASCIA, and on the reuerse a bull boaking with his hornes: The eighteenth, with CVNO within a laurell garland: and upon the back part an horse, with the inscription TASCE. *People of Aniou or Angiers.

We have seen besides one other coine with the flying horse Pegasus, and CAMV: on the backe part whereof, the forme of a man with an helmet and shield, within standing corne, and CVNO: another, with an horse ill fauouredly protraied, and EISV, peradventure for ISVRII, and D on the backe side, an eare of corne: also another with a souldier carying a speare, and on the other side, within a wreath or chein, SOLIDV. That it should be the peece of mony called Solidus, I doe not beleeve; because the said peece was in that age alwaies of gold, whereas this was of silver. More probable it is, that it should have a reference to Solidurij. For so the ancient French named men devoted to die in behalfe of others: Whose condition was this, that looke unto whose friendship they had betaken themselves, they should together with them enioy all the comforts and commodities of this life. If any violent accident hapned unto them, they were either to sustaine the same chance together with them, E or els to kill themselves: neither hath ever any one of them been found, who after the party was slaine, unto whose friendship he had devoted himselfe, would refuse to die. Now whether from these, those souldiers took their name, who being sworne pensioners to any one Prince or State, take a certaine pension, and with most nations of Europe carry al- Solidurij. Cæsar Comment.

most

Digitized by Google

Soldiers. moſt the very ſame name, to wit Soldiers, Soldates, Soldados, &c. I had rather A others ſhould thinke than my ſelfe determine: although for mine own part, I would more willingly ſubſcribe to this opinion, that in theſe later and more moderne times, they were termed Solidarij, for diſtinction ſake, for thoſe, who ſerued in the wars in regard of their tenours, without pay of mony.

Whether all theſe kinds of coine went commonly currant as monie, from one to another and in ordinary trafficke and exchange, or were at the firſt apart, for ſome ſpeciall uſe and purpoſe, is a queſtion debated among the learned. But in few words, take here my coniecture, if I may B be ſo bold as to interpoſe the ſame. Conſidering that Cæſar had appointed what Cuſtome or Impoſt the Britans ſhould pay yeerly, and whereas under Auguſtus they endured thoſe paiments for portage, or toll, as well in carrying foorth as bringing in commodities: by little and little o-Strabo. ther tributes alſo were impoſed upon them: to wit for* Corne-grounds,
*Sativis. Plant-plots, Groves or Parks, Paſturage of greater and ſmaller beaſts: as beeing Appian. ſubdued now to obey as ſubiects, and not to ſerve as ſlaves: I have been of opinion, that thoſe peeces of mony were ſtamped at firſt for that uſe; namely for greater beaſts, with an horſe; for ſmaller with a ſwine; for woods with a tree, for* corne fields with an eare of corne: as in that C peece of the Verlamians, which carieth the Inſcription VERV. As for thoſe with the head of a man or woman, they may ſeem ſtamped for the *Pol-ſilver. Tribute * Capitatio, which was perſonall and impoſed upon the poll or perſon of every one: of women, from the twelfth, of men, from the fourteenth yeere of their age. Which impoſition Bunduica or Bodicia a Queen of the Britans complaineth of unto her people in theſe words;
Yee doe both graſe and alſo plough for the Romans, yea yee pay an yeerlie tribute in reſpect of your verie bodies. For this purpoſe I have thought there was in olde time one certaine kind of mony ſtamped, ſeeing that in the ſcripture it is plainly called Numiſma Cenſus, and Heſichius expoun- D Numiſma deth Κῆνσος, εἶδος νομίσματος ἐπικεφαλαίου, Cenſus, is a kind of perſonall mony paid for Cenſus. every poll. And the more ſtedfaſtly beleeve I this, for that in ſome there is expreſſed the Mintmaſter marking mony with TASCIA, which among the Britans betokeneth a Tribute-Denier. Howbeit I deny not, but that afterwards theſe paſſed promiſcuouſly as mony from one to another. Neither am I yet of the ſame mind with thoſe, that would have the Swine, the Horſe, the corne eare, Ianus, &c. to have been the peculiar badges of nations, families or Princes: conſidering, we may ſee in theſe, that one and the ſame Prince and nation uſed ſundry badges, as Cunobelinus, who ſtamped in his mony a ſwine, an horſe, a corne eare and other E things.

Now, whether theſe tribute peeces were coined by the Romanes, or the Provinciall people, or their Kings, ſeeing that the whole world was taxed by Auguſtus, I may not eaſily affirme. Coniecture I may that they were

Digitized by Google

A were ſtamped by the Britiſh kings, conſidering that Britaine from the time of Iulius Cæſar unto Claudius daies, uſed their own lawes, and was committed to the government of their own Kings, as Dio writeth: and withall, ſeeing that they repreſent the images and titles of Britiſh Princes. For, the Romans by a received cuſtome had kings in their provinces as inſtruments to bring the people into ſervitude: who being now become, as it were, the Romanes fellowes and aſſociates, by little and little were framed, (a thing uſuall with perſons conquered) to their faſhions, and ſo, as it ſeemeth, began after the Roman maner both to ſtamp mony
B at a certain poiſe, and alſo to imprint a name upon the peeces. But contrariwiſe in Iurie, as may be collected by the anſwer of Chriſt, marked they were with Cæſars face and a ſuperſcription, and that in all likelihood by the Romans themſelves. Which Cardinall Baronius a painfull eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorian, ſheweth in theſe words: The maner, ſaith hee, among the Romans was, that mony ſhould be coined by the Emperors, in regard of Tribute or Tax, and not to remaine alwaies the ſame and after one ſort, but according to the riſe and fall of the ſaid tributes, differ from other peeces of uſuall mony in this point, for that the value of theſe ordinary peeces is alwaies one and the ſame, but thoſe of Tax or tribute, ever as the quality of Tribute changed, were made proportionable to the ſaid
C tribute. But divers learned men accord not in this point with Baronius.

NOTES VPON THE ROMANE COINES.

THE firſt Romane Emperor after [Iulius] Cæſar, that earneſtly ſet his mind upon the conqueſt of Britain, was Claudius: and hee having put over ſea hither with an armie, brought the Southpart thereof into the forme of a province: At which very time, this firſt peece of mony may D ſeeme to bee ſtamped, which carrieth this abbreuiated Inſcription, TI CLAVD. CAES. AVG. P. M. TR. P. VIIII. IMP. XVI. that is to ſay, Tiberius Claudius Cæſar, Auguſtus Pontifex Maximus, that is, High Prieſt, Dio. Caſſius. Tribunitia poteſtate IX. that is, In Tribunes authoritie the ninth time, Imperator XVI. that is, ſixteen times Imperator. But to explane theſe titles once for all, ye ſhall underſtand, That after Iulius Cæſar, who laid the foundation of the Romane Monarchie, and Octauius who was honoured with the name of Auguſtus, all their ſucceſſors in honor of them would be called Cæſares, and Auguſti, as though they far ſurpaſſed the nature of men. For ſuch things as be of ſacred Maieſty, are named Auguſta: alſo, E termed they were Pontifices Maximi, or High Prieſts, for that they were conſecrated in all kinds of Prieſthood, and overſeers of all Sacrifices and religious ceremonies. They uſurped likewiſe the Tribunitian power and authority (for Tribunes in no wiſe would they be termed) to the end, that they might have protection thereby and be inviolable. For, being

I. III. IIII

Digitized by Google

once inveſted in this authority, if any man either gave curſed language A or offered violence unto them, hee might without proceſſe of condemnation bee killed as a ſacrilegious perſon: and this Tribunitian power they renewed every yeere, and thereby were reckoned the yeers of their Empire. Laſt of all they were ſtiled, Imperatores, becauſe their command and rule was moſt large, and under that name the power of Kings and Dictators was contained. Now, they were entituled, Imperatores, ſo oft as they had atchieved any worthy exploit in battell, either in their own perſons, or by their Captains. But whereas in the reverſe of this peece of mony, there is to be ſeen a triumphall Arch, with the portrait of an B horſeman between two trophees, and this title, DE BRITAN. I would iudge, that thereby is meant a twofold victory obtained, in the ninth yeere of Claudius his Empire, according to the number, that ſheweth his Tribunitian authority renewed.

II. In the ſecond peece, which alſo is a coine of Claudius *Auguſtus, out
*The Empe-rour. of this inſcription, TI. CLAVD. CAES. AVG. GER. TR. P. XII. IMP.
XIIX. we are taught, that in the twelfth yeere of his raign he for a victory wone in Britain was with ioifull acclamations ſaluted, Imperator, the eighteenth time: and at the ſame inſtant that the Colonie Camalodunum was *Or Plough-man. thither brought, which is ſignified expreſly by an *husbandman imprin- C ted upon it, with a Cow and a Bull. The Romanes, (ſaith Servius) when they were about to found and build cities, being girt and clad after the Gabine faſhi-on, that is to ſay, with one part of their gowne covering the head, and the other tucked up; yoked on the right hand, a Bull, and within forth a Cow, and held the crooked plough taile bending inward, ſo as all the clods of the earth might fall inward. And thus having made a furrow, they did ſet out the places for wals, holding up the plough from the ground, where the gates ſhould be.

III. The Sonne of Claudius, whoſe peece of coine the third is with Greeke Characters, was by vertue of an act of Senate; adorned with the ſurname of BRITANNICVS, in regard of his fathers fortunate wars, that D he might uſe the ſame as his owne proper addition. He it was, for whom Seneca praied in this wiſe, That hee might appeaſe Germanie, make way into Britaine, and ſolemnize both his Fathers triumphs, and alſo new [of his owne.]
But what ſhould be the meaning of an halfe ſhip in this coine, with this inſcription, Metropolis Etiminij Regis? Certes, I cannot for certaine affirme who that Etiminius was, unleſſe a man liſt to imagine him to have beene the very ſame Adiminius, King Cunobelinus ſonne, of whom Suetonius re-porteth, That he ran away unto C. Caligula.

IIII. That which yee ſee in the fourth place, is a peece of Hadrians mony, with this writing upon it, HADRIANVS AVG. CONSVL III. PA- E
TER PATRIAE. And in the other ſide, EXERCITVS BRITANNI-CVS, that is, The Armie in Britaine repreſented by three ſouldiers. I would deem, that it betokened the 3 Legions, to wit, Secunda Auguſta, Sex-ta victrix, and Viceſima Victrix, which ſerved in Britain, Anno Chriſti 120.

For

Digitized by Google

A For then was he Consul the third time.

The fifth and sixth, which are the coines of Antoninus Pius, carrying this inscription, Antoninus Pius, Pater Patriæ, Tribunitia potestate, Consul tertium: and in their reverse, the one having Britaine sitting upon rocks with a militarie Ensigne, a speare and a shield; the other, the selfe same Britaine, sitting upon a globe; seeme to have been stamped by the Province Britaine, in honour of Antoninus Pius, when hee began his Empire in the yeere of Christ 140. As for that militarie habit of the Province Britaine, it signifieth, That Britaine in those daies flourished in glorie of B martiall prowesse: like as that peece of money, which at the same time Italie stamped for the honour of him, hath such another figure sitting upon a globe, with Cornu-copiæ, betokening plentie of all things: that also which Sicilie coined, hath the like figure with an eare of corne, in token of fruitfulnesse: semblably that which Mauritania stamped, hath a protraict or personage, holding two speares with an horse, to shew the glorie of that Province in good horsemanship and chivalrie. Hitherto also is to be referred the ninth, which is a peece of the same Antoninus, but not set in his due place.

V. VI. IX.

The seventh peece of money, stamped by Commodus, sheweth no C more, but that he for a victorie against the Britans, assumed into his stile the name of BRITANNICVS: for in the other side thereof is to bee seene, Victorie, with a branch of the Date-tree, holding a shield, and sitting upon the shield of the Britans vanquished, with this inscription, VICTORIA BRITANNICA.

VII.

The eighth, which is a coine of Caracalla, and set here not in the right place, more expresly sheweth by the numerall figures, that hee vanquished his enemies in Britaine, in the yeere of our Salvation, 214: as also by the Trophee, which Virgil better than any engraver, portraied in these verses:

VIII.

D Ingentem quercum decisis undiq; ramis
Constituit tumulo, fulgentiáque induit arma
Mezenti ducis exuvias, tibi magne trophæum
Bellipotens: aptat roranteis sanguine cristas,
Teláque trunca viri.

A mightie Oke, the boughes whereof were shred from everie side,
Vpon an hill he pight, whereon he goodly armour tide
Duke Mezence spoiles, a trophee brave, ô mightie Mars, to thee,
And fits thereto his crests which yet with gore bloud dropping bee,
The truncheons of that Knigt also.——

E The same is to be thought of the twelfth, which also is one of the same Caracallaes.

XII.

But in those of Severus and Geta, there is none obscuritie at all.

X. XI.

Who this Aebianus was, I am not yet fully resolved. Some reckon him to be A. Pomponius Aelianus, one of the 30 * Tyrants. Others will XIII.

* Or Ulpiu-pera.

Digitized by Google

him to be Cl. Aelianus, one of the sixe Tyrants under Diocleſian. There A are also that thinke he was the verie same* Tyrant in Britaine, under the *Or Usurper. Emperour Probus, of whom Iosimus made mention, but suppressed his name, and of whom I have written before. Surely, in what time so ever hee lived, we suppose that in Britaine he was named Augustus, considering his peeces of mony be found in this Iland onely, carrying this in-Others read Lelianus. scription, IMPERATOR CL. AELIANVS PIVS FOELIX AV-GVSTVS. In the reverse, there is to bee read, VICTORIA AV-GVSTI, which betokeneth, that he subdued some Barbarians.

XIIII. The coine of Carausius, with this inscription; Imperator Caius Carau- B sius Pius Fœlix Augustus, and in the backside thereof, PAX AVGVSTI, seemeth to have been stamped at the very time when hee had quieted the British Sea, which by reason of rovers was so dangerous.

XV. When Allectus, who made away Carausius, had put on the imperiall purple, and fought manfully against the Barbarians, he stamped this
*A kind of coine. peece with VIRTVS AVGVSTI. As for the Letters Q. L. some would have them to signifie a Quartarius, stamped at London; others,
The Questor, that is, Treasurer of London.

XVI. When as Constantius Chlorus, being departed this life at Yorke, was now solemnely consecrated, and after the Pagan maner deified, in C honour and memoriall of him was this peece of mony stamped: which appeareth evidently by the inscription, and a Temple between two Aegles. These letters underneath P. LON. doe plainely imply Pecuniam Londini, that is, that the said money was stamped at London.

XVII. His wife Flavia Helena, a British Ladie born, as our histories report, and as that most excellent Historiographer Baronius doth confirme, what time as her Sonne Constantinus Maximus had discomfited the Tyrant Maxentius, and received these Titles, Fundator quietis, that is, The founder of quietnesse: and Liberator Orbis, that is, The Deliverer of the world, having procured securitie to the State and common-weale, had this peece stamped D in honour of him at Triers, as appeareth by the Letters S. TR. that is,
*Treveris. Signata Treviris, that is to say, coined at Triers.

XVIII. Flavius Constantinus Maximus Augustus, the great ornament of Bri-taine, stamped this coine at Constantinople, as wee are taught by these characters underneath, CONS. with this, GLORIA EXERCTVS, that is, The glorie of the Armie, to currie favor with the souldiers, in whose choise in those daies, and not at the dispose of the Emperour, was the soveraigne rule and government.

XIX. Constantinus the yonger, Sonne of that Constantinus Maximus, unto whom with other countries the Province Britaine befell; stamped E this peece while his Father lived. For hee is called onely Nobilis Cæsar, a title that was wont to be given to the Heires apparant, or elect Succes-sours of the Empire. By the edifice thereon, and these words, PROVI-DENTIAE CAESS. we understand, that he together with his brother, built

A built some publike worke, like as by these letters P. L O N. that this peece of mony was coined at London.

This coine carrying the inscription, Dominus noster Magnentius Pius Felix Augustus, may seeme to have been stamped by Magnentius, who had a Britan to his father: as also to win the favour of Constantius, after he had put to flight some publike enemie. For, these Characters D D. N N. A V G G. that is, Our L O R D S A V G V S T I, do argue there were then two Augusti, or Emperours. And as for that inscription, V O T I S V. M V L T I S X. it betokeneth, that the people at that time did nuncupate their B vowes in these termes, That the Emperour might flourish 5. yeeres, and by dupling the said number of 5. with lucky acclamations praied for many 10. yeres. And hereto accordeth that speech in the Panegyrick oration of Nazarus, as followeth: The Quinquennall feasts and solemnities of the most blessed and happy Cæsars, hold us wholly possessed with joyes; but in the appointed revolutions of ten yeeres, our hastning vowes and swift hopes have now rested.* The letters P. A R. doe shew that this denier was stamped at* Arelate.

* Solemnized every fifth yeere.

* Arles.

Constantius having defeated Magnentius, and recovered Britaine, in honour of his armie, caused this to be stamped. The letter R. in the basis therof importeth haply, that it came out of the mint which was at Rome. XXI.

C In honour of Valentinian, when he had set upright againe the state of Britaine which was falling to ruine, and called that part of it by him thus recovered after his owne name Valentia, this peece was coined at Antiochia, as may be gathered out of the small letters underneath. XXII.

Vnto the Denier of Gratianus, I can thinke of nothing to say more, save onely that which erewhile I noted upon that of Magnentius. XXIII.

What time as Magnus Maximus was by the British armie created Augustus, and his son likewise Flavius Victor named Cæsar, to grace and glorifie the souldiers were these peeces coined: and Theodosius having subdued and made them away, for the very same cause, stamped that with this, XXIIII. XXV. XXVI.

D V I R T V T E E X E R C I T V S.

Vpon that golden peece of Honorius, I have nothing to observe, but that by this inscription, A V G G G. there were at the same time 3* Augusti: namely after the yeere of grace 420. when as Honorius ruled as Emperor in the west, Theodosius the yonger in the east, & with them Constantius, by Honorius nominated Augustus, who had vanquished our Constantine, elected in hope of that fortunate name. As for that inscription C O N O B, it signifieth, that it was fine and pure gold, stamped at Constantinople. For that same C O N O B, is no where red, so farre as ever I could hitherto observe, but in peeces of gold, for C O N S T A N T I N O P O L I O B R I Z V M. XXVII.

* Emperours.

E I could annex hereunto many more peeces of Roman mony, for infinit store of them is every where found among us in the ruins of cities and towns subverted, in treasure-coffers, or vaults hidden in that age, as also in funeral-pots & pitchers. And how it came to passe, that there should remain stil so great plenty of them, I much marvelled, until I had red in the Constitutions of Princes, that it was forbidden to melt such ancient coines.

D. 1. c. de auri pub. prosecut. L. 12. 13. C. The. de suscept. præpos.

Digitized by Google

Having now already represented these antike peeces, as well of British as Roman mony in their own formes, I thinke it also profitable for the Reader to insert in this verie place a chorographicall table or mappe of Britaine, (seeing it hath sometime been a Province of the Romanes) with the ancient names of places: and although the same be not exact and absolute, (for who is able to performe that?) yet thereby a man may learne thus much, if nothing else, that in this round Globe of the earth, there is daily some change: new foundations of townes and cities are laid; new names of people and nations arise, and the former vtterly be abolished: and, as that Poet said, A B

Non indignemur mortalia corpora solvi,
Cernimus exemplis oppida posse mori.

Why fret should we that mortall men to death doe subject lie?
Examples daily shew that townes and cities great may die.

THE

THE DOVVN-FALL OR DESTRVCTION OF BRITAIN.

WHen as Britain now was abandoned of the Romane garrisons, there ensued an universall and utter confusion, full of wofull miseries and calamities, what with barbarous nations of the one side making incursions and invasions, what with the native inhabitants raising tumultuons uprores on the other, whiles every man catcheth at the government of State, Thus, as Ninnius writeth, They lived in feare 40. yeeres or thereabout. For, Vortigern then King, stood in great dread of the Picts and Scots: Troubled sore also hee was with the violence of Romans, that remained here, and no lesse stood he in feare of Ambrosius Aurelius or Aurelianus, who during the conflict of these tempestuous troubles, wherein his parents that had worne the Imperiall purple robe, were slaine, survived them. Hereupon, the Saxons, whom Vortigern had called foorth of Germany to aid him, made bloody and deadly war against those friends that invited and entertained them: insomuch as after many variable and doubtfull events of war they wholly disseised the poore wretched Britans of the more fruitfull part of the Iland, and their ancient native seat and habitation.

Gildas.

Saxons called foorth into Britain.

Bed. lib. 1. cap. 13

But this most lamentable ruine & downfall of Britain, Gildas the Britan, who lived within a little while after, all ful of teares shall with his piteous pen depaint or deplore rather unto you. As the Romanes were returning, quoth he, *to their own home, there shew themselves avie, out of their carroghes, wherein they passed over the * Scitticke vale, and as it were, at high noone-Sunne, and in fervent heat, issuing from out of most narrow holes and caves, whole swarmes of duskish vermin, to wit, a number of hideous high-land Scots and Picts in flocks, for maners and conditions in some respect different; but sorting well enough in one and the same greedy desire of bloodshed: Who having intelligence that the Roman associats & Maintaners of the Britās were returned home, with utter disclaiming and renouncing of all returne, more confidently than their usuall maner had been, seise into their hands all the Northern and utmost part of the land, and hold the same (as naturall inborne inhabitants) even as far as to the wall. Against these attempts opposed there was and placed upon an high fort and castle along the wall a garrison, nothing war-like, unfit for fight, with quaking hearts and altogether unmeet for service: which warding there day and night became lazie with doing nothing. Meane while, no stay there was, but those bare naked enemies approched the forts and wall with hooked weapons and engines, wherewith the most miserable people were plucked from the walles and dashed against the hard ground. This good yet did this maner of hasting untimely death, unto those that by such meanes were speedily rid out of the world, in that by so quicke a dispatch they escaped and avoided the wofull imminent calamities of their brethren and deare children. To be short, having abandoned their Cities and quit that high-wall, once again they took them to flight, and were dispersed anew, in more desperate maner than before time. Semblably, the enemies follow hard in chase, and hasten to make fouler havock and more cruell butcherie of them. Like therfore as Lambs by bloody butchers, so are these wofull inhabitants quartred and mangled by their enemies: insomuch as their abode among them might well be compared to the ravening of wild and savage beasts. For not only the poore and wretched people themselves forbeare not to rob one another, for their short sustenance of small food, but also those hostile outward miseries and calamities were augmented with inward tumults and troubles: in that by these and such like pillages and spoiles practised so thick, the whole country was exhaust of victuals: he staffe and strength of life, save only the small comfort that came by hunting. Whereupon the distressed remains of them send their missive letters again unto Aetius a power-able man in the Romane state, in this tune;*

Carroghes.
Scitick vale.
*The Irish sea.
This Gildas here in the Manuscript Copies of France is named Querulus, as the right worthy Barnabas Brisonius hath reported unto me.

TO *ÆTIVS THRICE CONSVL. THE GRONES OF BRITANS.

The

In some Copies, AGITIVS, in other Equitius Cos. without any number, Bor. Both the consuls were slaine.

The Barbarians drive us backe to the sea: The sea again putteth us backe upon Barbarians. Thus betweene two kinds of death, either our throats be cut, or we are drowned: A

Yet obtaine they no succour at all for those their distresses. Meane while in this wandring and declining condition of theirs, most notorious and horrible famine oppresseth them, which forced many of them without delay, to yeeld themselves into the hands of those cruell spoilers and robbers, that they might have some food (were it never so little) to comfort and refresh their poore hungry soules: but with others it never wrought so much, but they chose rather to withstand and rise against them continually, from out of the very mountaines, caves and thick woods, full of bushes, briers and brambles. And then verily, at the first they gave sundry overthrowes with much slaughter to their enemies for many yeers together (as they made spoile and drave away booties in the land), reposing their trust not in man, but in God: according to that saying of Philo, The helpe of God is at hand when mans helpe faileth. Thus for a while rested our enemies from their boldnesse; but yet our countrimen gave not over their wickednesse: The enemies, I say, retired from the people, but the people did not retire themselves from their wickednesse. For, an usuall maner it ever was of this nation (like as it is at this day also) to shew themselves feeble in repressing the enemies forces, but strong enough to civill wars, and to undergoe the burdens of sinne, &c. B G

Well then, these shamelesse Irish rauenours returne home, minding shortly after to make repaire hither again: and the Picts rested without molestation then first; and so from thencefoorth, in the utmost part of the Province, yet not without wasting & harrying the country at sundry times. By meanes therfore of such surcease of hostility, the desolate peoples sore of famin was healed up cleane & skinned, but another more virulent than it, secretly bred and brake foorth. For, in the time that the Iland was free from hostile wasting, there hapned in it so fruitfull plenty & abundance of all things, as the like no age before had ever remembred: and therewith groweth evermore all maner of riot and excesse. For, so mightily it encreased and came to so great an head, that very fitly at the same time it might be said, Certainly it is heard, that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. And not this sinne only was rife, but all others also that are incident to mans nature: and especially (which likewise at this very day overturneth the state of all goodnesse in it) the hatred of Truth and the maintainers thereof, the love also of lies with the forgers thereof, the admitting of evill for good, the respective regard of leaudnesse in stead of goodnesse, desire of darknesse in lieu of the Sun-light, and accepting of Satan for an Angell of light. Kings were anointed not by God, but by such as were known more cruell than the rest: and soone after, the same were murdered by their own anointers, without due examination of the truth, and others more fierce and cruell elected. Now if any one of these Kings seemed more mild than other and somewhat better inclined to the Truth, upon him as the subverter of Britain the hatred and spitefull darts of all men without respect were leuelled and shot. No difference made they of any thing that they took diſpleasure at, but things waighed all in equall balance, saving that the better things indeed wrought ever discontent: in so much as, right iustly the saying of the Prophet which was denounced unto that people in old time might be applied unto our country, Yee lawlesse and corrupt children have forsaken the Lord and provoked unto wrath the holy one of Israel: Why should ye be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquity? Every head is sicke and every heart is heavy. From the sole of the foot unto the crown of the head there is nothing sound therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their safety, as if no physicke or medicine had been bestowed upon the world by the true physitian of all. And not only the secular or laymen did this, but also the selected flocke of the Lord and the shepheards thereof, who ought to have given example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them drenched, as it were, with wine, lay benummed and senselesse: possessed they were with swelling pride, and therewith stomackfull, given to contentious brawles, armed with the catching clawes of envie, and undiscreet in their iudgement, as putting no difference between good and evill. Insomuch as, apparently (even as now a daies D E F

Kings anointed.

Digitized by Google

A daies) it seemed that contempt was powred foorth upon the Princes, and the people were seduced by their vanities and error in by-paths, and not led the right way. In the meane time, when God was minded to purge his family and to recure it thus infected with so great corruption of sinnes, by heare say only of tribulation, the winged flight (as one would say) of an headlesse rumor, peiereeth the attentive eares of all men, giving notice of ancient enemies ready to arive, and upon their comming fully minded to destroy them utterly, and after their wonted maner to possesse and inhabite the country from one end to another. Yet for all this were they never the better, but like unto foolish and senseleſſe horses, reſisting the bridle of reason, and refusing to admit the bit (as they say) into their close shut mouth, leaving the B way to salvation narrow thought it were, ran up and downe at random all in the broad way of all wickednesse which leadeth directly and readily to death. While therefore, as Salomon saith, the obstinate and stubborne servant is not amended with words, scourged hee is for a foole, and feeleth not the whip. For lo, a pestilent contagion bringing much mortality falleth heavily upon the foolish people, which in a short space, when the enemies sword was gone destroied so great a multitude of them, as that the living were not able to bury the dead. Neither verily were they the better for it, that the saying of Esay the Prophet might in them also be fulfilled: And God called them, quoth he, to sorrow and mourning, to baldnesse and sackcloth: but behold, they fell to killing of calves, to slaying of rams: Lo, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall, Let us eat and drinke, for to morrow we shall die. C And why? the time drew neere wherein their iniquities, like as those in times past of the Amorites, should come to the fulnesse. For, they fall to consult what was the best and most conuenient course to be taken, for to represse so cruell, and so many invasions of the forenamed nations, with the booties which they raised. Then, all the Counsellors together with the proud tyrant became blinded and bewitched, devising such a protection, nay a destruction rather of their country as this; namely, that those most fierce Saxons, a people foully infamous, odious both to God and man, should be let into this Iland, as one would say, wolves into the sheep-folds, to repulse, forsooth, and beat backe the Northren nations. Than which, I assure you, nothing was ever devised and practised more pernicious, nothing more unhappy unto this land. O mist of sense and grosseſt understanding that ever was! O desperate dulD nesse and blind blockishnesse of mind! Those whom in their absence they were inclined and given to dread more than very death, now of their own accord these foolish Princes of Aegypt intertained, as I may say, under the roofe of one house, giving (as hath been said) fond foolish counsell unto Pharao.

Pestilence.

Saxons received into Britain.

Then rushed foorth out of the barbarous *Lioneſſes den a Kennell of whelps in three Veſſels, called in her language Cyulæ, that is, Keeles, and in our Latine tongue, Longæ naves, under full saile, caried with the wind of lucky sure-presaging auguries, whereby foreprophesied it was unto them, that for 300. yeeres they should possesse and hold that land as their country, unto which they directed their course: and for an hundred and twenty, that is, the one moity of the said space, oftentimes wast and depopulate the same. These being put E on shore first in the East part of the Iland, and that by commandement of this infortunate tyrant, set fast their terrible pawes and clawes there, pretending unto the Ilanders defence of their country, but more truely intending the offence thereof: unto which whelps, the foresaid dam, *the Lioneſſe, finding that their first setting foot and marching forward sped well, sends likewise a greater rabble of worrying freebutters, which being arrived here in Flotes conioined themselves with the former misbegotten crew. From hence it is, that the shoot-grifts of iniquity, the roote of bitternes, and virulent plants due to our deserts sprout & put foorth in our soile, proud bud, branch and leafe. Well, these barbarous Saxons thus admitted into the Iland, obtaine allowance of victuals and wages, as for douty souldiers, and F such as would endure hard service and much hazard (for so they falsly bare men in hand) in defense of their good hosts and friends for their kind intertainment. Which being given unto them a long time stopped (as we say) the dogs mouth. Howbeit afterward they complaine that their *monthly wages was not well paid them, devising of purpose colourable occasions of quarrell, protesting and threatning, that unlesse they might feele more munificence powred and heaped upon them, they would with the breach of covenant spoile and wast the whole Iland thorowout. And without further delay they second these threats with very deeds:

*Germanie.

Ciulæ

*Germany.

*Epimenia.

Digitized by Google

„ deeds, (for, the cauſe of deſerved revenge for precedent wickedneſſe, was ſtill nouriſhed) A
„ the fire kindled, and ſet a flaming by theſe prophane men from ſea to ſea, ceaſed not to con-
„ ſume all the cities, and countreys bordering thereabout, untill ſuch time as burning well „ neere all the inland ſoile of the Iland it licked up with a red flaming, and terrible tongue all „ unto the weſterne Ocean. In this violent furious invaſion, comparable to that of the Aſſy- „ rians in old time againſt Iuda, is fulfilled alſo in us (according to the hiſtorie) that which the „ Prophet by way of ſorrowfull lamentation uttereth: They have burnt with fire thy Sanctu- „ arie, they have polluted in the Land the Tabernacle of thy name. And againe, O God, the „ Gentiles are come into thine heritage, they have defiled thy holy temple, &c. In ſuch wiſe,
„ as all the Colonies by the force of many engines, and all the Inhabitants together with the B „ Prelates of the Church, both Prieſts and People, by drawne ſword glittering on every ſide,
„ and crackling flame of fire, were at once laid along on the ground: yea, and that which was „ a pitious ſpectacle to behold, in the mids of the ſtreets the ſtone workes of turrets, and high „ walles, rent and torne in ſunder from aloft the ſacred altars, and quarters of carcaſes (cove- „ red with imboſſed workes of imagerie) of a bloudy hue, were ſeene all blended and mixed „ together (as it were) in a certaine horrible wine-preſſe, neither was there any Sepulcher at „ all abroad, ſave onely the ruins of buildings, and the bowels of wilde beaſts and fowles.

When we ſhall read theſe reports, let us not be offended and diſpleaſed with good Gildas, for his bitter invectives againſt either the vices of his owne countreymen the Britans, or the inhumane outrages of the barbarous enemies, or the inſatiable cruel- C tie of our Fore-fathers the Saxons. But ſince that for ſo many ages ſucceſſively enſuing, we are all now by a certain engraffing or commixtion become one nation, molliſied and civilized with Religion, and good Arts, let us meditate and conſider, both what they were, and alſo what we ought to be: leſt that for our ſinnes likewiſe, the ſupreame Ruler of the world, either traſlate other nations hither, when wee are firſt rooted out, or incorporate them into us, after we are by them ſubdued.

BRITANS OF ARMORICA.

D

Gildas. „ DVring this moſt wofull, deſperate, and lamentable tempeſtuous ſea-„ ſon, ſome poore remaines of Britans, being found in the mountaines, were „ killed up by whole heapes; others, pined with famine, came and yeelded „ themſelves unto the enemies, vpon compoſition to ſerve them as Bond- „ ſlaves for ever, ſo they might not be killed out of hand, which was reputed
*A ſong at their firſt ſetting out. „ a moſt high favour, and eſpeciall grace. There were alſo that went over ſea into ſtrange lands, „ ſinging under their ſpred ſailes with a howling and wailing note, in ſtead of the Mariners „ Celeuſma, after this maner: Thou haſt given us* [O Lord] as ſheepe to be devoured, and „ ſcattered us among the heathen. Others againe remained ſtill in their owne countrey, albe-
„ it in fearefull eſtate, betaking themſelves (but yet continually ſuſpecting the worſt) to high E
Bretagne, or little Britain. „ ſteepe hilles and mountaines intrenched, to woods, and thicke growen forreſts, yea
„ to the rockes of the ſea. Of thoſe who paſſed beyond-ſea, no doubt were they who for to ſave their lives, went over in great number to * Armorica in France, and were kindly received of the Armoricans. That this is true, beſides the communitie of language, (the ſame in maner with that of our * Britans) and to ſay nothing of other authors, who all accord in this point; hee who lived neereſt unto that age, and was borne even in Armorica, and wrote the life of S. Wingualof the Confeſſor, ſuffici-
* Or Welchmen. „ ently doth proove. An off-ſpring, ſaith he, of the Britans embarked in Flotes, arrived in „ this land, on this ſide the Britiſh ſea, what time as the barbarous nation of the Saxons fierce
„ in armes, and uncivill in maners, poſſeſſed their native and mother-ſoile. Then, I ſay, this F „ deare of-ſpring ſeated themſelves cloſe within this nooke and ſecret corner. In which place
„ they being wearied with travaile and toile, ſat quiet for a while without any warres. Howbeit, our writers report, that our Britans long before this time, ſetled themſelves in „ this coaſt. For, he of Malmsburie writeth thus: Conſtantinus Maximus being ſaluted
„ by the Armie, Emperour, having proclaimed an Expedition into the higher lands, brought away

Digitized by Google

A away a great power of Britiſh ſouldiers, through whoſe induſtry and forward ſervice, ha- » ving obtained triumphant victories to his hearts deſire, and attained to the Empire: ſuch » of them as were paſt ſervice, and had performed the painfull parts of ſouldioury their full » time, he planted in a certaine part of Gaule weſtward upon the verie ſhore of the Ocean: » where at this day their poſteritie remaining, are wonderfully growen even to a mightie peo- » ple, in maners and language ſomewhat degenerate from our Britans. And true it is, that » Conſtantine gave commandement in this wiſe: Let the old ſouldiers according to our Pre- » Cod. Theod. lib.
cept enter upon the vacant lands, and hold them for ever freely. Ninnius likewiſe: Maximus » 7. Tit. 20.
the Emperor who ſlew Gratian, would not ſend home againe thoſe ſouldiers which he had » B levied out of Britaine, but gave unto them many countreys, even from the poole or Mere, » which lieth above Mont-Iovis unto the citie that is called Cantguic, and unto Cruc-occhidi- » ent. And he that hath annexed briefe notes upon Ninnius, fableth beſides in this ma- » ner: The Armorican Britons which are beyond-ſea, going forth from hence with Maxi- » mus the tyrant in his expedition, when as they could not returne, waſted the weſt parts of » Gaule, even to the verie bare ſoile: and when they had maried their wives and daughters, » did cut out all their tongues, for feare leſt the ſucceeding progenie ſhould learne their mo- » ther-language: whereupon we alſo call them in our tongue, Lhet vydion, that is, halfe ſi- » lent or tongue-tied, becauſe th y ſpeake confuſedly. The authoritie of theſe writers here- » in I cannot in any wiſe contradict; yet I am of opinion rather, that the children of C thoſe old ſouldiers gladly afterward received theſe Britans that fled out of their countrey. Nevertheleſſe, the name of Britans in this tract, I find not in all the writers of that age, before ſuch time that the Saxons came into our Britain, unleſſe it be of thoſe whom Plinie ſeemeth to place in Picardie, and who in ſome copies are named Brina- ni. For if any man out of the fourth booke of Strabo his Geographie, doe with Vo-laterrane thinke, that Britaine was a citie of Gaule, let him but looke into the Greeke Booke, and he will ſoone informe himſelfe, that he ſpake of the Iland Britaine, and not of a citie. As for that verſe out of Dionyſius, which before I have alleaged, ſome would rather underſtand it with Stephanus of our Britans, than with Euſtathius of the Armoricans, eſpecially ſeeing that Feſtus Avienus, a writer verily of good an-D tiquitie, hath tranſlated it thus:

*Cauris nimium vicina * Britannis,* * Britaine.
Flavaſq; cæſariem Germania porrigit ora.
Britaine the North-weſt winds too neare,
And yellow haired Germanie her front doth forward beare.

Neither let any man think that the Britannicians mentioned in the booke Notitia, Britanniciani.
came from hence, who in truth were certaine cohorts onely of ſouldiers enrolled out of this our Britaine.

Before the arrivall of our Britans, this countrey was at firſt called, Armorica, that Armorica.
is, ſituate by the ſea ſide: and afterwards in the ſame ſenſe, Llydaw, in the Britiſh E tongue, that is, coaſting upon the ſea, and thence in Latine by our writers living in the middle age, Letauia. From whence I ſuppoſe, were thoſe Leti whom Zoſimus nameth Haply, Lexoin Gaule, when he noteth, that Magnentius the Tyrant, was borne among the Leti in vij in Plinie.
France, and had a Britan to his father. Theſe Armoricans, when as that Conſtantine Zonaras.
elected for the names ſake became Emperor, & the barbarous nations over-ran Gaul, Procopius having caſt out the Romane garriſons, inſtituted a common-wealth among them- termeth them ſelves. But Valentian the younger by the meanes of Aëtius, and at the interceſſion Arborici: and of Saint German, reclaimed them to allegeance. At which verie time, it ſeemeth another cal-that Exuperantius governed them. Of whom Claudius Rutilius writeth thus: leth the countrey, Cornu
F Cuius Aremoricas Pater Exuperantius oras Gallia.
Nunc poſt liminium pacis amore docet.
Leges reſtituit, libertatemq; reducit,
Et ſervos famulis non ſinit eſſe ſuis.
Whoſe Sire Exuperantius the coaſts to ſea that reach
Now after diſcontinuance long in love of peace doth teach:
He ſets the lawes again in force, reduceth liberty,

And

Digitized by Google

And ſuffereth them unto his folke no more as ſlaves to be. A

Out of which verſes, I wot not whether Aegidius Maſerius hath made ſome collection, when he wrote, That the Britans were ſervants under the Armoricans and againſt them erected a freedome. The firſt mention to my knowledge of Britons in Armorica, was in the yeer of our ſalvation 461. about the thirtith yeere after that the Anglo-Saxons were called out of Germany into our Britain. For then, Manſuetus a Biſhop of the Britans, among other Biſhops of France and Aremorica, ſubſcribed to the firſt Councell of Tours. In the ninth yeere after, theſe new inhabitants of France, ſeeing the Weſt-Gothes to ſeize into their hands the moſt fertile territories of Aniou and Poictu, encountred them, and were a bar that the Gothes poſſeſſed not themſelves of all France. For they ſided with Anthemius the Romane Emperor againſt the Gothes, ſo far foorth that Aruandus was condemned for treaſon, becauſe in his letters ſent unto the King of the Gothes, he had given counſell to ſet upon the Britons dwelling over the river* Loire, and to divide France betweene the Goths and Burgundians. Theſe Britans were a kind of people witty and ſubtile, warlike, tumultuous, and in regard of their valor, number and aſſociation, ſtubborne: in which termes Sidonius Apollinaris complaineth of them unto Riothimus his friend, for ſo himſelfe calleth him (but Iornandes nameth him King of the Britans) who afterward being ſent for, by Anthemius came with a power of 12. thouſand men to aid the Romans, but before that they ioined with them, being with his own forces vanquiſhed in open field by the Gothes, hee fled unto the Burgundians confederate with the Romans. From that time the native Armoricans being by little and little ſubdued, the name of the Britons in theſe parts, where they were newly ſeated, grew ſo great, that generally all the inhabitants there, paſſed by little and little into the name of Britans: like as this whole tract was called Britannia Armorica, and of the* Frankners Britannia Ciſmarina, that is, Britain on this ſide the ſea: and thereupon, I. Scaliger verſified thus:

*Viſigothos.

Sidon. Appollinar.

* Ligerin.

Anno 470.

B

C

* French writers.

Vicit Aremoricas animoſa Britannia gentes,
Et dedit impoſito nomina priſca iugo.

The nations Aremorican ſtout Britain overcame,
And with the yoke of ſervitude gave them her ancient name. D

For, they turned the edge of their weapons upon thoſe their friends that gave them entertainment, as appeareth evidently both by other teſtimonies, and alſo by theſe words of Regalis Biſhop of Vennes as touching himſelfe and his: We living, ſaith he, in captivity under the Britans are ſubiect to a grievous and heavy yoke. Moreover, in the times ſucceeding, they couragiouſly maintained themſelves and their eſtates: Firſt under pety Kings, afterwards under Counts and Dukes againſt the French; albeit as Glaber Rodolphus writeth; Their only wealth was immunity from paiments to the publike Treaſury, and plenty of milke: Alſo 500. yeeres ſince, William of Malmesbury wrote thus of them: A kind of people they are needy and poore in their own country; otherwiſe alſo with forain mony waged, and purchaſing a laborious and painfull life. If they be well paid, they refuſe not ſo much as to ſerve in civill war one againſt another without all regard of right or kinred, but according to the quantity of mony readie with their ſervice for what part ſoever you would have them.

* Venetenſis.

Gregor. Turon. lib. 10. cap. 9.

E

BRITANS OF VVALES AND CORNWALES.

THe reſt of the Britans, who pitifully diſtreſſed in their own native country were put to ſeek for their country, were overlaied with ſo great calamities, as no man is able ſufficiently to expreſſe according to the nature of ſuch horrible particulars; as being not only moleſted grievouſly by the Saxons, Picts and Scots, who made cruell war upon them far and neere, but alſo oppreſſed under the proud and intollerable rule of wicked tyrants, in all places. Now, who

F

Digitized by Google

A who those tyrants were and of what quality about the yeere of our Lord 500, have here in few words out of Gildas, who then lived and was an eiewitnesse. Constantine a Tyrant among the *Danmonij, albeit he had sworne in expresse words before God and the company of holy Saints that he would performe the office of a good Prince, » yet in two Churches under the sacred vesture of an Abbat, slew two children of the blood » roiall, together with their Fosters, two right valiant men: and many yeeres before having » put away his lawfull wife, was foulie defiled with a number of foule filthie adulteries. »

Aurelius Conanus, wallowing in the mire of Parricidies and adulteries, hating » the peace of his countrie, and is left alone as a tree withering in the open field: whose fa- »
B ther and brethren were with a wild, youthfull and overweening phantasie carried awaie, » and by untimely death surprised. »

*Vortiporius tyrant of the Dimetæ, the ungracious sonne of a good father, like to a Panther » in maners, so variably spotted with vices of divers sorts: when his head was now waxen » hoary and gray, sitting in his throne full of craft and guile, and the same defiled with Parici- » dies, or murthers of his owne kinred, and with adulteries beside, cast off his own wife, (and » filthily abused her daughter unawares and unwitting) yea, and tooke also her life away. »

Cuneglasus, in the Roman tongue, Lanio fulvus, that is, The Lion tawney Butcher, a Beare sitting and riding upon many, the driver of that chariot which holdeth the Beare, a »
C contemner of God, an oppressor of the Clergie, fighting against God with grieuous sinnes, and » warring upon man with materiall armour and weapons, turned away his wife, provoked the » Saints and holy men with manifold injuries, proudly conceited of his owne wisedome, and » setting his hope in the uncertaintie of riches. »

Maglocunus, Dragon of the Isles, the deposer of many Tyrants out of Kingdome and life » both, the most forward in all mischiefe: for power and malicious wickednes together, grea- » ter than many more: a large giver, but a more prodigall and profuse sinner: stonger in » armes, higher also than all the Potentates of Britaine, as well in roiall dominion, as in the » stature and lineaments of his person. In his youthfull daies with sword and fire, he brought » to destruction his Vncle by the mothers side, (being then King) together with many right » hardy and redoubted servitours. After that phantasie of a violent course of rule according »
D to his desire was gone, upon a remorse of conscience for his sinnes, vowed to be a professed » Monke: but soone after returning to his vomit, breaking the said vow of Monkes profession, » he despised his first marriage, and became enamoured upon the wife of his brothers sonne, » whiles he was living; the said brothers sonne, and his owne wife, (after hee had kept her » for a certaine time) he murthered, and then maried that brothers sonnes wife, whom he be- » fore had loved. But I must leave the reports of these things to Historie writers, who hitherto have falsly set down, that these Tyrants succeeded one after another: whereas in truth as we may perceive by Gildas, who speaketh unto them severally and personally one by one, they all at once, and the very same time usurped tyranny in divers E quarters of the Iland.

And now to retume: The residue of Britans remaining alive, withdrew themselves into the westerne parts of the Iland, naturally fenced with mountaines, and inlets of the sea, to those parts (I meane) which now we call Wales, and Cornewall. The Inhabitants of the one the Saxons named Bnitpealer, of the other Connpealer, like as those in Gaule, Galweales; For Walsh with them signifieth strange and forraine: whence also the Wallons in the low Countreys, and the Vallachians upon the river *Dunow had their names.

The Britwales, or Welchmen, a verie warlike nation, for many yeeres defended their libertie under Petie-kings: and albeit they were secluded from the English Saxons by a Ditch or Trench which King Offa cast, (a wonderfull peece of worke) yet F otherwhiles by fire and sword they spoiled their cities, and in like sort suffered at their hands all extremities of hostilitie whatsoever. At the length in the raigne of Edward the first, as he writeth of himselfe, The Divine providence which in the owne disposse » Statute of is never deceived, among other good gifts dispensed by it, and with which it hath vouchsa- » Wales.
fed our Kingdome of England to be adorned, hath converted now full, wholly, and entierly » (of her good grace) the Land of Wales with the Inhabitants thereof (subject before time un- »

Cornwalist Britwales. Welch. Waili. *Danubium. *Welchmen.

Digitized by Google

to us by fealtie and ſervice) into our proper dominion, and without any let or barre whatſoever, hath annexed and united it unto the Crowne of the foreſaid Realme, as a part of one and the ſame bodie politike. Howbeit in the age next enſuing, they could no way bee induced to undergoe the yoke of ſubjection, neither could the quarrels by any means poſsibly be taken up, nor the moſt deadly hatred betweene the two nations extinguiſhed, untill that King Henry the ſeventh, who deſcended of them, aſsiſted the oppreſſed * Britans with his gratious hand, and King Henry the Eight, admitted them unto the ſame condition of Lawes and Liberties, that the Engliſh enjoy. Since which time, yea and very often alſo before, the Kings of England have had triall of their conſtant fidelitie and loiall alleageance. As for thoſe Cornwallians, although they ſtoutly bent all their force together in defence of their Countrey, yet ſoone became they ſubject to the Saxons, as who neither matched them in number, neither was their Countrey ſufficiently fenced by nature to defend them.

* Welchmen.

A B

Let this ſuffice that hath been ſaid, touching the Britans and Romans: but ſince we treat of the Inhabitants, we may not in this place omit, (although we have heretofore ſpoken thereof alreadie) that which * Zoſimus reporteth; How that Probus the Emperour, ſent over into Britaine the Vandals and Burgundians, whom he had overcome, who having ſeated themſelves here, ſtood the Romans in good ſtead, as oft as any one raiſed tumult and ſedition. But where they were planted, I know not, unleſſe it were in Cambridge ſhire. For, Gervaſe of Tilbury maketh mention of an ancient rampier or hold in that ſhire, which he calleth Vandelsbury, and ſaith, it was the worke of the Vandals.

* Lib. 1.

C

Neither let any man ſurmize, that in the daies of Conſtantius the Pæni had their abode here, grounding upon theſe words of Eumenius the Rhetorician: [Except perhaps no greater ruine had fallen upon Britaine, and borne it downe, than if it had been drenched thorowout, and overwhelmed with the over-flowing of the Ocean: which being delivered from the moſt deepe gulfe [Pænorum,] began to appeare and ſhew it ſelfe at the view and ſight of the Romanes.] For, in the old Copie belonging ſomtime to Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter, and afterwards to the right honourable Baron Burghly, Lord high Treaſurer of England, we read [Pænorum gurgitibus] that is, The gulfes of puniſhments, and not Pænarum gurgitib. For he ſeemeth to ſpeake of the calamities and miſeries wherewith Britaine was afflicted under Carauſius.

D

Whereas Agathias in the ſecond booke of his Hiſtories, hath theſe words, Hunnica natio Britones ſunt, that is, The Britons are a nation of the Hunnes: I would have no man hereby raiſe a ſlander upon the Britans, or thinke them to bee iſſued from the ſavage cruell Hunnes. For, long ſince Francis Pithæus a verie learned man, hath averred unto me, and now of late I. Lewenclaius, a right worthy Hiſtorian, publiſhed in writing, that in a Greeke Copie it is read, Βίσσοες, and not Britones.

E

PICTS.

PICTS.

NOw let us come to the other Inhabitants of Britaine, and firſt unto the Picts, whom for Antiquitie next after Britans, the Hiſtoriographers have accounted the ſecond. Hector Boetius deriveth theſe from the Agathyrſti: Pomponius Lætus, Aventinus and others from the Germans: ſome from the Pictones in France, and Beda from the Scythians. It hapned, ſaith he, that the nation of the Picts came in long * ſhips, and thoſe not many, out of Scythia, (as the report goeth) into Ireland: and of the Scots whom they found there, requeſted (but in vaine) a place of habitation: by whoſe perſwaſion they went into Britaine, and inhabited the Northerne parts thereof, and that was about the yeere of our Redemption, (as many would have it) 78. I for my part, in ſo great varietie of opinions, know not which I ſhould follow: yet, (that I may ſpeake what I ſuppoſe to be true, and deliver mine owne judgement) were it not that in this point the authoritie of venerable Beda, did over-weigh all the conjectures of all others,

* Gallies or keeles.

F

Digitized by Google

A others, I would thinke that the Picts came from no other place at all, but were verie naturall Britans themselves, even the right progenie of the most ancient Britans: those Britans, I meane, and none other, who before the comming in of the Romans, were seated in the North part of the Iland, and of those who afterwards, casting off the yoke of bondage (as they are a nation most impatient of servilitie) repaired unto these in the North. Like as when the Saxons over-ran the Ille, those Britans which would not forgoe their libertie, conveied themselves into the Westerne parts of the Iland, full of craggie hils, as Wales and Cornwall: even so, doubtlesse, when the Roman warre grew hot, the Britans lest they should undergoe servitude, (which is
B of all miseries the extreamest) gat them into these Northerne parts, frozen with the bitter cold of the aire, full of rough and rugged passages, and full of washes and standing meeres. Where being armed not so much with weapons, as with a sharpe aire and climate of their owne, they grew vp together with the native Inhabitans whom there they found, unto a mightie and populous nation. For, Tacitus reporteth, that the enemies of the Romans were by his wives father Agricola, driven into this part, as it were, into another Iland: and no man doubteth, but Britans they were which inhabited these remotest parts of the Iland. For, shall wee dreame, that all those Britans, enemies to the Romans, which brought out thirtie thousand armed men into the field against Agricola, who gave unto Severus so great overthrowes,
C that of Romans and Associats he lost in one expedition and journey 70000, were killed up every mothers sonne, and none left for seed, and procreation, that they might give roome unto forrainers out of Scythia and Thracia? So farre am I from beleeving this, although Beda hath written so much by relation from others, that I would rather affirme, they were so multiplied, that the verie soile was not able either to releeve or receive them, and were enforced therefore to over-flow and overwhelme, as it were, the Romane Province, which came to passe wee know afterwards, when the Scots came in unto them. But because Beda hath so written, as others in that time reported, I may easily bee brought to beleeve, that some also out of Scandia, called in times past Scythia, (as all the Northerne tract beside) came by the Isles, that by a
D continued ranke lie betweene, unto those Northerne Britans. Yet lest any man should imagine, that I seeke to countenance a lie, carrying likelihood and probabilitie of a truth, me thinks I am able to proove, that the Picts were very Britans indeed, by the demeanor, name and language of the Picts, wherein we shall see they agreed passing well with Britans. Their maners and demeanour.

And to let passe among other reasons, that neither the Picts, according to Beda, nor the Britans, as Tacitus writeth, made any distinction of sex for government in chiefe, or excluded women from bearing sceptre, that custome of painting and staining themselves with colours, was common to both nations. As touching the Britans, we have proved it before: and for the Picts Claudian proveth it for us, who wri-E teth thus:

——Nec falso nomine Pictos
Edomuit.——
The Picts he tam'd
So truly nam'd.

And in another place,

——Ferroq; notatas
Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras:
——And doth peruse with eie
Those iron-brent marks in Picts well seene all bloudlesse, as they die.

F Which Isidore doth shew more plainly: The Nation of the Picts (saith he) have a name drawne even from their bodies, for that by the artificiall pricking therein of small holes with a needle, the workman wringing out the iuice of greene grasse, encloseth the same within, that their Nobilitie and Gentry thus spotted, may carrie these Starres about them, in their painted pounced limmes, as badges to bee knowen by. Shall wee thinke now, that these Picts were Germans, who never used this maner of painting? or the Agathyrsi of Thracia, so farre distant from hence; or rather the very Britans themselves? seeing they Their name.

Digitized by Google

were in the selfesame Isle, and retained the same guise, and fashion of painting. A

Neither are those barbarous people, who so long time made such incursions out of the Forrest Caledonia, & from that farthest Northern coast found the Romans work, otherwise called than Britans, of the ancient Writers, Dio, Herodian, Vopiscus and others. Semblably, Tacitus, who describeth at large the warres of Agricola, his wives Father, in this utmost coast of Britaine, calleth the inhabitants by no other name than Britans, and Britans of * Caledonia: whereas notwithstanding, our latter writers have recorded, that the Picts new comers thither, were arrived there ten yeeres before; a thing that I would have you to note, considering that Tacitus in that age knew not of them at all. Neither would those Romane Emperours, who warred fortunatly against them, to wit, Commodus, Severus, with Bassianus and Geta his sonnes, have assumed into their Stile that addition of BRITANNICVS, after they had vanquished them, unlesse they had beene Britans. Certes, if the Romanes, for whose magnificence every thing made that was strange, had subdued any other nation there beside the Britans, and the same before time unknowen, (were they called Picts or Scots) they would (no doubt) have been knowen by the titles of PICTICVS and SCOTICVS in their coines and inscriptions. Tacitus ghesseth by their deep yellow bush of haire, and their large limmes, that they had their beginning out of Germanie: but straightwaies after, and more truely hee attributeth all to the climate, and posture of the heaven, which yeeldeth unto bodies their complexion and feature. C Whereupon, Vitruvius also writeth thus: Vnder the North Pole are nations bred and fostered, bigge and tall of bodie, of colour browne, with haire of head even, and streight, and the same ruddie. In like maner, that the Caledones, (without all question Britans) were the selfe same nation that the Picts, the Panegyrick author after a sort doth intimate, writing thus: The woods of the Caledones, and of other Picts, &c. as if the Caledones also, had been none other but the Picts. And that those Caledonians were Britans borne, Martiall in this verse of his, implieth:

Quinte Caledonios Ovidi visure Britannos:
Quint Ovide, Britans Caledon, thou that dost mind to see.

Ausonius likewise, who sheweth withall that they were painted, while hee compareth their colour unto green mosse, distinguished with gravel between, in this wise: D

——Viridem distinguit glarea muscum;
Tota Caledonijs talis pictura Britannis:
——Like to greene mosse with gravell rewes between,
The Britans Caledonian are all bepainted seen.

But, as these for a long time were no otherwise known than by the name of Britans, and that, by reason of their depainted bodies: so afterwards, about the time of Maximian and Diocleſian, (neither before that, find we the name of Picts in any writers) when Britaine had so long been a Province, that the Inhabitants had learned the provinciall Latine tongue, then (as it seemeth) began they to bee called Picts, for distinction sake, that they might be known from them that were confederate with the Romanes, and called Britans. And whence should they bee called Picts, if it were not because they depainted themselves? Now if any one there be, who beleeveth not, that our Britans used the provincial Latin tongue, little knoweth he certainly how earnestly the Romans laboured, that the Provinces might speake Latine, neither seeth he what a number of Latine words is crept into the British language: that I may not urge the authoritie of Tacitus, who saith, that in Domitians time the Britans affected very much the eloquence of the Latine tongue. And as touching the name of Picts, the authoritie of Flavius Vegetius may soone cleere this doubt, who sheweth (after a sort) that the Britans used the word [Pict] in the verie same sense, for a thing that is coloured, as the Latines doe. For, he writeth, that the Britans called those light Pinnaces of espiall, PICTAS; the sailes, gables; and other tacklings whereof were died with a blew or watchet colour, like as the mariners and souldiers to them belonging, who were clad in blew apparell. Surely if the Britans called Ships, for their sailes and tacklings stained with the said blew colour, PICTAS, what letteth but that they

*Now Albanie.

Lib. 4. cap. 37.

Digitized by Google

A they ſhould call the people PICTI, who were painted with ſundrie colours, and with blew eſpecially, for that is the colour that woad giveth?

This alſo maketh for us, that the Northerne Picts, whom Saint Columbane by preaching the word, and by his good example brought unto Chriſtianitie, are in the ancient Engliſh Annals, named, Bpitτar Peohτar, as one would ſay, Britan Picts.

The cauſe wherefore we draw not many proofes from the language, is this, for that of the Picts tongue, there can ſcarce one word bee gathered out of authors: yet it ſeemeth to bee the ſame that the Britiſh. Beda wrote, that the Romane wall made againſt the incurſions of the Picts, beganne in a place, which in the B Picts Language is called, Penuahel: and Pen-wall, among the Britans expreſly ſignifieth, The beginning or head of the wall. Moreover, thorowout all that tract of the Iland, which the Picts held longeſt (and that was the Eaſt part of Scotland) the names of moſt places doe ſavour of a Britiſh originall: as for example, Morria, Mœnia, for that they be countreys adjoyning to the ſea, comming of the Britiſh word Mor, that is, Sea. Aberden, Aberlothnet, Aberdore, Aberneith, that is, the mouth of Den, of Lothnet, of Dore and Neith, from the Britiſh word, Aber, which ſignifieth, the mouth of a river. Strathbogi, Strathdee, Strathearn, that is, The Dale or Vale of Bogi, Dee, and Earne, comming of Strath, which in the Britiſh tongue betokeneth, a Valley. Yea, and the chiefe ſeat of the Picts, doth acknowledge no other C originall than a Britiſh, I meane Edenburgh, which Ptolomee calleth, Caſtrum alatum, that is, the winged Caſtle. For Aden, in Britiſh is, a Wing. Neither wil I (by way of proofe) take hold of this argument, that ſome of the Britiſh petie Kings, were called Bridij, which is as much in the Britan language (as I have often ſaid) as Depaintea. Out of theſe premiſſes verily, we may without any abſurditie conclude, That the Picts Language, and the Britiſh differed not, and therfore the nations were not divers; howſoever Beda ſpeaketh of the Picts & Britans tongues, as if they were diſtinct one from the other; in which place, he may be thought to have meant their ſundrie Dialects.

Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould marvell, that the Picts wrought ſo much miſchiefe, and gave ſo many overthrowes unto their countrey-men the Bri- D tans, conſidering that we ſee at this day in Ireland, thoſe which are within the Engliſh pale, have none ſo deadly foes unto them, as their owne countrey-men, the wilde Iriſh. For like as we read in Paulus Diaconus, the Gothes, Hypogothes, Gepidians, and Vandales, varying their names onely, and ſpeaking one and the ſelfe-ſame language, encountred often times one another in open field with banner diſplayed; even ſo did the Picts and Britans, eſpecially when as theſe Britans were become the Romane allies. Theſe were the reaſons, ſuch as they be, that tooke hold of mee, and induced me in a maner, to thinke the Picts a remnant of the Britans: but perhaps the authoritie of Beda weigheth downe all this; and therefore, if ye thinke ſo good, E let the tradition of ſo reverend a man, grounded upon the relation of others, prevaile and take place before theſe conjectures.

Theſe Picts Ammianus Marcellinus divideth into Dicalidonians, and Vecturiones. I would rather read Deucalidonians, and doe thinke they were planted about the Weſterne coaſts of Scotland, where the Deucalidonian Sea breaketh in. And albeit I have been of opinion, that theſe were ſo called, as if a man would ſay, Blacke Caledonians, (for Dee in the Britiſh tongue, ſignifieth Blacke) like as the Iriſh now adaies terme the Scots of that tract, Daſ Allibawn, that is, Blacke Scots, and ſo the Britans called the rovers and pirats, which out of theſe parts did much ſcath at ſea, Ylu du, that is, the blacke armie: yet now, mee thinks wee may gheſſe, (for gheſſes are free) that F they tooke that name from their ſituation. For Deheu Caledorij, betokeneth the Caledonians dwelling on the right hand, that is, Weſtward; like as the other Picts, who kept on the left hand, that is, Eaſtward, which Ninnius calleth, the left ſide, were named Vecturiones, by a word haply drawen from Chwithic, which in the Britiſh tongue, ſignifieth, Left; and theſe ſome thinke are corruptly called in Ptolomee, Verturiones. An old Saxon fragment ſeemeth to give them the name of Peȝpeonn for ſo they terme an enemie-nation: whereas the ancient Angles, or Engliſh ſignifieth Hurt.

Their Language.

Dicaledonij. Vecturiones.

Digitized by Google

called the Picts themſelves, Pehits and Peohtas. And hereupon it is that we read everie where in Whitkindus, Pehiti, for Picti. A

The maners of theſe ancient and barbarous Britans, who afterwards came to bee named Picts, I have heretofore deſcribed out of Dio, and Herodian. It remaineth now, that I goe on with my webbe, and weave thus much to it: namely, that in the declining ſtate of the Empire, when the Romanes ſomewhat unadviſedly, and without good forecaſt enrolled cohorts of the Barbarians, certaine of theſe Picts, (when all was in quietneſſe and peace) were taken into the militarie ſervice of the Romans by Honorius, and therfore termed Honoriaci, who under that tyrant Conſtantine (elected in hope of ſo fortunate a name) having ſet open the fortified entries of the Pyrænean hils, let Barbarians into Spaine. In the end, when firſt by themſelves, and afterwards combining with the Scots their confederats, they had afflicted the Roman Province, they began, though late it were, to waxe civill. Thoſe of the South, were by Ninias, or Ninianus the Britan, a moſt holy man, converted to Chriſt, in the yeere of grace foure hundred and thirtie. But they of the North, who were ſecluded from the Southerne by a continuall ridge of high craggie mountaines, by Columbanus a Scot of Ireland, a Monke likewiſe of paſſing great holineſſe, in the yeere 565. who taught them, whence ſoever he learned it, to celebrate the feaſt of Eaſter, between the fourteenth day of the Moone in March, unto the twentieth, but alwaies upon the Lords day, as alſo to uſe another maner of tonſure, or ſhaving their heads, than the Romans did, to wit, repreſenting the imperfect forme of a Coronet. About theſe ceremonies hard hold there was, and eager diſputation for a long time in this Iland, untill that Naitanus a King of the Picts brought his owne ſubjects with much adoe unto the Romane obſervance. In which age very many Picts with great devotion, as the daies were then, frequented the Chapels and Shrines of Saints at Rome, and among others hee that is mentioned in the Antiquities of Saint Peters Church there, in theſe words [ASTERIVS COMES PICTORVM ET SYRA CVM SVIS VOTVM SOLVERE] that is, Aſterius a Count or Earle of the Picts and Syra with their family performed their vowes. At length, by the Scots that infeſted them out of Ireland, they were made to ſtoop, and after ſo daunted, as that about the yere of our Lord 740, being vanquiſhed in a moſt bloudy battell, they were either utterly extinct, or elſe by little and little, quite paſſed into their Scotiſh name, and nation. Which very ſame thing chanced to the moſt puiſſant Nation of the Gaules, who being ſubdued of the Frankes by little and little, were turned into their name, and called with them, Franci, that is, French.

The Maners of the Picts.

Blondus.

Honoriaci.

Bede.

Reckoning the ſaid day.*

 Aſterius Comes Pictorum.*

B C D

Whereas the Panegyrick author, giveth ſome inkling, that Britaine before Cæſars time uſed to skirmiſh with their enemies the Picts and Iriſh, halfe naked men, hee ſeemeth to ſpeake after the maner of the time wherein he lived: but ſurely in thoſe daies, there were none knowen in Britaine by the name of Picts.

Alſo, whereas Sidonius Apollinaris in his Panegyrick to his wives Father poetically powred out theſe verſes: E

——Victricia Cæſar
Signa Caledonios tranſvexit ad uſq; Britannos, Fuderit & quanquam Scotum & cum Saxone Pictum:
In traine of conqueſt Cæſar ſtill his enſignes even as farre
As Britaine Caledonian advanc'd: and though no barre
Staid him, but that the Scots and Picts, with Saxons he ſubdu'd, &c.

I cannot chuſe but with another Poet, crie out in this wiſe:

——Sit nulla fides augentibus omnia Muſis:
Theſe Poets love to over-reach, F
Beleeue them not, when ſo they teach.

For, Cæſar who is prodigall in his owne praiſe, would never have concealed theſe exploits, if hee had ever performed them. But theſe men ſeeme not unlike to thoſe good, honeſt, and learned writers in our age, who whiles they patch together an hiſtorie of Cæſar, write forſooth, how hee ſubdued the Franks in Gaule, and the Engliſh

Digitized by Google

A liſh men in Britaine, whereas in thoſe daies the names of Engliſh, and French were not ſo much as heard of, either in the one or the other countrey, as who, many ages after, came into theſe Regions.

That the Pictones of Gaule, and our Picts were both one Nation, I dare not with Ioannes Picardus avouch, ſeeing the name of the Pictones in Gaule was even in Cæſars time verie rife and much ſpoken of, and for that our Picts were never called Pictones: yet am I not ignorant, how in one onely place of the Panegyriſt among all the reſt, through the negligence of the copier, there was foiſted in Pictonum, in ſtead of Pictorum. Pictones.

B

SCOTI.

AMong the people of Britaine, after Picts, the SCOTISH nation by good right challenge the next place: concerning whom, before I ſpeak ought, for feare leſt evill willers and frowardly peeviſh, ſhould calumnioufly miſconſtrue thoſe allegations, which I, ſimply, ingenuouſly, and in all honeſt meaning, ſhall heere cite out of ancient writers as touching Scots, I muſt certifie the Reader before hand, that C everie particular hath reference to the old, true, and naturall Scots onely: whoſe of-ſpring are thoſe Scots ſpeaking Iriſh, which inhabite all the Weſt part of the kingdome of Scotland, now ſo called, and the Ilands adjoyning thereto, and who now adaies be termed High-land men. For, the reſt which are of civill behaviour, and bee ſeated in the Eaſt part therof, albeit they beare now the name of Scotiſh-men, yet are they nothing leſſe than Scots, but deſcended from the very ſame Germane originall, that we Engliſh men are. And this, neither can they chuſe but confeſſe, nor we but acknowledge, being as they are, termed by thoſe abovеſaid, High-land men, Saſſones, as well as we; and uſing as they doe the ſame language with us, to wit, the Engliſh-Saxon, different onely in Dialect, a moſt aſſured argument of one and the ſame oriD ginall. In which regard, ſo farre am I from working any diſcredit unto them, that I have rather reſpectively loved them alwaies, as of the ſame bloud and ſtocke, yea and honoured them too, even when the Kingdomes were divided: but now much more, ſince it hath pleaſed our almightie, and moſt mercifull God, that wee growe united in one bodie, under one moſt Sacred head of the Empire, to the joy, happineſſe, welfare, and ſafetie, of both Nations, which I heartily wiſh and pray for.

The beginning and Etymologie of the Scotiſh Nation, like as of other neighbor nations round about, are ſo full of obſcuritie, and lie over-ſpred under the miſt of darkeneſſe, in ſuch ſort, that even Buchanan himſelfe, though otherwiſe a man of a verie deepe inſight, either hath ſeene little therein, or ſeene to himſelfe alone: for E in this point he hath come ſhort of all mens expectation. Wherupon I have forborne a long time to take this enterprize in hand, leſt with others in admiring fables, I ſhould full ſweetly pleaſe my ſelfe, and fall into folly. For, a man may with as great probability derive the Scots pedigree from the Gods, as from Scota that ſuppoſed and counterfeit daughter of the Ægyptian King Pharao, wedded (forſooth) unto Gaithelus, the ſonne of Cecrops founder of Athens. But, as this conceit ariſing from the unskilfulneſſe of Antiquitie, is of the better ſort of ingenuous Scots rejected: ſo, that other opinion of later daies, drawen without all ſenſe from a Greeke fountaine, that Scots ſhould be ſo called, as it were, σκότοι, that is, Obſcure, I vtterly diſallow and condemne, as a device of envious perſons, to the ſlanderous reproch of a famous and F valiant Nation. Neither doe all men like the derivation of our * Florilegus, namely, that Scots were ſo called, becauſe they came of a confuſed migle-mangle of divers nations: And yet I cannot but marvell, whence Iſidorus had this: The Scots (ſaith he) take their name in their owne proper tongue of their painted bodies, for that they are marked with ſharpe yron pricks, and inke, and ſo receive the print of ſundry ſhapes. Which alſo Rabanus Maurus, in the very ſame words (doubtleſſe out of him) doth teſtifie

Scota, King Pharaoes daughter.

* Flowergatherer, the name of an Hiſtorie. Lib. 9. cap. 2.

in

in his Geographie to Ludovicus Pius the Emperour, which is to be seene in the Libra- A rie of Trinitie Colledge in Oxford.

But seeing that Scotland it selfe hath of her owne people such as might verie well fetch their beginning from the inmost records of Antiquitie, and thereby best of all advance the glorie of their Countrey, in case they would wholly set their minds, and bestow their carefull diligence for a time in this argument; I will point only with my finger to the fountaines, from whence haply they may draw the truth; and lay before them certaine observations, which I would wish them to marke, and consider more diligently: for, my selfe will in this matter play the Scepticke, and affirme nothing. And first, touching their originall; and then, of the place from whence they remoo- B ved, and came over into Ireland. For, certainely knowen it is, that out of Ireland, an Ile inhabited in old time by Britans, as shall in due place be prooved, they passed into Britain, and what time as they were first known unto writers by this name, seated they were in Ireland. For, Claudian the Poet hath written of their irruptions into Britaine, in these verses:

Ireland the native Countrey of the Scots.

——Totam cum Scotus Hibernem
Movit, & infesto spumavit remige Thetis:
What time the Scots all Ireland stir'd offensive armes to take,
And with maine stroke of enemies ores, the sea much fome did make.

Also in another place; C

Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Hiberne:
And frozen Ireland, heapes of Scots bewail'd with many a teare.

Orosius likewise writeth thus; Ireland is peopled with Scotish Nations. Gildas calleth Scots, Irish Spoilers. And Beda; The Scots that inhabite Ireland, an Isle next unto Britaine: as also elsewhere. Yea, and in the daies of Charles the Great, Eginhardus in expresse words, calleth Ireland, The Isle of Scots. Moreover, Giraldus Cambrensis; That the Scotish nation (saith he) is descended out of Ireland, the affinitie as well of their Language, as of their apparell, of their weapons also, and of their maners even to this day doe sufficiently proove. But now to come unto the points which I would have the Scots thorowly to weigh. D

For as much as they which are right and naturall Scots, acknowledge not this name of Scots, but otherwise call themselves Gaoithel, Gael, and Albin; seeing also, that verie many people have other names given unto them by their neighbours, than they use themselves, whereby often times there is a secret light given unto nations of their descent: as for example; the Inhabitants of the lower Pannonia, who terme themselves Magier, are in Dutch named Hungari, for that they came first of the Huns: they that border upon the Forrest Hercynia, among themselves are called Czechi, but by o- *Burbonnois.
thers Bohemi, because they descended from the * Boij in Gaule: the Inhabitants of Africke, who having also a peculiar name among themselves, are by the Spaniards termed Alarbes, for that they be Arabians: the Irish, who call themselves Erinach, are E
* Welchmen. by our * Britans named Gwidhil: considering also, that as well those Irish, and these * Welchmen. our * Britans, gave no other name to us English men, than Saxons, because wee are descended from the Saxons; I would have the learned Scotish men first to consider, whether they might not bee so called of their neighbours, as one would say, Scythæ. For, even as the Flemings and other Netherlanders, expresse by this one word, Scutten, both the Scythians and Scots; so it hath been observed out of our British writers, that they named both Scythians and Scots, Y-Scot. Ninnius also expressly calleth the Britans that inhabite Ireland, Scythians: and the narrow sea, thorow which they pas- *Vallis Scythica.
sed over out of Ireland into Britaine, Gildas nameth, Vallem Scythicam, that is, The Scythian Vale. For so hath the copie printed in Paris, where others without all sense F read, Stythicam Vallem. Moreover, King Alfred, who seven hundred yeeres past translated the Historie of Orosius into the English-Saxon tongue, turned [Scotos] into [Scyttan] and our Countrey-men, who dwell next to Scotland, use to call them, not *In Hypodigmate.
by the name of Scots, but Scyttes, and Scettes. For, like as (Walsingham is mine author) the same people be called Getæ, Getici, Gothi, Gothici; so, from one and the same originall,

Digitized by Google

A originall, Scythæ, Scitici, Scoti, Scotici, take their names.

But whether this name were impoſed upon this nation by their neighbours, in regard of Scythian maners, or becauſe they came out of Scythia, let them here adviſe well upon it. Surely, both * Diodorus Siculus, and alſo * Strabo, compare the first Britans inhabiting Ireland, (which is the native countrey indeed of the wild Iriſh, and thoſe that be right Scots) with the Scythians for their ſavage nature. Beſides, they drinke bloud out of the wounds of men ſlaine: they eſtabliſh leagues among themſelves, by drinking one anothers bloud; and ſuppoſe, that the greater number of ſlaughters they commit, the more honour they winne: and ſo did the Scythians
B in old time. To this we may adde, that theſe [wild] Scots, like as the Scythians, had for their principall weapons, bowes and arrowes. For, Orpheus termeth Scythians, τοξοφόρους, even as Aelianus, and Iulius Pollux, Sagittarios, that is, Archers. And learned men there be, that thinke hereupon both nations had this name given unto them, for their skill in ſhooting. Neither may this ſeeme ſtrange, that divers nations carried the ſame names, by occaſion of the ſame maners: as they who have travailed all over the Weſt Indies, doe write, that all ſtrange, and hardie men that doe ſo much miſchiefe with bow and arrowes thorowout all India, and the Iles thereof; are by one name called Caribes, although they be of divers nations.

* Lib. 6.
* Lib. 4.

Caribes.
Benzo. lib. 2.

Now, that theſe Scots came out of Scythia, the Iriſh Hiſtoriographers themC ſelves doe report: For Nemethus the Scythian, and long after him, Dela, one of Nemethus his progenie, that is, of the Scythian ſtocke, they reckon among the firſt Inhabitants of Ireland. Ninnius likewiſe a Diſciple of Eluodugus, hath plainly written thus: In the fourth age of the world (that ſpace I meane which was betweene the building of Salomons Temple, and the captivitie of Babylon) the Scythians poſſeſſed themſelves of Ireland. And hereto accordeth the authoritie of latter writers, to wit, of Ciſnerus in his preface to Crantzius; and of Reinerus Reineccius, who writeth thus: There remaineth yet the nation of the Scots in Britaine, ſprung from the Scythians, &c. And yet I verily doubt, although the Getæ were a Scythicke nation, whether the Poet Propertius meaneth thoſe Iriſh of ours, in writing thus:

Tom. 2. pag. 376.

D Hiberniq; Getæ, Pictoq; Britannia curru.

Both Iriſh Getes and Britaine with his painted chariot.

But the Scots ſhould loſe part of their honor and dignity, unleſſe they bee brought out of Spaine into Ireland. For, this both they themſelves, and their Hiſtoriographers labour to proove with all their might and maine; and good reaſon, (I aſſure you) have they ſo to doe. Unleſſe therefore wee finde Scythians in Spaine, all our labour is loſt. And that Scythians have been in Spaine (to ſay nothing of a promontorie or point among the Cantabri, called Scythicum next unto Ireland, and how that Strabo writeth, that the * Cantabri and Scythians ſorted well together in their deE portment) Silius Italicus a Spaniard borne, doth moſt plainely declare: for by theſe verſes he ſheweth, that the Concani, a nation of Cantabria, were begotten of the Maſſageta, that is, Scythians.

Whence the Scots came into Ireland.

Scythians in Spaine.

* Thoſe of Biſcay, and thereabout.

Concani.

Et quæ Maſſagetem monſtrans feritate parentem, Cornipedis fuſâ ſatiaris Concane venâ.

Lib. 3.

And ye your Parents Maſſagets in fierceneſſe that doe ſhow, Hight Concani, drinke horſes blood, as it from veine doth flow.

And after ſome few verſes betweene, he prooveth, that the * Sarmatæ, whom all men confeſſe to have been Scythians, built the Citie Suſana in Spaine, whiles hee ſingeth in this note:

* Ruſsians, and Tartarians.

Sarmaticas attollens Suſana muros:

* Capanille.

F Suſana, with high Sarmatian wals.

Luceni.

Of theſe Sarmatians or Scythians, the Luceni, whom Oroſius placeth in Ireland, ſeem to be deſcended (conſidering that the Spaniards themſelves put Suſana among the *Lucenſians of Spaine) like as of thoſe Concani, the Gangani of Ireland. For the Lucenſij and Concani in Cantabria, were neighbour nations, even as the Luceni and Gangani in that coaſt of Ireland oppoſite to Spaine. Now if any man demaund of

* Thoſe about Luca.

me,

Germans in Spaine.

me, what those Scythians were which came into Spaine. Verily I know not, unlesse a man would thinke them to have been Germans: And I could wish that the Scots themselves would enter into a more serious and deepe consideration of this point. But, that the Germans long agoe entred into Spaine; beside Plinie, who calleth the Oretani in Spaine, Germans, Seneca which was a Spaniard borne will enforme us. The mountaine Pyrenæus (saith he) stopped not the passage of the Germans; the levitie of men made shift to enter thorow places scant passable, and unknowen. And that the Germans were called Scythians, wee gather not onely out of Ephorus and Strabo, who termed all the nations in the North, Scythians, but also out of Plinie. The name of Scythians (quoth he) extendeth it selfe farre and wide every way, even to the Sarmatians and Germans. Aventinus also witnesseth, that Germans were by the Hungarians called Scythæ and Scythulæ. And to derive descent from a Scythian stock, cannot be thought any waies dishonourable, seeing that the Scythians, as they are most ancient, so they have been the Conquerours of most Nations, themselves alwaies invincible, and never subject to the Empire of others. Neither must we forget in this place, that the Cauci and Menapij, ranged among the most famous Nations of Germanie, are by Ptolomee placed in Ireland under the same names, and in the verie same vicinity one to the other: so that by all likelihood, they derived from the same Germans, both their name, and also their descent.

De Consolatione ad Albinum lib. 4. cap. 12.

A

B

If the Scots have not their originall from these, I would they pondered with themselves, whether they were not of those Barbarians, who (as it is recorded in King Alphonsus his Chronicles) were by Constantine the Great, driven out of Gallæcia in Spaine: for out of those parts they will needs have it, that they came into Ireland. If they demaund, who those Barbarians were? I doubt not but they will bee of the same mind with me, that they were Germans. For during the raigne of Gallienus the Emperour, the Germans dwelling in the farthest parts (saith Orosius) of Germanie, spoiled and held Spaine in subjection: and who should those remote Germans bee, unlesse they were meere Scythians? but Aurelius Victor, whom Andrew Schot hath published, calleth those Germans, * Frankes. But seeing those Frankes and Germanes, inhabiting the farthest parts of Germanie, putting to sea from thence, sailed in their heat and furie farre into the Ocean, and as Nazarius saith unto Constantine, greatly annoied, and did much harme by these our seas, even to the Spanish coasts also, who will beleeve that they preferred the drie and barrein soile of Biscay, before Ireland, an Ile most fruitful, and fitly sited to endammage Spain? Nay rather, as in the time of Charles the Great, and afterwards, the Norvegians out of Scandia, did often attempt and invade Ireland, yea, and seated themselves there: so we may with good probability conjecture, that the Franks did the same before; and that they passed from hence into Spain; and after they were driven out thence by Constantius the Great, retired backe againe into Ireland. Credible likewise it is, that more of them afterwards flocked thither, what time as the Vandals and Gothes depopulated Spain, and as barbarous nations, warred among themselves, and made havock of all: as also, when that storme of Saracens lay sore upon the Spaniards, and drave a great number of them into Gallitia and Biscay. But I leave these overtures unto others for to prie further into: let it be sufficient for me, that I have been but willing only to remove this cloud out of the way.

Vassæus.

* Or Frankners.

Orosius lib. 7.

C

D

E

But I beseech the learned Scots in this place to consider here, how it commeth to passe, that the Irish being the ancient Forefathers and Progenitors of the Scots, yea, and the Scots themselves, beare them highly of this, that they be called Gail and Gaiothel, and their Language Gaiothlas, as also why they named that part of Britaine, which they first possessed, Argathel? Whence can they say, that these names sprang? From the Gallæci in Spaine, from whom very many, no doubt, flitted over into Ireland; and whose beginning is fetched from the Gallatæ or Galles? or from the Goths, as some latter Writers are of opinion, who would have this word Gaiothel to proceed from the Gothes, as likely as Cathalonia did in Spaine? Here should they have drawn arguments from the affinitie, between the Gothicke Language, and the Irish: which notwithstanding,

F

Digitized by Google

A notwithstanding, so farre as ever I could find, hath no resemblance at all of any other tongues in all Europe, save onely of the * Welch and Dutch. How truely Henrie Huntingdon writeth; The Scots came in the fourth age of the world out of Spaine into Ireland: and part of them who still remained there, useth as yet the same Language, and are called Navarrians: how truly (I say) he hath delivered this, let others speake. And here I omit David Chambres the Scotish-man, who hath beene enformed by certaine Iesuites, that the Scotish tongue is used in East India. I am afraid lest that countrey so farre remote as it is, made the credulous man bold, not to make a lie, but to tell a lie.

B But if arguments in this cafe may bee taken from the habite and apparell of the people, surely the array and clothing of the wild Scots at this day, is all one with that of the Gothes in times past; as we may by and by perceive out of Sidonius Apollinaris, who in describing a Goth, portraieth & depainteth unto us a wild Scot, as right as may be. They are (saith he) of a flaming deepe yellow, died with saffron; they buckle upon their feet a paire of Broges made of raw and untanned leather up to their ankles; their knees, thighes, and calves of their legs are all bare; their garments high in the necke, straight made and of sundry colours, comming skarce downe to their hammes; the sleeves cover the upper points of their armes and no more; their souldiers coats of colour greene, edged with a red fringe; their belts hanging downe from the shoulder; the lappets of their eares hidden

C *under the curled * glibbes and lockes of haire lying all over them*, (For so a man may very rightly call, the manifold branched, and parted twists of haire, which * Scots and Irish weare) they use also hooked Spares, which Gildas termeth, Vncinata tela, and axes to fling from them. They wore likewise strait bodied coats (as saith Porphyrio) fitted close to their breasts, without girdles. If this be not for all the world the very right apparell of the wild Irish-Scots, let themselves be Iudges. I would withall, they did consider these words of Giraldus Cambrensis, in his first booke of The Institution of a Prince. When Maximus (saith he) was passed out of Britaine into Gaule, with the whole power of men, forces, and armour, that the Iland could make, and all to seize into his hands the Empire, Gratian and Valentinian brethren, and partners in the Empire, shipped over these

D Gothes, (a Nation hardy and valiant in feats of armes, being also either confederate with them, or subiect and obliged unto them for benefits, which they had received of the Emperours) from the borders of Scythia, into the North parts of Britaine, for to annoy the Britans, and cause the said usurper to returne backe with his forces. But they, because they were exceeding puissant, (such was the inbred valour and warlike nature of the Gothes,) and withall finding the Iland destitute both of men and other meanes to defend it, becoming of pirats and rovers neighbour-dwellers, planted themselves in the saide Northerne parts, and held by strong hand no small Provinces thereof, which they usurped as their owne. Now, who these Gothes were, let others shew, and peradventure out of Procopius, they may find some light; in whom we read, That Belisarius, when the Goths

E expostulated with him, for that he had granted Sicilie to the Romanes, answereth in these words: And we likewise permit the Gothes to have unto themselves Britaine a farre better countrey than Sicilie, and in ancient times subiect to the Romane Empire: For, meet it is, that they who first have bestowed benefits, should either reape condigne thanks againe, or receive good turnes reciprocally. To this also may seeme to bee referred, that the Scots write, How Fergusius the Scot accompanied Alaricke the Goth in the sacking of Rome: that Irenicus likewise reporteth, How Genfricke King of the Vandals came over unto Scotland and Britaine: as also, that which Cambrensis delivereth unto us, (but whence himselfe had it, I know not) namely, how the Gaideli, that is to say, the Scots, drew both their descent, and also their name from the Vandals, who were all

F one with the Gothes, as Paulus Diaconus sheweth. Neither can it be any disparagement at all to the name and nation of the Scots, to acknowledge themselves the offspring of the Gothes, seeing that the most puissant Kings of Spaine, thinke it an honour to fetch their pedigree from hence; and the noblest houses in all Italie, either draw indeed, or else falsifie their lineall descent from the Gothes. The Emperor himselfe Charles the fifth, would often times give out, and that in good earnest; that all the

* Flagella crinium.
* That is, the Redshanks.
* Upon Horace, De arte Poetica.

Lib. 2 de bello Gothorum.

Lib. 6. cap. 25.

Digitized by Google

the Nobilitie of Europe came out of Scandia, and from the ſtocke of the Gothes. But A theſe reaſons are not of ſuch credit and importance with mee, as that I dare thereupon reſolve, that the Scots are ſprung and iſſued from the Gothes.

Diodorus Siculus. Now, to end all in a word, I would have the learned Scots to conſider ſeriouſly, whether they were of thoſe moſt ancient Britans inhabitants of Ireland (For, certain it is that Britans in times paſt inhabited Ireland) and called Scythæ or Scoti, becauſe they ſuted ſo well with Scythians in maners: or Scythians indeed, ſuch as came out of Scandia or Scythia, unto whom the Gallæci, Franci, or Germanes driven out of Spaine, and Gothes or Vandals came afterwards, what time as Spaine with moſt hot and bloody wars was all in combuſtion: or rather a miſhmaſh of ſundry nations B which conflowed into Ireland, and thereupon gat that name among their neighbors. The language, ſaith Giraldus, of the Iriſh is called Gaidelach, as one would ſay, gathered out of all tongues. And Florilegus (whenceſoever he gathered it); From Picts and Iriſh, quoth he, the Scots took their beginning, as people compounded of divers nations: For that is called Scot, which from ſundrie things groweth into one heape. Like as An. Dom. 77. Scot.
Almans. Agath. lib. 1. the Almanes (by the teſtimony of Aſinius Quadratus) carried that name, becauſe they came of a commixture of divers men. Neither may any man thinke it ſtrange, that ſo many nations in old time flowed into Ireland, conſidering the ſite of that Iland in the very midſt between Britain and Spaine, and lying open ſo convenientlie upon the French ſea: ſeeing alſo it appeareth moſt certainly upon record, in the beſt C approoved Annals, that within theſe eight hundred yeeres laſt paſſed the Norwegians and Ouſtmans, that is, Eaſterlings out of Germany, the Engliſhmen, Welchmen, and Scots out of Britain, planted themſelves ſurely there. Theſe are the points, I ſay, which I would wiſh the Scotiſh men in this matter diligently to thinke upon. But let them remember in the meane time, that I have affirmed nothing, but onely given an inkling of certain things, which may ſeeme in ſome ſort materiall and to make for the purpoſe. Whence, if the originall of the Scots ſhall receive no light, let them ſeeke elſwhere: For, I my ſelfe in this am ſtarke blind, and have in vain ſearched and hunted after the truth, that flieth ſtill from me; howbeit with this conſiderate and circumſpect care, that I have not, I hope, given the leaſt offence to any whomſo- D ever.

When the Scots came into Britaine. Touching the time when the name of Scots became firſt famous, there is ſome queſtion; and Buchanan a right good Poet, hath herein commenſed an action againſt Humfrie Lhuid as good an Antiquarie: Becauſe the ſaid Lhuid averreth, that the name of Scots can no where be picked out of Authors before the time of Conſtantine the great; he fals upon the man, is ready to take him by the throat, and with two arguments goeth about to give him the deadly ſtab; the one out of the Panegyriſt, the other grounded upon a bare coniecture. Becauſe we find in the old Panegyriſt, that Britain in Cæſars time was wont to bee troubled with Iriſh enemies; therefore, the Scots as then were ſeated in Britain: but no man before him ever ſaid, that ſo E much as thoſe Iriſh had then any ſetled place, much leſſe, that they were Scots. No doubt, the Panegyriſt, after the uſuall and received maner of writers, ſpake according to his own times and not unto Cæſars. And as for the coniecture, it is none of his own, but the coniecture of that moſt learned Ioſeph Scaliger. For he in his notes upon Propertius, whiles he was correcting (by the way) of that verſe out of Seneca his enterlude;

The Britans thoſe that ſeated are beyond the known ſea-coaſt
And Brigants with blew painted ſhields, he forced with his hoaſt;
To yeeld their necks in Romane chaines as captives to be led,
And even the Ocean this new powre of Roman ax to dread. F

Ille Britannos Vltra noti Littora Ponti
Et cæruleos Scuta Brigantes Dare Romuleis
Colla Catenis Inſsit, &c.

readeth Scoto-Brigantes, and ſtraightwaies exclaimeth, that the Scots are now beholden unto him for their originall. But to this his opinion I cannot yeeld aſſent, though it

Digitized by Google

A it be somewhat against my will; who in many things have alwaies for his learning honored and admired the man. For, this coniecture ariseth not from the divers readings in books, but out of his own braine: and the sense may beare, either [Cæruleos Scuta Brigantes] as it is in all books, or [Cæruleos cute Brigantes] that is, the Brigantes with blue died skins, as that most learned Hadrian Iunius readeth it. But Buchanan, who had rather disport himselfe sweetly in his own conceit and the witty invention of one other, than to iudge aright with the usuall and approoved reading of that place, giveth a marvellous applause to this coniecture. First, because authors do not record that the Britans painted their shields then, for that Seneca called them Scoto-
B Brigantes for difference sake, to distinguish them from the Brigantes of Spaine and Ireland: Last of all, because in these verses he makes a distinction between the Britans and Brigantes, as though they were divers nations. But if one would narrowlie sift and examine these matters what letteth but that they might paint their shields as well as themselves and their chariots? Why should hee for distinction sake, coine this new word, Scoto-Brigantes? when he calleth them blew, and saith they were subdued by Claudius, doth he not sufficiently distinguish them from the other Brigantes? But that observation of his touching Britans and Brigantes, as if they were divers nations, doth scarse savour of a Poets head, which could not be ignorant of that poeticall figure, and maner of speaking, wherein a part is used for the whole, and contra-
C riwise. Wherefore, seeing these things make nothing to his cause, I will second Buchanan by way, as it were, of a fresh supply, with the aid of Egesippus, (who is commonly reputed a verie ancient writer:) For, thus writeth he, where he treateth of the Romans power: *They make*Scotland to quake, which is beholden to no land for any thing; before them, Saxony trembleth, that for Marishes is inaccessible.* But heare you me, this author shal stand behind in the rereward, for he lived after Constantines daies, as may be gathered out of his owne writings: neither can it bee prooved out of him, that the Scots dwelt in Britain, no more than out of that verse of Sidonius which erewhile I alleaged. Yea mary, but there is another reason of more weight and moment indeed,
D which M. Iohn Crag, a right famous and learned man, found by most exquisit and curious search in Ioseph Ben-Gorion, writing of the destruction of Ierusalem, to wit, that in an Hebrew copie, the Scots are expresly named, where Munster in his Latine translation hath untruely put downe Britans for Scots. But in what age that Ben-Gorion lived, I cannot find for certaine: sure I am, that he was after Flavius Iosephus, because he maketh mention of the Franks, whose name long after began to be knowen.

But surely, if I may be so bold as to interpose my selfe in this question, among so great Scholars: so farre as I have beene able to observe, the first time that ever the Scotish nation became named in authors, was whiles Aurelianus was Emperour. For Porphyrie, who then wrote against the Christians, as *Saint Ierome informeth
E us, mentioned them in these words: Neither Britaine, a fertile Province of tyrants, nor the Scotish nations, together with the barbarous people round about, as farre as to the Ocean, had any knowledge of Moses and the Prophets. At which time verily, or somewhat before, those that are well seene in Antiquities have noted, that the names of the most potent nations of French and Almanes, were not heard of before the time of Gallienus the Emperour.

It is no assured truth therefore, which some write, That the name and Kingdome of the Scots flourished in Britaine many hundred yeeres before the birth of Christ. But hearken to Girald, who will tell you the just time: When Great O-Nel (saith hee) held the Monarchie of Ireland, six sonnes of Mured King of Vlster, seized upon the North parts of Britaine. Hereupon from them was there a nation propagated, which by a peculiar
F name called, Scotica, that is, Scotish, inhabiteth that part even to this day. And that this befel at the verie time when the Roman Empire in everie mans sight grew to decay, it is collected thus. Whiles Lagerius the sonne of that O-Nell raigned over the Irish, Patrick (the Apostle of the Irish-men) came into Ireland, much about the yeere after Christs nativitie 430. So as it may seeme, this hapned neere the daies of Honorius

As also for their Etymologie in his notes upon Eusebius Chronology, See them.

* That is, Ireland. See in Ireland and before. Lib. 5. cap. 15.

* Unto Ctesiphon against Pelagians.

Digitized by Google

*Emperour.

* Auguſtus. For then, whereas before time, ranging up and downe without any certaine place of abode (as Ammianus doth report) they had long annoyed Britaine and the places appointed for the Marches, they ſeeme to have ſet their footing in Britaine. But they themſelves will have it thus, that they did but returne then out of Ireland, whither they had retired before, what time they were put to flight by the Britans, and driven away: and ſo they underſtand that place out of Gildas, of this verie time; The Iriſh ſpoilers returne home, minding ſhortly to come back again. And much about this time, ſome think that Reuda, (whom Bede mentioneth) either by force and arms, or through favour planted himſelfe in this Iland, upon an arme of the river Cluid northward. And of this captaine Reuda (ſaith he) the Dalreudini, even to this day take their name. For, in their tongue, Dal, ſignifieth, a part: and others thinke, that from this Reuda it was, that we called the Iriſh-Scots, Redſhanks. It is thought alſo, that the ſame Simon Brech, whom the Scots avouch to bee the founder of their nation, flouriſhed in theſe daies. Sinbrech in truth was the name of the man, which is as much to ſay, as Sin, with the freckled face, as wee read in Fordon. And peradventure the ſame Brech he was, who about the time of S. Patrick, together with Thuibai, Mac-lei, and Auſpac, Scots, infeſted Britaine, as wee read in the life of Saint Carantoc.

Beda. lib. 1. ca. 1.

Alban and Albin.

But why the High-land Scots living in Britaine, call that countrey which they inhabite, Alban and Albin, & the Iriſh name it Allabany, were a queſtion for an ingenuous and liberall wit to travell in: as namely, whether this word Allabany, may not have in it ſome token of the ancient Albion: or whether it came of whiteneſſe, which they call Ban, and therefore may import as much in Scotiſh, as Ellan-Ban, that is, a white Iland: or whether it bee derived of Ireland, which the Iriſh Poets name Banne? ſo that Allabany, may ſound as much, as another Ireland, or a ſecond Ireland. For, Hiſtoriographers were wont to call Ireland, Scotland the greater, and the Kingdome of the Scots in Britaine, Scotland the leſſer. Moreover, ſeeing theſe Scots in their own language terme themſelves Albin, wherupon Blondus called the Scots, Albienſes, or Albinenſes, and Buchanan, Albini, let Criticks conſider, whether that in Saint Ierome, where he inueigheth againſt a certaine Pelagian, a Scot borne, it ſhould not be read, Albinum for Alpinum, when hee taketh him up in theſe termes; The great and corpulent Alpine dog; and who is able to doe more harme with his heeles, than his teeth: for hee hath his of-ſpring of the Scotiſh nation, neere neighbours to the Britans: of whom alſo in another place, he ſaid, that he was fulfatned with Scotiſh pottage and breweſſe. Of Alpine dogs, I never remember that I have read ought; but that Scotiſh dogs were in much requeſt at Rome in thoſe daies, Symmachus ſheweth unto us, Seven Scotiſh Dogs there were (ſaith he) the day going before the Games, which in Rome they wondered at ſo, as they thought they were brought thither in yron-grated Cages.

Albin. Albinus.

The Albine Dogge.

But after that the Scots were come into Britaine, and had joyned themſelves unto the Picts, albeit they never ceaſed to vexe the Britans with skirmiſhes and in-roades, yet grew not they preſently up to any great ſtate, but kept a long time in that corner, where they firſt arrived, not daring (as Beda writeth) for the ſpace of one hundred and ſeven and twentie yeeres to come forth into the field, againſt the Princes of Northumberland; untill at one and the ſame time, they had made ſuch a ſlaughter of the Picts, that few or none of them were left alive: and withall the Kingdome of Northumberland, what with civill diſſenſions and invaſions of the Danes, ſore ſhaken and weakned, fell at once to the ground. For then, all the Northerne tract of Britaine, became ſubject to them, and tooke their name, together with that hithermore countrey on this ſide Cluid, and Edenburgh Frith. For, that it alſo was a parcell of the Kingdome of Northumberland, and poſſeſſed by the Engliſh-Saxons, no man gain-ſaieth: and hereof it is, that all they which inhabite the Eaſt part of Scotland, and be called Lowland men, as one would ſay, of the Lower-countrey, are the very of-ſpring of the Engliſh-Saxons, and doe ſpeake Engliſh. But they that dwell in the Weſt coaſt, named Highland men, as it were, of the upper countrey, be meere Scots, and ſpeake Iriſh, as I have ſaid before: and ſo none are deadly enemies, as they be vn-

Lib. 1. cap. ult.

Bede.

to

Digitized by Google

A unto the Lowland men, which use the English tongue as we doe.

Ammianus Marcellinus writeth, that together with the Scots, ATTACOTTI, a warlike people, did much mischiefe unto Britaine; and those Humfrey Lhuid gheſseth, (how truely I know not) to have been also of the Scotish nation. Saint Ierome telleth us plainely, that they were a Britiſh people. For he writeth, that when he was a very youth, (while Iulian as it seemeth was Emperour) he saw in Gaule the Attacots, a Britiſh nation, feed of mans fleſh, who when they found in the Forrests heards of ſwine, ſlockes of neat and other cattell, were wont to cut off the buttockes of their heard-men, and keepers, the dugs also and paps of the women, and account the ſame the onely dainties in the world. For, ſo according to the true manuſcript copies we are to read in this place, B Attacotti [and not Scoti with Eraſmus] who acknowledgeth this text to be corrupted: Although I muſt needs confeſſe, that in one Manuſcript we read Attigotti, in another Catacotti, and in a third Cattiti. Neither can this paſſage bee any waies underſtood as the vulgar ſort take it, of the Scots: conſidering that Saint Ierome treating there of the ſundry orders and maners of divers nations, beginneth the next ſentence following in this wiſe: The Nation of the Scots hath no proper wives of their owne, &c. In another place alſo, where Saint Ierome maketh mention of the Attacotti, Eraſmus putteth downe for them, Aſcoti. Theſe Attacotti, as appeareth by the booke called Notitia, ſerved under the Romanes in their warres, in the very decaying and declining ſtate of their Empire. For, reckoned there are among the Palatine aids within Gaul, C Attecotti Iuniores Gallicani, and Attecotti Honoriani Seniores: alſo, within Italie, Attecotti Honoriani Iuniores. By this addition Honoriani, they ſeeme to be of the number of thoſe Barbarians, whom Honorius the Emperour entertained, and to no ſmall dammage of the Empire enrolled as ſouldiers to ſerve in his warres.

Attacotti.

Lib. 2. contra Iovianum.

Among theſe nations alſo, which made rodes and invaſions into Britain, Iohn Caius, a man much exerciſed with cares and endevours of the beſt kind, and one who hath paſſing well deſerved of our Common-wealth of learning, reckoneth the * Ambrones, for that he red in Gildas, where he writeth of Picts & Scots, thus: Thoſe former „ enemies, like Ambrones, Wolves, even enraged for extreame hunger, with dry jawes leaping „ D over the ſheepfold whiles the ſhepheard is out of the way, being carried with the wings of ores „ and armes of rowers, ſet forward alſo with ſailes helped with gales of winds, breake thorow „ the bounds, killing and ſlaying all where they come. This good meaning old man thought of that which hee had read in Feſtus, namely, that the Ambrones, together with the Cimbri, flocked by numbers into Italie: and being buſied about another matter, it was quite out of his head, that [Ambro] as Iſidorus noteth, doth ſignifie, a Devourer. Neither doth Gildas uſe that word in any other ſenſe, nor Geffrey of Monmouth, who called the Saxons alſo, Ambrones: nor any other Ambrones than theſe, could my ſelfe hitherto ever find in ancient Writers, to have invaded Britaine.

* Ambrones.

E

ENGLISH-SAXONS.

WHen as now the Romane Empire under Valentinian the younger did more than decline, and Britain being exhauſt through ſo many levies of all able men, and abandoned of the Romane gariſons, could no longer withſtand the force of Scots and Picts; Vortigern, whom the Britans had made their Soveraigne and chiefe Governour, or who (as others think) had uſurped the Monarchie, to the end that he might eſtabliſh his imperiall rule, and F recover the State falling to ruine: (much awed hee was, ſaith Ninnius, by the Picts and Scots, he ſtood in feare of the Romanes forces, and was afraid of Aurelius Ambroſius) ſent for the Saxons out of Germanie to aide him: who forthwith under the conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, with their Ciules (for ſo they called their Flat-boats or Pinnaces) arrive in Britaine, and after they had in one or two battels gotten the victorie againſt the Picts and Scots, became verie much renowned: and ſeeing the Anglo-Saxons.

Who alſo is called Guortigern.

ſee Bede's Eccleſ. Hiſtory, lib. 1. c. 15. Danet's Hiſt. p. 6.

Digitized by Google

Britans ſtil relying upon their manhood & courage, they ſend for greater forces out of A Germany, which ſhould keep watch and ward upon the borders, and annoy the enemies by land & ſea. Guortigern (ſaith Ninnius) by the advice of Hengiſt, ſent for Octha and Ebiſſa to come and aid him: who being embarked in 40. Cyules or Pinnaces, and ſailing a-
* Orkney Iſles. *bout the Picts coaſts waſted the iſles called * Orcades, yea and got many Iſles and Countreys*
* Mare Freſticum. *beyond the * Frith, as farre as to the confines of the Picts.* But at length, after they had begun to fall in love with the Lands, the civill faſhions, and riches of Britaine, preſu-ming upon the weaknes of the Inhabitants, & making the default of pay, and want of victuals their quarrell, they entred into league with the Picts, and raiſed a moſt bloodie and mortall warre againſt the Britans, who had given them entertainment: they B kill and ſlay them in every place being put in affright and amazedneſſe, their fields they harrie, their cities they race, and after many doubtfull events of battell, fought Aurelius Ambroſius. againſt thoſe two bulwarks of warre, Aurelius Ambroſius, who here tooke upon him Gildas calleth him, Ambroſius Aurelianus. to weare the purple robe, wherein his parents were killed, and that warlike Arture, they diſſeize the Britans of the more fruitfull part of the Iſle, and drive them out of their ancient poſſeſſions. At which time, to ſpeake all in a word, the moſt miſerable Inhabitants ſuffred whatſoever either conqueror might dare, or the conquered feare.
For, freſh ſupplies of aide flocked together daily out of Germanie, which ſtill ſhould renew warre upon warre againſt the wearied Britans: to wit, Saxons, Iutes, (for ſo muſt we read, and not Vites) and Angles, who by theſe proper names were knowen C one from another, although generally, they were called Engliſh, & Saxons. But let us treat of theſe in ſeverall, and ſummarily, that if it be poſſible we may have a ſight of our originall, and firſt cradles.

Howbeit, firſt will I adde hereto that which Witichindus, being himſelfe both a Saxon borne, and alſo a writer of good antiquitie, hath related, as touching the „ comming in of the Saxons. Britaine (ſaith hee) being by Veſpaſian the Emperour long „ ſince reduced among Provinces, and under the vaſſalage of the Romanes, ſtanding them in „ ſtead, and ſerving to good uſe a long time, became aſſailed by their neighbour-nations: for „ that it ſeemed deſtitute, and abandoned of the Romans helpe. For, the people of Rome, after
* Haply, Martian. „ *that the Emperour * Martial was by his ſouldiers killed, being ſore tired out with forraine* D „ warres, was not able to aſſiſt their friends with ſupply of accuſtomed aides. Yet neverthe- „ theleſſe, the Romanes having built a mightie peece of worke for the defence of the Country, „ reaching between the confines from ſea to ſea, where it was thought that the enemies would „ aſſaile the Inhabitants, left the Land. But no difficultie it was for the enemie fiercely bent „ and alwaies ready to wage warre (eſpecially where they deale with a nation, feeble and una- „ ble to make warlike reſiſtance) to deſtroy the ſayd worke. Therefore hearing by report of „ the worthy and fortunate exploits, atchieved by the Saxons, they ſend an humble Embaſſage
„ to require their helping hand: and ſo the Embaſſadours having audience given them, came
* Brets, for Britans. „ *forth and ſpake, as followeth. Moſt noble Saxons, The poore and diſtreſſed * Brets out-*
„ toiled, and over-tired by the many incurſions of their enemies, hearing the fame of thoſe E „ victories which yee have valorouſly atchieved, have ſent us ſuppliants unto you, cra- „ ving that yee would not denie us your helpe and ſuccour. A large and ſpatious Land, plen- „ tifull and abundant in all things, they yeeld wholly to be at your devotion and command.
„ Hitherto have we lived liberally under the patronage and protection of the Romanes: after
„ the Romans, we know none of more proweſſe than your ſelves: and therefore wee ſeeke for „ refuge under the wings of your valour. So that wee may by your puiſſant vertue and arms, „ be found onely ſuperiour to our enemies, what ſervice ſoever ye impoſe upon us, willing we „ are to abide the ſame. To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made „ anſwere in this wiſe. Know yee, that the Saxons will be faſt friends unto the Brets, and „ preſt at all times, both to aſſiſt them in their neceſſitie, and alſo to procure their wealth and F „ commoditie. With joy returne theſe Embaſſadours home, and with this wiſhed-for tidings, „ make their countrey-men more joyfull. Hereupon according to promiſe, an armie ſent into „ Britaine, and joyfully received, in ſhort time freeth the Land from the ſpoiling enemies, and „ recovered the countrey unto the behoofe of the Inhabitants. For, the performance hereof required no great labour: the enemies who had long ſince heard of the Saxons, were terrified

Digitized by Google

A terrified with the verie fame that was bruited of them: ſo that their very preſence drave them farre off. For thoſe were the nations that troubled the Brets, namely, Scots and *Pehits: againſt whom, the Saxons whiles they maintaine warres, received of the Brets all things neceſſarie. They abide therefore in that country a good while, making „ ſome uſe of the Brents friendſhip reciprocally. But ſo ſoone as the Chieftaines of the „ armie ſaw the country to be large and fertile, and withall the hands of the Inhabitants ſlow „ to practiſe feates of Armes: and conſidered therewith, that themſelves, and the greateſt part „ of the Saxons, had no certaine place to ſeat themſelves in, they ſend over to call unto them „ a greater power, and more ſurely. This having concluded peace with the Scots and Pehits, „ B they riſe all together and then marching againſt the Brets, drive them out of the country, and di- „ vide the Land at their pleaſure, as if it were their owne. Thus much Witichindus. „

* Picts.

The originall and Etymologie of the Saxons; like as of other nations, not onely Monkes ignorant, as they were, in learned antiquitie, but alſo latter Writers, being men of ſome exact and exquiſite iudgment, have enwrapped with forged & fained fables. Some derive them and their name from Saxo, the ſonne of Negnon, and brother of Vandalus: others from their ſtonie nature: ſome from the remaines of the Macedonian armie; others of certaine knives, whereupon was made that ryme in Engelhuſius:

Quippe brevis gladius apud illos Saxa vocatur,
C Vnde tibi nomen, Saxo traxiſſe putatur.

For, Sax, with them, and Short-ſword, is the ſame,
From whence it's thought, the Saxon tooke his name.

But Crantzius deriveth them from the Catti in Germanie: and that learned Capnio from the Phrygians. Of theſe, let everie man follow which hee liketh beſt: For, ſuch conjecturall opinions as theſe, I will not labor to diſproove. Howbeit, that conceit of the beſt learned Germans may ſeeme worthy of acceptance, and to bee preferred before the reſt, who ſuppoſe that the Saxons deſcended from the Sacæ, a moſt noble Nation, and of much worth in Aſia, and ſo called, as one would ſay, Sacoſones, that is, the ſonnes of the Sacæ: and that out of Scythia, or Sarmatia * Aſiatica, they came in companies by little and little, together with the Getæ, Suevi, Daci, and others into Europe. Neither is this opinion of theirs improbable, which fetcheth the Saxons out of Aſia, wherein mankind was firſt created and multiplied: for, beſides that Strabo writeth, how thoſe Sacæ (as before time the Cimerij) made invaſions into countreys which lay farre off, and termed a part of Armenia after their owne name Sacaſena: Ptolomee alſo placeth the Saſſones, Suevians, Maſſagetes and Dahi in that part of Scythia: and Ciſner obſerveth, that theſe Nations retained the ſame vicinitie or neighborhood in a maner in Europe, which was among them in former times when they were in Aſia.

Saxons, from the Sacæ in Aſia.

Tartaria.

D Lib. 11. Melancthon Ciſnerus.

Neither is it leſſe probable, that our Saxons deſcended from theſe Sacæ or Saſ-
E ſones in Aſia, (call them whether you will) than the Germanes from thoſe Germanes in Perſia, of whom Herodotus maketh mention: which they themſelves after a ſort doe affirme, by reaſon of the affinitie of their Language: for, that ſingular Scholar Ioſeph Scaliger ſheweth, that theſe words, Fader, Moder, Brader, Tutchter, Band, and ſuch like, are at this day found in the Perſian tongue, in the ſame ſenſe as we vſe, Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bond. But when the Saxons began firſt to bee of any name in the world, they had their abode in Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, which wee now call Denmarke, wherein Ptolomee placeth them, who was the firſt author (as far as I find) that made mention of them. For, we ſhould not indeed read, Saxones, (as it is in ſome bookes) but more truly, Axones, in that verſe of Lucan:

Michael Neander.

Axones, people of Gaule.

F —— Longiſq; leves Axônes in armis:
And Axons in ſide armour light and nimble. ——

Out of this Cimbrica Cherſoneſus in the time of Diocleſian, they (with the Frankes their neighbours) troubled our coaſts and the ſeas with Piracie, in ſo much as for the defence of the countrey, and to repell them, the Romanes made Carauſius their Generall. Afterwards they having paſſed over the river * Albis, part of them by little *Elbe. Zoſimus.

Digitized by Google

and little gat footing within the ſeat and territorie of the Suevians, where now is the Dukedome of Saxonie, and part of them beſtowed themſelves in Friſland and Holland, which now the Frankes had quite forſaken. For, thoſe Frankes who before time had inhabited thoſe inmoſt Fennes of Friſland (whereof ſome, by overflowes and flouds, are growen to be that ſea, which at this day they call Zuider-ſea) and poſſeſſed themſelves of Holland, then called Batavia, under Conſtantius Chlorus, Conſtantine the Great, and his ſonnes, being received as Liege-men, and tranſlated from thence to inhabit the waſte and deſert countries of Gaule, either by the ſwords point making way into more plentifull regions, or elſe (as Zoſimus writeth) driven out by the Saxons, departed out of Holland. From which time, all the people bordering upon that ſea coaſt in Germanie, which were men of warre, and profeſſed Piracie, as before they grew to be Franci, ſo now they became clepid Saxons: thoſe Nations I meane, which inhabite Iutland, Sleſwicke, Holſt, Ditmarſe, the Biſhopricke of Breme, the countie of Oldenburgh, both Eaſt and Weſt Friſland, and Holland. For the nation of the Saxons, (as Fabius Quæſtor Ethelward, himſelfe deſcended of the Saxons roiall bloud, writeth) was wholly all that upon the ſea coaſt, from the river Rhene unto the citie Donia, and which now is commonly called Dane-Marc. Which author, (that I may acknowledge by whom I have profited) maſter Thomas Allen of Oxford an excellent man, and one endued with very many ſingular Arts, firſt found out, and of his courteſie imparted the ſame unto me, with many others.

Ethelward, Son to King Adulph in the fourth degree, flouriſhed the yeere 950.

Out of this Maritime tract, the Saxons fleſhed now with the ſlaughter of many Romanes, brake many times into the Romans provinces, and for a great while annoied this Iland, untill Hengiſt himſelfe came: Who out of Batavia or Holland, ſailed into Britaine, and built that Caſtle of Leiden in Holland, as not onely the Hollanders Annals doe teſtifie, but alſo that noble Ianus Douſa, a man of excellent wit and learning: who of that Caſtle, verſifieth thus:

Quem circinato mœnium ut ambitu,
Sic arcuatis fornicibus novum
Putatur Hengiſtus Britanno
Orbe redux poſuiſſe victor.

Ode 2. of Leiden.

Which Hengiſt, by report, when he Return'd from Britaine with victorie,
Built new with walles in compaſſe round,
And on vaults arched under ground.

The Iutæ, who had that name (as many think) from the Gutes, Getes, or Gothes (for in a manuſcript booke, we read Geatun) did for certaine inhabite the upper part of Cimbica Cherſoneſus, which ſtill the Danes call Iuitland: deſcended haply of thoſe Guttæ, whom Ptolomee hath placed in Scandia, whoſe habitation this day is called Gothland. But take heede you thinke not with Iornandes, that this was the native country of thoſe Gothes, who with victorious conqueſts over-ran all Europe: for, the moſt ancient and beſt approoved writers have recorded unto us, that they dwelt beyond the river *Iſter faſt by Pontus Euxinus*, and were before time called Getæ.

Spartianus Trebellius Pollio Capitolinus, &c.

* Alias, Danubius Donow.
* Mar majore.

But, in what place the Angles were ſeated, it is a queſtion, neither are all men of one opinion. Moſt authors place them in Weſtphalia, where Engern ſtandeth, and where the Suevians, whom Tacitus & Ptolomee make mention of, had their abode; whom I am willing to beleeve, if wee ſpeake of the age of Tacitus: but I ſuppoſe, that from thence they came downe to the tract by the ſea ſide. Others ſeeke for them in Pomerania, where the towne Angloen flouriſheth. But ſeeing theſe reach into the more inland parts of Germanie far from our ſeas, ſurely we muſt ſeek for ſome other ſeat of our Angles or Engliſhmen: which Beda willed me to looke for between the Saxons and Iutes. The Angles (quoth he) came out of that countrey which is called Angulus, and is reported from that time to lie waſte, betweene the Provinces of the Saxons and Iutes*. Now ſeeing that between Iuitland and Holſatia the ancient countrey of the Saxons, there is a little Province in the Kingdome of Dania, named at this day

Angles, or Engliſhmen.

Lib. 1. cap. 15.
* Iutarum. So readeth the Manuſcript, and not Vitarum.

Angel,

Digitized by Google

A Angel, beneath the citie Flensburg, which Lindebergius in his Epistles calleth Little Anglia: I dare affirme, that now at length, I have found the place of our Ancestors habitation, and that from thence the Angles came into this Iland. And to averre this the more confidently, I have good warrant from the authoritie of that ancient writer Ethelwardus, whose words be these: Old Anglia is sited betweene the Saxons & the Giots: they have a capitall towne, which (in the Saxon tongue) is named Sleswic: but the Danes call it Haithby. In which verie place, Ptolomee seemeth to set the Saxons: So that a Poet of the middle time, sung not untunably in this maner:

Angel in Denmarke, the seat of the English, or Angles.

B ——Saxonia protulit Anglos,
Hoc patet in lingua, niveoq; colore.——

That Englishmen from Saxons draw descent,
Their colour *white and tongue make evident.

* Faire.

Of these Angles, some part having passed forward into the inmore quarters of Germanie, being blended with the Longobards and the Suevians went, as farre as Italie, and are thought to have left their footings in Engelheim, the native countrey of Charles the Great, Ingolstad, Engleburg, Englerute in Germanie, and Angleria in Italie. But what the reason or Etymologie is of the name, I dare not definitively pronounce. Away with that Angulus the son of Humblus: and with Queene Angela, whom foolish folke babble to have been the founders of our Nation. Neither thinke C we that their name was imposed of Angulus, that is, An angle or corner; as if it were a comer of the world, as some building upon that stale verse, seeme to hold:

Anglia terra ferax, & fertilis angulus orbis,
Insula prædives, quæ toto vix eget orbe:
England a fruitfull angle, is without the world so wide,
An Iland rich, that hath small need of all the world beside.

Neither doth Goropius his conjecture deserve credit, but rather a smile, which deriveth Anglos, that is, Englishmen, from Angle, that is, A fishing rod, or a Fish-hooke; because (saith he) they hooked all unto them, and were, as we say, Good Anglers. But he that seeth the Etymologie, of Engelbert, Englehard, and such like D Dutch names, may see perhaps the originall of Angli also. Moreover, it may seeme out of Procopius, that the Frisones likewise came with others into Britaine. The text whole as it lieth (for that the booke is not commonly extant in print) I will not thinke much here to set downe, even as Franciscus Pithæus a singular good man, and in all sorts of Antiquitie most skilfull, hath exemplified it unto me, out of the Kings Librarie in Paris: Βρεττίαν τὴν νῆσον ἔθνη τρία πολυανθρωπότατα ἔχει, βασιλεῖς τε εἰς αὐτῶν ἑκάστῳ ἐφέστηκε, καὶ ὄνομα κεῖται τοῖς ἔθνεσιν τούτοις, Ἄγγιλοι, Φρίσονες, καί τε οἱ νήσῳ ὁμώνυμοι Βρίττονες. Τοσοῦτόν γε ἡ νῆσος ἑκάτερον πολυανθρωπία φαίνεται ὥστε κατ' ἔτος ἕκαστον ἐκ τῶνδε μετανιστάμενοι ξὺν γυναιξὶ, καὶ παισὶν εἰς Φράγγους χωροῦσι· οἱ δὲ αὐτοὺς ἐνοικίζουσι τῆς σφετέρας τῇ ἐρημοτάτῃ δοκούσῃ εἶναι. καὶ ἀπ' αὐτῆς τῇ νήσου τοὔνομα ἐσχήκασιν οἱ ἄνθρωποι. ὥστε ἀμύλως ἡ πάλαι ποτὲ ὑπὸ Φράγγων βασιλεὺς ὑπὸ πρεσβείᾳ τῶν ἐς Βυζάντιον στείλας ἄνδρας, αὐτοῖς ἐπὶ τῆσδε Ἀγγίλων ξυνέπεμπε φιλοτιμούμενος, ὡς καὶ ἡ νῆσος ἦδη ὑπ' αὐτῷ ἄρχεται. That is, according to my grosse translation, thus much: The Iland Britaine, three most populous nations doe inhabite, which have everie one their severall King to rule them: and these Nations be called Angili, Frisones, and after the name of the very Iland, Britones. Now they seeme to be so great a multitude of people, that every yeere a mightie number of them, with their wives and children, flit from thence unto the Franks: and they give them entertainment in that part of their Land, which seemeth most desert above the rest: and hereupon men say, they challenge unto themselves the verie Iland. And verily, not long since, when the King of the Franks, sent certaine of his people in Embassage to Constantinople unto the Emperour Iustinian, he sent withall some English, pretending ambitiously, that this Iland was under his dominion.

De bello Gothico. lib. 4.

E F

These are the people of Germanie, that planted themselves in Britaine, who, that they became one nation, and were called by one generall name, one while Saxons, another while, Enlishmen, and English-Saxons, for difference of those that are in Germanie, may be gathered most truly, out of Gildas, Beda, Saint Boniface, Paulus Diaconus, and others: but most commonly in Latine, Angli, Gens Anglica; and Saxons, Angles, and Iutes one nation.

Digitized by Google

and in their owne tongue, to the same sense, Engle-theod. A

Anglo-Saxons, when they came into Britaine.

About the time when they were admitted into Britaine by Vortigern, writers doe not agree: but to omit others, Bede and those that follow him, make this computation of those most confused times.

In the one and thirtieth yeere of Theodosius the younger, and of Christ 430. The Britans pitiously crave aid, but in vaine, of * Aetius the third time Consul, for that they were sore oppressed by the Picts and Scots.

* or Aetius.

Under Valentinian the third, Saint German once or twice came into Britaine against the Pelagians, and after he had powred out his praiers unto God, led an armie [of Britans] against the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victorie. B

In the first yeere of Martianus, and the yeere of our Lord 449, the nation of the English Saxons arrive in Britaine.

* or Register. Fasti Consulares.

But seeing it appeareth for certaine by the * Kalender of the Consuls, that the third Consulship of Aetius fell out to be in the 39. yeere of the said Theodosius, and after the birth of Christ 446. as also by the best and most approoved authors, that Saint German died in the yeere of Grace 435: justly wee may suspect, that those numbers in Beda were corrupted, and that the Saxons had footing given them here, before the yeer of our Lord 449. For otherwise, how could it be, that S. German, who departed this life An. Do. 435, should conduct the Britans against the Saxons, when as they were not yet come? Ninnius also writeth, that Saint German returned out of Britaine into his owne country after the death of Vortigern, who received the Saxons into Britaine: so that of necessitie their comming in was before the yeere of our Lord 435, which was the yeere wherein Saint German ended his life. In like maner, in the second yeere after that Leo Magnus was created Bishop of Rome, which was in the yeere of Christ 443, Prosper Tyro who then lived, writeth, that Britaine after sundry overthrowes, was brought in subjection to the Saxons, so that they doubtlesse must needs come in before that time, namely, the yeere of Christ 449. But to take away all scruples, and cleere all doubts in this point, this one note of computation adjoyned unto some copies of Ninnius, which is unto me in stead of all, may suffice. C

Baronius.

From the Consulship of the two Gemini, * Rufus and Rubellius, unto Stilico the Consul, are reckoned 373. yeeres. D

* Read Fusius.

Item, from Stilico unto Valentinian the son of Placidia, and to the raigne of Vortigern, be 28. yeeres.

From the raigne of Vortigern unto the * discord of Guitolin and Ambrose, are 12. yeeres. Which battell is Guoloppum, that is, Cathguoloph.

* or battell.

Now Vortigern held the Kingdome of Britaine when Theodosius and Valentinian were Consuls: and in the fourth yeere of his raigne, the Saxons came into Britaine, and were entertained by Vortigern, when Fœlix and Taurus were Consuls.

From the yeere wherein the Saxons came into Britaine, and were received by Vortigern, unto * Decius Valerianus, are 69. yeeres. E

* Elsewhere Decius Paulinus.

By casting therefore the account thus, the comming in of the English-Saxons into Britaine, was in the 21. yeere of Theodosius the younger: and this commeth neerest to the computation of Beda, in the yeere of our salvation 428. For then Fœlix and Taurus bare their Consulship: and so all circumstances of persons and times doe well cohere. This moreover I thinke good to tell you of, although I will not take upon me to be a Criticke, that in most copies of Gildas, whence Bede had that note of Ætius, we read Agitio III. Consuli, in others without adjection of number, Aegitio: and in one, Aequitio Cos. But to this day never could I see in the Register and Kalender of Consuls, any Consul of that name: unlesse we might thinke that hee was some Consul extraordinarie. F

Well, what time soever it was that they came in, they made good proofe of their singular valour and wisedome withall. For in a short space, their State, for number, for good customes and ordinances, for lands and territories grew to that heighth, that it became most wealthy and puissant, yea, and their conquest in some sort full and absolute. For all the conquered, except some few, whom in the Westerne tract the roughnesse

The Saxons conquest.

Digitized by Google

A roughneſſe of the countrey defended and kept ſafe, became one nation, uſed the ſame lawes, tooke their name, and ſpake one and the ſelfeſame language, with the conquerours. For, beſides England it ſelfe, a great part of Scotland, being poſſeſſed by the Engliſh Saxons (and ſtill to this day, the wilde and naturall Scots indeed, terme them Saſſones) uſeth the ſame tongue that we do, varying a little in the Dialect onely. Which tongue we and they together for the ſpace now of 1150. yeeres, have kept after a ſort uncorrupt, and with it the poſſeſſion alſo of the Land. So that now it is proved vaine and falſe, (as other prophe ſies of that kind) which the Saxon Prophets foretold, when as they ſpred their ſailes for this Iland, That they ſhould inhabit here 300. B yeeres and no more, and for one hundred and fiftie of them, often times waſte and ſpoile the countrey. Now, the matter it ſelfe, and the place ſeeme to require, that ſomewhat ſhould bee added as touching the ancient maners and demeanour of our Forefathers the Saxons: and ſurely, annex I will what I have obſerved in this behalfe. Gildas.

This nation of the Saxons, was generally moſt warlike and martiall, For courage „ of minde, ſtrength of body, enduring of labour and travell, reputed of all the Germans „ moſt valiant, as ſaith Zoſimus. Moſt feared of the Romanes, becauſe their invaſions „ were ſudden, as Marcellinus reporteth: Terrible for hardineſſe and agilitie, as ſaith Oroſius. Saxony is a region (by reaſon of Mariſhes) inacceſſible, and environed with comberſome countreys, and unpaſſable. Which things although they may make them more ſecure for „ C war, and although it ſelfe alſo was ſed captive oftentimes to ſet out the Roman triumphs, yet „ have they the name to bee a moſt valorous kind of men; excelling all other in piracie: howbeit, truſting in their ſwift pinnaces and flybotes (not in fine force) provided rather for flight „ than fight, as Ægyſippus recordeth of them. In imitation of whom, Iſidorus writeth „ thus: The Nation of the Saxons ſeated upon the coaſts of the Ocean ſea, and among unpaſſable Mariſhes, is for valour and nimbleneſſe meet for ſervice: and thereupon they tooke their „ name, as being a kinde of people ſtout, hardy, and moſt valiant, yea and redoubted above all „ other for piracie. Men they are for their tall ſtature, the good feature of their limbs, and framing of their lineaments, conſpicuous and notable. Whereupon Witichindus the Monke, writeth thus of them; The Franks had theſe men in admiration for „ D their excellencie as well in bodie as mind: they wondred at them for their new and ſtrange „ habite, for their armour alſo, and ſhoulders overſpred with the haire of their head; but a- „ bove all for their conſtant reſolution, and valiant courage. Clad they were in ſouldiers „ caſſocks, and weaponed with long ſpeares: they truſted upon their little bucklers, and wore „ great knives or skeins at their backes. Howbeit, beforetime they uſed to ſhave their „ haire off, hard by the head to the very skinne, unleſſe it were round about the crowne, and to weare a plate about their head, as Sidonius Apollinaris teacheth us in theſe verſes: The Saxons Maners. Lib. 9. epiſt. 2. Originum.

Iſtic Saxona cærulum videmus
Adſuetum antè ſalo, ſolum timere;
E Cujus verticis extimas per oras
Non contenta ſuos tenere morſus,
Altat lamina marginem comarum.
Et ſic crinibus ad cutem reciſis,
Decreſcit caput, additurque vultus.

The Saxons there in watchet clad, we ſee
On land afraid, who earſt at ſea were bold;
Whoſe buſh of haires about the crowne that be Plates not content to keepe their wonted hold Raiſe up in tufts, when all the reſt is pold:
F The Scalpe beneath thus ſhaven to the skin,
Their face ſeemes full, their heads but ſmall and thin.

As for their apparell, you may underſtand what it was out of theſe words of Paulus Diaconus, as touching the Longobards. Their garments were large, and looſe, and moſt of all linnen, ſuch as the Engliſh Saxons are wont to weare, trimmed and ſet out with verie broad gards or welts purfled, and embrodered with ſundry colours. Moſt skilfull ſeamen men they were, as who a long time lived as Pirats, so that being accustomed to the sea they were afraid, as he saith, of the land: and wrought so much mischiefe upon the sea-coasts of Britaine and France, as farre as to Spaine, that there were both Captaines & souldiers appointed all along the shores of both Countries to restraine their rovings and depredations, who thereupon were called Counts or Earles of the Saxon shore along Britaine and France. And heereto tend these verses of Sidonius Apollinaris:

Digitized by Google

The Saxons shores or coasts.

Comites littoris Saxonici.

Quin & Aremoricus piratam Saxona tractus,
*Sperabat, * cui pelle salum sulcare Britannum,*
Ludus, & assuto glaucum mare findere lembo.

* Sperabat, for timebat.

The tract also that lies the Sea so neare,
Hight Armoricke, did Saxon pirate * feare:
Whose sport it is with leather-stitched boat,
Of British Sea to cut the waves afloat.

Yea and that which more is, within Gaule neere unto Armorica, they seased into their hands and held a long time the Country about the * Baiocasses, as is to be seene in Gregorius Turonensis, who termed them Saxones Baiocassinos, like as the common sort, Sesnes Bessins.

*Baieux.

Saxones Baiocassini.

But with how great cruelty they committed outraies along these shores, heare if it please you, Sidonius himselfe. The Messenger, (saith he) with whom we spent some time in »» take, whiles for your sake we held him with vs, constantly affirmed, that you of late sounded »» alarum at Sea, and performing the part in your owne person sometime of a souldier, & sometimes of a mariner, bestirred your selfe up and downe the winding shores of the Ocean, to »» *affront the * flat bottom barkes of the Saxons: Of whom as many rowers as you see, so many* »» Archpirats you may thinke you beheld: They all of them together, so command, obey, teach, and learne to rob and steale; that euen now also you haue greatest cause to be warned, »» and to be most heedfull and wary of them. There is no enemie so cruell as this. He setteth »» upon others at unwares, himselfe slips away as warily: He setteth at nought such as encounter him; he bringeth to nought those that take no heed to him: whom he courseth, he surely »» ouertaketh: when he flieth he is sure to escape. To this service, shipwracks inure him, they »» terrifie him not. Not only skilfull they are in the dangers of sea, but also familiarly acquainted in some sort therewith. Be there a tempest up? the same of one side serveth to secure them »» were they in jeopardie to be taken; on the other side if they be to assaile others, it keepeth »» them from being descried and seene farre off. In the mids of waves and craggy rocks, they »» hazard their liues in hope of good successe. Besides this, before they take shipping into their »» owne Country and weigh their flowked anchors from the enemies shore, upon the point of »» *returne, their maner is to kill every tenth captive with equall and * dolorous torment (a* »» custome the more lamentable, because it is superstitious) & among the number of such as are »» gathered together to die, for to disperse the equity of lot, together with the iniquitie of death. »» With such vowes they bind themselves, with such sacrifices they pay their vowes, and not »» so much purified by such sacrifices, as polluted with sacrilegies, the bloudie and abominable »» murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a prisoner to death, than to set him »» free for a ransome. Hitherto also may be referred that, which we collect of the fragmēt of an ancient Historie in Isidorus. The Saxons trust to their fly-boats and not to their »» strength, better appointed for flight than for fight. As also this testimonie of Salvianus, »» who then lived, writing thus of Barbarous nations. The Alani are a people vicious »» and unclean, but not so perfidious. The Franks be giuen to lying, howbeit full of »» hospitalitie and kind to strangers. The Saxons in cruelty outragious, yet for chastitie to »» be honoured. But so firme and resolute they were, (if I may be allowed to giue it so good a terme) that they would chuse rather to kill themselves, and cast away their liues wilfully, than be mocked & laughed to skorne. And hereupon it was, that when »» Symmachus had provided a band of them against the publicke shewes which were to be ex- »» hibited; the very day on which they should haue beene brought forth into the Theater, for »» sword play to kill one another, they by strangling themselves prevented all hope of shew- »» ing bloudy sport and pastime unto the people. Of whom Symmachus himselfe writeth thus: The band or company of Saxons is lessened by death. For, when as the private guard restrained

Lib. 8. Epist. ad Ramantium.

*Ciuli.

*Behanging them indifferently one with another.

Lib. 2. Epist. 46.

Digitized by Google

A restrained not the liberty of the impious hands of those desperate people; the first day of the sword fight shew, saw nine and twenty of their necks broken without any halter.

Moreover, this nation of the Saxons was very much addicted to superstition, & for that cause when they were to consult of weighty & important matters, beside Soothsaying by inspection of beasts entrails, they obserued especially the neighing of horses, as presaging things to come. And thence perhaps it is, that the Dukes of Saxonie in ancient time gave the horse in their Armes. But why our first Progenitours Hengistus and Horsa, tooke their names of an horse, (for both their names in the Saxon tongue doe signifie, an horse,) surely I know not, unlesse it were for a lucky osse and B fore-token of their warlicke prowesse, according to that verse of Virgil.

An horse the badge or cognisance of the Saxons.

Bello armantur equi, bella hæc armenta minantur:
For warre our horses armed are,
These beasts also doe threaten warre.

They used also casting and drawing of lots very much; for, they did cut downe a branch from some tree that bare fruit, and slived or cleft the same into slips and twigs, and when they had distinguished them with certaine marks, they skattered them at haphazard upon a white garment. Straightwaies, if the consultation were publike, the Priest; if priuate, the goodman of the house, after praiers first unto the Gods, looking up to heauen, tooke ech of them up three times, and hauing lifted them C up, they interpreted them according to the marke set before upon them.

These ceremonies Adam Bremensis ascribeth to the Saxons which Tacitus attributeth to the Suevians.

To trie out the event and issue of warres, they were wont to set a prisoner of that nation against which they denounced warre, and a man chosen out of their owne countrimen, to fight together a combat, each of them with the weapon used in their countrie; and so to ghesse by him that was victour, which nation should goe away with victorie. Above all other Gods they worshipped Mercurie, whom they called Wooden, whose favour they procured by sacrificing unto him men alive; and to him they consecrated the fourth day of the weeke, whereupon we call it at this day, Wednesday: like as the sixth unto Venus, whom they named Frea or Frico, whence we name that day Friday: even as we do Tuesday of Tuisco, the stocke-father of the German or D Duch nation. They had a Goddesse also named Eoster, unto whom they sacrificed in the moneth of Aprill: and hence it commeth, saith * Beda, that they called Aprill, Eoster monath, and we still name the feast of the Resurrection, Eoster; but rather as I think of the rising of Christ, which our progenitors called East, as we do now that part whence the Sunne riseth. In general (as saith Tacitus) the English & other neighbour-nations worshipped Herthus, that is, Dame Earth, for a Goddesse, & they had an opinion, that she intermediated in humane affaires, and relieued the people. And even with us in these daies, that word Earth is in use, but growen out of use with Germans, who in stead of Earth, say, Arden. Of these superstitions that foresaid Ethelward writeth thus; respectiuely unto the time wherein he liued: So grieuously seduced are the unbeleevers of E the North, that unto this very day, the Danes, Normanes and Suevians, worship Woodan as » their Lord: and in another place; The Barbarous people honoured Woodan as their God, & » the Painims offred sacrifice unto him, that they might be victorious and valorous. »

The Saxons Gods.

Wednesday.
Friday.
Tuesday.

De temporibus.

Eoster a goddesse.

Herthus, a goddesse.

Earth.

But more fully Adam Bremensis setteth these things downe. In a temple, saith he » (called in their vulgar and native speech Vbsola) which is made altogether of gold, the peo- » ple worship the statues of three Gods: in such maner as that, Thor, the mightiest of them hath » only a throne, or bed: on either hand of him Woodan and Fricco hold their places. And » thus much they signifie. Thor, say they, beareth rule in the aire, as who gouerneth thunder » and lightning, winds, showres, faire wether, corne and fruits of the earth. The second, » which is Woodan, that is, stronger, maketh wars and ministreth manly valour against ene- » F mies. The third is Frico, bestowing largely upon mortall men, peace and pleasure, whose » *image they deuise and pourtray with a great * viril member. Woodan they engraue armed,* » like as with us they use to cut and expresse Mars. And they seeme to represent Thor, » with the scepter of Iupiter. But these errors, the truth of Christiã religion hath at length » chased quite away. After that these nations above said, had now gotten sure foo-ting in the possession of Britain, they divided it into seuen kingdomes, and established

Thursday hath name from this Thor.

* Ingenti Priapo.

an

A Monarchie alwaies in the Englishmens Heptarchie.

an Heptarchie: In which notwithstanding, the prince that had the greatest power, was called, as we read in Beda, King of the English nation: So that in this very Heptarchie it may seeme there was alwaies a Monarchie. After this, Augustine, whom commonly they call the Apostle of the English men, being sent hither by Gregorie the Great, having abolished these monstrous abominations of heathenish impietie, with most happy successe planting Christ in their hearts, converted them to the Christian faith. But for what cause and upon what occasion, this Gregorie was so diligent and carefull for the salvation of this English nation, Venerable Beda hath by tradition of his forefathers recounted unto us in these words: The report goeth, that on a

Lib. 2. cap. 1.

» certaine day, when upon the comming of merchants lately arrived, great store of wares was B » brought together into the market place [at Rome] for to be sold, and many chapmen flocked » together for to buy, Gregory also himselfe among others came thither, and saw with other » things, boies set to sale, for bodies faire and white, of countenance sweet and amiable, ha- » ving the haire also of their head as lovely and beautifull. Whom when he wistly beheld, he » demanded, (as they say) from what countrey or land they were brought? Answere was » made, that they came out of the Isle of Britaine, the people whereof were as welfavoured to » see unto. Then he asked againe, Whether those Ilanders were Christians, or ensnared still » with the errours of Paganisme? To which it was said, They were Painims: but he fetching
» a long deepe sigh from his very heart roote; Alas for pitie, quoth he, that the foule fiend and C
» father of darknes should be Lord of so bright and lightsome faces, and that they who caried » such grace in their countenances should be void of the inward grace in their harts & soules.
» Once againe he desired to understand by what name their nation was knowne; They made » answer, That they were called *Angli: And well may they so be named, quoth he, for An- » gellike faces they have: and meet it is that such should be fellow-heires with Angels in » heaven. But what is the name of that Province from whence these were brought? Answere
» was returned, that the inhabitants of the said province were cleped DEIRI: DEIRI, » quoth he, They are in deed De ira eruti, that is, delivered from ire and wrath, and called to
» the mercie of Christ. How call you the King of that province, saide he? Answere was giuen,
» that his name was Aelle: Then he alluding to the name, said, That Allelu-jah should be sung D
» in those parts, to the praise of God the Creator. Comming therefore to the Bishop of the Ro- » mane and Apostolicall Sea (for himselfe as yet was not made Bishop) he entreated, that » some ministers of the word should be sent unto the English nation, by whose meanes it might » be converted to Christ: and even himselfe was ready to undertake the performance of this » worke, with the helpe of God, in case it would please the Apostolicall Pope, that it should » be so.

*Englishmen.

*Hol-Deir-Nesse.

Concerning this conversion, the same Gregorie the Great writeth thus: Behold, *he *Christ.

» hath now entred already into the hearts of all nations, in maner, that are: Behold, in one faith
» he hath cõjoined the limits of East & west: Behold, I say, the very British toong, which could » nought else but rudely bray Barbarous words, long since began in the laud of God to resound
» the Hebrew Allelu-jah. And in his Epistle to Augustine himselfe: Who is able heere to shew E » sufficiently, what great joy is risen up in the hearts of all the faithfull, for that the nation of » Englishmen by the operation of God almightie his grace, and the labour of your brother- » hood, after the darknes of errours were chased and driven away, is illuminated with the » light of holy faith: for that with most sincere devotion they now spurne and tread » idols vnder their feete, who beforetime in superstitious feare lay prostrate before them? In » an old fragmẽt also written in that age, thus we read: Augustine upon one day of Christs » Nativitie, which with the universall glorie of the Englishmen is for ever celebrated, did re- » generate by lively Baptisme above ten thousand men, besides an innumerable multitude of » women and yoong children. But, what a number of Priests, and other holy orders besides,

The River Swale in York-shire.

» could be sufficient to wash such a sort of people? Having hallowed and blessed therefore the F » river called in English Swale, the Archbishop [Augustine] commanded by the voice of Cri-
» ers & Maisters, that the people should enter the riuer confidently two by two, & in the name » of the Trinitie, baptize one another by turnes. Thus were they all borne againe with no lesse » miracle, than in times past the people of Israel passed over the [red] Sea divided, and like- » wise Iordan when it turned back: for even so, they were transported to the banke on the » other

Beda reporteth all this of Paulinus Archbishop of York and not of Augustine.

Digitized by Google

A other side: and not withstanding so deepe a current and chanel, so great and so divers differences of sex and age, not one person (who will ever thinke it?) tooke harme. A great miracle no doubt, but this miracle as great as it was a greater preeminence doth surmount: in that, all feeblenes and infirmitie was laid off in that riuer: whosoever was sick and deformed returned out of it whole and reformed. O festivall spectacle for angels & men to behold, when so many thousands of a nation suing for grace, came forth of one rivers chanel, as out of one mothers wombe, and out of one poole so great a progenie sprung up for the celestiall and heavenly City? Hereupon the most gracious Pope Gregorie, with all the companies of Saints above, breaking forth into joy, could not conceale this, but wrote unto Saint Eulogius the Patriarch of Alexandria, that he would most thankfully congratulate with him, for B so great an host baptized upon one Christmas day.

No sooner was the name of Christ preached, but the English presently with such fervent zeale and devotion consecrated themselves unto Christ, that they tooke incredible paines in propagating Christianitie, in celebrating diuine seruice, performing all functions and duties of pietie, building Churches and endowing them with rich livings, so that there was not another region in all Christendome that could make reckening of more monasteries richly endowed: Yea & divers kings there were that preferred a religious and monastic all life before their crowne and kingdome. So many holy men also this land brought forth, which for their most firme profession of
C Christian religion, constant perseuerance therein, and sincere pietie were canonized Saints, that it gaue place to no other Christian province in this behalfe: And like as Britaine was called of that prophane Porphyrie, a plenteous province of Tyrants; so England might truly be named, a most fruitfull Iland of Saints. The Religion of the Englishmen.

Furthermore, they applied their minds to the bringing in againe of the better kind of arts & sciences, & sowed the seeds of Divinitie and good literature thorow out all Germaine, by the meanes of Winifridus, Willebrodus and others, which a German Poet sheweth in these verses: The learning of Englishmen.

Hæc tamen Arctois laus est æterna Britannis,
Quòd post Pannonicis vastatum incursibus orbem,
D Illa bonas artes & Graia munera linguæ,
Stellarumq; vias, & magnisydera cœli,
Observans, iterum turbatis intulit oris.
Quin se religio multum debere Britannis,
Servata, & latè circùm dispersa fatetur:
Quis nomen Winfride tuum, quis munera nescit?
Te duce, Germanis pietas se vera, fideq;
Insinuans cœpit ritus abolere profanos.
Quid non Alcuino facundo Lutetia debes?
Instaurare bonas ibi qui fœliciter artes,
E Barbariemq; procul, solus depellere cœpit.
Quid? tibi diuinumq; Bedam, doctissimus olim
Dum varias unus bene qui cognoverat artes, Debemus.

Yet this immortall praise is due to Britain, Northern Ile,
That when the world was ouerrun and wasted all the while
By Pannonik invasions, it did reduce in ure
Those troubled countries, with good arts: also with knowledge pure
Of Greeke tongue: and observing still the stars in spacious skie,
And planets with their wandring waies, taught them Astronomie.
F For true religion eke preserv'd, and sowne in many a land,
The world much bound to Britain is, and to her helpfull hand.
Thy name and gifts, ô Winifride, who knowes not? since by thee
The way was made in Germaine; where faith and pietie
First setting foote began to chase all rites profane away:
What ow I not to Alcuine now? may eloquent Paris say,

Digitized by Google

Who happily went there in hand alone to plant a new, A Good Arts, and thence all barbarisme to banish far from view.
And unto thee, worthy Bede we are beholden much,
The only man for sundry arts, his learned skill was such.

Britaine twice Schole-mistris of France.

Peter Ramus saith moreover, that Britaine was twice Schole-mistris to France, meaning, by the Druidæ and Alcuinus, whose industrie Charles the Great used especially in erecting the University of Paris.

The flitting backe againe of Anglo-Saxons into Germanie.

They brought also into Germanie militarie knowledge of Armes, as well as learning and religion: yea, and, which you will maruell at, if we may beleeve these words of Eginhardus, they gave unto those Saxons their first Originall, who now inhabite the B Dukedome of Saxonie. The nation of the Saxons, saith he, as Antiquities doe record, being departed from the English inhabiting Britaine, sailing thorow the Ocean, partly vpon a desire they had, and partly driven of necessitie to seeke where they might seat themselves, arrived upon the coasts of Germanie, and landed at a place called Hadutoha: what time as Theodericus King of the Franks warring upon Hirmirfridus Duke of the Thuringers his daughters husband, cruelly with fire and sword wasted their land. Now when as they had in two pight fields already, tried the doubtfull fortune of battaile, with lamentable slaughter of their people and vncertaine victorie, Theoderich disappointed of his hope to be Master of the field, dispatched Embassadors unto The Saxons, whose Duke was Hadugato: who having heard the cause of their cõ- C ming, and taken their promise, that upon obtaining victorie they should cohabite together, led forth an armie with them to aide Theodoricus. By meanes of which forces valiantly fighting now with him, as it were, for their liberty and native country, he overcame his enemies: and when he had spoiled the naturall inhabitants, killed them up and in maner left not one a live, their land according to his promise he set out and appointed for the Conquerours to possesse, who dividing the same by casting lots, seeing many of them were slaine in the warres, and that by reason of their fewnesse the whole country could not be occupied and peopled by them, part of it, that especially which lieth Eastward, they made over to coloners and new inhabitants, to every one according as by lot it fell out, to be holden and tilled for a certaine D rent and tribute: All the rest they themselves possessed. On the Southside verily, these Saxons haue the Franks, and a remnant of the Thuringers, whom the precedent whirlehind of hostility had not touched, and are divided from them by the chanel of the river Unstrote: Northward dwell the Normans, a most fierce Nation: East, from them the Obotrites inhabite: and Westward, the Frisians: from whom continually without intermission they defended their territories and marches thereof, either by Couenants of league or necessary skirmishing. But now returne we to our English-Saxons.

For a long time the State and Empire of the Saxons flourished exceeding well under the foresaid Heptarchie, untill those kingdomes bruised and impaired one of an- E other with ciuill warres, came all in the end to be subject unto the West-Saxons. For, Egbert king of these West-Saxons, having conquered already foure of these kingdomes, and swallowed up (as it were) in hope the other twaine also, to the end that they which were subdued and reduced to the rule of one Prince might be conjoined likewise in one name, commanded by an Edict and Proclamation, that the England.

Heptarchie which the Saxons held, should be called Engleloñ that is, England: whereupon in Latine it was named Anglia, taking denomination of the Angles, as being of those three nations most in number and of greatest prowesse. For they kept in their possession the kingdome of Northumberland and Mercia, very great and large countries, together with East England: whereas the offspring of the Iutes held F Kent only and the Isle of Wight: The Saxons East-sex, South-sex, & West-sex, a small parcel verily if it be compared with those spatious territories and lands of the English. Of whom, long before this they were generally thorowout called English, and in their owne language Englathead, Anglcynne Engl-cynn, & Englisc-men: albeit every kingdome therein, had a speciall name of the owne by it selfe. And this appeareth for

About the yeare, 800.

Theod. that is, a Nation.

certaine,

Digitized by Google

A certaine, as well out of other writers, as Beda, who intituled his Storie, The Historie of the English-Nation. Yea and in that Heptarchie, those Princes that ouer-ruled the East, were stiled Gentis Anglorum Reges, that is, Kings of the English nation: At this time, the name of Britaine, lay forgotten and growen quite out of use among the inhabitants of this Iland: remaining only in Books, & not taken up in common speech. And hereupon it is, that Boniface the bishop of Mentz, descended frō hence, called this our country, Saxony beyond the Sea. Howbeit, king Eadred, about the yere of our Lord, 948. used in some Charters and Patents the name and title of King of great Britaine: like as Edgar in the yeere, 970. bare this stile also, The Monarch of all whole Albion. Epist. to Zacharie the Pope.

B Being now called Anglia or England, the state and puissance of these Angles was come to the full height, and therefore, (such is the revolution of all mortall things) hastened apace to their period and end. For, the Danes continually infesting our coasts many yeeres together, at the length began to enter, ransacking and mangling this countrie most pitifully.

NAMES OF ENGLISH-SAXONS.

C MY purpose was, even here to have set downe the orderly succession of the English-Saxon Kings, both in the Heptarchie, and also in their Monarchie: but seeing that they seeme not properly to belong unto this place, neither is the bare heaping up of names only delightfull to the Reader, perhaps it will bee more acceptable, if I briefly annex hereto what I have observed by much reading, and especially in Alfricus our ancient Grammarian, as touching the force, reason, and signification of the antient English names. Not that my meaning is to interpret every name severally, (for, that were a peece of worke verie laborious) neither can such barbarous names, in which there lieth couched great significancie, succinct brevitie, and some ambiguitie, be easily delivered in another tongue. But considering that most of them bee compounded, Porphyrius de Theolog. Phœnicum.

D and that of few simples: I will explane the said simples, that the significations of the compound, implying all the osse and presage of good lucke, wished-for, and happie fortune, may evidently appeare, and that we may thorowly perceive, there is among all nations that one Orthoites of names, which Plato speaketh of.

AEL. EAL, and AL, in names compounded, like as παν in Greeke compositions, signifieth, All, or Wholly. Hereupon Aelwin, is as much, as Wholly, or Fully Victor. Albert, All, bright and dred, wholly dread or reverend. Alfred, Altogether Pacificall, or peacefull. Whereunto in some sort are correspondent, in Greek, Pammachius, Pancratius, Pamphilius, &c. Ael. Eal. &c.

E AELF, which with varietie of Dialect, is pronounced, Vlf, Wolph, Hulph, Hilp, Helfe, and in these daies Helpe, carieth in it a signification of Helpe or Aid: as for example, Aelfwin, that is, a victorious aid: Aelfwold, a helpfull Gouernour. Aelfgiva, she that giveth helpe: according to which are these Greeke names, Boetius, Symmachus, Epicurus. Vlf.

ARD, betokeneth naturall disposition or towardnesse: as Godard, is as much, as Divine towardnesse or inclination, Reinard, Sincere disposition, Giffard, a franke and liberall nature: Bernard, a filiall and sonne-like affection. Ard.

ATHEL, Adel, and Ethel import, Noble. Thus Aethelred, that is, Noble in counsell; Aethelard, a noble nature or disposition: Aethelbert, famously Noble: Ethelward, a noble Tutor or Protectour. Athel and Ethel.

F BERT, the same that with us at this day, Bright, and in Latin, Illustris, & clarus, that is, Splendent, and cleere: so, Ecbert, that is, Bright and shining for ever: Sigbert, a splendent conquerour: as also, she whom the Germans named, Bertha, the Greeke called Eudoxia, as Luitprandus witnesseth. And of this sort were Phædrus, Epiphanius, Photius, Lampridius, among the Greekes; Fulgentius and Illustrius, &c. among the Latins. Bert.

Digitized by Google

Bald. BALD, with the people of the North parts, is the same that Audax in Latine, that is, Bold, as Iornandes sheweth: a word, that yet is not growen out of use. So Baldwin, and by inversion Winbald, is the same, that, Bold Victour: Ethelbald, Nobly bold: Eadbald, Happily bold. Unto which are consonant, Thraseas, Thrasimachus and Thrasibulus, in Greeke. &c. A

Ken and Kin. KEN, and KIN, import, Kinsfolke, as Kinulph, an helpe to Kinsfolke: Kinhelm, a Defender of his kin: Kinburg, a Defence to kinred: Kinric, powerfull in or to kinsfolke.

Cuth. CVTH, beareth with it a signification of skill and cunning: so, Cuthwin, that is, a skilfull or politicke Conquerour: Cuthred, a learned counsellor: Cuthbert, Notable for his skill: neere unto these sound the Greeke names, Sophocles, Sophianus, &c. B

Ead. EAD in the compounds, and Eeadig, in simple words, sheweth as much as Happinesse and Blessednesse. Thus Eadward, is all one with, Happie Saviour, or preserver: Eadulph, Blessed helpe: Eadgar, Happie power: Eadwin, Fortunate Conquerour: Of which there is some resemblance, in the Greeke names, Macarius and Eupolemus: in these Latine also, Faustus, Fortunatus, Fœlicianus, &c.

Fred. FRED, soundeth all one with peace, for, so our ancestours called Sanctuaries, Fredstole, that is, the seats of peace. Thus Frederic, is as much as Powerable, or wealthy in peace; Winfred, Victorious peace: Reinfred, Sincere peace.

Gisle. GISLE, among the English Saxons, betokeneth a pledge or hostage, as Fredgisle, an hostage of peace. Gislebert, a notable or famous pledge: like as in Greeke, Homerus. C

Hold. HOLD, in the old Glossaries, like as Wold also, is interpreted, Governour, or chiefe Lieutenant: although in other places, it signifieth, Love; as Holdlic, Lovely, or Amiable.

Helm. HELM, is as much as Defence. Thus, Eadhelm, Happie defence: Sighelm, Victorious defence: Berthelm, Notable, or famous defence: even as these Greeke names, Amyntas, Boetius, &c.

Hare and Here. HARE, and Here, as they are diversly pronounced, betokened both an Armie, and also a Lord: so, Harhold, that is, the Ruler of an Armie: Hareman, A Principall or Chiefe man in an Armie: Herebert, Excellent in an armie: Herwin, a Victorious armie, or conquerour of an Host: not unlike to those Greeke names, Stratocles, Polemarchus, Hegesistratus, &c. D

Hild. HILD, in Alfricks Grammar is expounded, Lord, and Lady: thus Hildebert, betokeneth a famous or brave Lord: Mathild, a Virgin Ladie: and in the same sense is Wiga. Wiga found.

Leod. LEOD, that is to say, People: thus, Leodgar, is one mightie with the people.

Leof. LEOF, signifieth, Love: thus, Leofwin, He that winneth love: Leofstan, Most deare or best beloved: like as in Greeke, Agapetus, Erasmus, Erastus, Philo; and in Latine, Amatus, and Amandus. E

Mund. MVND, betokeneth, Peace: whereof our Lawyers-terme Mundbreach commeth, that is to say, Breach of peace: so, Eadmund, is Happie peace: Aethelmund, Noble peace: Aelmund, Wholly peaceable, or Make-peace: whereunto are well neere æquivalent these names, Irenæus, and Hesychius in Greeke: Lenis, Pacatus, Sedatus, Tranquillus, in Latine.

Rad, Red, and Rod. RAD, RED, and ROD, differing in Dialect, imply, Counsell: as Conrad, Powerfull, or skilfull in counsell. Etheldred, a noble Counsellor. Rodbert, notable for counsell: and in sense not unlike to Eubulus, Thrasibulus, in Greeke.

Ric. RIC, signifieth, Potent, Rich, and Valiant, as Fortunatus in these verses hath taught us: F

Hilperîce potens, si interpres barbarus adsit,
Adjutor, fortis, hoc quoq; nomen habet:

O Hilpericke so mightie thou, (stood here th'expounder by
Of bar'brous words) an helper strong, eke doth this name imply.

Like as Alfric, Al or wholly powerfull: Athelric, Nobly valiant, or mighty. Unto which names

A names these in Greeke allude, Polycrates, Crato, and Plutarchus, Opimius also in Latine.

Sig.

SIG, usually among them, was put for Victorie, whereupon, Sigbert, Renowmed or glorious for victorie: Sigward, a victorious Protectour: Sigard, Victorious towardnesse. And to the same sense in maner, Nicocles, Nicomachus, and Nicander with the Greekes: Victor, Victorinus, Vincentius, &c. among the Latines.

Stan.

STAN, was among those old Forefathers of ours, a termination of the Superlative degree, as, Athelstan, that is, Most noble: Betstan, best: Leefstan, most liefe or deare: Wistan, most wise: Dunstan, most high.

Wi.

WI, the same that Holy, as Wimund, holy or sacred peace: Wibert, Famous, or renow-
B med for holinesse: Alwi, All holy: like as in Greeke, Hierocles, Hieronymus, Hosius, &c.

Will.

WILLI, and Vili, among English Saxons, as Billi at this day, among the Germans caried a signification of Many: as Willielm, a defender to many: Wildred, Honoured, or reverend of many: Wilfred, Peace to verie many. To which in sense and signification accord, Polymachus, Polycrates, Poliphilus, &c.

Wold.

WOLD, and Wald, betokened with them a Ruler or Governour: Hence commeth Bellewold, An excent Governour: Ethelwold, a noble Ruler: Herwald, and by inversion, Waldher, the Governour or Ruler of an Armie.

But lay a straw here, for in a trifling matter, others as well as my selfe, may thinke
C these notes sufficient, if not superfluous.

But for names, of greater moment peradventure it will be, if I here commit to writing (if so be these papers be marked to long life) what we have seene: namely, that as Egbert commanded this hither part of Britaine, and which was his owne possession, to bee named England: so now after 800. yeeres, or thereabout come and gone; even whiles we are perusing this worke, King Iames invested in the Monarchie of the whole Isle, by the propitious favour and grace of God, in right of his owne inheritance, and with the generall applause of all good men; to the end that this said Isle, which is one entire thing in it selfe, encircled within one compasse of the Ocean; in his own person, vnder one imperiall crown, and diademe, in one communitie of Lan-D guage, Religion, Lawes, and Iudiciall processes; to the increase of perpetual felicitie, and oblivion of old enmitie, should beare also one name: hath in the second yeere of his raigne by an Edict published and proclaimed thorow his Realmes, assumed the name, title, and stile of KING OF GREAT BRITAINE, in all matters generally, save onely in Writs, and formalities of Law Instruments.

The name of Britaine brought into use againe.

THE DANES.

E WHat was the beginning of the Danes, the Danes themselves verily know not for certain. For, the veritie it selfe hath hissed out of the Schoole of Antiquitie, not onely that Giant Danus the sonne of Humblus, but also Goropius (who deriveth it from an Henne.) Andrew Velleius a Dane and a very great scholar, fetcheth their originall from the Dahæ, a people of Scythia, and from Mart, a word which should signifie not a limit but a Region: Our countrey-man Ethelward was fully perswaded, that the name arose from the Citie Donia. For mine owne part, I alwaies thought, that they sprung from the Danciones, (whom Ptolomee placeth in Scandia, and who by change of one letter, in some copies be named Dauciones) and from thence voided themselves into the de-F sert and forsaken seat of the English, to wit, into Cimbrica Chersonesus: untill that Ionas Iacobus Venusinus, a most learned man, right judicious, and passing well seene in the studie of Antiquitie, found out by diligent search and inquirie, the very expresse tracts, as it were, and marks of the Danes name, within Sinus Codanus or Codanonia, that is, the Baltish sea, or Oost sea; whereof Pomponius Mela made mention in this very tract. Which names pronounced somewhat grossely by the Northerne people, Cdan and Cdanonum, Mela forged and fashioned upon the Latine anvill, into Coda-

Da-ha.

Digitized by Google

num and Codanonia: like as the posteritie after him, Gdanum have coined out with a more gentle sound Dansk; of Clodonaus, Lodouic, of Cnutus, Canutus. And yet before the daies of Iustinian the emperour, about the yeere of our redemption 570. the world tooke no knowledge of their name. For then, begun they to rove upon the coasts of France and England, and were by the writers, that penned in Latine the histories of England, named Winccingi, for that they practised Piracie: for Wiccinga, in the Saxon tongue, as Alfricus witnesseth, doth signifie a Pirat that runneth from creek to creeke: also Pagani, that is, Painims, because as yet they were not become Christians: but the Angles themselves in their language, termed them Denisean, and often times Heathon-mon, as one would say, Ethnicks. Of these Danes listen to * Dudo of Saint Quintins, an author of good antiquitie, out of the Librarie of Iohn Stow (that most studious Antiquarie of the citie of London) which was never shut from me. The Danes swarmed from out of Scanza, that is, Scandia, like bees out of an hive, in manifold diversitie and barbarous maner, after they had in heat, lascivious lust, and wantonnesse ingendred an innumerable of-spring. Who after they were growne to ripenesse of yeeres falling to hote contention for goods and lands with their fathers, and grand-fathers, yea and often times among themselves; when they once overflowed and grew so populous that they could have no roome sufficient to inhabite in the place, wherein they presently dwelt: having gathered together by lot a multitude of youth and springals, after a most antient custome, were thrust out into forraine Realmes, to conquer unto themselves lands by dint of sword, wherein they might live.

Winccinga.

* Dod.

The Religion of the Danes. Hereupon peradventure we have our Thursday so called.

* Burnt offering.

But in the full performance of discharging those that should be thus sent out, & in mustering up their armies, they sacrificed unto THVR, *whom they worshipped in old time as their Lord; for whom they killed not any sheepe, oxen or other cattell, but offred mens bloud: Thinking that to be the most pretious * holocaust and sacrifie of all others, because, when the priest by casting lots had predestined who should die, they were all at once deadly smitten upon the head with ox yokes: and when every one that was chosen by lot had his braines dashed out, at one severall stroke, laid along he was on the ground, and sought out there was with narrow prying the fibre, that is to say, the veine of the heart on the left side, & having after their maner drawen out the bloud thereof, and stricken it upon the heads of their friends, speedily they hoise up sailes, and thinking that they please their God with such an act, they immediatly put to Sea, and fall to their ores.* Moreover, there is another maner, or rather a most foule and detestable superstition, which the Danes used in pacifying their Gods, and this doth Ditmarus the Bishop, who was of greater antiquitie somewhat than Dudo, in these words describe. *But because I have heard strange, and wonderfull things of the ancient Sacrifices that the Danes and Normans used, I will not over passe the same. There is in these parts a place, and the chiefe it is of this kingdome, called Lederum, in a province named Selon: where every ninth yeere in the moneth of Ianuarie, after the time in which we celebrate the * Nativitie of our Lord, they all assemble together, and there they kill and sacrifice unto their Gods ninety and nine men, and as many horses, with dogs and cocks for the hauks, which the Gods sent them, certainly perswading themselves, as I said before, that by the same they should please them.*

Lib. 1.

* Theophania.

The waste & spoile that the Danes made.

About the time of Egbert, in the yeere of Christ, 800. they first landed on our sea-coasts: afterwards with such tumults and hurliburlies as never the like was heard of, having for many yeeres made foule havock over all England, racing cities, firing Churches, and wasting countries, they let out the raines loose to all barbarous crueltie, driving, harrying, spoiling, & turning all upside down where ever they went. Thus after they had killed the Kings of the Mercians & East-Angles, they seazed upon their Kingdomes, with a great part of the Kingdome Northumberland. Then was there a tribute called, Dangelt, imposed upon the poore people, for the repressing of their robberies and outrages: and that you may know what maner of imposition this was, I would have you to read these few lines copied out of our ancient Lawes: The payment of Dangelt was at the first ordained for Pirats. For by sore annoying the countrey, they went on, and did what they could to waste it utterly. And verily to keepe downe their insolencie, it was enacted, that Dangelt should yeerely be paid, that is, twelue pence out of every Dangelt.

Digitized by Google

A *every hide of land thorowout the whole country: for to hire and wage those that might resist and withstand their invasion. Also, of this Dangelt was every Church freed and quit: as also, all lands that were in the proper * Demesies of those Churches, where soever they lay, paying nothing at all in such a contribution as this, because they trusted more in the prayers of the Church, than in their defence by force of armes.*

*Or demáne.

But when as now they assaile and set upon * Aelfred king of the West-Saxons, he one while by retiring & giving the ground, otherwhiles by preassing hard upon them with his victorious forces, not only did put them back from his owne country; but also having slain a Danish-pety-king of the Mercians, expelled them in maner, quite out
B of all Mercia: & his sonne Edward the elder following in traine of his fathers victories, when he had put the Danes to flight, brought East England to his subjection: like as Adelstane his base sonne, speedily marching to atchieve victories, with great slaughter of the Danes subdued Northumberland, and so terribly pursued the Danes, that they were forced either to depart the realme, or to submit themselves unto him. By the valorous prowesse of these Princes, England recovered out of the whirlepit of calamities, and rested from that bloudie warre by the space of 50. yeares. But whiles Etheldred a man of a dull & soft spirit reigned, the Danes taking advantage of his cowardise, strooke up alarme & sounded the battaile againe: & having wasted the country, constrained the Englishmen to redeeme their peace yearely with a great sum of
C monie: & so insolently they bare themselves, that the Englishmen conspired generally together, and in one night murdred all the Danes every mothers sonne of them thorowout all England, thinking by this effusion of bloud to quench the fire of Danish warre, which brake out nevertheless into a more pernicious flame. For, Sueno king of the Danes, provoked with this slaughter of his people, invaded England with a puissant armie, and having in a furious and enraged moode made much spoile, he put Etheldred to flight, subdued the whole kingdome, and left the same unto his sonne Canutus: who having encountred in many cruell and sharp battailes, and those with variable fortune fought, with Etheldred now returned and his sonne Edmund surnamed Iron-side, had two of his sonnes succeeding after him, to wit, Harald abastard,
D and * Canutus the Hardie: After they were dead, & the Danish yoke shaken off, the kingdome fell againe unto the English. For, Edward, who in regard of his holinesse was surnamed, The Confessor, the sonne of Etheldred by his second wife, recovered the crowne & roiall Dignity. Now began England to take breath againe: but soone after, as saith the Poet, 1012.

Cut in his comes.

The Danes afflicted England 200. yeeres, and reigne about 20.

* Hardy-Knout. Edward the Confessor.

——— Mores rebus cessere secundis,
Prosperity perverted maners.

The Priests were idle, drowsie and unlearned; the people given to riot and loose life: they grew also through rest to be lither, discipline lay, as it were, dead, the commonwealth sick as one would say of an infinite sort of vices, lay in consumption and E pined away: but pride aboye all, whose waiting maid is destruction, was come to a mightie head. And as Gervasius * Doroberneńsis, of that time speaketh: They fell so fast to commit wickednesse, that to be ignorant of sinfull crimes, was held to be a crime. All which most evidently foreshewed destruction. The Englishmen of those times, as William of Malmesburie writeth, went lightly appointed with their garments, reaching but to the mid knee, their heads shorne, their beards shaven, but the upper lip uncut, where the mustaches grew continually, wearing massie bracelets of gold about their armes, carying marks upon their skin, pounced in, of sundry colours: The clergie contenting themselves, with trivial literature, could scarsly hack and hew out the words of the Sacrament.

* Of Canterbury.

THE

Digitized by Google

THE NORMANS.

LIke as in ancient times out of that East coast of Germaine (in respect of us) which tendeth Northward, the Franks first, & then the Saxons, grievously annoied both France, Gaule, and Britaine, with their depredations, so that in the end, the one became Lords of Britaine, the other of France: euen so in these later daies ensuing, the Danes first, and afterward the Normans succeeding in their place, from out of the same coast did the like. As if it were fatally giuen vnto that tract, by the dispose and prouidence of almightie God, to conceive still, and often times to send out of her wombe, nations to afflict France, and Britaine, yea and to establish new kingdomes therein.

Nordmanni. Nord-ieuti. Helmoldus.

These Normans were so called of the Northern quarter or climate from whence they came: For, Nordmans be nothing else but Men of the north: in which sense also they are named Nordleudi, that is, a Northern people (for, a mixt nation they were of the most valiant Norvegians, Suedens and Danes.) In the time of Charles the Great, they practised roving and piracie, in such cruel maner about Frisia, Belgica, England, Ireland, & France, that when the said Charles the Great saw their roving ships in the Mediterranean sea, he shed teares abundantly, and with a grievous deepe sigh said: Heavy I am at the heart that in my life time they durst once come upon this coast: and I foresee what mischiefe they will worke hereafter to my posterity: Yea and in the publicke Processions, and Litaines of Churches, this afterwards was added to the rest: From the rage of Normans, Good Lord deliver us. They drave the French to that extremitie, that King Charles the * Bald was forced to give unto Hasting a Norman Archpirate, the Earledome of Charters for to asswage the mans furie: King Charles the * Grosse, granted unto Godfrey the Norman a part of * Neustria, with his daughter also in mariage. But afterwards, by force and armes they seated themselves neere unto the mouth of the riuer Sein, in a country which before time was corruptly called Neustria, because it had bene parcell of Westrasia: For, so the writers of the middle time named that which the Germans used to call Westen-rijch, that is, the West-kingdome: and doth comprise all that lieth between the rivers of Loyre and Seine: Which tooke the name of Normandie afterwards of them, as it were the region of Northren men, when King Charles the Simple had confirmed it unto their Prince * Rollo, whose Godfather he was at his Baptisme, to be held in Fee by homage, and withall bestowed upon him his daughter in mariage.

The booke of Sangall concerning the Acts of Charles the Great.
* Calvus.
* Crassus.
* Normandy.
Neustria.
* Rou.

At which time, as we read in an old Manuscript belonging to the Monasterie of Angiers, Charles surnamed * Stultus, gave Normandie to Rollo, and his daughter Gista with it: This Rollo deigned not to kisse the foote of Charles, and when his friends about him admonished him to kisse the Kings foote as his homager, for the receit of so great a benefit, he answered in the English tongue, Ne se by God, which they interpret thus, No by God: The king then and his Courtiers deriding him and corruptly repeating his speech, called him Bigod, whereupon the Normans be at this day called Bigodi. Hence also peradventure it is, that the Frenchmen even still use to call hypocrites and superstitious folke, Bigod.

* The Foole.
Bigod.

This Rollo, who being baptised received therewith the name of Robert; some writers report to have become a Christian but in shew and colour only; others, upon good deliberation and in earnest: and they adde moreover, that he was warned so to doe by God in a dreame: which I pray you give me leave, (being a man for all this, that doateth not upon dreames) to relate without suspicion of vanity, from the credit of writers in those daies. The report goeth, that as he sailed; he dreamed he saw himselfe fouly infected with the leprosie, but when he was washed once in a most cleere spring at the foote of an high hill, he recovered, and was clensed thereof, and anon climbed up to the top of the said hill. This Dreame when he reported, a Christian that was a captive in the same ship with him, interpreted it in this wise: The Le-

prosie

Digitized by Google

A Leproſie was the impious worſhip of Idols-gods, wherewith he was tainted; that offspring, betokned the holy * Laver of Regeneration, wherewith being once cleanſed, he ſhould aſcend up the hill, that is, attaine unto high honor, and heaven it ſelfe. * Baptiſme.

This Rollo begat William ſurnamed * Long-eſpee, of the long ſword which he uſed to weare: and William begat Richard, the firſt of that name. Whoſe ſonne, and nephew by his ſonne carying both his name, ſucceeded after him in the Duchie of Normandie: but when Richard the third was dead without iſſue, his brother Robert was Duke in his ſtead, who of his concubine begat that William, whom we commonly name The Conquerour, and the Baſtard. All theſe were every one for their noble acts, atchieved both at home and abroad, moſt renowned Princes. Now whiles B this William, being of ripe yeeres, ruled Normandie, Edward the holy, ſurnamed CONFESSOR, king of England, and the laſt of the Saxons line, departed out of this world unto his heavenly country, to the great miſſe and loſſe of his people, who being the ſonne of Ladie Emma coſen to William, and daughter to Richard, the firſt of that name, Duke of Normandie, whiles he remained in Normandie baniſhed, had promiſed unto him, that he ſhould ſucceed after him in the Crowne of England. But Harold the ſonne of Godwin, and Great Maſter or Steward of King Edwards houſe, uſurped the Kingdome: whom to diſpoſſeſſe, his brother * Toſto of one ſide, and the Normans of the other, did what they could, and left no ſtone unturned: But C when he in a pitched field had, neere unto Stamford bridg in Yorkſhire, ſlaine his brother Toſto and Harald king of Norway, whom Toſto had drawen to take part with him in this warre, and ſo obtained bloudy victory, behold within nine daies after the ſaid WILLIAM ſurnamed the Baſtard, Duke of Normandie, taking hold of the promiſes of king Edward late deceaſed, and preſuming of his adoption and neere alliance, having levied a great armie, arrived in England among the South-Saxons. Againſt whom Harald forthwith advanced, albeit his ſouldiours were ſore wearied, and his power by the former battaile much empaired. And not far from Haſtings they encounter and joine battaile: where Harald engaging himſelfe into the mids of the medley, and fighting manfully loſt his life with a great number of Engliſhmen left D ſlaine in the place: but how many they were juſt, hard it is exactly to conceive and faithfully to put downe. WILLIAM thus a Conquerour preſently with banner diſplaid marched about in order of battaile by Wallingford to London: where being received, he was ſolemnly inaugurated King, as unto whom, by his owne ſaying, The Kingdome was by Gods providence appointed, and by vertue of a gift from his Lord and Coſen King Edward the Glorious, granted: and after ſome few lines, the ſtory runneth on and ſaith, that the moſt bounteous King Edward had by adoption ordained him his heire in the kingdome of England. And yet if we liſt to beleeve the Hiſtorie of Saint Stephens in Caen of Normandie, at his laſt breath he uttered theſe words: The Regall Diadem which none of all my predeceſſors euer wore, I got & gained by the grace of God E onely, and no right of inheritance. And a little after: I ordaine no man heire of the Kingdome of England, but I commend the ſame to the eternall Creator, whoſe I am, and in whoſe hands are all things. For I became not poſſeſſed of ſo great honour by any hereditarie right, but by a terrible conflict, and with much effuſion of bloud I tooke it from that perjured King Harald, and after I had either ſlaine or put to flight his favourers, and adherents, I ſubdued it under my Dominion.

But why doe I ſo briefly run over this ſo great alteration of the Engliſh ſtate? Haue therefore, if you thinke not mch to read it, what my ſelfe with no curious pen, (haply with as little ſtudie and premeditation, howbeit according to the truth of the Hiſtorie) wrote, when being but young, not well adviſed nor of ſufficiencie F to undergoe ſo great a burden, I purpoſed to ſet forth our Hiſtorie in the Latine tongue.

Dukes of Normandie.

* Domus regia Maior.

* Or Toſtre.

Mormans 1066.

The Charter of William Conquerour.

The Hiſtorie of Saint Stephens Abbay at Cane in Normandie.

WHen Edward the Confeſſour was now without iſſue departed this life, the Nobles and people of the land were in doubtfull care diſtracted about the ſetting up of a new King in his place. Edgar, ſurnamed Aetheling, grand child unto King Edmund Iron-ſide, onely

The Normans conqueſt.

Digitized by Google

onely of all the issue male of the Saxons line remained alive, unto whom by right of inheri- A tance the kingdome was due. But considering he was thought by reason of his tender yeeres, not meete to manage the State, and had beside intermingled his naturall disposition *Hungarie. with forrain maners, as being borne in * Pannonia, and the sonne of Agathra daughter to the Emperor Henrie the third, who was in so remote a countrie farther off, than that he could conveniently assist the young Gentleman either with aid or counsell: in these regards he was lesse affected of the Englishmen, who desired nothing more than to have a King, (as it were) out of their owne bodie: And therefore, all of them for the most part had their eies fixed with much respect upon Harald Goodwins sonne, a man for his good parts as well in warre as peace very glorious. For albeit he was of noble parentage but by one side: and his father B for his treacherie and treason, as also for pilling and polling had incurred everlasting infamie and shame, yet with his courteous affability, gentill deportment, liberality, and warlike prowesse he woond himselfe into exceeding great especiall favour with the people. For, there could not another be set by him, in whom there was more resolute hardines to adventure upon danger, or more advised policie in the mids of dangers. His valour also and fortune shined out so apparently in the Welch wars, which heretofore most happily he had brought to an end, that he was reputed verily a man passing well furnished with all vertues required in a soveraigne Commander, & even borne to repare the decaied state of England.
Moreover, good hope there was that the Danes (who onely terrified this country) would be the better contẽted & pleased with him, because he was the sonne of Githa, daughter to Sue- C no King of Denmarke. And in case ther should arise any other power against him, either forrain or domesticall, he was thought sufficiently enabled to make his part good, with the affectionate hearts of the common people, with the alliance also and affinitie that he had among the Nobility. For he had to wife, the sister of Morcar and Edwin two brethren, men of exceeding great puissance: and Edric surnamed the Wild, a man of high spirit and in chiefe authority was linked to him in the neerest bond of Affinitie: Besides, it fell out very well for him, that at one and the self same time, Sueno king of the Danes had his hands full of warre with Sueden; and between William Duke of Normandie, and Philip the French king, there fell some dislikes and emulation, for that Edward the Confessour during his exile in Normandie, had in expresse termes promised unto William of Normandie the Kingdome, if he D died without issue: For the performance of which promise, Harold became, as it were, surety, and bound himselfe with an oath, (what time as he was detained prisoner in Normandie): but with this condition annexed, that he might espouse the daughter of the said William of Normandie. Whereupon most men thought it the wisest policie to set the crowne upon William his head; to the end that by performing oath, and promise, the warre that they foresaw now threatned, and destruction (which alwaies waiteth as a due punishment upon perjurie) might be averted, and withall by laying Normandie to England, the Kingdome under so mightie a Prince might be surely established, & the Common-wealth very much advanced. But Harold quickly preuenting all consultations whatsoever; thinking it not good for him to linger and delay any whit: that very day on which King Edward was enterred, E contrary to the expectation of most men, entred upon the soveraigne government, and with the applause onely of such as were then present about him, who with acclamations saluted him King, without the due complements and solemnitie of Coronation, set the Imperiall Diadem upon his owne head. By which act of his, as being a breach of ancient ordinance, he exceedingly provoked and stirred up against him, the whole clergie and Ecclesiasticall state.
But he knowing well enough, how hard it was for a new Prince, and an usurper, to maintaine his roiall place and dignity, without an opinion of pietie and vertue, for to blot out that his offence given, and to establish his Scepter, did all he possibly could for the promoting of religion, and preferment of Churchmen, and to beautifie and adorne Monasteries and religious houses: Edgar Aetheling Earle of Oxford, and all the nobles he entertained with all love F & favour: the people he eased of their tributes: he gave bountifully a great largesse of monie to poore people: and in one word, with faire speech and affable language, with mild hearing of causes, & equitie in deciding the same, he woon to himselfe singular love, and no lesse authority and reputation. So soone as William Duke of Normandie was truly advertised of these newes, he seemed to take the death of King Edward very heavily, whiles in the meane time,

Digitized by Google

A time, he was vexed at the heart that England which he had in conceit and hope already swallowed & devoured, was thus caught away out of his very chawes. Forthwith therefore, by advice of his counsell & friends, he dispatcheth Embassadors to Herold, with instructions to put him in mind of the promises and stipulation past; but withall, in his name to make claime to the crowne. Harold, after some pause and deliberation upon the point, returneth this answere: As touching the promises of King Edward, William was to understand, that the Realme of England could not be given by promise, nitther ought he to be tied unto the said promise, seeing the kingdome was fallen unto him by election and not by right of inheritance. And as for his owne stipulation, extorted and wrung it was from then a prisoB ner, by force and by guile, in feare of perpetuall imprisonment, to the hinderance of the English common-wealth and prejudice of the State, and therefore void: which neither ought he, if he could, nor might if he would, make good, since it was done without the Kings privitie and consent of the people. And a very hard and unreasonable demand it was of his, that he should renounce and surrender unto a Norman Prince, a meere stranger and of forrein linage, that kingdome wherein he was invested with so great assent of all sorts. With this answere William was not well pleased, and he thought that Harold thereby sought starting holes for to hide his perjurie. Others therefore he sent out of hand in Embassage about the same matter, who should admonish him, how religiously he had bound himselfe by oath, and that forsworne persons should be sure of finall perdition at Gods hands, and reprochfull C shame among men. But when as now the daughter of William affianced unto Harold in the covenant, (the very strength and knot of the foresaid stipulation) was by Gods appointment taken away by death, the Embassadours were with lesse courtesie entertained, and received none other answere than before. So that now by this time, there was nothing like to follow but open warre. Harold riggeth and prepareth his navie, mustereth and pressеth souldiers and placeth strong garisons along the sea coasts in convenient places, and provideth all things in readines which were thought needfull and meet for to beat backe the Norman forces: Howbeit, the first tempest of warre, beside the expectation of all men, arose from Tosto the brother in whole bloud of Harold. He being a man of a proud, hautie and fell heart, ruled in great authority a good while over Northumberland, but growing outragious in cruelty to D his inferiors, in pride toward his Soveraigne, and in hatred to his brethren, was outlawed by Edward the Confessor, and so withdrew himselfe into France, and now, by the advice of Baldwine Earle of Flanders, and perswasion of William Duke of Normandie, as it seemeth probable, (For Tosto and William maried two daughters of Baldwine Earle of Flanders) beginneth to trouble his brother with open warre, whom a long time he deadly hated. From Flanders he tooke sea with a fleet of 60. rovers-ships, wasteth the Isle of Wight, & annoyeth the sea-coast of Kent: but terrified at the cōming of the kings navie, he set up saile & directing his course toward the more remote parts of Eng land, landeth in Lincolneshire, and there harrieth the Countrey: where Edwin and Morcar give him battell: but being discomfited and put to flight, into Scotland he goes, from thence to renew his forces and so to E warre afresh. Now were all mens minds held in suspense with the expectation of a twofold warre, of the one side out of Scotland, of the other out of Normandie: and so much the more, because at the feast of Easter, there was seene about a sevennight together a blasing starre of an hideous and fearefull forme, which turned mens minds already troubled and perplexed, (as it falleth out in a turbulent time) to the forefeeling of some unluckie events. A Comete. But Harold carried an heedfull eie to all parts of his kingdome, and the south coast he fortified with garisons. Lesse feare he had from Scotland and Tosto, because * Malcolm king of the Scots was sore disquieted with civill dissensions. Meane while, William much busied in his mind about England, casting about what course to take, ever and anon communicated F with his Captaines about the point; whom he saw cheerefull, and full of forward hopes: But all the difficulty was how to make money for defraying the charges of so great a warre. For, when in a publike assembly of all the stats of Normandie, it was propounded as touching a subsidie, answere was made, That in the former warre against the French, their wealth was so much empaired, that if a new warre should come upon them, they were hardly able to hold and defend their owne: That they were to looke rather unto the defence of their proper possessions, than to invade the territories of others: and this war intended, just Malcolm. * Mil-Columbus.

though

though it were, yet seemed it not so necessary, but exceeding dangerous: beside, the Normans were not by their allegeance bound to military service in forrain parts. Neither could they by any meanes be brought to grant a levie of money, although William Fitzosbern, a man in high favour with the Duke and as gracious among the people, endevoured what he could to effect it: yea, and to drawe others by his owne example, promised to set out sortie tall ships of his owne proper charges towards this warre. Duke William then, seeing he could not bring this about in a publike meeting, goeth another way to worke. The wealthiest men that were he sendeth for, severally one by one to repaire unto him: he speaks them faire, and requireth them to contribute somewhat toward this warre. They then, as if they had strived avie who should helpe their Prince most, promise largely: and when that which they promised was presently registred in a booke, there was a huge masse of money quickly raised, and more than men would ever have thought. These matters thus dispatched, he craveth aid and helpe of the Princes his neighbours, to witt, he Earles of * Anjou, * Poictou, * Maine and * Bulloigne, & unto them he promiseth faire Lands and possessions in England. Philip also the French king he goeth unto, and solliciteth: voluntarily promising in case he aided him, to become his vassall and leege man, and for England to take the oath of fealtie unto him. But it being thought nothing good for the state of France, that the Duke of Normandie, who already was not so pliable and obedient to the French king as he ought, should be bettered in his state by the addition of England (for, the power of neighbour potentates is alwaies suspected of Princes) so far was the king from yeelding any helpe, that he disswaded him rather from invading England. But by no meanes could the Duke be reclamed from his enterprise, nay much more encouraged he was now and set on, being once backed with warrant from Alexander the Bishop of Rome (for even now began the Pope to usurpe authority over Princes:) who allowing of his cause and quarell, had sent unto him a sacred and hallowed banner as a luckie fore-token of gaining both the victory, and Kingdome: yea and with all cursed whosoever should oppose themselves against him. Hee assembled therefore all the forces he could possible raise, and gathered together a mighty navie before the Towne of Saint Valeries, which standeth upon the mouth of the river Some, where he lay a long time windbound: For the procurement whereof with many a vow he importuned Saint Valeric the patron-Saint of the towne, and heaped upon him a number of gifts and oblations. Harold, who with his forces had waited very long in vaine for his comming determined to dissolve his armie, to withdraw his navie, and to leave the Sea-coast: both for that he was compelled thereto for want of prouision, as also because the Earle of Flanders had written unto him, that William would not stirre that yeere: whom he soone beleeved, as thinking that the time of the yere was such, as had locked up the seas & barred all navigation, for as much as the [autumnall] * Aequinox was neere: Whiles he thus deviseth with himselfe, driven he was (upon an unexpected necessity of new warre) to call backe his armie; for, Harold surnamed the * Hard and Harfager, king of Norway, who had practised piracie in the North parts of Britaine, and already subdued the Isles of Orknes, being by Tosto sollicited and called forth in hope of the Kingdome of England, arrived within the mouth of the river Tine with a fleet of 500. flibotes or thereabout, where Tosto also came and joined his owne fleet. When they had a good while forraied and spoiled the countrey heere, they weighed anchor, and sailing along the coast of Yorkshire, put into Humbre, and there began to commit outrages with all maner of hostility. For the repressing of whom, the two Earles Edwin and Morcar led forth a power of souldiers, whom they had raised suddainly and in tumultuary haste: but they not able to abide the violent charge of the Norwegians, fled for the most part as fast as they could, and together with the Earles made shift to escape: howbeit, many of them passing over the river Ouse, were swallowed up with the waves thereof. The Norwegians then, goe in hand to lay siege unto the Citie of Yorke, which straightwaies they get by surrender, hostages being given on both sides. But after some few dayes, King Harold having gathered his whole power from all parts together, speedeth him to Yorke, and from thence marcheth against the Norwegians, who lay encamped strongly in a most safe place: for backed they were with the Ocean, flanked on the left hand with Humber, wherein their fleet rid at anchor, and had for their defence on the right side and afront, the river Derwent. Howbeit King Harold courageously setteth upon them: where first, there was Filius Osberni.

* Andium.
* Pictonum.
* Genemannorum.
* Bononiæ.

* When daies and nights be of alength: about the eleuenth day of September.
* Durus.

A B C D E F

Digitized by Google

A was a cruell conflict at the Bridge, ſtanding over the river Darwent, which one Norwegian ſouldier, by report, made good for a time againſt the whole armie of the Engliſhmen, and held out ſo long until he was ſhot thorow with a dart, and died: after this continued the battell a good while within the verie campe, fought with equall valour, and indifferent fortune on both ſides: But in the end, the Norwegians were diſarraied and ſcattered, and in the mids of the battell Harold himſelfe King of the Norwegians, and Toſte, with the greater part of the Armie loſt their lives. Vpon this Victorie, there fell unto King Harold an exceeding rich bootie, a great maſſe both of gold and ſilver, and that huge Armada, except twentie ſmall Barkes onely; which hee granted unto Paul Earle of Orkney and O- Stanford bridge neere Yorke.

B lave the Sonne of Harold who was ſlaine, for to carie away thoſe that were hurt, taking their oath firſt, that from thenceforward they ſhould not attempt any hoſtiltie againſt England. This happy Victorie encouraged Harold and ſet him aloft: now, he thought that he ſhould be a terrour, yea, to the Normans, howſoever he grew odious unto his owne people, becauſe he had not divided the ſpoile among his ſouldiers. Howbeit, wholly hee employed himſelfe to reforme the diſordered ſtate of the countrey, which in this part was pitifully out of frame and lay neglected. Meane while, William Duke of Normandie, finding a fit ſeaſon for his purpoſe, about the end of September weighed anker and launched forth: then with a gentle gale of winde, he ſailed with all his ſhipping; and arrived at Pevenſey in Suſſex, where being landed upon the naked ſhore, for to cut off all hope of return from his men, he did ſet fire

C on his ſhips: and having erected a fortreſſe there, for his men to retire thither in ſafetie, forward he marcheth to Haſtings, where alſo he raiſed another ſtrong hold, and placed therein a garriſon. Now by this time, he maketh proclamation, declaring the cauſes of this warre: namely, to revenge the death of Alfred his Couſin, whom together with many Normans Godwin the Father of Harold had murdered: Item, to bee avenged of the wrongs that Harald had done, who when he had baniſhed Robert Archbiſhop of Canterburie, even then by intruſion entred upon the Kingdome of England now pertaining to him, (treading under foot the religious reſpect of his oath.) Howbeit, by an Edict he ſtraightly charged his ſouldiers not in hoſtile maner to ſpoile the Engliſh men. Newes hereof in all haſte was brought to King Harold, who by all meanes thinking it good to uſe prevention, and as ſpeedily as might

D be to encounter the Duke, ſendeth out his meſſengers everie way, calleth earneſtly upon his ſubjects to continue in their faithfull allegeance, aſſembleth all his forces in everie place, and with great journeys haſteneth to London: where there preſented himſelfe unto him an Embaſſadour from Duke William; but as he made many words in claiming the Kingdom, Harold in a furious fit of anger and indignation, went within a little of laying violent hands upon the verie perſon of the Embaſſadour. For a hard matter it was to bereave a freſh Victour of his pride and confident hope. Forthwith he diſpatcheth his Embaſſadours alſo unto William, by way of inſolent termes to menace him, unleſſe with all ſpeed he retired back into Normandie. Yet William gave them a gentle anſwere, and diſmiſſed them with great courteſie. Meane time, Harold muſtereth up ſouldiers in London, and findeth that by the former bat-

E tell againſt the Norwegians, his forces were very much diminiſhed: yet a mightie armie he levied of Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the love of their native countrey had raiſed and brought into the field, for to put backe and repell the common danger. Preſently he leadeth forth into Suthſex, notwithſtanding his mother (though in vaine) did what ſhe could to ſtay him: and with an undaunted heart, encamping upon a faire plaine, ſcarſe ſeven miles from Duke William, ſat him downe. And thither alſo immediatly the Norman approached with his Armie. Firſt there were ſecretly ſent out on both ſides Eſpies: and they of the Engliſh part, either not knowing the truth, or diſpoſed to lie, made incredible report of the Normans number, their furniture and proviſion, of their good order alſo and diſcipline, inſomuch as Gyth, a yonger brother of King Harold, a man renowmed for martiall exploits, thinking it no good policy to

F hazard all in the triall of one battell, advertiſed the King, that the events of war were doubtful; that victories oftener depended of fortune than of valour, and that holding off, and deliberat delay, was the chiefeſt point of militarie diſcipline: Alſo, he adviſed him, that in caſe hee had made promiſe unto William of the Kingdom, he ſhould for his owne perſon withdraw himſelf: for ſurely he could not with al his forces be fenced againſt his conſcience, & God no doubt, would require puniſhment for breach of faith and promiſe: neither, ſaith he, wil any thing ſtrike

Digitized by Google

greater terrour into the Normans, than if he ſhould be levying and enrolling of a new Armie, whereby they might be received eſſoones with freſh battels. Furthermore, hee aſſureth him in his owne behalfe, that if hee would commit the fortune of that battell into his hands, he would not faile to performe the part of a good brother, and a valiant captaine: as who truſting upon the cleerenesse of his heart, and a good conſcience, might either more eaſily defeat his enemies, or elſe more happily ſpend his life for his countrey. The King was not well content, to heare theſe admonitions and counſels which ſeemed to tend unto his diſhonour: for, as hee could willingly abide the event and iſſue of warre, ſo in no wiſe could he endure the reproach of feareſull cowardiſe. And therefore, the praiſes of the Normans with bad words he depraved, neither thought hee that it would ſtand with his owne dignitie, or the reputation of his former proweſſe, being now come as it were to the utmoſt point of perill and hazard, like a milke-ſoppe and daſtard, to draw foot backe, and incurre the perpetuall ſtaine and blot of ſhame. Thus, whom it pleaſeth almightie God to overthrow, he firſt maketh them uncapable of good counſell. Whiles theſe matters thus paſſed between them, Duke William upon a pious affection to preſerve and maintaine the ſtate of Chriſtendome, and to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, ſendeth a Monke as a mediatour between both, who propoſed this offer and condition unto Harold, Either wholly to reſigne up his Kingdome, or to acknowledge from thence forth, that he holdeth it of the Norman Duke as his ſuperiour Lord, or elſe to decide the quarrell with William by combate, or at leaſtwiſe to ſtand to the judgement of the Pope of Rome, touching the Kingdom of England. But he as one having no rule of himſelfe, and accepting of no condition whatſoever, referred the whole triall of the matter to the tribunall ſeat of God, and made anſwere, that the verie next day following, which was the ſecond* before the Ides of October, hee would bid him battell: and this day upon a credulous errour, he had aſſured himſelfe would be fortunate unto him, becauſe it was his birth day. All the night enſuing, the Engliſh men ſpent in licentious revels, in riotous exceſſe of banquetting, and in clamorous noiſes: But the Normans beſtowed the ſame in praiers and vowes for the ſafetie of the armie, and for victorie. The next morning by day light they embattell themſelves on both ſides: Harold placed in the vant-gard, the Kentiſh men with their billes* and halberts, (for by an old cuſtome the front of the battell was due to them:) and in the reregard himſelfe tooke place with his brother, and thoſe of middle England with the Londoners. Of the Normans vaward Roger of Montgomerie, and William Fitz-osberne had the leading: the ſame conſiſted of horſemen out of Aniou, Perch, and little Britaine, the moſt part of whom ſerved under Fergentus the Briton. The maine battell which ſtood of Poictouins and Germans, Geffrey Martell, and a German Penſioner commanded. In the reregard was the Duke himſelfe with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobilitie and Gentrie. But in every place, were intermingled with the reſt certaine companies of Archers. The Normans having with no confuſed nor untunable ſhout, ſounded the battell, and advanced forward with their Battailons, and at the firſt encounter did let flie luſtily on every ſide a volley of arrowes like haile, a kinde of fight, which as it was ſtrange to the Engliſhmen, ſo it terrified them exceedingly: for, they flew ſo thick, that they thought they had their enemies even in the mids of themſelves. Then with a violent charge, they aſſaile the vaward of the Engliſh: and they for their parts, who reſolutely had determined to cover the place which they had taken up with their bodies, rather than to give one foot of ground, bending all their forces, and keeping themſelves cloſe together right valiantly put the enemies backe, and ſlew a number of them: the Normans reenforced themſelves againe upon them, and with an horrible noiſe, the battels of both ſides gave the ſtroke: And now by this time were they come to the medley, wherein as if foot to foot, and man to man, they had coped together, there was for a good while a fierce & cruel fight: The Engliſh men ſtanding thick and cloſe, as if they had ſtucke one to another, abid the brunt and charge of the enemies with conſtant reſolution, inſomuch as after many a bloudie wound received, they were now at the point to have reculed, had not William performing the part of a leader, as well as of a ſouldier, with his authoritie reſtrained them. Thus the fight continuing ſtill, the Norman horſemen brake in upon them, and withall from above the arrowes flew ſo thicke about the Engliſh mens eares, that they were in maner overwhelmed with them: yet for all that, they kept their array unbroken. For, Harold neglecting no dutie of a valorous Captaine, was readie in perſon everie where: and William againe for his part bare himſelfe as worthily, who having one or two horſes ſtabbed and ſlaine under him, ſeeing that hee could not by

* 14. Octobr.

*Or heavie Axes.

Digitized by Google

A by fine force, and true valour indeed get the upper hand, betooke himselfe to stratagems: commanding his men to sound the retreat, and keeping them still in good order and array, to give ground and retire. The English men supposing now, that they turned backe and fled, and that themselves had the victorie in their hands, display their ranks, and being thus distraied, presse hard upon their enemies, as making full account that the day was now sure enough theirs. Whereas the Normans casting themselves suddenly againe into array, and winding about, charge the English afresh, and thus setting upon them being scattered, and out of order, enclosed them round about, and made an exceeding great slaughter of them. Many of them whiles they stood doubtfull, whether to fight or to flie, were borne downe and slaine: but more of them having re-
B covered an higher ground, casting themselves round into a ring, and comforted with the exhortation one of another, with good resolution, turned head and resisted a long time, as if they had made choice of that place for an honourable death: until that Harold being shot thorow the head with an arrow, together with his two brethren, Gyth, & Leofwin, lost his life. Then Edwin & Morcar with some few others that remained alive, and escaped by flight, yeelded to the hand of God, and gave place unto the time, considering that the battell had continued without intermission from seven of the clock in the morning unto the evening twilight. There were in this battell missed of Normans much about 6000: but of English many more by farre. William now Conqueror, reioyced exceedingly, and by way of a solemn supplication or procession, which he appointed, gave al honor to the almightie and most gratious God: and when hee had erected his pavili-
C on in the midst of the bodies lying slaine by heapes, there he passed that night. The morow after, when he had buried his owne men, and granted leave unto the English men to doe the like, himselfe returned to Hastings, partly to consult about following the traine of his victorie, and in part to refresh a while his wearied souldiers. No sooner was the newes of this grievous overthrow by fearfull Messengers brought to London, and to other cities of England, but the whole land generally was stricken into dumpes, and as it were astonied. Githa the Kings mother, like a woman gave her selfe to plaints and lamentations so, as that shee would admit no consolation, but with most humble praiers intreated the Conquerour, for the dead bodies of her sonnes. And those she enterreth in the Abbey of Waltham. Edwin sendeth Queene Algitha his sister into the farther parts of the Kingdome: But the Lords and Peeres of the Realme, will the people not to cast downe their hearts, but lay their heads together about the State and Common-wealth.
D The Archbishop of Yorke, the Citizens of London, and the Sea-souldiers, whom they called Boten capten, gave their advice to consecrate Eadgar King, and to begin warre againe with William. Edwin and Morcar plotted secretly to usurpe the imperiall rule and dignitie for themselves: but the Bishops, Prelates, and others, who were terrified with the flashing thunderbolts of the Popes curse, thought best to yeeld, and not by doubtfull battell to provoke the Conquerours heavie indignation against them: nor to strive against God, who now for the sinnes of the people calling for vengeance, had delivered England, as it were, into the hands of the Norman. William all this whiles fortifying the towne of Hastings, purposed to march directly with his armie in warlike maner to London: but because he would raise the greater terrour abroad, and make all sure behinde, having divided his Botescarlet.
E forces, he rangeth over part of Kent, over Suthsex, Suthrey, Suthampton shire and Berk shire, fireth villages, and upland houses, driveth booties, at Wallangford he passeth over the Thames, and terrifieth all the countrey as he goeth. Yet for all this, the Nobles and Peeres wist not what counsell or course to take, neither could they be brought, to lay downe private grudges, and enmities, and with one heart to consult in common for the good of the State. The Prelates, to be absolved from curses of the Church, and censures of the Bishop of Rome, (whereby now he exercised his authoritie, not onely over mens soules, but also over Kingdomes) seeing that the state of the realme was now not decayed, but quite ruinate and past recoverie, persisted in this mind to submit, in so much as many seeking to save them-
F selves, secretly departed out of the Citie. But Alfred Archbishop of Yorke, Wolstan Bishop of Worcester, and other Prelates, together with Eadgar Aetheling, Edwin and Morcar, at Berkhamsted doe meet the Norman Conquerour, (who made them many and large promises:) and having given hostages, committed themselves to his protection, and submitted. Then forthwith speedeth he to London, where being received with great and joyful acclamations, he was saluted King: for the solemnizing of his Coronation, which he appointed should be on Christmas day, he made all the preparation that might bee, and meane while bent his whole mind, and all his thoughts to the setling of the State. A

Digitized by Google

Now was the period and revolution of the English-Saxons Empire in Britaine come about, which was determined within the compasse of 607. yeeres, and a notable alteration and change made in the Kingdome of England: which some lay upon the base avarice of the Magistrates, and the superstitious lazinesse of the Prelates: others impute to that Comet or blazing Starre, and the powerable influence of celestiall bodies: some againe made God the Author thereof, who in his secret iudgements, and those never unjust, disposeth of Kingdomes. Others also there were, who looked into neerer secundarie causes, and they found a great want and lacke of wisedome in King Edward, in that whiles under a goodly shew and B pretext of religious and vowed virginitie, hee casting off all care of having issue, exposed the Kingdome for a prey to ambitious humours.

WHat an insolent and bloudie victorie this was, the Monks that write of it, haue declamed with full mouth: neither is it to be doubted, but in this Victorie, (as it hapneth in other) wickednes tooke head and bare the full sway. William the Conqueror, in token as it were of a Trophee for this conquest, abrogated some part of the ancient positive lawes of England, brought in some Customes of Normandie, and by vertue of a decree, commanded, That all causes should be pleaded in the French tongue. The English he thrust out of their ancient Inheritances, assigned their lands C and Lordships to his souldiers, yet with this reservation to himselfe, that he should still remaine chiefe Lord and bind them to doe due service and homage unto him and his successors, that is to say, That all of them should hold their lands in Fee or fealty. He caused also a Seale for himselfe to be made of purpose, with this inscription upon the one side:

Hoc Normannorum Guilielmum nosce Patronum,

The Normans Patron William know, by this stamp that you;

And on the other:

Hoc Anglis signo Regem fatearis eundem:

By this, a king to Englishmen, acknowledge him to be. D

The seale of William Conqueror.

Moreover, as William of Malmesburie doth report, In imitation of Cæsars policy, who expelled the Germans, (lying hidden within that huge forrest Ardenna, and by many a sallie from thence annoying his armie) not by the helpe of his owne Romans, but by the Gaules his confederates: to this end, that whiles strangers and aliens killed one another, himselfe might triumph with their bloudshed: the very same course, I say, did William take with the English men. For, against certaine of them, who upon the first battell of that infortunate man Harold were flea into Denmarke and Ireland, and returned with a puissant armie in the third yeere after, he opposed meere English forces and an English Generall; permitting the Normans to sit still and keepe holiday: foreseeing heereby and providing for his owne great easement, whether of them so ever should have the better. Neither was he in this point E frustrate of his purpose. For, the English, having thus a prettie while skuffeled and skirmished one with another, in the end rendred up the entire Victorie to the King, without his paines taking. And in another place: Having undermined and quite overthrowne the power of the Laimen, he provided by a sure and irrevocable edict, to suffer no Monke or Clerke of the English Nation, to endevour for to get any dignitie; much disagreeing herein from the clemencie and gentlenesse of King Cnuto in times past, who gave unto those that he conquered, all their honours entire. And hence it came to passe, that when hee was once dead, the naturall Inhabitants of the country upon light occasions fell to driving out of strangers, and recovered unto themselves their ancient right and freedome.

When he had brought this to passe, above all things hee laboured to turne away F the storme of Danish warres, that hung over his head, and to purchase peace, though it were with round sums of mony. Wherein he used Adelbert Archbishop of Hamburgh as his Instrument. For, Adam Bremensis writeth thus: Betweene Suen and the Bastard there was continuall strife about England, although our Bishop being greased in the hand with Williams bribes, would have concluded a firme peace betwixt the

Kings

Digitized by Google

A Kings. Which may ſeeme alſo to have been eſtabliſhed: for, ſince that time, England was never any whit afraid of the Danes. And William verily betooke himſelfe wholly to the defence and maintenance of his imperiall dignitie, and to governe the ſtate by excellent lawes. For, as Gervaſe of Tilburie writeth; When the renowmed Conqueror of England King William, had ſubdued the farther coaſts of this Iland, under his dominion, and thorowly tamed the ſtomacks and hearts of rebels by terrible examples, leſt that from thenceforth they ſhould licentiouſly run into errour and commit treſpaſſe, hee determined to reduce his ſubiects under the obedience of poſitive, and written Lawes. Having therefore all the Lawes of England laid before him, according to the Tripartite Diviſion,
B whereby they were diſtinguiſhed, that is to ſay, Merchenlage, Denelage, and Weſtſexenlage, when he had rejected ſome of them, and allowed of others, he adjoined thereto thoſe Lawes of Neuſtria beyond the ſeas, which ſeemed moſt effectuall to preſerve the peace of his Kingdome.* Afterwards, as mine author Ingulphus ſaith, who flouriſhed in thoſe daies, Hee commanded every Inhabitant of England to doe him homage; and to ſweare fealtie to him againſt all men: Hee tooke the ſurvey and deſcription of the whole Land, — v. of this Book neither was there an Hide of England thorow, but he knew both the value, and the owner f. 519.
thereof; there was neither plaſh nor place, but ſet downe it was in the Kings Roll: and the rent, revenue, and profit thereof, the verie tenure of poſſeſſion, and poſſeſſour himſelfe was made knowen to the King; according to the credit and true relation of certaine Taxers, who
C being choſen out of every countrey, did put downe in writing the territorie properly belonging thereto. And this Roll was called, the Roll of Wincheſter, and by the Engliſhmen (for the generalitie ther of, becauſe it contained fully & exactly, al the tenements of the whole Land) named, Domeſday. I have been more willing to make mention of this book, becauſe it is to be cited and alleaged often times hereafter: which booke alſo, it pleaſeth mee to name, Gulielmi librum Cenſualem, that is, The Tax-booke of William: Angliæ Notitiam, that is, The Notice of England: Anglia commentarios Cenſuales, that is, The Taxe regiſter, or Seſſing booke of England: and Angliæ Luſtrum, that is, the Survey of England. Domeſday booke.

But whereas Polydore Virgill writeth, how William that Conquerour, firſt brought in the Triall or Iudgment of twelve men,* there is nothing more untrue. For,
D moſt certaine it is, and apparent by the Lawes of Etheldred, thas it was in uſe many yeeres before. Neither hath he any cauſe to terme it a terrible Iudgement. For theſe 12. free-borne and lawful men, are duly by order empannelled, and called forth of the Neighbourhood; theſe are bound by oath to pronounce and deliver up their Verdict, * de facto: they heare the counſell pleading in courts on both ſides before the Bench or Tribunall, and the depoſitions of witneſſes: then taking with them the evidences of both parties; they are ſhut up together; and kept from meat, drinke, and fire, (unleſſe haply ſome one of them be in danger of death thereby) ſo long, untill they bee all agreed of the fact: which when they have pronounced before the Iudge, hee, according to right and law giveth his definitive ſentence. For, this maner of triall our moſt ſage and wiſe Ance-
E ſtours have thought the beſt to find out the truth, to avoid corruption, and cut off all partialitie and affections. * A Iurie of twelve. * As touching the fact.

Now, as touching martiall proweſſe, how much the Normans excelled therein, let others tell: this may ſuffice for me to have ſaid thus much, that being planted among moſt warlike nations, they alwaies ſaved themſelves, not by obſequious baſeneſſe, but by force of armes, and founded moſt Noble Kingdomes in England and Sicilie. For Tancrede, nephew unto Richard the ſecond of that name, Duke of Normandie, and his poſteritie, atchieved brave exploits in Italie, and having compelled the Saracens to flie out of Sicilie, erected a Kingdome there. Whereupon the Sicilian Hiſtoriographer doth freely acknowledge, that the Sicilians are beholden unto the F Normans for that themſelves remaine ſtill in their native ſoile, live in freedom, and continue Chriſtians. Likewiſe in the holy Land their martiall proweſſe hath been ſeen with ſingular commendation. Hence it is alſo, that Roger Hoveden writeth in theſe termes; Bold France having made triall once of the Normans warfare, durſt not peepe out: Fierce England being conquered, yeelded as captive unto them: Rich Apulia falling to the lot of their poſſeſſion flouriſhed a freſh: Famous Ieruſalem, and renowned Antioch were both The warlike proweſſe of the Normans. Th. Fazel. in the ſixth booke of the latter Decad.

Digitized by Google

ſubdued by them. And ever ſince their comming, England as well for martiall honour as civil behaviour, hath among the moſt floriſhing Kingdoms of Chriſtendome flouriſhed with the beſt. In ſo much, as Engliſhmen were picked forth to guard the perſon of the Emperours of Conſtantinople. For, Iohn the ſonne of Alexius Comenus, (as our writer of Malmsburie reporteth) having their fidelitie in great eſteeme, applied himſelfe eſpecially to their familiaritie, commending their love unto his ſonne after him: and a long time ſince, they were the Yeomen of the ſaid Emperours guard, called by Nicetes Choniata, Inglini Bipenniferi, that is, Engliſh Halbardiers or Bill men, & by Curopalata, Barangi. Theſe attended upon the Emperour in every place, carrying Polaxes or Halberds upon their ſhoulders: which they tooke up, and held upright whenſoever the Emperour ſhewed himſelfe from out of his Cloſet, and knocking them their Halberds one againſt another to make a clattering noiſe, they in the Engliſh tongue, praied for his long life. As for that blot wherewith Chalcondilas hath beſmutted our nation, for having wives in common, the truth it ſelfe waſheth it clean away, and repreſſeth the overlaſhing vanity of that Grecian. For, as ſaith that moſt learned man, & my ſingular good friend Ortelius in this verie matter, thoſe things be not alwaies true which by everie one are given out of all whatſoever. Well, theſe are the nations that ſeated themſelves in Britaine, whereof remaine the Britans, Saxons, or Engliſh men, and Normans intermingled with them: the Scots alſo in the North: whereupon came the two Kingdomes in this Iland, to wit, England and Scotland, long time divided, but moſt happily now in the moſt mightie Prince King Iames, under one imperiall Diademe conjoined and united.

Chalcondilas.

Touching the Flemmings, which flocked hither foure hundred yeeres ſince, and by permiſſion of the Kings, received a place in Wales to inhabit, it is not requiſit to ſpeake of them now, elſewhere I will treat of that matter. But let us conclude this argument with Seneca. By theſe it is manifeſt, that nothing hath continued in the ſame place, wherein it had the firſt beginning. There is a daily ſtirring and mooving to and fro of mankind: ſome change or other there is every day in ſo great a revolution of this world. New foundations of Cities are laid: New names of nations ſpring up, whereas the old are either growne out of uſe, or altered by the comming in of a mightier. And conſidering that all theſe nations which have broken into Britaine, were Northerne as all the reſt, which about the ſame time over-ranne all Europe, and afterwards Aſia; moſt truly from the authority of holy Scipture, wrote Nicephorus, Like as terrors often times are ſent from heaven by God upon men, as lightning, fire, and tempeſtuous ſhowers; often times from the earth, as open gapings of the ground, and Earthquakes; often from the aire, as whirlewinds and extraordinarie ſtormes: ſo, theſe terrours of the Northerne and Hyperborean parts, God keepeth by him in ſtore, to ſend them forth for ſome puniſhment, when and among whom, it pleaſeth him in his divine providence.

In Pembroke ſhire.

Of conſolation to Albina.

Nicephorus.

THE DIVISION OF BRITAINE.

How countries are divided.

NOw let us addreſſe our ſelves to the Diuiſion of Britaine. Countries are divided by Geographers, either Naturally, according to the courſe of rivers, and interpoſe of mountaines: or Nationally, according as the people inhabite them: or Diverſly and Civilly, according to the wils and juriſdiction of Princes. But foraſmuch as wee ſhall treat here and there thorowout this whole worke, of the firſt and ſecond kinds, that third (which is civill and politike) ſeemeth properly pertinent to this place. Which yet is overcaſt with ſo darke a miſt, through the iniquitie of former times, that much eaſier it is in this caſe to confute what is falſe, than to find out the truth.

Our Hiſtoriographers will needs have that diviſion of Britaine to be moſt antient, whereby they divide it into Loegria, Cambria, and Albania, that is to ſpeake more plainly, into England, Wales, and Scotland. But I would think this diviſion to be of a newer and later edition, both becauſe it is threefold; for it ſeemeth to have riſen of thoſe

Digitized by Google

A thoſe three ſorts of people, Engliſh, Welch, and Scotiſh, which laſt of all parted the Iland among themſelves: and alſo for that ſuch a partition is no where extant in approved authors before our Geffrey of Monmouth. For, the fable, (as the Criticks of our age doe thinke) could not hang well together, vnleſſe he the ſaid Geffrey had deviſed three ſonnes of Brutus, to wit, Locrine, Camber, and Albanact, becauſe ſo many Nations flouriſhed here when hee lived. Neither make they doubt, but he would have found out more children of Brutus, if there had beene more nations diſtinct at the ſame time in Britaine.

The moſt antient diviſion of Britaine in the opinion of many learned men is that,
B which is found in Ptolomee, in the ſecond booke of Mathematicall Conſtruction*, where he treateth of the Parallels: namely, into Britaine the GREAT, and the LESSE. But by their leave, as great learned men as they be, they themſelves ſhall ſee, if it pleaſe them but to examine thorowly and exactly in that place, the proportion of diſtance from the Aequator, and compare the ſame with his Geographicall Deſcriptions, that he calleth this our Iſland there, Britaine the GREAT, and Ireland, Britaine the LESSE. Howbeit, ſome of our later writers named the hitherpart of this Iſland toward the South, GREAT, and that farther part Northward, the LESSE: the Inhabitants whereof in times paſt, were diſtinguiſhed into MAIATAE, and CALEDONII, that is to ſay, into the Inhabitants of the Champion or Plaines, and the Mountainers:
C as now, the Scots are divided into Hechtlandmen, and Lawlandmen. But for as much as the Romanes cared not for that farther tract, becauſe (as Appian ſaith, it could not be profitable to them nor fruitfull; having ſet downe their bounds not farre from Edenburgh, at the firſt they made this hither part reduced alreadie into a Province, two-fold, to wit, the LOVVER, and the HIGHER, as it is gathered out of Dio. For, the hither or neerer part of England, together with Wales, he termeth the HIGHER, the farther and Northerne part the LOVVER. Which thing the verie ſeats, and abiding places of the Legions in Dio do prove. The ſecond Legion Auguſta, which kept at Caerleon in Wales, and the twentieth ſurnamed Victrix, which remained at Cheſter or Deva, he placeth in the Higher Britaine: but the Sixth Legion Victrix, that was reſident
D at Yorke, ſerved, as he writeth, in the Lower Britaine. This diviſion I would ſuppoſe, was made by the Emperour Severus, becauſe Herodian reporteth, that hee after hee had vanquiſhed Albinus Generall of the Britiſh forces, who had vſurped the Empire, and therewith reformed, and ſet in order the State of Britain, divided the government of the Province in two parts, between two Prefects, or Governours.

Britain Great and Small.

Britaine the Higher, and the Lower.

After this, the Romans did ſet out the Province of Britaine into three parts, as is to be ſeen out of a manuſcript of Sextus Rufus: namely, into MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, BRITANNIA PRIMA, and BRITANNIA SECVNDA. Which, as I take it, I have found out by the Biſhops, and their antient Dioceſſes. Lucius the Pope, in Gratian, inſinuateth thus much, that the Eccleſiaſticall Iuriſdictions of the Chriſti-
E ans, followed the Iuriſdictions of the Roman Magiſtrates, and that Archbiſhops had their Seas in thoſe cities, wherein the Romane Preſidents in times paſt made their abode. The Cities and places (ſaith he) in which Primats ought to ſit and rule, were appointed not by the Moderne, but long before the comming of Chriſt: to the Primats of which Cities &c. the Gentils alſo appealed in matters of greater importance. And in thoſe verie cities after Chriſts comming, the Apoſtles and their Succeſſors placed Patriarks, or Primats, unto whom the affaires of the Biſhops, and greater cauſes ought to be referred. Whereas therefore, Britaine had in old time three Archbiſhops, to wit, of London, of Yorke, and Caerleon in Southwales, I ſuppoſe, that the Province which now we call of Canterburie, (for thither the Sea of London was tranſlated) made BRITANNIA PRIMA: Wales un-
F der the *Citie of Caer Leon, was BRITANNIA SECVNDA: and the Province of York, which then reached unto the Limit or Borders, made MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS.

Tripartite Britaine.

Diſt. 80. cap. 1

* Cheſter.

In the age next enſuing, when the forme of the Roman Empire was daily changing, either through ambition, that more men might attaine to places of honour, or the warie forecaſt of the Emperours, that the power of their Preſidents which grew over great might be taken downe and abridged, they divided Britaine into five parts,

to

Digitized by Google

Britaine in five parts.

to wit, BRITANNIA PRIMA, SECVNDA, MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, VALENTIA & FLAVIA CAESARIENSIS. VALENTIA ſeemeth to have been the northerly part of Maxima Cæſarienſis, which being uſurped and held by the Picts and Scots, Theodoſius Generall under Valens the Emperour recovered out of their hands, and in honour of him named it Valentia, which Marcellinus ſheweth more plainely in theſe words: Lib. 28. The Province now recovered, which was fallen into the enemies hands, he reſtored to the former ſtate, in ſuch ſort, as by his own procuring it had both a lawful governor, and was alſo afterwards called VALENTIA, at the pleaſure of the Prince. Now that the ſonne of this Theodoſius, (who being created Emperor was named Flavius Theodoſius, and altered very many things in the Empire) added Flavia, we may verie well conjecture, for that before the time of this Flavius we read no where of BRITANNIA FLAVIA. Wherfore to make up this matter in few words, All the ſouth coaſt which of one ſide lieth betweene the Britiſh ſea, & the river Thames with the Severn ſea on the other ſide, was called BRITANNIA PRIMA. BRITANNIA SECVNDA, was that which now is Wales. FLAVIA CAESARIENSIS, reached from Thames to Humber. MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, from Humber to the river of Tine, or the wall of Severus. VALENTIA from Tine to the wall or rampier neere Edenburgh, which the Scots call Grameſdike, and was the utmoſt limit of the Romane Empire in this Iland, when this laſt diviſion was in uſe.

And now I cannot chuſe but note ſome want of judgement in certaine men, who otherwiſe being verie learned, doe reckon Scotland in this account, which ſome of them make to have beene Maxima Cæſarienſis, and others, Britannia Secunda: As if (forſooth) the Romans neglected not that part of the Iland, lying under a cold climate, and reckoned here thoſe Provinces onely, which they governed by Conſular Lieutenants, and Preſidents: for Maxima Cæſarienſis, and Valentia were ruled by Conſular Lieutenants; Britannia Prima, Secunda, and Flavia, by Preſidents.

Now if any man would have me render a reaſon of this my diviſion, & accuſe me as a falſe bounderer & ſurveior, let him heare in brief, what hath induced me to this opinion. Having obſerved thus much, that the Romans alwaies called thoſe provinces PRIMAS, which lay nigheſt to Rome: as Germania Prima, Belgica Prima, Lugdunenſis Prima, Aquitania Prima, Pannonia Prima; all which lay neerer to Rome, than thoſe that were named, Secunda: & that theſe Prima, were by the finer ſort of writers, termed Superiores, or higher: the Secunde, Inferiores, or Lower: I reſolved, that the South-part of our Iland, and neerer to Rome, was Britannia Prima. By the ſame reaſon, ſeeing the Provinces Secunda (as they call them) were more remote from Rome, I ſuppoſed Wales was the Britannia Secunda. Moreover, having noted this alſo, that in the decaying State of their Empire, thoſe Provinces onely had Conſular Magiſtrates, which lay anent the enemies, not onely in Gaule, but alſo in Africke, as appeareth in the booke of Notices: alſo, that in the ſaid Booke, Valentia with us, and Maxima Cæſarienſis be accounted Conſular Provinces; I have judged them being next and expoſed to the Scots and Picts, to lie in thoſe places which I have ſpoken of. I can doe no other but gheſſe, that Flavia Cæſarienſis here, was in the midſt between them all, and in the verie heart of England: and ſo much the more confidently, becauſe that antient writer Giraldus Cambrenſis, is juſt of the ſame opinion with mee. And thus much of the Diviſions of Britaine under the Romanes.

Afterwards, when the Barbarians made invaſion on everie ſide, and civill warre daily increaſed among the Britans, the Iland, as bereft of all life and vigour, lay for a time languiſhing and forlorne, without any ſhew at all of government. But at length that part which inclineth to the North, became two kingdomes, to wit, of the Scots and the Picts, and the Romans Pentarchie, or five portions, in this hither part became in proceſſe of time the Heptarchie, or ſeven Kingdomes, of the Saxons. For, they divided the whole Province of the Romans, (ſetting Wales aſide, which the remnant of Britans poſſeſſed) into ſeven Kingdomes, that is to ſay, Kent, Southſex, Eaſt-England, Weſtſex, Northumberland, Eaſtſex, and Mercia.

The Saxons Heptarchie or ſeven Kingdomes.

But what this Heptarchie of the Engliſh-Saxons was, and what their names were in thoſe daies, in this chorographical table here adjoined, you may (if you pleaſe) behold.

Conſidering

Digitized by Google

A Considering that in a Chorographicall Table or Map, by reason of so narrow a roome, those Regions or Counties which these Kingdomes contained, could not well and handsomely be described: In this other Table here, rather than by heaping many words together, I think good to propose, and set downe the same, that the Reader may once for all have a view of them.

The Saxons Heptarchie.

1 The Kingdome of KENT contained — the County of — Kent.

B

2 The Kingdom of SVSSEX, or Southern Saxons, contained — the Counties of — Suthsex. Suthrey.

3 The Kingdome of EAST-ENGLAND, or East-Angles, contained — the Counties of — Norfolke. Suthfolke. Cambridge shire, with the (Ile of Ely.

C

4 The Kingdome of WEST-SEX, or West-Angles, contained — the Counties of — Cornwall. Devon shire. Dorset shire. Sommerset shire. Wilt shire. Southampton. Berkshire.

D

5 The Kingdom of NORTHVMBERLAND, contained — the Counties of — Lancaster. Yorke. Durham. Cumberland. Westmorland. Northumberland, and the Countreys of Scotland to Edenburgh-frith.

6 The Kingdom of ESATSEX, or East-Saxons, contained — the Counties of — Essex. Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire.

E

7 The Kingdome of MERCIA, contained — the Counties of — Gloucester shire. Hereford shire. Worcester shire. Warwick shire. Leicester shire. Rotland shire. Northampton shire. Lincolne shire. Huntingdon shire. Bedford shire. Buckingham shire. Oxenford shire. Stafford shire. Derbie shire. Salop or Shropshire. Nottingham shire. Chester, or Cheshire. (shire. The other part of Hertford

F

Yet

Digitized by Google

England diuided into Shires or Counties.

YEt was not England whiles the Heptarchie flouriſhed, thus diuided into Counties, for ſo they be commonly called, but into certaine ſmall regions with their Hides, which out of an old fragment that I had of Francis Tate a gentleman, moſt converſant in the Antiquitie of our Law, I haue heere put downe. But it containeth that countrie onely, which lieth on this ſide Humber. A

And Hide, as ſome thinke, is ſo much land, as one plough can eare in one yeere: as others think, 4. yard-lands.

Myrcna containeth 30000. * Hides.	Nox gaga 5000. hides.
Woken-ſetna 7000. hides.	Oht gaga 2000. hides.
Weſterna 7000. hides.	Hwynca 7000. hides.
Pec-ſetna 1200. hides.	Ciltern-ſetna 4000. hides. B
Elmed-ſetna 600. hides.	Hendrica 3000. hides.
Lindes-farona 7000. hides.	Vnecung-ga 1200. hides.
Suth-Gyrwa 600. hides.	Aroſeatna 600. hides.
North-Gyrwa 600. hides.	Fearfinga 300. hides.
Eaſt-wixna 300. hides.	Belmiga 600. hides.
Weſt-Wixna 600. hides.	Witherigga 600. hides.
Spalda 600. hides.	Eaſt-willa 600. hides.
Wigeſta 900. hides.	Weſt-willa 600. hides.
Hereſinna 1200. hides.	Eaſt-Engle 30000. hides.
Sweordora 300. hides.	Eaſt-Sexena 7000. hides. C
Eyſla 300. hides.	Cant-warena 15000. hides.
Wicca 300. hides.	Suth-Sexena 7000. hides.
Wight-gora 600. hides.	Weſt-Sexena 100000. hides.

Although ſome of theſe names may at the firſt ſight be diſcouered, yet others of them a man ſhall hardly picke out although he ſtudie upon them: and they require one I profeſſe it, of much ſharper wit and quicker inſight than my ſelfe, to gheſſe what they ſhould meane.

Ælfred he is named in peeces of Come: alſo Alured, in our Engliſh Chronicles.

Afterwards, when Aelfred was ſole Monarch, like as the Germans our anceſtors, as Tacitus witneſſeth, kept courts and miniſtred juſtice in every Territorie and towne, D and had a Hundred men out of the Common people as companions and aſſiſtants to performe this Function: euen ſo, to uſe the words of Ingulphus of Crowland, He firſt diuided England into Counties, for that the naturall inhabitants after the example, and under colour of the Danes committed outrages and robberies. Beſides, he cauſed the Counties to be parted into Centuries, that is, Hundreds, and Decimes, that is, Tithings: and commanded withall that euery Homeling or naturall inhabitant, ſhould be in ſome one Hundred and Tithing. He diuided alſo the gouernours of the Prouinces, who before were called Vice-Domini, that is, Vice-Lords, into two offices, to wit, Iudges, now Iuſtices, and Vice-Comites, that is, Sheriffes, which ſtill retaine the ſame name. By whoſe care and induſtrie, peace ſo much flouriſhed within ſhort ſpace thorow the whole prouince, that had a way-faring man let fall in the fields or common highwaies, a ſumme of money, how great ſoeuer it had beene, if he returned thither the next morning or a moneth after he might be ſure to ſee it there ſafe and untouched. Which our Hiſtoriographer of Malmesburie will declare unto you more at large. By occaſion, ſaith he, and example of the Barbarians, that is, Danes, the proper and naturall inhabitants alſo were very greedy of ſpoile, ſo that no man could paſſe to and fro in ſafety, without weapons for his defence. Alfred therefore ordained Centuries, which they terme Hundreds, and Decimes, which they call Tithings, that euery Engliſh man liuing under law as a liege ſubiect, ſhould be within one Hundred and Tithing or another. And if a man were accuſed of any tranſgreſſion, he ſhould bring in ſtreightwaies ſome one out of the ſame Hundred and Tithing, that would be bound for his appearance to anſwere the law; but he that could not find ſuch a ſurety, ſhould abide the ſeuerity of the Lawes. But in caſe any man ſtanding thus accuſed, either before or after ſuretiſhip, fled, then all that Hundred and Tithing, incurred a mulct or fine to be impoſed by the King. By this deuice he brought peace into the Country, ſo as along the common cauſies & highwaies where they croſſed one another, he cõmanded bracelets of gold to be hanged up, to Hundreds.

E

F

A to delude the greedines of passengers, whiles there was no man that durst take thē away. But these Hundreds be in some places of the realme called Wapentaches: if you would know the reason therof, I will tell you it out of the lawes of Edward the Confessor. When a man received the government of a Wapentach, upon a certain day appointed in the place where they were wont to assemble, all the elder sort met together and expected him: and as hee alighted from his horse, rose up vnto him and did him reverence. Then he, setting his speare upright, received of them all, according to the custome, a covenant of Association. For as many as came, with their speares touched his speare, and thus they assured themselves by touching of weapons, in peaceable maner. For, armes in English they call Wapentaks, Tithings and Lathes.

B pæpun: & Tac-cape is as much as to confirme or establish: as if this were a confirmation of weapons: or, to speake more significantly and expresly according to the English tongue, Wepentac, is the touching of weapons. For pepun soundeth as much, as armes, tac is touching. There were besides, other governments and iurisdictions above Wapentaches which they called Þrihmgar, for that this was the third part of a Province. And the rulers over those were termed Þrihingepefar. Before these officers were brought those causes that could not be determined in the Wapentachs. And so, that which the Englishmen named a Hundred, these termed a Wapentach. And that which in English they called three or foure Hundreds, these named Þrihinge. Howbeit in some provinces they called that Leþ, which these terme Trihing: and that which could not be decided and ended in a Þrihinge, was brought into

C the Schyre. Leth.

These Counties which you may properly and in Latine call, either Conuentus or Pagos, we by apt culiar terme name Shires, of Scype a Saxon word, which signifieth, to part or divide: and at the first diuision, there were in all but thirty two. For, in the yeere after Christs nativitie 1016. whiles Ethéldred reigned, the Chronicle of Malmesburie reporteth there were no more: For, thus writeth he in the life of the said Etheldred. The Danes at this time when there be reckoned in England thirty two Shires, invaded 16. of them. And in those daies, according to the varietie of lawes these counties or shires were divided. For the lawes of England were distinguished Shires. The division of England according to the Lawes.

D into three sorts: to wit, those of the west-Saxons which they called West-Saxenlage: those of the Danes, named Denelage, and those of the Mercians, termed Merchenlage. To the law of the west-Saxons belonged nine counties, to wit, Kent, Sussex, Suthrie, Berkshire, Hantshire or Southampton shire, Wilshire, Sommerset shire, Dorset shir and Denshire. To the Danes law appertained 15. Counties, namely, York shire, Darby shire, Notingham shire, Leicester shire, Lincoln shire, Northhampton shire, Bedford shire, Buckingham shire, Hertford shire, Essex, Middlesex, Northfolk, Southfolk, Cambridge shire, Huntingdon shire. The eight remaining, followed the law of the Mercians: these were, Glocester shire, Worcester shire, Hereford shire, Watwick shire, Oxenford shire, Cheshire, Salop or Shropshire and Stafford shire. But when William the first made a survey and taxed this kingdome, there were reckoned, as we read The Manuscript booke of S. Edmund.

E in Polychronicon, xxxvj. shires or counties: and yet the publicke * record, in which he engrossed and registred this survey and tax, doe make mention of 34. only. For, Durham, Lancashire, Northumberland, Westmerland, and Comberland were not comprised in that number, because these three last were then subject to the Scots, as some will have it, and those other two were either free from paiments and taxes, or comprehended under Yorkshire: but being afterwards added to the rest they made up in all, the number of 39. shires, which we have at this day. Vnto which are adjoined since 13. more in Wales: whereof six were in the time of Edward the first, the rest Henrie the eight ordained by Parlamentarie authority. * Doomesday booke. Wales diuided into shires.

In these Shires there is appointed in troublesome times by the Prince, a Prefect or F Deputie under the King, whom they call a Lieutenant, to see that the Commonweale sustaine no hurt. The first Institution of this Lieutenant, as it may seeme, is to be fetched from king Aelfred, who appointed in every Countie certaine Custodes or Keepers of the kingdome: whom Henrie the third afterward did set up and restore againe, naming them Captaines. For he in the fiftieth yeere of his raigne, Held a Parliament at London of Easter, wherein this holsome ordinance was enacted, that* * or, London. 897. Math. Westmonast.

Digitized by Google

that in every Countie there ſhould be made at the Kings charge, one Capitaine, who with A the helpe of the Sheriffe ſhould reſtraine the cruel and outrageous robbers and theeves from ſtealth and rapine. Many therefore being frighted with this terrour gaue ouer, and ſo the Kings power began to breath againe and reuiue. With good forecaſt this was done verily by theſe princes: but whether Canutus the Dane did more wiſely, who in his Monarchie erected a Tetrarchie, let our Politicians and Statiſts diſpute. For he, (Hermandus the Archdeacon is mine Author) being a pruadent Prince, and watchfull every way, dividing the care of his kingdome into foure parts, ordained Tetrarchs, ſuch as he had found to be moſt faithfull and truſty. The charge of the greater portion, to wit of Weſtſex, B he tooke upon himſelfe; of Mircia, which was the ſecond portion, he committed to one Edrich; the third, uſually called Northumbre, to Trtus; and to Erle Turkill, the fourth, Eaſt-England, which flowed in plenty and abundance of all wealth.* For this inſtruction I am beholden to the diligence of Francis Thinn, a man, who with exceeding great commendation hath trauelled very much in this Studie of Antiquities.

He flouriſhed in the yeere, 1070.

* Mercia.

Sheriffe of the Shire.

Now every yeere, ſome one of the Gentlemen inhabitants, is made ruler of the countie wherein he dwelleth, whom we call in Latin Vicecomitem, as one would ſay, the Deputie of the Comes or Erle, and in our tongue Sheriffe, that is, the Reeue of the ſhire, who alſo may well be termed the Treaſurer of the Shire or Prouince. For, it is his dutie, to gather the common monies and profits of the Prince in his Countie, to collect and bring into the Exchequer all fines impoſed, even by diſtreining: to be atten- C dant upon the Iudges, and to execute their commandements: to aſſemble and empanell the twelue men which in cauſes doe enquire of the fact, & make relation thereof and giue in their verdict to the Iudges (for Iudges with us ſit upon the right onely of a cauſe and not upon the fact) to ſee condemned perſons executed, and to examine and determine certaine ſmaller actions. Moreouer, there be ordained in every Shire, and that by the inſtitution of Edward the third, certaine Iuſtices of peace, who examine Murders, Felonies, & Treſpaſſes, as they call them, yea and many other delinquences. Furthermore, the King ſendeth yeerely into every Shire of England two Iuſtices, to giue Iudgment of Priſoners, and that I may uſe the Lawyers terme, to deliuer the Goale. Of whom, more heereafter in the Treatiſe of Iud call courts and Iudgment ſeats. D

Twelue men.

Iuſtices of peace.

Iuſtices of Aſſiſes.

As touching Eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction, when the Biſhops of Rome had aſſigned ſeuerall Churches to ſeuerall Prieſts, and laid pariſhes unto them, Honorius Archbiſhop of Canterburie, about the yeere of our Redemption 636. began firſt to diuide England into Pariſhes, as we read in the Hiſtorie of Canterburie. But now hath England two prouinces, and accordingly two Archbiſhops: to wit, the Archbiſhop of Canterburie Primate and Metropolitan of all England, and the Archbiſhop of Yorke. Vnder theſe are twenty fiue Biſhops: to the Archbiſhop of Canterburie are ſubiect twenty two, to the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the other three. Now what Biſhopricks theſe be, with the ſhires and Dioceſſes that are at this day under their iuriſdiction, that godly, and right reuerend father Matthew Parker, [late] Archbiſhop of E
Canterburie, a man very ſtudious and skilfull in antiquitie, and a worthy Patron of good learning, ſheweth in theſe his owne words.

England diuided into Pariſhes.

Biſhops.

IN THE PROVINCE OF CANTERBVRIE.

THe Biſhoprick of Canterburie together with that of Rocheſter containeth under it Kent it ſelfe. The Biſhopricke of London hath under it Eſſex, Middleſex, & part of Hertfordſhire. The Biſhoprick of Chicheſter hath belonging unto it Suſſex. The Biſhoprick of Wincheſter compriſeth Southhampton ſhire, Surry, and the Iſle of Wight, Gernſey alſo & Ierſey, Ilands lying againſt Normandie. The Biſhoprick of Sa- F liſburie, comprehendeth Wiltſhire and Berkſhire. The Biſhoprick of Exceſter containeth Denſhire and Cornwall. The Biſhoprick of Bath and Wels joined together, hath under it Sommerſetſhire: The Biſhoprick of Gloceſter hath belonging to it Gloceſterſhire. To the Biſhopricke of Worceſter, is ſubiect Worceſterſhire & part of Warwickſhire. To the Biſhoprick of Hereford, Herefordſhire & part of Salop or Shropſhire. The

Biſhoprick

A Bishoprick of Couentrie and Lichfield joined together, have under it, Staffordshire, Derbishire and the other part of Warwickshire, as also that part of Shropshire which lieth toward the river Reuil. Then, the Bishoprick of Lincolnshire, which of all other is the greatest, is bounded with Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, & the other part of Hertfordshire. To the Bishoprick of Ely pertaine Cambridgeshire, and the Ile it selfe of Elie. Vnder the Bishopricke of Norwich is Norfolke and Suffolke. The Bishopricke of Oxenford hath under it Oxenfordshire. The Bishopricke of Peterborough compriseth Northamptonshire & Rutlandshire. Under the Bishopricke of Bristoll, is Dorsetshire. Vnto which eighteene B. Dioceses in England, are to be added those of Wales, which are both bereft of their owne peculiar Archbishopricke, & made also fewer in number; seven being brought scarse to foure: to wit, the Bishopricke of Meneva; having the seat at Saint Davids, the Bishopricke of Landaffe; the Bishopricke of Bangor; and the Bishopricke of Saint Assaph.

IN THE PROVINCE OF YORKE.

THe Bishopricke of Yorke comprehendeth Yorkeshire it selfe and Nottinghamshire. The Bishopricke of Chester containeth, Cheshire, Richmondshire, Lancashire, part of Cumberland, of Flintshire, and of Denbighshire. The Bishopricke of Durham, hath Durham it selfe under it and Northumberland. The Bishopricke of Carleil containeth within it part of Cumberland, and the countie of Westmerland. To these you may adde, the Bishopricke of Sodor in the Isle Mona, which commonly is called Man. Among these, the Archbishop of Canturburie hath the first place: the Archbishop of Yorke the second: the Bishop of London the third: the Bishop of Durham the fourth: the Bishop of Winchester the fift: the rest as they are consecrated or enstalled first, so in priority they take their place. Howbeit, if any of the other Bishops happen to be Secretarie to the King, he challengeth by D his right the fift place. Besides, there are in England Deanries xxvj. wherof thirteene were ordained by Henrie the Eighth in the greater Cathedrall Churches, after the Monks were thrust out. Archdeaconries three skore: Dignities and Prebends five hundred fortie foure.

Numbred also there are parish-churches under Bishops, 9284: of which 3845, be Appropriat, as I find in a Catalogue exhibited unto King Iames, which here I have put downe underneath. Now, Appropriat Churches those are called, which by the Popes authority comming betweene, with consent of the King and the Bishop of the Dioceese were upon certaine conditions tied, or Instruments united, annexed, and incorporate for ever, unto Monasteries, Bishopricks, Colleges and Hospitals, endowed E with smal lands, either for that the said Churches were built with in their Lordships and lands, or granted by the Lords of the said lands. Which Churches afterwards when the Abbaies and Monasteries were suppressed, became Laye Fees, to the great dammage of the Church.

	Dioceses.	Parish-Churches.	Churches appropiated.
In the Province of Canturburie in the Dioceſſe,	Of Canturburie.	257	140	A
	Of London.	623	189
	Of Wincheſter.	362	131
	Of Coventrie and Lichfield.	557	250
	Of Sarisburie.	248	109	B
	Of Bath and Wels.	388	160
	Of Lincoln.	1255	577
	Of Peterburgh.	293	91
	Of Exceter.	604	239
	Of Gloceſter.	267	125
	Of Hereford.	313	166
	Of Norwich.	1121	385
	Of Elie.	141	75	C
	Of Rocheſter.	98	36
	Of Chicheſter.	250	112
	Of Oxford.	195	88
	Of Worceſter.	241	76
	Of Briſtoll.	236	64
	Of S. Davids.	308	120
	Of Bangor.	107	36
	Of Lhandaffe.	177	98	D
	Of S. Aſaph.	121	19
	Peculiar, in the Province of Canturburie.	57	14
	The ſumme of the Province of Canturburie.	8219	3303
In the Province of Yorke,	Of Yorke.	581	336
	Of Durham.	135	87
	Of Cheſter.	256	101	E
	Of Carlile.	93	18
	The ſumme of the Province of Yorke.	1065	592
	The totall Summe in both Provinces	9284	3845

Howbeit, in the booke of Thomas Wolſey Cardinall, digeſted and written in the yeere 1520. by Counties are reckoned, 9407. Churches. How this varietie F ſhould come, I cannot ſay, unleſſe that in the former age ſome Churches were pulled downe, and the Chapels which belong unto Pariſhes be omitted, and others that are but bare Chapels, counted in the number of Pariſh-churches. Yet, out of this booke of Wolſey, have I put downe the number of Pariſh-churches to every Shire.

There

Digitized by Google

A There were alſo, in the reigne of Henrie the Eight (I hope without offence I may ſpeake the truth) many religious places, Monuments of our fore fathers pietie and devotion, to the honor of God, the propagation of Chriſtian faith and good learning, and alſo for the reliefe and maintenance of the poore and impotent, to wit, Monaſteries or Abbaies, and Priories, to the number of 645: of which when by permiſſion of Pope Clement the ſeuenth, fortie were ſuppreſſed by Cardinall Wolſeies meanes, who then had begun to found two Colleges, one at Oxenford, the other at Ipſwich: ſtraightwaies, about the xxxvj. yeere of the reigne of the ſaid Henrie the Eight, a ſudden floud (as it were) breaking thorow the banks with a maine ſtreame, fell B upon the Eccleſiaſticall State of England; which whiles the world ſtood amazed, and England groned thereat, bare downe and utterly overthrew the greateſt part of the Clergie, together with their moſt goodly and beautifull houſes. For, that leave which the Pope granted to the Cardinall, the King with aſſent of the Parlament took to himſelfe. Whereupon, in the yeere of our Lord, 1536. all religious houſes every one, together withall their livings and revenewes, as many I meane as might diſpend by yerely rent 200. pound or under, (and thoſe amounted to the number of 376) were granted to the King. And in the yeere next following, under a faire pretence & ſhew of rooting out ſuperſtition, all the reſt, together with Colleges, Chanteries and Hoſpitals were left to the diſpoſe and pleaſure of the King. At which time, the reli- C gious houſes remaining, in number 605. were ſurveied, valued or taxed. Colledges there were, beſides thoſe in the Vniverſities, 90. Hoſpitals 110. Chanteries and free Chapels 2374. All which for the moſt part, ſhortly after were every where pulled downe, their revenues ſold and made away, and thoſe goods and riches which the Chriſtian pietie of Engliſh nation had conſecrated unto God, ſince they firſt profeſſed Chriſtianity were in a moment as it were diſperſed, and (to the diſpleaſure of no man be it ſpoken) profaned.

Monaſteries or Abbaies.

An hundred Priories of Monks Aliens, King Henrie the Firſt, had diſſolved before.

THE STATES AND DEGREES D of England.

AS touching the diviſion of our Common-wealth, it conſiſteth, of a King or Monarch, Noblemen or Gentry, Citizens, Free-borne, whom we call, Yeomen, and Artiſans or Handicraftſmen.

The King.

The King, whom our anceſtors [the Engliſh-Saxons] called Coning and Cyning, (in which name is implied a ſignification both of power and skill) and wee name contractly, King, hath ſoveraigne power and abſolute command among us, neither holEdeth he his empire in vaſſallage, nor receiveth his inveſture or enſtalling of another, ne yet acknowledgeth any ſuperiour but God alone: and as one ſaid, All verily are under him, and himſelfe under none, but God onely: Alſo, he hath very many rights of Maieſtie peculiar to himſelfe, (the learned Lawyers terme them, Sacra ſacrorũ, that is, Sacred, and Individua; that is, inſeparable, becauſe they cannot be ſevered: and the common ſort Roiall prerogatives) which they terme, The flowers of his Crowne, in which reſpect they affirme that the regall materiall Crowne is adorned with flowers. Some of theſe, are by poſitive or written law; others, by right of cuſtome, which by a ſilent conſent of all men without law, preſcription of time hath allowed; the King iuſtly enjoieth: and moſt deſervedly; conſidering that His watchfull care defendeth the ſtate F of all his painfull labour maintaineth the quiet of all his carefull induſtry, upholdeth the delights of all, and his buſie employment affordeth reſt to all. But theſe are points of a loftier diſcourſe, and not of the argument now in hand.

Bracton lib. 1. cap. 8.

Seneca.

The ſecond or next to the King, is his firſt begotten ſonne: who, like as among the Romans, the heire apparent, and aſſigned ſucceſſour to the Empire, was firſt entituled, Princeps Iuuentutis, that is, Prince of the youth; and afterwards (as flatte-

The Prince.

Digitized by Google

* Nobilis Cæsar. * Cæsar Nobilissimus.

rie did increase) stiled by the name of Cæsar, Noble Cæsar*, and the* most Noble: so, A with our Ancestors the English-Saxons, he was named in their tongue, Aetheling, that is, Noble, and in Latine Clyto, of the Greeke word, Κλύτος, that is, Glorious or Excellent (see how that age affected the Greek Language.) And hereupon, of that Eadgar, the last heire male of the English bloud roiall, this old said saw is yet rife in every mans mouth, Eadgar, Aetheling, Englanor deapling. And in the antient latin Patents and Charters of the Kings wee read often times, Ego E. vel Ae. Clyto, Regis filius: But this addition Clyto, I have observed to be given even to all the Kings sonnes. After the Norman conquest, no certaine or speciall title of honour was assigned unto him, nor any other to my knowledge, than singly thus, The Kings Sonne, and, The first begot- B ten of the King of England, until that Edward the First summoned unto the high Court of Parliament his sonne Edward, by the name of Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester; unto whom he granted afterwards, the Dukedome also of Aquitaine: like as the same Prince, being now King Edward the Second, called unto the Parliament his young sonne Edward, not full ten yeeres old, by the title of Earle of Chester, and of Flint. But the said Edward, having now attained to the Crown, and being Edward the Third, created Edward his sonne, a most valiant and renowmed man of warre, Duke of Cornwall. Since which time, the Kings first begotten sonne, is reputed* Duke of Cornewall at the houre of his birth. And soone after, he adorned the same sonne by solemne investure and creation, with the title of Prince of Wales. And gave the C Principality of Wales in these words, To bee held of him and his heires Kings of England. And as the declared or elect Successours of the Roman Empire, (as I said even now) were named Cæsares, of the Greekish Empire, * Despota; of the Kingdome of France, Dolphins, and of Spaine, Infants: so from thence forward, the Heires apparent of the Kingdome of England, were entituled, Princes of Wales. And this title continued unto the daies of Henrie the Eight, when Wales was fully united to the Kingdome of England.

* Dux Cornubiæ natus.

* Lords.

But now, whereas the Kingdomes of Britaine formerly divided, are by the happy good luck, and rightfull title of the most mightie Prince King Iames growen into one; his Eldest sonne Henrie, the Lovely Ioy and Dearling of Britaine, is stiled, PRINCE OF D GREAT BRITAINE: who, as he is borne thus to the greatest hopes, so all Britaine from one end to the other, praieth unceassantly from the verie heart, that God would vouchsafe to blesse him with the greatest vertues, and continuance of honour, that hee may by many degrees, and that most happily exceede our hope, surpasse the noble Acts of his Progenitours, yea, and outlive their yeeres.

As for our Nobilitie, or Gentry, it is divided into Superiour, and Inferiour. The Superiour or chiefe Noblemen we call, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Barons: which have received these titles from the Kings of this Realme for their Vertue and Prowesse.

A Duke.

DVKE, is the chiefe title of honour among us next after PRINCE. This was a E name at first of charge and office, and not of dignitie. About the time of Aelius Verus the Emperour, those who governed the Limits and Borders, were first named Duces, and this degree in the daies of Constantine was inferiour to that of Comites. After the Romane government was here in this Iland abolished, this title also remained as a name of office: and those among us, who in old Charters, during the Saxons time, are so many of them called Duces, were named in the English tongue onely Ealdermen: and the verie same, that were named Duces, they called also* Comites. As for example, that William the Conquerour of England, whom most call Duke of Normandie, William of Malmsburie, termeth Comes, or Earle of Normandie. But, as well Duke as Earle, were names of charge and office, as appeareth by F this Briefe or Instrument of creating a Duke or Earle, out of Marculphus an antient Writer. In this point especially is a Princes regall Clemencie fully commended, that throwout the whole people there bee sought out honest and vigilant persons; neither is it meet to commit hand over head, unto every man a judiciarie Dignity, unlesse his faithfulnesse and valour seeme to have been tried before: seeing then therefore, we suppose that we have had

* Dukes. * Earles.

A had good proofe of your truſtie and profitable ſervice unto us, we have committed unto you „ the government of that Earledome, Dukedome, Senatourſhip, or Elderſhip in that Shire or „ Province, which your Predeceſſor untill this time ſeemed to have exerciſed, for to manage „ and rule the ſame accordingly. Provided alwaies, that you evermore keepe your faith „ untouched and untainted toward our Roiall governance, and that all people there abiding „ may live, and be ruled under your regiment and governance, and that you order and direct „ them in the right courſe, according to law, and their owne cuſtomes: That you ſhew your „ ſelfe a protector to widowes, and Guardian to Orphans: that the wickednesſe of theeves „ and malefactors be moſt ſeverely by you puniſhed: that the people living well under your „ B regiment, may with joy continue in peace quietly: and whatſoever by this very execu- „ tion is looked for to ariſe, in profit due to the Exchequer bee brought yeerely by your ſelfe „ into our Coffers, and Treaſurie. This title of Duke, began to be a title of honour under „ Otho the Great, about the yeere 970. For hee, to bind more ſtreitly, and neerer unto him, martiall and politike men, endowed them with Regalities and Roialties, as he termed them. And theſe Roialties were either Dignities, or Lands in fee. Dignities were theſe, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, Capitaines, Valvaſors, Valvaſines. Later it was ere it came to be an Hereditarie title in France: and not before the time of Philip the third King of France, who granted, that from thenceforth, they ſhould bee called, Dukes of Britaine, who before time were indifferently ſtiled, both Dukes and
C Earles. But in England, in the time of the Normans, ſeeing the Norman Kings themſelves were Dukes of Normandie, for a great while they adorned none with this honour: nor before that Edward the Third created Edward his ſonne, Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath upon his head, a ring on his finger, and a ſilver verge or rod: like as the Dukes of Normandie were in times paſt created by a Sword, and Banner delivered unto them: afterwards, by girding the Sword of the Duchie, and a circlet of gold, garniſhed with little golden Roſes in the top. And the ſame King Edward the Third, created in a Parliament his two ſonnes, Lionel Duke of Clarence, and Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, by the girding of a Sword, and ſetting upon their heads a furred chapeau, or cap, with a Circlet or Coronet of gold, pearle, and a Charter delivered unto them. From which time there have been many D hereditary Dukes among us, created one after another, with theſe or ſuch like words in their Charter or Patent: We give and grant the Name, Title, State, Stile, Place, Seat, Preeminence, Honour, Authoritie, and Dignitie of a Duke, to N. and by the cincture of a Sword, and impoſition of a Cap and Coronet of gold upon his head, as alſo by delivering unto him a verge of gold, we doe really inveſt.

Sigonius Regni Italici lib. 5.

Afterward a golden rod or verger was uſed.

A MARQVESSE, that is, if you conſider the verie nature of the word, a Governour of the Marches, hath the next place of honour, after a Duke. This Title came to us but of late daies, and was not beſtowed upon any one, before the time of King Richard the Second: For, hee made his minion Robert Vere, who was highly in his favour, Marqueſſe of Dublin: and then it began with us to be a title of honour. For E before time thoſe that governed the Marches, were commonly called, Lord Marchers, and not Marqueſſes (as now we terme them.) Henceforth they were created by the King, by cincture of the Sword, and the impoſition of the Cap of honor and dignitie, with the Coronet, as alſo by delivery of a Charter or writing. Neither will I think it much to relate here, that which is found recorded in the *Parliament Rols. When Iohn de Beaufort, from being Earle of Sommerſet, was by Richard the Second created Marqueſſe Dorſet, and afterwards by Henrie the Fourth, deprived of that title; what time as the Commons of England made humble ſuit in Parliament to the King, that hee would reſtore unto him the title of Marqueſſe which he had loſt: he oppoſed himſelf againſt that petition, and openly ſaid, That it was a new dignitie, and altogether unknowen to F his Anceſtours; and therefore hee neither craved it, nor in any wiſe would accept of it.

Marqueſſes.

*An. 4. Henr. 4.

Earles, called in Latine, Comites, are ranged in the third place, and may ſeeme to have come unto us from our Anceſtours the Germans: For, they in times paſt, as Cornelius Tacitus writeth, had their Comites, Who ſhould alwaies give attendance upon their Princes, and be at hand in matters of counſell and authoritie. But others thinke, that they

Digitized by Google

they came from the Romans to us, as alſo to the Franks, or French. For, the Empe- A rours, when as the Empire was growen now to the full ſtrength, began to have about them a certaine privie Counſell, which was called Cæſaris Comitatus: and then thoſe whoſe counſell they uſed in warre and peace, were termed Comites: whence it is, that in ancient Inſcriptions, we finde often times COMITI IMPP. And in few yeeres the name of Comes, grew ſo rife, that it was given to all Officers and Magiſtrates that obſerved or gave attendance upon the ſaid ſacred or privie Counſel, or that came out of it: and from thence afterward the name extended to all thoſe which were the Pro-voſts or Over-ſeers of any matters of ſtate. And Suidas defineth Comes, to be The ruler
In paratitlis ad Codicem. of the people, as Cuiacius hath taught vs: who alſo teacheth us, that before Conſtantine B the Great, the name of Comes was not in uſe, to ſignifie any honour. But he, when he altered the forme of the Roman Empire by new diſtinctions, and endevored to oblige many unto him with his benefits, & them to advance unto honour, ordained firſt the title of Comes without any function or government at all, to be a title of dignitie: and this Comes had a certain power and priviledge, for to accompanie the Prince, not only when hee went abroad, but in his palace alſo, in his privie chamber and ſecret roomes, to have libertie likewiſe to be preſent at his Table, and private ſpeeches. And hereupon it is, that wee read thus in Epiphanius, ὃς καὶ παρ' αὐτῆς τῆς βασιλέως ἀξιώματος Κομήτων ἔτυχε. that is, Who alſo obtained of the King, the Dignitie of Comites. At length, to them which were beholden unto him for this honourable preferment, hee granted other C dignities with charge: and againe, upon thoſe that were in place of Magiſtracie, and executed any office of State, either at home or abroad, hee beſtowed that title of honour, Comes Domeſticorum, L. Great Maſter of the Houſhold; Comes ſacrarum largitionum, Treaſurer of the privie Purſe; Comes ſacræ veſtis, Maſter of the Ward-robe; Comes Stabuli, Maſter of the Horſe; Comes Theſauri, Treaſurer; Comes Orien- tis, Lieutenant of the Eaſt; Comes Britanniæ, Comes Africæ, &c. Herehence it came, that ever ſince the name of Comes, imported Dignitie, and authoritie or government, at the firſt temporarie, afterward for terme of life. Moreover, in proceſſe of time, when the Empire of the Romans became rent into many kingdomes, this title yet was retained: and our Engliſh-Saxons, called them in Latine, Comites, and D Conſules, whom in their owne language, they named Ealdormen, and the verie ſame, the Danes termed in their tongue, Eorlas, that is, Honourable, as Ethelward writeth, by which name ſomewhat mollified, they are called of us at this day, Earles. And
P. Pithæus in Memorab. Campaniæ. verily for a long time, they were knowen by this name ſimply: at length, with addition alſo of the place over which they were put in authoritie. Neither as yet deſcen-ded this honour to the next heire by inheritance. Where, by the way thus much I note, that the firſt hereditarie Earles in France, were the Earles of Britaine. But when William of Normandie had made conqueſt of this Land, and ſeated himſelfe in the abſolute government of this Kingdome, Earles began to be Feudall, Hereditarie, and Patrimoniall, that is, By fee, or Tenure by ſervice, by inheritance, and by Lands, E
* An authentical record of the Exchequer. who alſo, as it appeareth in * Domeſday-booke, were ſimply without any addition at all, named Earles, as Comes Hugo, Comes Alanus, Comes Rogerus; Earle Hugh, Earle Alan, Earle Roger, &c. Afterwards, as wee may ſee in antient Charters, Earles were created with the name of a place joyned unto them, and the third penie of the Shire was aſſigned unto them. As for example, Mawd the Empreſſe, daughter and heire to K. Henrie the Firſt, created an Earle in theſe words, as appeareth in the verie Charter which I have: I Mawd, daughter of K. Henry, and Ladie of the Engliſhmen, doe give and
* or Maundevil. grant unto Geffrey de Magnavil for his ſervice, & to his heires after him by right of inheri- tance, to be Earle of Eſſex, and to have the third penie out of the Sheriffs Court, iſſuing out of F al pleas, as an Earle ſhould have thorow his Countie in all things. And this is the moſt anti-ent Charter that hitherto I have ſeen, of an Earles creation. Likewiſe Henrie the Second, King of England her ſonne, created an Earle by theſe words: Know yee, that we have made Hugh Bigod, Earle of Norfolk, to wit, of the third penie of Norwic, and Nor- folc, as freely as any Earle of England holdeth his Countie. Which words, an old booke of Battaile Abbey expoundeth thus: An uſuall and ancient cuſtome it was thorowout

Warwick — Rotul. 4 Hen. 3. m. Comitatus hil. — vt Anglia lib. warw: fol. 340. all

Digitized by Google

A all England, that the Earles should have the third penie to themselves of the Provinces, whereof they tooke the name, and were called Earles. Semblaby, another booke without name, more plainly: The Shire or Countie hath the name of the Earle or Count, or else contrariwise, the Count of the Countie. And Count or Earle he is, because he receiveth the third part of those things, that accrew or arise, by plea in every Countie or Shire: But all Earles reape not these fruits, but those to whom the King hath granted them by right of inheritance, or in their own persons. And hereupon Polydore Virgil writeth truly, and according to the maner of our age. It is a custome in England, saith he, that the titles of Earldomes be given at the Princes pleasure, even without possession of those places, from
B whence the very titles are taken. And therefore the King is wont to give unto them, that possesse nothing in that Countie, some certaine pension or summe of money out of his owne revenues, in lieu of the possession.

Earles were created in old time without any complement or ceremonie at all, but only by delivering unto them a Charter. Vnder Stephen who usurped the kingdome, during the heat of civill war, many also tooke upon them the titles of Earles, whom the Historie of Waverlew church, and others of that age calleth Pseudo-Comites, that is, counterfeit Earles, and Comites imaginarios, that is, Earles in conceit, whiles it reporteth unto us, that Henrie the Second deposed them. And King Iohn, was the first by my observation, that used in creating of them, the cincture of a sword. Cincture of the sword.

C For Roger of Hoveden writeth thus: *King Iohn upon the day of his Coronation girded William Mareschall with the sword of the Earldome of Strigulia, and Geffrey Fitz-Peties with the sword of the Earldome of Essex: who albeit they had beene called Earles before and governed their Shires, yet were they not girt with the sword of an Earldome: and upon that day they waited at the Kings table, wearing those swords by their sides. In the age next ensuing, there came up the imposition of a chaplet cap, with a Circlet of gold, that now is turned into a coronet with rates or points onely, and with a robe of estate. Which three, to wit, a sword with a girdle, a cap or chaplet with a coronet, and a mantle or robe of estate, are by three severall Earles borne before him, that is to be created Earle: and betwixt two Earles arraied also in their robes of estate,

* Penbrochie, in another place.

D brought he is in his Surcoat unto the King sitting in his throne, where kneeling down while the Patent or Charter of his creation is a reading: at these words, This same T. we erect, create, constitute, make, appoint, and ordaine Earle of S. and we give and grant unto him the name, title, state, stile, honour, authority, and dignitie of the Earle S. and into it by the cincture of a sword really doe invest: Then is the robe or mantell of estate done upon him by the King: the sword hung about his neck, the cap with the Coronet put upon his head, and the said Charter of his creation being read before, delivered into his hand. But these matters are beside my purpose. Now, whereas it is growen to be a custome, that he which is to be created Earle, if he were not a Baron before, should be made a Baron first; it is a new ceremonie come up of late daies, and put in use, since the time
E of king Henrie the Eight. But among Earles, most honorable are they by many degrees, which are called Counts Palatine: For, as this terme Palatine was a name common to all them that had offices in the Kings palace; so Count Palatine was a title of dignity conferred upon him that before had beene an Officer Palatin, with a certaine roiall authority to sit in judgment within his owne Territorie. As for the Earle Marshall of England: King Richard the second gave that title first to Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, whereas before they were simply stiled Marshals of England, and after the banishment of Mowbray, he granted to T. Holland Duke of Surry substituted Earle Marshall in his place, that he should carie a rodde of gold enamelled blacke at both ends, where as before they used one of wood. Count Palatine. Pithœus.

F After Earles, next follow in order VICECOMITES, whom we call Vicounts: An old name this is of an office, but a new title of dignitie not heard of with us before Henry the Sixth daies, who conferred that title upon I. Lord Beaumont. In the ranke of the superior or chiefe Nobility, BARONES have the next place. And although I am not ignorant, what the learned doe write of this words signification in Tullie, yet willingly will I accord to the opinion of Isidore and of an old Grammarian, who will Vicounts. Barons.

have

have Barones to ſignifie, hired ſouldiers. For, that place in Hirtius ſo well knowen, A touching the warre of Alexandria, ſeemeth cleerely to prove the ſame: and this it is. They came running together to defend Caſſius; for, hee was wont alwaies to have about him Barones, and a great many choſen ſouldiers weaponed, from which the reſt are ſevered apart. Neither diſſenteth from this, the old Gloſſarie with Latin before Greek, which interpreteth Baro, by Ἀνὴρ that is, a man. And thorowout the laws of the Longobards, Baro is uſed for Vir, that is, a man. As for the Etymologies of this word which ſome have forged, I like them not. The French Heralts deduce Barones from the French tongue, as one would ſay Par-hommes, that is, men of equall dignity: our Engliſh Lawyers would have them to be as much, as Robora belli, that is, the ſtrength of war. B
Some Germans ſay they import, as it were Banner-heirs, that is, Lord-bearing Banners. Iſidorus ſaith, they are ſo termed, as a man ſhould ſay, βαρεῖς that is, grave or weighty. Alciatus deriveth them of Berones, an ancient people in Spaine, who were, as he ſaith, in times paſt waged ſouldiers. But that derivation out of the German tongue is the better, wherein Bar betokneth Free, and him that is his owne man and at libertie. When this name firſt came into this Iland I know not for certaine. The Britans doe not acknowledge it for theirs. In the Engliſh-Saxon lawes it is no where to be ſeene; nor found in the Saxon Gloſſarie of Alfricus among the Vocables or termes of honour; where, Dominus is tranſlated Laford, which we have contracted ſhort into Lord. The Danes called their Free-Lords, ſuch as theſe Barons be at this day, Thani, C and ſo they terme them ſtill, as Andreas Velleius witneſſeth. Howbeit, in Burgundie the uſe of the name hath beene of great antiquity: For, Gregorie Turonenſis writeth thus, The Barons of Burgundie as well Biſhops as other Leudes, &c. In a fragment of the lawes of Canutus king of Engliſh-men and Danes, was the firſt mention made of a Baron with us, ſo farre as ever I could hitherto obſerve: and yet therein, according to the varietie of copies we read indifferently theſe termes, Vironis, Baronis, and Thani. But that a Baron is meant therby, evident it is out of the Lawes of William the Conquerour, into which thoſe ordinances of Canutus are in the Normans tongue tranſlated under the name of Baro: and lo what the verie words are: Exercitualia verò, &c. That is, Let the Heriots or Relevies be ſo moderate, as that they may be tolerable. Of an D
Earle, as decent it is, eight horſes, foure with ſaddles, and foure without ſaddles: foure Helmets, and foure ſhirts of maile: eight launces or ſpeares, and as many ſhields, foure ſwords, and withall 200. mauces of gold. Of a Viron or Baron to the King, who is next unto him, foure horſes, two with ſaddles, and two without ſaddles, two ſwords, foure ſpeares and as many targets, one helmet, and one coate of mauile, and with fifty maces of gold.

Also in the firſt time of the Normans, Valvaſores and Thani were ranged in degree of honor, next after Earles and Barons: and the Valvaſores of the better ſort, if we may beleeve thoſe that write de Feudis, were the verie ſame that now Barons are. So that the name [Baro] may ſeeme to be one of thoſe, which time by little and little hath mollified and made of better eſteeme. Neither was it as yet a terme of great E honor. For, in thoſe daies ſome Earles had their Barons under them: and I remember that I read in the ancient Conſtitutions and Ordinances of the Frenchmen, how there were under an Earle, twelue Barons, and as many Capitaines under a Baron. And certaine it is, that there be ancient Charters extant, in which Earles, ſince the comming in of the Normans wrote thus, To all my Barons as well French as Engliſh, Greeting, &c. Yea even Citizens of better note were called Barons. For, the Citizens of Warwick, in Doomeſday book, were named Barones: likewiſe, Citizens of London; and the inhabitants of the Cinque-ports enioyed the ſame name. But, ſome few yeeres after, like as at Rome in times paſt, they choſe Senators for their worth in wealth: ſo were they with vs counted Barons, who held lands of their own by a whole F Baronie: that is, 13. Knights Fees, and a third part of one Knights Fee: reckoning every fee, as an old book witneſſeth, at 20. li. which make in all 400. marks. For, that was the value of one entire Baronie: and they that had lands and revenues to this worth, were wont to be ſummoned unto the Parlament. And it ſeemed to be a dignity with a iuriſdiction: which the Court-Barons, as they terme them, in ſome ſort doe prove:

yea

In Parergis. See Goldaſtus, pag. 414.

Lords.

About the yeere, 580.

Heriots or Relevies.

Haply, Mancuſa, that is, 30. deniers.

Many Thanes in England, in the Conquerors time.

Court-Barons.

A yea and the very multitude that was of theſe Barons perſwadeth me, to thinke them to be Lords of this nature, as that they might in ſome ſort miniſter and execute juſtice within their circuit and ſeigniorie, ſuch as the Germans call Free-heirs, and eſpecially, if they had Caſtles of their owne. For then, they jumped juſt with the definition of that moſt famous Civiliam Baldus, who defineth him to be a Baron, whoſoever had a meere and ſubordinate rule in ſome caſtle, by the grant of the Prince. And all they, as ſome would have it, that held Baronies, ſeeme to have claimed unto themſelves this ho- Matth. Paris.
nor: ſo that, as divers learned in our laws are of opinion, a Baron & a Baronie, a Count pag. 1262.
or Earle and a Countie, a Duke and a Duchie, were Conjugata: that is, termes as one B would ſay, yoked togither. Certes, in thoſe daies, Henrie the Third reckoned in England 150. Baronies. And heereupon it is, that in all the Charters and Hiſtories of that age, all noble men in maner be called Barons: and verily that title then was right honorable, and under the terme of Baronage, all the ſuperior ſtates of the king- Baronage of dome, as Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles and Barons, in ſome ſort were compriſed. But it England. attained to the higheſt pitch of honor, ever ſince that king Henrie the Third, out of ſo great a number, which was ſeditious and turbulent, called the very beſt, by writ or ſummon, unto the high Court of Parlament. For he (out of a writer I ſpeake of good antiquity) after many troubles and enormous vexations, betweene the King himſelfe, and Simon of Mont-fort with other Barons, and after appeaſed, did decree and ordaine, that all
C thoſe Earles and Barons of the Realme of England, unto whom the King himſelfe vouchſafed to direct his writs of Summons, ſhould come unto his Parlament, and none others. But, that which he began a little before his death, Edward the Firſt and his ſucceſſours conſtantly obſerved, and continued. Heereupon, they onely were accounted Barons of the kingdome, whom the kings had cited by vertue of ſuch writs of Summons, as they terme them, unto the Parlament. And it is noted, that the ſaid prudent king Edward the Firſt, ſummoned alwaies thoſe of ancient families that were moſt wiſe to his Parlaments, but omitted their ſonnes after their death, if they were not anſwerable to their parents in vnderſtanding. Barons were not created by Patents vntill ſuch time as king Richard the Second created Iohn Beauchamp de Holt Baron of Kiderminſter, by D his letters Patent, bearing date the eighth day of October, in the eleventh yeere of his reigne. Since that time, the Kings by their Patents, and the putting on of the mantell or robe of honour, have given this honor. And at this day, this order of creating a Baron by letters Patent, as alſo that other by writs of Summons, are in uſe: in which notwithſtanding they are not ſtiled by the name of Baron, but of Chevalier; for the Common law doth not acknowledge Baron, to be a name of dignitie. And they that be in this wiſe created, are called Barons of the Parlament, Barons of the Realme, and Barons of honor, for difference of them, who yet according to that old forme of Barons, be commonly called Barons, as thoſe of Burford, of Walton; and thoſe who were Barons unto the Count-Palatines of Cheſter and Penbroch, who were Barons in fee
E and by tenure.

Theſe our Parlamentarie Barons carie not the bare name onely, as thoſe of France and Germanie, but be all borne Peeres of the Realme of England, Nobles, Great States and Counſellers: and called they are by the King in theſe words, To treat of the high affaires of the kingdome, and thereof to give their counſell. They have alſo immunities and priviledges of their owne, namely that in criminall cauſes they are not to have their triall but by a Iurie of their Peeres: that they be not put to their oath, but their proteſtation upon their Honor is ſufficient: that they be not empanelled upon a Iurie of twelve men for enqueſt de facto. No ſupplicavit can be granted againſt them. A Capias cannot be ſude out againſt them: Neither doth an Eſſoine lie againſt them: with very F many other, which I leave unto Lawyers, who are to handle theſe and ſuch like. Beſides theſe, the two Archbiſhops, and all the Biſhops of England, be Barons alſo of the Biſhops, Barons.
kingdome, and Parlament: even as in our Grandfathers daies, theſe Abbats & Priors Abbats, Barons of the Parlament.
following:

Abbas

The Abbat of	Glaſtenburie.	The Abbat of	Waltham holy Croſſe.	A
	S. Auguſtines in Canturbury.		Shrewsburie or Salop.
	S. Peter in Weſtminſter.		Sirceſter.
	S. Albans.		S. Peters in Gloceſter.
	S. Edmonds Bury.		Bardeney.
	Peterburgh.		S. Bennets of Hulme.
	S. Iohn of Colcheſter.		Thorney.
	Eveſham.		Ramſey.
	Winchelcomb.		Hyde.	B
	Crouland.		Malmesburie.
	Battaile.		S. Marie in Yorke.
	Reding.		Selbey.
	Abindon.

The Prior of Coventrie.
The order of S. Iohn at Ieruſalem, who commonly is called Maſter of S. Iohns Knights, and would be counted the firſt and chiefe Baron of England.

Vnto whom, as ſtill unto the Biſhops, By right and cuſtome it appertained, as to Peeres of the Kingdome, to be with the reſt of the Peeres perſonally preſent at all Parliaments whatſoever, there to conſult, to handle, to ordaine, decree, and determine, in regard of the Baronies which they held of the King. For, William the Firſt, (a thing that the Churchmen of that time complained of, but thoſe in the age enſuing counted their greateſt honor) ordained Biſhopricks and Abbaies, which held Baronies in pure and perpetual Almes, and untill that time were free from all ſcular ſervice, to be under military or Knights ſervice, enrolling every Biſhopricke and Abbay at his will and pleaſure, and appointing how many ſouldiers he would have every of them to find for him and his ſucceſſours, in the time of hoſtility and warre. From that time ever ſince thoſe Eccleſiaſtical perſons enjoyed all the immunities that the Barons of the Kingdome did, ſave onely that they were not to be judged by their Peeres. For conſidering that according to the Canons of the Church, ſuch might not be preſent in matters of life and death: in the ſame cauſes they are left unto a jurie of twelve men to be judged, in the queſtion of Fact. But whether this be a cleere point in law or no, I referre me to skilfull Lawyers.

Matth. Paris.

Vavaſors or Valvaſors in old time, ſtood in the next ranke after Barons: whom the Lawyers derive from Valvæ, that is, leaved doores. And this dignitie ſeemeth to have come unto us from the French: For when they had ſoveraigne rule in Italy, they called thoſe Valvaſores who of a Duke, Marqueſſe, Earle or Capitaine, had received the charge over ſome part of their people: and as Butelere the civill Lawyer ſaith, had power to chaſtiſe in the higheſt degree, but not the libertie of faires and mercates. This was a rare dignity among us, and if ever there were ſuch, long ſince by little and little, it ceaſed and ended. For, in Chaucers time it was not great, ſeeing that of his Franklin a good yeoman or Freeholder, he writeth but thus:

Vavaſors.

Signior.

A Sheriffe had he beene and a Contour,
Was no where ſuch a worthy Vavaſour.

Nobles of an inferiour ranke.

Inferiour nobles are Knights, Eſquires, and thoſe which uſually are called Generoſi and Gentlemen.

Knights.

Knights, who of our Engliſh Lawyers be termed alſo in Latin Milites, and in all nations well neere beſides, tooke their name of Horſes: for the Italians call them Cavellieri, the Frenchmen, Chevaliers, the Germans Reiters, and our Britans in Wales Margogh, all of riding. Engliſhmen onely terme them Knights, by a word that in the old Engliſh language, as alſo of the German, ſignifieth indifferently a ſervitor or miniſter, and a luſty yong man. Heereupon it commeth, that in the Old written Goſpels tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue, we read, for Chriſts Diſciples, Chriſts Leorning Cnyhts, and elſe where for a Client or Vaſſall, Incnyght: and Bracton our ancient civill Lawyer

Digitized by Google

A Lawyer maketh mention of Radenights, that is to say, serving horsemen: who held their lands with this condition, that they should serve their Lords on horsbacke: and so by cutting off a peece of the name, as our delight is to speake short, I thought long since, that this name of Knights remained with us. But whence it came, that our countreymen should in penning of lawes, and in all writings since the Normans conquest terme those Knights in Latin, Milites, I can hardly see. And yet I am not ignorant, that in the declining time of the Roman Empire, the Denomination of Milites, that is, Souldiers, was transferred unto those that conversing neere about the Princes person bare any of the greater offices in the Princes Court or traine. But if I have any sight B at all in this matter, they were among us at first so called, who held any lands or inheritances, as Tenants in Fee, by this tenure, to serve in the warres. For those Lands were termed Knights Fees: and those that elsewhere they named Feudatarij, that is, Tenants in Fee, were here called Milites, that is, Knights: as for example, Milites Regis &c. The Kings Knights, Knights of the Archbishop of Canturburie, Knights of Earle Roger, of Earle Hugh &c. For that they received those lands or manors of them with this condition to serve for them in the wars, and to yeeld them fealtie and homage: whereas others who served for pay were simply called Solidarij and Servientes, that is, Souldiers and Servitors. But these, call them Milites or Equites, whether you will, are with us of foure distinct sorts: The most honorable and of greatest dignitie be those of the Order C of S. George, or of the Garter: In a second degree are Banerets: in a third ranke, Knights of the Bath: and in a fourth place, those who simply in our tongue, be called Knights, in Latin Equites aurati, or Milites, without any addition at all. Of S. Georges Knights, I will write in due place, when I am come to Windsor. Of the rest thus much briefly at this time.

Where fore Knights be called in Latin Milites.

Solidarij.

Banerets, whom others terme untruely Baronets, have their name of a Banner: For, granted it was unto them in regard of their martiall vertue and prowesse, to use a foure square ensigne or Banner, as well as Barons: whereupon some call them and that truly Equites Vexillarij, that is, Knights-Banerets, and the Germans, Bannerheires. The antiquitie of these Knights Banerets, I cannot fetch from before the time D of King Edward the Third, when Englishmen were renowmed for Chiualrie: so that I would beleeve verily, that this honorable title was devised then first, in recompence of martiall prowesse, untill time shall bring more certainty of truth to light. In the publicke records of that time, mention is made among militarie titles, of Banerets, of *Men at the Banner, (which may seeme all one) and of Men at armes. And I have seene a Charter of King Edward the Third, by which he advanced Iohn Coupland to the State of a Baneret, because in a battell fought at Durham he had taken prisoner David the Second, King of the Scots; and it runneth in these words: Being willing to reward the said Iohn, who tooke David de Bruis prisoner and frankly delivered him unto us; for the deserts of his honest and valiant service, in such sort as others may take example by E this precedent to doe us faithfull service in time to come; we have promoted the said Iohn to the place and degree of a Baneret: and for the maintenance of the same state, we have granted for us and our heires to the same Iohn, five hundred pounds by the yeere, to be received for him and his heires, &c. Worth the remembrance it is, to set downe heere out of Froissard the very maner and forme, whereby Iohn Chandos a brave & noble warrior in his time was made a Baneret. What time as Edward Prince of Wales, saith he, was to fight a field in the behalfe of Peter King of Castile against Henry the Bastard and the Frenchmen, Iohn Chandos came unto the Prince and delivered into his hands his own Banner folded and rolled up, with these words: My Lord, this is my Banner, may it please you to unfold and display it, that I may advance it into the field this day. For, F I have by Gods favour revenewes sufficient thereunto. The Prince then, and Peter King of Castile who stood hard by, tooke the Banner into their hands, vnfolding the same, delivered it again unto him with these or such like words: Sir Iohn, in the name of God, who blesse this daies service of yours, that it may speed well and turne to your glorie, Beare your selfe manfully, and give proofe what a Knight you are. Having thus received the Banner, to his companies he went with a cheerefull heart: My fellow Banerets.

Pars. 2. Pat. 15. E. 3. m. 22. and 23.

vide p: 288. 305.

Digitized by Google

low ſouldiers, quoth he, Behold there is my Banner and yours, in caſe yee defend it A courageouſly as your owne. Of later time, he that is to be advanced unto this dignity, either before the battell, that he may be encouraged; or after the battell ended, that he may receive due honor for his valor, bearing an enſigne of a long faſhion, ſuch as they call a Pennon wherein his owne armes are depainted in their colours, is brought betweene two elderly Knights, with trumpetters and Heralds going before, into the preſence of the King, or his Regent and Lieutenant generall: who after good words and wiſhes in parting happie fortune, commandeth the tip or point of the ſaid pennon to bee cut off, that of a long pennon it might be made a foure ſquare banner. B

Knights of the Bathe.

Concerning Knights of the Bath, in all my readings hitherto, I could find no greater Antiquitie thereof, than this, that they were in uſe among the antient French: and that Henrie the Fourth King of England, that day whereon he was crowned in the tower of London, dubbed 46. Eſquiers Knights, who the night before had watched and bathed: unto everie one of whom, he gave greene ſide coats reaching downe to their ankles, with ſtreit ſleeves, and furred with minivère: alſo, that they wore upon their left ſhoulder two cordons of white ſilke with taſſels thereto hanging down. Theſe in former times were wont to be created, and ſelected out of the flower of Nobilitie (which had not before taken the degree of Knighthood) at the coronation of Kings and Queenes, and at their marriages: ſometimes alſo, when their C ſonnes were inveſted Princes of Wales, or Dukes, or when they ſolemnly received the cincture or militarie girdle of knighthood, and that with many ceremonies, which now for the moſt part are grown out of uſe. But in our daies, they that are called by the king to enter into this order (neither will I handle this argument exquiſitly) the day before they are created, being clad in an Eremits gray weed, with a hood, a linnen coife, and booted withall, come devoutly to divine ſervice, to begin their warfare there, as if they would employ their ſervice for God eſpecially: they ſuppe all together: and upon every one of them, there wait two Eſquiers, and one Page: After ſupper, they retire themſelves into their bedchamber, where for each of them is prepared a prettie bed, with red curtaines, and their owne armes faſtened thereupon, D with a bathing veſſell ſtanding cloſe by, covered with linnen clothes, wherein after they have ſaid their praiers, and commended themſelves to God, they bathe themſelves, that thereby they might bee put in mind, to be pure in bodie and ſoule from thenceforth. The next morrow, early in the morning awakened they are, and raiſed with a noiſe of Muſicall Inſtruments, and doe on the ſame apparell. Then the high Conſtable of England, the Earle Marſhall, and others whom the king appointeth, come unto them, cal them forth in order: and tender an oath unto them, namely, that they ſhall ſerve and worſhip God above all, defend the Church, honour the king, maintaine his rights, protect widowes, virgins, orphans, and to their power repell and put by all wrong. When they have ſworne thus to doe, by laying their hand E upon the Goſpels, they are brought with ſtate to morning praier, the kings Muſitians and Heralds going before, and by them likewiſe, they are conducted backe to their bedchambers: where after they have deveſted themſelves from their Eremites weed, they put on a mantle of martiall redde Taffata, implying they ſhould be Martiall men, and a white Hat with a white plume of feathers over their linnen coife, in token of ſinceritie, and tie a paire of white gloves to the pendant cordon of their mantle. This done, they mount upon Steeds, dight with ſaddle and furniture of blacke leather, with white intermingled, and having a croſſe in the frontlet. Before everie one of them rideth his own Page, carrying a ſword with a gilded hilt, at which there hang gilt ſpurres, and of either hand of them ride their Eſquiers. With this pompe, F and trumpets ſounding before them, to the kings Court they goe, where when they are brought by two antient Eſquiers to the Kings preſence, the Page delivereth the Girdle and Sword hanging thereto, unto the Lord Chamberlaine, and he with great reverence unto the King, who therewith girdeth the Knight overthwart, and commandeth therewith two elder knights to put on the Spurres, who in times paſt were wont with

Digitized by Google

A with good wishes, and praiers to kisse his knees that was to bee knighted. And these new knights thus created, used in old time to bring up the service of meats to the kings Table: after this, they dine all together, sitting to one side of the boord, every one under the Escutchon of his owne Armes fastened over his head. At evening praier they repaire to the chapel, offer their Swords upon the high altar, and by laying downe a peece of money redeeme the same againe. Now, as they returne from divine service, the kings Master-Cooke sheweth them his knife, and admonisheth them to B performe the part of good and faithfull knights, otherwise hee would to their shame and reproch, cut off those Spurres of theirs. Upon the Coronation day, in that solemne pompe, they accompanie the King keeping their places, with their Swords girt to them, and their spurres on, in louiall blew mantles, as a man would say, in the colour of just Iupiter, as a foretoken of justice, having the knot of white silke made in forme of a crosse, with an hood upon their left shoulder. But of these complements (which my purpose was not to prosecute in particular) this may bee thought sufficient, if not superfluous.

Now as touching those knights, who simply without any addition be called, Knights, and howsoever they are in order ranged last, yet by institution they bee first and of greatest Antiquitie. For, as the Romans, a gowned nation, gave unto them that were entring into mans estate, a virile and plaine gowne, without welt or guard: Knights.
C even so, the Germans our Ancestors bestowed upon their young men, whom they judged meet for to manage armes, armour and weapons. Which Cornelius Tacitus will informe you of, in these words of his: The maner was not for any one to take armes in hand, before the State allowed him as sufficient for Martiall service. And then, in the very assembly of Counsell, either some one of the Princes, or the Father of the young man, or one of his kinsfolke furnish him with a shield and a javelin. This with them standeth in stead of a virile gowne, this is the first honour done to youth: before this they seeme to bee but part of a private house, but now within a while members of the Commonweale. De moribus Germanorum.

And seeing that such militarie young men, they termed in their language (as we in D ours) Knechts, from them I deeme, the originall both of name and institution also, ought to be fetched. This was the first, and most simple maner of creating a Knight, this the Lombards, this the Franks, this our countreymen, all descended out of Germanie in old time used. Paulus Diaconus reporteth thus; among the Lombards, This is the Custome, that the Kings sonne dineth not with his father, unlesse hee receive Armes before from some King of a forraine nation. The Annals of France record, that the Kings of the Franks, gave armes unto their sonnes, and to others, and girded them with a sword: yea, and our Aelfred, as William of Malmesburie witnesseth, when he dubbed Athelstane his nephew, Knight, being a child of great hope, gave him a scarlet mantle, a belt or girdle set with pretious stones, and a Saxon-sword with a golden Lib. 1. cap. 22.
E scabberd. Afterwards, when as religion had possessed mens minds so, as that they thought nothing wel and fortunatly don, but what came from Church-men, our Ancestors a little before the Normans comming received the Sword at their hands. And this, Ingulphus who lived in those daies, sheweth in these words; He that was to be consecrated unto lawfull warfare, should the evening before, with a contrite heart, make confession of his sinnes unto the Bishop, Abbat, Monke, or Priest, and being absolved, give himselfe to praier, and lodge all night in the Church, and when hee was to heare divine service the morrow after, offer his sword upon the Altar: and after the Gospel, the Priest was to put the sword first hallowed upon the Knights necke, with his Benedictum, and so when he had heard Masse againe, and received the Sacrament, he became a lawfull Knight. Neither
F grew this custome out of use fleight waies under the Normans: For, Iohn of Sarisburie writeth in his Polycraticon, thus; A solemne Custome was taken up and used, that the verie day when any one was to be honored with the girdle of knighthood, hee should solemnly goe to Church, and by laying and offering his Sword upon the Altar, vow himselfe (as it were) by making a solemne profession, to the service of the Altar, that is to say promise perpetuall service and obsequious dutie unto the Lord. Peter also of Blois, writeth thus:

Digitized by Google

Epist. 94. At this day young Knights, and ſouldiers receive their Swords from the Altar, that they might profeſſe themſelves Sonnes of the Church, and to have taken the Sword for defence of the poore, for puniſhment and revenge of malefactors, and deliverie of their Countrey. But in proceſſe of time (ſaith he) it is turned cleane contrarie. For, in theſe daies ſince they are become adorned with the Knights cincture, preſently they ariſe againſt the Anointed of the Lord, and rage upon the patrimonie of Chriſt crucified. And as for this ceremonie, that they would be girt with a Sword, it may ſeeme no doubt to have proceeded from the militarie diſcipline of the Romans; becauſe as they denied it unlawfull to fight with their enemie before they were bound to their militarie oth, by a drawen ſword: even ſo, our Forefathers thought they might not goe to warfare lawfully, before they were by this ceremonie lawfully authoriſed: according to which wee read, that William Rufus king of England, was dubbed knight, by Lanfranke the Archbiſhop. But this cuſtome by little and little grew to diſuſe, ſince the time that the Normans, as Ingulphus writeth, laughed and ſcorned at it; and in a Synode at Weſtminſter, An. 1102, a Canon paſſed, That no Abbats ſhould dubbe Knights: which ſome notwithſtanding expound thus, That Abbats ſhould grant no lands of the Church to be held, by Knights ſervice, or in Knights fee, or ſervice.

Afterwards, Kings were wont to ſend their ſonnes unto the neighbour Princes to receive knighthood at their hands: thus, was our K. Henrie the Second, ſent unto David king of the Scots, and Malcolme king of Scots unto our Henrie the Second, and our Edward the Firſt unto the king of Caſtile, to take of them Militarie or Virile armes: for, theſe terms and phraſes they uſed in that age for the creation of a Knight. Then it was alſo, that beſides the ſword and girdle, gilt ſpurs were added for more ornament; whreupon at this day, they are called in Latin, Equites aurati. Moreover, they had the priviledge to weare and uſe a ſignet: for before they were dubbed knights, (as I gather out of Abendon Boooke) it was not lawfull to uſe a ſeale: Which writing (quoth he) *Richard Earle of Cheſter purpoſed to ſigne with the ſeale of his mother Ermentrud, conſidering that all Letters which he directed (for as yet he had not * taken the Militarie girdle) were made up and cloſed within his mothers ſignet.* In the age enſuing, knights (as it may be well collected) were made by their wealth, and ſtate of living: For, they which had a great knights Fee, that is, (if wee may beleeve old records) * 680 akers of Land, claimed as their right, the ornaments & badges of knighthood: Nay rather under Henry the Third, they were compelled after a ſort to be knights, as many as in revenues of their lands might diſpend fifteen pounds by the yere: ſo as now it ſeemed a title of burden, rather than of honour. In the yeere 1256. there went out an edict from the King, by vertue whereof, commandement was given and proclamation made thorowout the Realm, that whoſoever had fifteen pounds in land and above, ſhould be dight in his armes, and endowed with knighthood: to the end that England as well as Italie might bee ſtrengthened with Chivalrie: and they that would not, or were not able to maintaine the honour of knighthood, ſhould fine for it, and pay a peece of money. Hence it is, that in the kings Records, we meet ſo often with this: For reſpit of knighthood, A. de N. l. H. &c. Alſo ſuch like preſentments from the Iurours, or ſworne Enqueſt, as this, R. de S. Lawrence, holdeth an entire and whole Fee, is at full age, and not yet knight, therefore in Miſericordia, that is, To be fined at the Kings pleaſure. To this time and after, unleſſe I faile in mine obſervation, in the Brieſes and Inſtruments of our law when twelve men, or Iurers are named, before whom there paſſeth triall or proofe de facto, that is, of a fact, they bee called, Milites, that is, Knights, who have a complet Fee, and thoſe Milites gladio cincti, that is, Knights with cincture of ſword, who by the King are girded with the belt of knighthood. At which time when the king was to create knights, as the ſaid Matthew Paris writeth, he ſat glorioufly in his ſeat of eſtate, arraied in cloth of gold of the moſt pretious and coſtly Bawdkin, and crowned with his Crowne of gold, and to every knight, hee allowed or gave 100. ſhillings, for his * harneſſements. And not onely the King, but alſo Earles in thoſe daies created knights. For the ſame author reporteth, How the Earle of Gloceſter inveſted with a militarie girdle his brother William, after he had proclaimed a Turneament. Simon likewiſe de Monteſort Earle of Leiceſter,

* Been dubbed Knight.

* Others ſay, 100.

* Complements.

Digitized by Google

A Leicester, did the same by Gilbert de Clare: Like as in France, (a thing that evidently appeareth by the Patent or Instrument of * Nobilitation) he that hath obtained such letters of Ennoblishment*, is enabled to be dubbed knight, and receive the girdle of knighthood at any knights hand that he will himselfe*. But since that time, hath no man with us been created knight, but either by the king himselfe, or the kings eldest sonne, warranted before by authoritie recived from his father, or else by the Kings Lieutenant, or Deputie generall in the campe, and that in consideration either of some valiant acts atchieved, or exploits to be performed abroad in armes: or else of wisdome and policie at home. And verily a most prudent and wise order was this, that our B Kings tooke, since they had not any Fees or Lands now to bestow upon them. Neither was there (I assure you) any thing of more validitie, to give an edge unto the courage of hardy men, and to bind unto them their best subjects, and such as had deserved well, (being otherwise worshipfully descended, and of honourable parentage, and withall sufficient for estate and living) than kindly and lovingly to adorne them with this high esteemed title of Knighthood, which was before time the name only of charge and function: when this right worshipful title was by the Prince conferred upon one, advisedly and for desert, it went (no doubt) for an ample reward, was prized as a benefit, and accounted among the tokens of honour. For, Knights in this maner dubbed, made this esteeme thereof, that in it consisted the guerdon of C their vertue and valour, the praise of their house and family, the memoriall of their stocke and lineage; and lastly, the glorie of their name. Insomuch, as our Lawyers have in their bookes written, That [Knight] was a name of dignitie, but so was not Baron. For in old time, a Baron (if hee were not of this order of Knighthood) was written simply by his Christian, or fore-name, and the proper name of his family, without any addition, unlesse it were of Dominus, a terme fitting Knights also. And this name of Knight may seeme to have beene an honourable additament to the highest dignitie, when Kings, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Barons, requested to have the dignitie, and name together. Here it likes me well to insert, what Matthew Florilegus hath written concerning the creation of Knights in the time of Ed- D ward the First. The King (quoth he) for to augment and make a goodly shew of his expedition into Scotland, caused publike proclamation to bee made thorowout England, that whosoever were to be knights by hereditarie succession, and had wherewith to maintaine that degree, should present themselves in Westminster, at the feast of Whitsontide, there to receive every one, the ornaments of a knight, (saving the equipage or furniture that belongeth to horses) out of the kings Wardrobe. When as therfore there flocked thither to the number of 300. yong gallants, the Sons of Earles, Barons and knights, purple liveries, fine silke Scarfes, Robes most richly embrodered with gold, were plentifully bestowed among them, according as was befitting each one: And because the Kings Palace, (large though it were) was streited of roome, for so great a multitude assembled, they cut downe the apple trees E about the new Temple in London, laid the walles along, and there set up pavilions and tents, wherin these noble yong gallants might array, and set out themselves one by one in their gorgeous and golden garments. All the night long also, these foresaid youths, as many as the place would receive watched and praied in the said Temple. But the Prince of Wales, by commandement from the king his father, held his wake, together with the principall and goodliest men of this company within the Church of Westminster. Now such sound was there of trumpets, so loud a noise of Minstrelsie, so mightie an applause and crie of those that for joy shouted, that the chaunting of the Covent could not be heard from one side of the Quire to the other. Well, the morrow after, the king dubbed his Sonne knight, and gave him the Girdle of knighthood in his owne palace, and therewith bestowed upon him the Du- F chie of Aquitaine. The Prince then, thus created Knight, went directly into Westminster Church for to grace with the like glorious dignitie his feers and companions. But so great was the preasse of people thronging before the high Altar, that two Knights were thrunged to death, and verie many of them fainted, and were readie to swowne, yea, although every one of them had three souldiers at least to lead and protect him: The Prince himselfe by reason of the multitude preasing up to him, having divided

* Ennoblishment.
* Nobilitation.

Digitized by Google

the people by the meanes of ſteeds of ſervice, no otherwiſe than upon the high altar girt his foreſaid companions with the order of knighthood. But in our daies, hee that receiveth the dignitie of a knight, kneeleth downe, and then the * King with his ſword drawne, ſlightly ſmiteth him upon the ſhoulder, ſpeaking unto him theſe words withall, in French, Sois Chevalier au nom de Dieu, that is, Be thou Knight in the name of God: and afterwards he ſaith moreover, Avances Chivalier, that is, Ariſe Sir knight. As for al things elſe appertaining to this order, namely, what an excellent and glorious degree this of knighthood was eſteemed with our Anceſtours, how noble a reward to brave minded men, ſuch as deſired glorie and honour, it was reputed, how carefully they kept faith and troth, conſidering it was ſufficient, if they undertook or promiſed ought as faithful knights or upon the faith of a knight, how farre they were from baſe gaine and lucre, and what maner of paiment or Aid is to be levied for knights fees, when as the Prince, the kings eldeſt ſonne ſhould bee inveſted in this honour, &c. I leave it for others to write: as alſo, when they had ſo farre offended, that being to ſuffer death therefore, they were firſt deſpoiled of their enſignes, and of their degree, to wit, their militarie Girdle vngirted, the Sword taken away, their Spurres cut off with an hatchet, their Gantlets or Gloves plucked from them, and the Eſcutcheon of their Armes reverſed: like as in degrading the *Eccleſiaſticall order, all the Eccleſiaſtical ornaments, booke, chalice, & ſuch like are taken away. Let the curious alſo enquire, whether thoſe knights were truly by ſome termed Knights Bachelars; or whether Bachelars were of a middle degree between theſe Knights and Eſquires? For, in the kings Record are read, The names of Knights, of Bachelars, and of Valects of the Earle of Gloceſter, and of others. Whereupon there be that would have Bachelars ſo called, as one would ſay, Baſ-Chevaliers, that is, knights of Low degree: although other derive that name from the French verbe Battailer, which ſignifieth to combate or fight it out. Withall, let them weigh and conſider, whether theſe dignities of knighthood in times paſt ſo glorious, (as long as they were more rare, and beſtowed onely as the reward of vertue) may not be vilified, when it becommeth common, and lieth proſtitute (as it were) to the ambitious humour of everie one. Whereof in the like caſe Æmilius Probus complained long ſince among the Romans.

* King or Queene.

* Prieſts.

In dorſo Pat. 51. H. 3.

Eſquires. Next in degree after theſe Knights, are Eſquires, termed in Latine, Armigeri, that is, Coſtrels or Bearers of armes: the ſame that Scutiferi, that is, Shield-bearers, and Homines ad arma, that is, Men at armes: the Gothes called them Schilpor, all, of carrying the ſhield: as in old time among the Romans, ſuch as were named Scutarij, who tooke that name either of their Eſcutcheons of armes, which they bare as Enſignes of their deſcent, or becauſe they were armour-bearers to Princes, or to the better ſort of the Nobilitie. For, in times paſt every Knight had two of theſe waiting upon him: they carried his morion and ſhield, as inſeparable companions, they ſtucke cloſe unto him, becauſe of the ſaid Knight their Lord they held certaine lands in Eſcutage, like as the knight himſelfe of the king by knights ſervice. But now adaies, there be five diſtinct ſorts of theſe: for thoſe whom I have ſpoken of alreadie, be now no more in any requeſt. The principall Eſquires at this day thoſe are accounted, that are ſelect Eſquires for the Princes bodie: the next unto them be knights eldeſt ſonnes, and their eldeſt ſonnes likewiſe ſucceſſively. In a third place, are reputed younger ſonnes of the eldeſt ſonnes of Barons, and of other Nobles in higher eſtate: and when ſuch heires males faile, togither with them the title alſo faileth. In a fourth ranke are reckoned thoſe, unto whom the King himſelfe, togither with a title, giveth armes, or createth Eſquires, by putting about their necke a ſilver colar of * SS. and (in former times) upon their heeles a paire of white ſpurres ſilvered: whereupon at this day in the Weſt parts of the kingdome, they bee called White-ſpurres, for diſtinction from knights, who are wont to weare gilt ſpurres: and to the firſt begotten ſonnes onely of theſe doth the title belong. In the fifth and laſt place be thoſe ranged, and taken for Eſquires, whoſoever have any ſuperiour publicke office in the Commonweale, or ſerve the Prince in any Worſhipfull calling. But this name of Eſquire, which in antient time was a name of charge and office onely, crept firſt among other titles ſee chaucer in the Wife of Baths prologue ſ. 282 in my book) — our apprentice Jankyn — Squiereth me to the ſtable and dreſſe — I attendeth, waytеth for on me.

* Eſſes.

Digitized by Google

A titles of dignitie and worship, (so farre as ever I could observe,) in the reigne of Richard the Second.

Gentlemen, or the common sort of Nobilitie bee they, that either are descended of worshipfull parentage, or raised up from the base condition of people, for their vertue or wealth. Gentlemen.

Citizens or Burgesses, bee such as in their owne severall citie execute any publike office, and by election have a roome in our high court of Parliament. Citizens.

Yeomen, are they whom some call, Free-borne, or Freeholders, and our law termeth, Homines Legales, that is, Lawfull men, and who of Free-lands may dispend for- Yeomen.
B tie shillings at least by the yeere.

Lastly, Craftsmen, Artisanes, or Workmen, be they that labour for hire, and namely, such as sit at worke, Mechanicke artificers, Smiths, Carpenters, &c. Which were termed of the Romans, Capite censi, as one would say, Taxed or reckoned by the poll, and Proletarij.

LAW COVRTS OF ENGLAND.

C AS touching the Tribunals, or Courts of Iustice of England, there are three sorts of them among us: for, some bee Ecclesiasticall, others Temporal, and one mixt of both, which being the greatest, and most honourable of all, is called by a name of no great antiquitie, and the same borrowed out of France, The Parliament. Parliament. The Anglo-Saxons our ancestors termed it, Witena-ȝe-mot, that is, An assembly of the wise, and ȝe-þæning, that is, A Counsell, and Micil synod, of the Greeke word Synodus, that is, A great Synod or meeting. The Latine writers of that, and the ensuing age called it, Commune Concilium, Curiam altissimam, Generale placitum, Curiam magnam, Magnatum Conventum, Præsentiam Regis, Prælatorum, Procerum & collectorum, Commune totius regni Concilium, &c. That is,
D The Common councell, The Highest court, The Generall Plea, The Great court, The Meeting of States, The Presence of the King, Prelates and Peeres assembled together, The Publike Councell of the whole kingdome, &c. And like as the Generall councell of all Ætolia is named by Livie PANAETOLIUM, so this may well be termed PANANGLIUM. For it consisteth of the King, the Clergie, the superior Nobles, the elect Knights and Burgesses; or to speake more significantly after the Lawyers phrase, of the King, the Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and the Commons, which States represent the body of all England. It is not held at set and certaine times, but summoned by the King at his pleasure, so often as consultation is to be had of high affaires and urgent matters, that the Common weale may susteine no damage; and at his will alone it is dis-
E solved. Now this Court hath sovereigne and sacred authority in making, confirming, repealing and expounding Lawes, in restoring such as be attainted or outlawed to their former estates, in deciding of the hardest controversies betweene private persons, and, to speake at a word, in all causes which may concerne either the safetie of the State, or any private person whatsoever.

The next Court after this, in the daies presently following the Normans comming, and some good while after, was The Court of the King himselfe; and the same kept in the Kings house or Palace, & accompanying the King whither so ever he retired or went in progresse. For, in the kings Palace, a place there was for the Chancellor and clerks, such as were imployed about writs or processes, & the seale: for Iudges also that han- The Kings Court.
F dled as well Pleas (as they term them) pertaining unto the Kings Crowne, as between one Subiect and another. There was also the Exchequer, wherein the Lord Treasurer, Auditours, and Receivers sat, who had the charge of the Kings revenues, treasure, & coffers. Every of these being counted of the Kings houshold in ordinary, had allowed them from the King, both diet and apparell. Wherupon Gotzelinus in the life of S. Edward, calleth them, The Lawyers of the Palace, & Iohn of Salisburie, The Court-Law- yers. But beside these and above them all, was one appointed for administration of Iustice, named, Iustitia Anglia, he Iustice of England; Prima Iustitia, The principall Iustice, the Iusticer of England, and Chiefe Iusticer of England, who, with a yeerely pension of a thousand Marks, was ordained by a Commission or Charter running in these termes; The King, to all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbats, Priors, Earles, Barons, Sheriffes, Foresters, and all other liege and faithfull people of England, greeting. Whereas for the preservation of our selves, and the peace of our Kingdome, and for the ministring of Iustice, to all and every person of our Realme, we have ordained our beloved and trustie Philip Basset, Chiefe Iusticer of England, so long as it shall please us; we charge you upon the faith and allegeance that ye owe unto us, and do straitly enjoyne you, that in all things which concerne the office of our foresaid Iusticeship, and the preservation of our peace, and kingdome, yee be fully attendant, and assistant unto him, so long as he shall continue in the said Office. Witnesse the King, &c.

Digitized by Google

But when as in the reigne of Henrie the Third, enacted it was that the Common Pleas of the Subjects should not follow the Kings Court, but beheld in some certain place within a while after, the Chancerie and the Court of the Pleas of the Crowne, together with the Exchequer, were translated from the Kings Court, and established in certaine places apart by themselves: as some, I know not how truly, have reported.

Having premised by way of Preface thus much, I will proceed to write briefly somewhat of these Courts, and others that arise from them, according as they are kept at this day. And whereas some of them be Courts of law, to wit; the Kings Bench, The common Bench or Pleas, the Exchequer, the Assises, the Star-chamber, the Court of Wards, and the Admirals Court: others of Equity, namely; The Chauncerie, The Court of Requests, The Counsels in the Marches of Wales and in the North parts; of every of these in due order, somewhat, as I have learned of others.

Kings Bench. The Kings Bench, so called because the Kings were wont there to sit as Presidents in proper person, handleth the pleas of the Crowne, and many other matters which pertaine to the King and the Weale publicke: and withall it sifteth and examineth the errors of the common Pleas. The Iudges there beside the King when it pleaseth him to be present, are, the Lord cheefe Iustice of England, and other Iustices foure, or more, as the King shall thinke good.

Common Pleas. The common Pleas hath that name because in it are debated the common Pleas betweene Subject and Subject, acccording to our law, which they call common. Heerein give judgement, The chiefe Iustice of the common Pleas, with foure Iustices assistants or more. Officers attendant there be, The Keeper of the Brieffes or writs, Three Protonotaries, and inferior Ministers very many.

Exchequer. The Exchequer tooke that name of a boord or table whereat they sat. For, thus writeth Gervase of Tilburie, who liued in the yeere 1160. The Exchequer is a foure cornered boord, about ten foot long, and five foot broad, fitted in maner of a table for men to sit round about it. On every side a standing ledge or border it hath of the bredth of foure fingers. Vpon this Exchequer boord is laid a cloth bought in Easter terme, and the same of black colour, and rewed with strikes distant one from another a foote are a span. And a little after. This Court, by report, began from the very Conquest of the Realme, and was erected by King William: howbeit the reason and proportion thereof, taken from the Exchequer beyond Sea. In this are all causes heard which belong unto the Kings treasury. Iudges therein, be The Lord Treasurer of England, The Chanceller of the Exchequer, The Lord chiefe Baron, with three or foure other Barons of the Exchequer. The servitours and Ministers to this court are, The Kings Remembrancer; The Lord Treasurers Remembrancer, The Clerke of the Pipe, The Controller of the Pipe: Auditours of the old reuenues five: The Forren opposer, The Clerke of the Estreights, The Clerk of the Pleas, The Marescall, The Clerke of Summons, The Deputie Chamberlaines Secondaries in the office of the Kings Remembrancer two, Secondaries in the office of the Lord Treasurers Remembrancer two, Secondaries of the Pipe two, Clerkes in divers offices foure &c. In the other

A other part of the Exchequer called the Receit, these be the Officers: Two Chamberlains, a vice Treasurer, Clerke of the Tallies, Clerke of the Pels, Tellers foure, Ioyners of Tallies two, Deputie Chamberlaines two: The Clerke for Tallies, The Keeper of the Treasurie, Messengers or Pursuivants ordinary foure: Scribes two &c. The Officers likewise of the Tenths and first Fruits belong to the Court, who were ordained, when as the Popes authoritie was banished and abolished, and an act passed, by which it was provided that the Tenths & First fruits of Churchmens Benefices should be paid vnto the King.

Beside these three Kings Courts for law, to cut off delaies, to ease the subject allo of travell and charges; King Henrie the Second sent some of these Iudges Iustices Itenerant.
B and others yeerely into every Shire or Countie of the Realme, who were called Iustices Itinerant, and commonly Iustices in Eyre. These determined and gave judgement, as well of the Pleas of the Crowne, as the common Pleas, within those Counties whereunto they were assigned. For, the said King, as Matthew Paris saith, By the counsell of his sonne and the Bishops together, appointed Iustices to six parts of the Kingdome: in every part three, who should sweare to keepe and maintaine the right belonging to every man, sincerely and uncorruptly. But this ordinance vanished at length under Edward the Third: Howbeit, within a while after by Parlamentarie authority, it was in some sort revived. For the Counties being divided into certaine Circuits, as we
C terme them, two of the Kings Iustices together twice in the yeere ride about and keepe their Circuits, for to give definitive sentence of the Prisoners, and as we use to speake, to deliuer the Goales or Prisons. Whereupon in our Lawyers Latin, they bee called Iusticiarij Gaolæ deliberandæ, that is, Iustices for Goale deliverie: as also to take Recognisances of Assises of new Desseisine, &c: whereof they be named Iustices of the Assises, to end and dispatch controversies depending, and growen to an issue in the foresaid principall Kings Courts, betweene plaintiffes and defendants, and that, by their Peeres, as the custome is: whence they are commonly called Iustices of Nisi prius, which name they tooke of the writs sent unto the Sheriffe, which have in them these two words, Nisi Prius, that is, Vnlesse before &c.

The Star-Chamber or the Court rather of Kings Counsell, wherein are discussed Star-Cham-
D and handled criminall matters, perjuries, cousenages, fraud, deceit, riots or excesse. ber.
&c. This Court in regard of time is right ancient, and for dignity most honorable. For it seemes that it may claime antiquity ever since the first time that Subjects appealed unto their Soueraignes, and the Kings Counsell was erected. Now, the Iudges of this Court are persons right Honorable and of greatest reputation, even the Kings Privie Counsellers. As for the name of Star-Chamber, it took it from the time that this Counsell was appointed at Westminister in a Chamber there anciently garnished and beautified with Starres: For we read in the Records of Edward the Third, Counseil en la Chambre des Estoilles, pres de la Receit al Westminster, that is, The Counsell in the Chamber of Starres, neere unto the Receit at Westminster. But the Authority
E thereof, that most sage and wise Prince Henrie the Seuenth, by authority of Parlament so augmented and established, that some are of opinion, though untruly, hee was the first founder of it. The Iudges heere, are The Lord Chancellor of England, The Lord Treasurer of England, The Lord Præsident of the Kings Counsell, The Lord Keeper of the Privy Seale, & all Counsellers of the State, as wel Ecclesiastical as Temporall: & out of the Barons of the Parlament, those whom the King wil call: The two cheefe Iustices of the Benches, or in their absence two other Iudges. The Officers heerein are these, The Clerke of the Counsell, The Clerke of writs and processe of the Counsell in the Star-Chamber &c. And causes here are debated and decided not by Peeres according to our common Law, but after the course of civill Law.

F The Court of Wards and Liveries hath the name of Pupils or Wards, whose causes Court of Wards.
it handleth; was first instituted by Henrie the Eighth; whereas in former times their causes were heard in the Chancerie and Exchequer. For, by an old Ordinance derived out of Normandie, and not from Henrie the Third (as some doe write) when a man is deceased, Who holdeth possessions or Lands of the King in chiefe by Knights service, as well the heire as his whole patrimonie and reuenues are in the Kings power, tuition

and

Digitized by Google

and protection, vntill he be full one and twenty yeeres of age, and vntill by vertue of A the Kings breefe or letter, reſtitution and redelivery be made vnto him thereof. In this Court, the Generall Maſter ſitteth as Iudge: vnder whom are theſe, The Supraviſor, or Surveier of Liveries, The Atturney generall of the Court, The generall Receiver, The Auditour, The Clerke of the Liveries, The Clerke of the Court, Forty Fedaries, and a Meſſenger.

There have ſprung up alſo in theſe later times, two other Courts, to wit, Of reforming Errours: whereof the firſt is, to correct Errours in the Exchequer, the other to amend errours committed in the Kings Bench. The Iudges in the former of theſe twaine, are the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Treaſurer of England, with others of the B Kings Iuſtices whom they are diſpoſed to take vnto them. In the later, The Iuſtices of the Common Pleas, and the Barons of the Exchequer.

Admirals Court. The Admirals Court handleth Sea matters. In this are reckoned the Lord Admirall of England, his Lieutenant, and a Iudge: two Scribes, a Serjeant of the Court, and the Vice-Admirals of England. Now proceed we to the Courts of Equity.

Chancerie. The Chancerie drew that name from a Chancellor: which name vnder the ancient Romane Emperours, was not of ſo great eſteeme and dignity, as we learne out of Vopiſcus. But now adaies a name it is of higheſt honour, and Chancellors are aduanced to the higheſt pitch of civil Dignity. Whoſe name Caſsiodorus fetcheth frō croſſe grates or latteſſes, becauſe they examined matters, within * places ſevered apart en- C cloſed with partitions of ſuch croſſe barres which the Latins call Cancelli. Regard, ſaith he to a Chancellor what name you beare: It cannot bee hidden which you doe within Latteſſes. For you keepe your gates lightſome; your bars open, and your dores tranſparent as windowes. Whereby, it is very evident, that he ſat within grates, where he was to be ſeene on every ſide, and thereof it may be thought he tooke that name. But, conſidering it was his part, being as it were the Princes mouth, eie and eare, to ſtrike and daſh out with croſſe-lines lattiſe-like, thoſe letters, Commiſſions, Warrants, and Decrees paſſed againſt law and right, or prejudiciall to the Commor-wealth, which not improperly they termed to cancell, ſome thinke the name of Chancellor came from this Cancelling: and in a Gloſſarie of later time thus we read, A Chancellor is he whoſe D
Office is, to looke into and peruſe the writings and anſwers of the Emperour: to cancell what is written amiſſe, and to ſigne that which is well. Neither is that true, which Polydore Virgil writeth, namely that William the Conquerour inſtituted a Colledge or fellowſhip of Scribes, to write letters patents &c. and named the Maſter of that Societie, Chancellor: conſidering it is plaine & manifeſt that Chancellors were in England before the Normans Conqueſt. How great the dignity and authority of the Chancellor is at this day, it is better knowen than I can declare: but of what credit it was in old time, have heere in a word or two out of a writer of good antiquity. The dignitie of the

Robert Fits-Stephen, who lived vnder Henry the Second. Chancellor of England is this, He is reputed the ſecond perſon in the Realme and next vnto the King; with the one ſide of the Kings Seale, (whereof by his office he hath the Keeping) E he may ſigne his owne injunctions, to diſpoſe and order the Kings Chapell as he liketh, to receive and keepe all Archbiſhopricks, Biſhopricks, Abbaies, and Baronies, void and falling into the Kings hand, to be preſent at all the Kings Counſels, and thither to repaire uncalled: alſo that all things be ſigned by the hand of his Clerke who carieth the Kings Seale, & that all things be directed and diſpoſed by advice of the Chancellor. Item, that by the helpfull merits of his good life through Gods grace, he need not die, if he will himſelfe, but Archbiſhop or Biſhop: And hereof it is, that the Chancellor-ſhip is not to be bought. The forme and maner of ordaining a Chanceller, (for that alſo I will note) was in the time of King Henrie the Second, by hanging the great Seale of England about the necke of the Chanceller elect. But in King Henry the Sixt daies, this was the order of it, according to the F notes I tooke out of the Records. When the place of the Lord Chanceller of England is void by death, the Kings three great Seales, to wit, one of gold, and other two of ſilver, which remained in the cuſtodie of the Chanceller, preſently after his death are ſhut up in a wooden cheſt faſt locked, and ſigned with the Seales of the Lords then preſent and ſo conveied into the Treaſurie: From thence brought they are to the King, who in the preſence of many Noblemen

* Secretum, that is, the place of Iudgment. Epiſt. 6. lib. 11.

Digitized by Google

A blem in delivereth them into the hands of him that shall be Chancellour, and undertaketh the charge of executing the Office of Chancellorship, taking before an oath of him, well and truly to exercise the same: first he deliuereth the great Seale of silver, then that of gold, and so the other of silver: who receiving the same bestoweth them againe in the chest; and being signed with his owne Seale conveieth it home to his owne house, and before certaine of the Nobility, causeth the Kings Patents and writs to be Sealed. When a Chancellour is discharged of his place, he delivereth up into the Kings hands in the presence of the Lords and Nobles, those three Seales, first the Seale of gold, then one broad Seale of silver; and so another of a lesse forme. Howbeit at this day one Seale and no more is delivered unto B the Chancellour, neither is there mention any where made of these three Seales, but in the reigne of Henrie the Sixth. To this Chancellors Office in processe of time much authority and dignity hath beene adioined by authority of Parlament; especially ever since that Lawyers stood so precisely upon the strict points of law, & caught men with the traps and snares of their law termes; that of necessity there was a Court of equity to be erected; and the same committed unto the Chancellour, who might give iudgement according to equitie & reason, and moderate the extremity of law, which was wont to bee thought extreme wrong. In this Court there sitteth as President, the Lord Chancellor of England, and as assessors or assistants to him, twelve Masters of the Chancerie: whereof the chiefe and principall is the Keeper of the Rolls be-
C longing to the same Court, and thereupon he is called Master of the Rolles. There belong also to this Court very many Officers, of whom some attend especially upon the Kings Seale, namely, The Clerke of the Crowne, The Clerke of the Hanaper, The Sealer, The Chauff-wax, The Controller of the Hanaper, Cursitours twenty foure, A Clerke for the writs of Sub-pœna. Others are attendant upon Bils of complaint there exhibited, to wit, A Protonotarie, six Clerkes, or Atturnies of the Court, and a Register. There belong also thereto, the Clerkes of the Pety Bag, The Clerke of Presentations, The Clerke of Faculties, The Clerke for examination of Letters Patents, The Clerke for dimissions, &c.

There is another Court also derived out of the Kings Privie Counsell, called The Court of Requests.
D Court of Requests, which giveth hearing likewise, as in the Chancerie, to causes betweene private persons, but such as before were presented unto the Prince or his Privie Counsell, as also to others. In this are employed certein Masters of the Requests, and a Clerke or Register, with two Atturneys or three. But as touching those Counsels held in the Marches of Wales and in the North parts, we will speake with the leave of God in their due place.

As for Ecclesiasticall or Spirituall Courts there be two principall; to wit, The Synode, which is called The Convocation of the Clergie, and is alwayes kept with the Parlament: and the Provinciall Synods in both Provinces. Ecclesiasticall Courts. See the Antiquity of the British Church.

After these are reckened the Archbishop of Caturburies courts; to wit, The Court
E of the Arches: wherein sitteth as Iudge the Deane of the Arches. He is called Deane, for that he hath jurisdiction in xiij. Parishes of London, exempt from the Bishop of London, which number maketh a Deanrie; and Deane of the Arches, because the principall of his Churches, S. Maries church in London, the tower, steeple or lantern whereof is beautifully built of arched worke. He hath to do with appeales of all men within the Province of Canturburie. Advocates there be in this Court xvj. or more, at the pleasure of the Archbishop, all Doctours of the Law; two Registers, and ten Proctours. Court of the Arches.

The Court of Audience, which enterteineth the complaints, causes and appeales of them in that Province. Court of Audience.

F The Prerogative court, in which the Commissarie sitteth upon Inheritances fallen either by the Intestate or by will and testament.

The Court of Faculties, wherein there is appointed a chiefe President, who heareth and considereth of their grievances and requests that are petitioners for some moderation and easement of the Ecclesiasticall law, sometimes over-strict and rigorous; and a Register beside, who recordeth the Dispensations granted. Court of Faculties.

The

Digitized by Google

The Court of Peculiars, which dealeth in certeine Pariſhes exempt from the Biſhops iuriſdiction in ſome Dioceſſes, and are peculiarly belonging to the Archbiſhop of Canturburie. Other Courts of meaner account I willingly overpaſſe. Neither do I wiſely, I aſſure you, thus to intermeddle heerein: and yet Guicciardine in his Deſcription of the Netherlands hath given me a precedent hereof to follow.

Heere in this place my purpoſe was to have interſerted ſomewhat, (ſo farre foorth eſpecially as concerned antiquitie) as touching the chiefe Magiſtrates and higheſt officers of England, as namely, The Lord Chancellor aforeſaid, The Lord Treaſurer, The Preſident of the Counſell, The Lord Keeper of the Privie Seale, The Lord high Chamberlain, The Lord high Conſtable, The Mareſcall, and Seneschal or Steward of the Kings houſhold, &c. But underſtanding that others were in hand with theſe matters, ſo far am I from preventing them, that right willingly I ſhall impart even to them, whatſoever in this behalfe I have obſerved.

Vnder what ſigne in heaven Britaine lieth.

Some man perhaps heere looketh, that I ſhould out of Aſtrologicall rules, adde to the reſt, under what ſigne and planet our Britaine is ſeated. And verily I will ſay ſomewhat to ſatisfie the Curious; for in thoſe learned errors I have, I may tell you, in my youth taken ſome paines: although the Conjectures of Aſtrologers touching this point are ſo divers, that the very diverſity may ſeeme to weaken the thing it ſelfe, and leave no place for the truth. M. Manilius an ancient poet in this verſe of his, ſeemeth to intimate, that Capricorn heere beareth rule in Britaine:

Tu Capricorne regis quicquid ſub Sole cadente Expoſitum.

Thow Capricorne doeſt govern all,
That lies to Sun at his down-fall.

Ptolomee, Albumazar, and Cardane, doe make Aries our Tutelar Signe; Iohannes de Muris, the Planet Saturne: The Frier Perſcrutator, Eſquidus and Henrie Silen, the Moone; for that, as they ſay, it is in the ſeuenth Climate. Roger of Hereford, Thomas of Ravenna, Philologus, and Hiſpalenſis, are of opinion that Piſces governe us; and laſt of all Schonerus and Pitatus, (ſee how they all diſagree) haue with no better reaſon than the reſt, ſubiected us unto Gemini.

Now will I, by Gods aſſiſtance, make my perambulation thorow the Provinces or Shires of Britaine: wherin (according to the Preface that they uſed in old time, before they tooke any enterpriſe in hand) God grant me gracious good ſpeed. In the ſeuerall diſcourſes of every of them, I wil declare as plainly and as briefly as I can, who were their ancient Inhabitants; what is the reaſon of their names; how they are bounded; what is the nature of the ſoile; what places of antiquity and good account are therein; what Dukes likewiſe or Earles have beene in ech one ſince the Norman Conqueſt: And in this ſucceſſion of Earles, to confeſſe frankly, by whom I have taken profit, I do willingly and juſtly acknowledge that Thomas Talbot a moſt diligent Clerke in the Records of the Tower, a man of ſingular skil in our antiquities, hath given me much light.

The order or Method of the worke enſuing.

And begin I will at the fartheſt parts in the Weſt, that is to ſay, at Cornwall, and ſo paſſe over the other countries in order, imitating heerein Strabo, Ptolomee and the moſt ancient Geographers, who alwaies begin their deſcription in the Weſtern countries, as being firſt from the firſt Meridian.

DANMONII

DANMONII.

THat Region, which according to the Geographers, is the first of all Britaine, and growing straiter still and narrower, shooteth out farthest into the West, and hath on the North side the Severne-Sea; on the South the British, and on the West, the Vergivian or Westerne Ocean, beating upon it; was in antient time inhabited by those Britans, whom Solinus called, DVNMONII, Ptolomee, DAMNONII, or (as wee find in some other copies,) more truly DANMONII. Which name, if it bee not derived from those ever-continuing mines of tinne in this tract, which the Britans terme Moina; may seeme to come of the dwelling there under hils. For, their habitation all over this Countrey is somewhat low, and in valleys: which maner of dwelling is called in the *British tongue Dan-munith: in which sense also the Province next adjoyning, in like respect is at this day named by the *Britans Duffneint, that is to say, Low valleys. Now whether the OSTIDAMNII, called also OSTAEI, and OSTIONES, of whom Strabo maketh mention out of Pithæas of Marsiles, be our Danmonij, I wish the studious searchers of Antiquitie would weigh with themselves, and examine somwhat more diligently. For, seated they were by their report, in the furthest parts of Europe, toward the West Ocean over against Spaine, not farre from the Isle Vxantissa, now called Vshant, Which particulars every one doe verie well, and in each point agree unto this Region of our Danmonij. And seeing that those Ostiones be called by Artemidorus COSSINI, as Stephanus in his Cities seemeth to note, I wish likewise they would consider (because these people are termed also Corini) whether instead of COSSINI, wee are not to read CORINI: For, we read Fusij for Furij, and Valesij for Valerij. And surely, the Geographers have not so much as a glimps where to seek these Ostidamnij and Cosini by the westerne Sea, if they bee hence excluded. But the Country of this nation is at this day divided into two parts, knowen by later names of Cornwall and Denshire, whereof we will speake in order.

*Welch.

*Welch men.

Ostidamnij.

Cossini.

CORNWALL.

COrnwall, which also by later Writers is called Cornubia in Latine, of all Britain doth beare most westward, and is inhabited by that remnant of Britans, which Marianus Scotus calleth Occidentales Britones, that is, Britans of the west parts, who in the British tongue (for as yet they have not lost their ancient language) name it Kernow, because it waxeth smaller

Digitized by Google

Corn and Kern.

smaller and smaller in maner of an horn, and runneth forth into the Sea with little promontories, as they were homes, on every side. For the Britans cal an home, [Corn] and homes [Kern,] in the plurall number: although others would have Cornwall to take the name of one Corineus, I know not what companion of Brutus, and doe call it Corinea, according to this verse of a late-borne Poet;

Pars Corinea datur Corinæo, de duce nomen
Patria, deq́ viro gens Corinensis habet.
To captaine Corinæus, part was given, to hold by right:
Of him both coast Corinea, and people Cornish hight.

* Perocopsea, or, Procopia.

But, no strange matter it is (if a man search Antiquities) for many places to have their denominations given them of such kind of site as this. In Crete and * Taurica Chersonesus, there be promontories termed, Κεφάλαια, that is, Rams Foreheads, because they shoot forth into the sea, after the fashion of Rams homes. Semblably, Cyprus was of the Greeks in old time, called Cerastis, for that it butteth on the sea with promontories bearing out like homes, so that it is no marvell, if this coast bee called Kernaw and Corn, crookening inward as it doth, like unto an home, and having divers small capes and points sticking out, as it were homes. Whereupon, when in the heat of the Saxons warre, many Britans retired themselves into this tract, trusting to the naturall strength of the place; for, they knew that the waies by land were hard enough to be passed thorow by reason of mountaines, and crossed in divers places with armes of the Sea; that sailing likewise there, was combersome, because the places were unknowen: the Saxon being Conquerour, who called all forraine things, and aliens or strangers, in his language Wealsh, named the Inhabitants hereof Cornwealer and Wertwealer. Hereof sprang the Latin name Cornwallia, and in the later age Cornubia, and in some Writers Occidua Wallia. So farre is it off, that it should be called Cornwallia, of the Gaules that conquered it, which some there bee, that in flatterie of the French name and nation would uphold: who, if they were as quicke-sighted at home, as they bee curious abroad, might find that their * Britaine lying upon the sea coast, opposit to this country, is so named of our Britaine, and that Cornovaille, no small territorie therein, which speaketh the same language that our Cornishmen doe, tooke name of our countrey-men, that passed over hence to dwell there. For, as these our Britans of the West parts, aided the Armorici of Gaule, inhabiting in that tract in their warres against Cæsar; upon which occasion he pretended a quarrell to invade Britaine, and they afterwards comming thither, as wee said before, changed the name of Armorici, and called it Britaine: so in the fore-going ages, readie they were, and ever at hand to helpe those Britans their countrey-men against the French; and during the tempestuous troubles of the Danish warre, some of them put over thither also, and are thought to have left this name of Cornovaille behind them there. But to leave that Cornovialle.

* Bretaigne, or, Little Britaine.

Strabo.

This our Cornwall, as if nature made amends and recompense for the incroching in of the sea, is for the most part raised on high with mountaines, being in the valleys between of an indifferent glebe, which with the Sea weede, or reit commonly called Orewood, and a certaine kind of fruitfull Sea-sand, they make so ranke and battle, that it is incredible. The Sea coast, is beautified with verie many townes, able to set out a great fleet of Ships: the inland parts have rich and plentious mines of tinne. For, there is digged out of them wonderfull store of tinne, yeelding exceeding much profit and commoditie, whereof are made houshold pewter vessels, which are used thorowout many parts of Europe in service of the table, and for their glittering brightnesse, compared with silver plate. The Inhabitants doe discover these mines by certaine tinne-stones lying on the face of the ground, which they call Shoad, being somewhat smooth and round. Of these Mines or tinne-works, there be two kinds: the one they call, Lode-works; the other Steam-works. This lieth in lower grounds, when by trenching they follow the veines of tinne, and turne aside now and then the streames of water comming in their way: that other, is in higher places, when as upon the hils they dig verie deepe pits, which they call, Shafts, and doe undermine.

Orewood.

Tinne.

Digitized by Google

A mine. In working both waies there is ſeen wonderfull wit and skill, as well in draining of waters aſide, and reducing them into one ſtreame; as in the underbuilding, pinning and propping up of their pits: to paſſe overwith ſilence their devices of breaking, ſtamping, drying, craſing, waſhing, melting, and fining the mettall, than which there cannot be more cunning ſhewed. There are alſo two ſorts of Tinne, Blacke tinne, which is tinne-ore broken and waſhed, but not yet founded into mettall, and white tinne, that is molten into mettall, and that is either ſoft tinne which is beſt merchantable, or hard tinne leſſe merchantable.

That the antient Britans practiſed theſe tinne-works, (to omit Timæus the Hiſto- Lib.6.cap.8.
B rian in Plinie, who reporteth, That the Britans fetched tinne out of the Iſle Ićta, in & 9.
wicker boats covered and ſtitched about with leather) appeareth for certaine out of Diodorus Siculus, who flouriſhed under Auguſtus Cæſar. For, hee writeth, that the Britans, who inhabited this part, digged tinne out of ſtonie ground, and at a low water carried the ſame in carts, to certaine Ilands adjoyning. From whence Merchants tranſported it by ſhips into Gaule, and from thence conveied the ſame upon horſes within thirtie daies unto the ſpring-heads of the river * Eridanus, or elſe to the citie *Po.
Narbone, as it were, to a Mart. Æthicus alſo, who ever hee was, that unworthily beareth title to be interpreted by S. Hierome out of the Sclavonian tongue, inſinuateth the very ſame, and ſaith, That hee delivered rules and precepts to theſe Tinne-
C workers. But it ſeemeth, that the Engliſh-Saxons neglected it altogether, or to have uſed the workmanſhip and labour of Arabians or Saracens. For, the Inhabitants in their language terme the mines forlet and given over, Attal Sariſin, that is, the leavings of the Saracens; if they did meane by that name, the antient Panims.

After the comming in of the Normans, the Earles of Cornwal gathered great riches out of theſe mines, and eſpecially Richard brother to King Henrie the Third: and no marvell, ſith that in thoſe daies Europe had tinne from no other place. For, the incurſions of the Mores, had ſtopped up the tinne mines of Spaine; and as for the tinne veines in Germanie, which are in Miſnia and Bohemia, they were not as yet knowen: and thoſe verily not diſcovered, before the yeere after Chriſts nativitie,
D 1240. For then, (as a writer of that age recordeth) was tinne mettall found in Germanie by a cetain Corniſhman driven out of his native ſoile, to the great loſſe and hindrance of Richard Earle of Cornwal. This Richard began to make ordinances for theſe tin-works, and afterward Edmund his ſonne granted a Charter, and certain liberties, and withall preſcribed certaine Lawes concerning the ſame: which hee ratified or ſtrengthened under his ſeale, and impoſed a tribute or rent upon tin, to be anſwered unto the Earls.

Theſe liberties, priviledges and lawes King Edward the Third, did afterwards con- The Comfirme and augment. The whole common-wealth of thoſe Tinners and workmen, mon wealth as it were, one bodie, hee divided into foure quarters, which of the places they call of Tinners.
Foy-more, Black-more, Trewarnaile, and Penwith. Over them all he ordained a War-E den, called, L. Warden of the Stanniers, of Stannum, that is, Tinne; who giveth judgement aswell according to equitie and conſcience, as Law; and appointed to every L Warden of quarter their Stewards, who once every iij. weeks, (every one in his ſeverall quarter) the Stannary.
miniſter juſtice in cauſes perſonall between Tinner and Tinner, and between Tinner and Forrainer, except in cauſes of land, life, or member. From whom there lieth an appeale to the Lord Warden, from him to the Duke, from the Duke to the King. In matters of moment, there are by the Warden generall Parliaments, or ſeverall aſſemblies ſummoned: whereunto Iurats are ſent out of every Stannarie, whoſe conſtitutions do bind them. As for thoſe that deale with tinne, they are of foure ſorts: the owners of the ſoile, the adventurers, the merchants or regraters, and the laborers, called F the Spadiards (of their Spade) who poore men are pitifully out-eaten by vſurious contracts. But the Kings of England, and Dukes of Cornwall, in their times have reſerved to themſelves a præemption of tin (by the opinion of the learned in the Law) as well in regard of the proprietie, as being chiefe Lords and Proprietaries; as of their roiall prerogative. Leſt the tribute or rent impoſed, ſhould be embezelled, and the Dukes of Cornwall defrauded, unto whom by the old cuſtome for every thouſand pound waight of tinne there is paid forty ſhillings, it is by a Law provided, that all the tin which is caſt & wrought, be brought to one of the foure appointed townes: where twice in the yeere it is weighed, and ſigned with a ſtampe, (they call it Coinage) and the ſaid impoſt accordingly paid: neither is it lawfull for any man before that, to ſell or ſend it abroad, under forfeiture of their tin. And not only tin is here found, but therwith alſo gold and ſilver; yea, and Diamonds ſhaped, and pointed anglewiſe, ſmoothed alſo by nature it ſelfe: whereof ſome are as big as walnuts, and inferiour to the Orient Diamonds, in blackneſſe and hardneſſe only. Moreover there is found Eryngium, that is, Sea Holly, growing moſt abundantly every where along the ſhore. Furthermore, ſo plentifull is this countrey of graine, although not without great toile of the husbandman, that it hath not onely ſufficient to maintaine it ſelfe, but alſo affordeth often times great ſtore of corne into Spain. Beſides, a moſt rich revenue and commoditie they have by thoſe little fiſhes that they call Pilchards, which ſwarming, as one would ſay, in mighty great skuls about the ſhores from Iuly unto November, are there taken, garbaged, ſalted, hanged in the ſmoke, laied up, preſſed, and by infinite numbers carried over into France, Spaine, and Italie, unto which countreys they be very good chaffer, and right welcome merchandiſe, and are there named * Fumados. Whereupon Michael a Comiſh Poet, and of Rhymers in his time the chiefe, in his Satyre againſt Henrie of Aurenches, Archpoet to King Henrie the Third, becauſe he had unreverently plaied upon Comiſhmen, as if they were ſeated in the nocke hole of the world; after much ſatyricall ſharpneſſe, came out with theſe round rhymes:

Digitized by Google

Comiſh Diamonds.

Pilchards.

* Which peradventure be Gerres in Plinie.

Non opus eſt ut opes numerem quibus eſt opulenta,
Et per quas, inopes ſuſtentat non ope lenta:
Piſcibus & ſtanno nuſquam tam fertilis ora.

I need not here report the wealth, wherewith enrich'd it is,
And whereby alwaies to ſuſtaine poore folke it doth not miſſe:
No coaſt elſewhere for fiſh and tinne, ſo plentious, ywis.

And yet is Cornwall nothing happier in regard of the ſoile, than it is for the people; who as they were endued and adorned with all civilitie, even in thoſe antient times; (For by reaſon of their acquaintaince with merchants ſailing thither for tin, as Diodorus Siculus reporteth, they were more courteous toward ſtrangers:) ſo they are valiant, hardie, wel pitcht in ſtature, brawny & ſtrong limmed: ſuch as for wraſtling, (to ſpeak nothing of that manly excerciſe, & feat of hurling the Ball which they uſe) ſo farre excell, that for ſlight and cleane ſtrength together, they juſtly win the prize and praiſe from other nations, in that behalfe. Moreover, that Poet Michael, when as in the exceſſive commendation of his country men, he had with gigging rimes reſounded, how Arthur in his battels, gave them the honour, to give the firſt charge, he thus couragiouſly concludeth in rime.

Hurling.

Quid nos deterret? ſi firmiter inpede ſtemus,
Fraus ni nos ſuperet, nihil eſt quod non ſuperemus.

What frighteth us? if footing ſure we have on ſteady ground, (Barre crafty ſleights) there is no force, but we can it confound.

And hereof peradventure ariſeth the report ſo generally received, that Giants in times paſt inhabited this countrey. For, Havillan the Poet, who lived foure hundred yeeres ſince, in deſcribing of certaine Britiſh Giants, wrote pleaſantly of Britaine, and the Comiſh Giants, in this wiſe: ——Titanibus illa

Havillan. in Architrenio.

Sed paucibus famuloſa domus, quibus uda ferarum
Terga dabant veſtes, cruor hauſtus, pecula trunci,
Antra Lares, Dumeta thoros, cœnacula rupes,
Præda cibos, raptus venerem, ſpectacula cædes,
Imperium vires, animos furor, impetus arma,
Mortem pugna, ſepulchra rubus: monſtriſq; gemebat
Monticolis tellus: ſed eorum plurima tractus
Pars erat occidui, terror majorq; premebat
Te furor, extremum Zephyri, Conubia, limen.

A lodge it was to Giants fell (though few) of Titans brood Enthralled: whoſe garments were raw hides of beaſts full wood;
Their bloud they dranke, but cups they made of hollow blocks and ſtocks, Caves

Caves serv'd for cabins, bushes for beds, for chambers craggie rocks.
Prey slak'd their hunger, rape their lust, in murder tooke they joy, Force gave them rule, and furie heart, wrath weapons to annoy; (againe Fight brought thē death, grieves were their graves: thus groan'd the ground
With mountain-Monsters. Howbeit, of them the number maine
Did pester most the westerne tract: more feare made thee agast
O Cornwall, utmost dore that art to let in Zephyrus blast.

Now, whether this firme and wel compact constitution of the Cornish-men which proceedeth from the temperature of heat and moisture, is to bee referred unto the breeding-west wind and the Westerne situation thereof, like as wee see, that in Germanie the Batavians, in France the Gascoines who be fartheſt Westward are the ableſt and most valiant, or rather to some peculiar and speciall reason of aire and soile; it is not my purpose to search curiously. Westerne people most strong and hardie.

Now let us treat of the Promontories, Cities and Rivers, whereof ancient writers have made mention: For, this is my principall proiect: beginning at the furthest point, and so surveying first the Southern shore, then the Northern, and lastly the course of the river * Tamara, which severeth this countie from Devonshire. The utmost Promontorie which lieth upon the Western Ocean, and is distant 17. degrees and no more in the globe or surface of the earth, from the Ilands called Azores, is called by Ptolomee Bolerium, and by Diodorus, Belerium; perhaps of the British word Pell, which signifieth a thing most remote or fartheſt off: by Ptolomee also the same is termed ἀντιέσπερον, or ANTIVESTAEVM, by the Britans, I meane their Bardi onely or Poets, Penringuaed; that is, the Promontorie of Bloud: For, the Welsh Historians name it Penwith, that is, the Promontorie on the left hand: The Saxons Penpiþ-ꝑteopt. For, Steort with them betokeneth a peece of land shooting into the Sea: and hereupon all that Hundred of Penwith at this day is called by borderers in their language, Pen von las, that is, the end of the land: and in the same sense, we in English name it, The lands end; because it is the utmost part of the Iland toward the West. And if this Promontorie were sometimes called Helenum, as Volaterran and the late writers affirme, it came not of Helenus K. Priams sonne, but of Pen-Elin, which signifieth in the British tongue an Elbow, as Ancon doth in Greeke. And seeing that crooked and bending shores be termed of the Greekes Ancônes, as Elbows, for so Plinie witnesseth of Ancona in Italie, no absurditie is it at all, that this crooked and bowing shore should by the Britains in the same sense be called Pen-elin, and thereof that Latin name Helenum be deriued. But as touching this name Antivestæum, I was wont now and then to doubt, whether it savoured not of some Greek originall. For, seeing it was a common and usuall thing with the Greeks, to impose names upon places taken from the names of such as were opposite unto them, not only in Greece it selfe, where they have, * Rhium, and * Antirrhium, but also in the * Arabian gulfe, where there is Bacchium and Antibacchium, as also vpon the gulf of Venice, Antibarrium, because it looketh towards Barrium, lying over against it in Italie; I searched diligently whether any place named Vestæum, lay opposite unto this our Antivestæum: but finding no such thing, I betooke my selfe againe to the British tongue, neither yet can I here resolve my selfe. But the Inhabitants doe suppose, that this Promontorie heeretofore ran further into the Sea, and by the rubbish which is drawen out from thence, the Mariners affirme the same: yea and the neighbor Inhabitants avouch, out of I wote not what fable, that the earth now covered there all over with the in-breaking of the Sea, was called Lionesse.

Thoſe of the Tercieres &c. Bellerium or Antivestæum. Steort what it signifieth. * Castelli di Lipanton. * Mar di Mecha or the Red-sea.

In the utmost rocks of this Promontorie, when at a low water they be bare, there appeare veines of tin and copper, and the people there dwelling report, that there stood a watch-tower upon it, from whence by the light of burning fire, there was a signe given vnto Sailers: no doubt, ad speculam Hispaniæ; according as Orosius hath put downe in writing, That the most high watch-towre of Brigantia in Gallicia, a rare and admirable peece of worke, was erected ad speculam Britanniæ: that is, if I well understand him either for the use of Mariners sailing out of Britaine toward Spaine, or else, over against the watch-towre of Britaine. For, no other place of this Iland looketh directly

Digitized by Google

S. Burien. rectly to Spaine. Upon it there ſtandeth now a little village named S. Buriens (in old time Eglu Buriens, that is, The Church of Buriena or Beriana) conſecrated to Buriena, a religious Iriſh woman. For, this nation hath alwaies honored Iriſh Saints as tutelar patrons of their own, ſo, as all their towns in maner they have conſecrated unto them. This village King Athelſtane, as the report goeth, granted to be a priviledged place or Sanctuarie, what time as he arrived as Conquerour out of the * Iles of Sylly: True it is, that he built heere a Church, and that under William the Conquerour there was heere a Colledge of Chanons, unto whom the territorie adjoyning belonged. Neere unto this, in a place which they call Biſcaw Woune, are to bee ſeene nineteene ſtones ſet in a round circle, diſtant every one about twelve foote from the other; and in the very center there is one pitched far higher and greater than the reſt. This was ſome Trophee (or monument of victorie) erected by the Romans (as probably may be conjectured) under the later Emperours, or elſe, by Athelſtan the Saxon, when he had ſubdued the Corniſh-men, and brought them under his dominion.

* Silly, or Sorlings.

A Trophee.

As the ſhore fetcheth a compaſſe by little and little from hence Southward, it letteth in a bay or creeke of the Sea, in maner of a Creſcent, which they call Mounts-bay: wherein, as the common ſpeech goeth, the Ocean by ruſhing with a violent force drowned the land. Vpon this lieth Mouſehole, in the Britiſh tongue Port Inis, that is, The Haven of the Iland: For which, Henry of Tieis, a Baron in his time and Lord of Alwerton and Tiwernel in this County, obtained of King Edward the Firſt the grant to haue a market there. Likewiſe there is ſeated upon this Bay Pen-ſans, that is, The Cape or Head of Saints, or as ſome thinke Sands, * a prety market Towne: within a little wherof is that famous ſtone, Main-Amber; which, being a great Rock aduanced vpon ſome other of meaner ſize with ſo equall a counterpeize, a man, may ſtir with the puſh of his finger, but to remove it quite out of his place a great number of men are not able: as alſo Merkiu, that is, Iupiters market, (becauſe Thurſday anciently dedicated to Iupiter is their market day) a dangerous rode for ſhips. And in the very angle and corner it ſelfe S. Michaels mount, which gaue name unto the foreſaid Bay; ſometime called Dinſol, as we find in the booke of Landaffe: the inhabitants name it Careg Conſe, that is, The hoary Crag or Rock, the Saxons Michel-ſtop, that is, Michaels place, as Maſter Laurence Noel, a man of good note for his ſingular learning, and who was the firſt in our age that brought into ure againe and revived the language of our anceſtours the Saxons, which through diſuſe lay forlet and buried in oblivion, hath well obſerved. This Rocke is of a good height and craggy, compaſſed round about with water ſo oft as it is floud, but at every ebbe joined to the main-land, ſo that they ſay of it, It is land and Iland twice a day. For which cauſe, Iohn Earle of Oxford, not many yeeres ago, preſuming upon the ſtrength of the place, choſe it for his cheefeſt defence when he raiſed war againſt King Edward the Fourth, and valiantly held the ſame, but with no good ſucceſſe. For, his ſouldiers being aſſailed by the Kings forces ſtraightwaies yeelded. In the very top heereof within the Fortreſſe, there was a Chapell conſecrated to S. Michael, the Archangel, where William Earle of Cornwall and Moriton, who by the bounteous gift of King William the Firſt had great lands, & large poſſeſſions in this tract, built a Cell for one or two monks; who avouched that S. Michael appeered in that mount: which apparition, or the like, the Italians challenge to their hill Garganus, and the Frenchmen likewiſe to their Michaels mount in Normandie. At the foote of this mountaine within the memorie of our Fathers, whiles men were digging up of tin they found Spear-heads, axes, and ſwords of braſſe wrapped in linnen: ſuch as were ſometimes found within the foreſt Hercinia in Germanie, and not long ſince in our Wales. For, evident it is by the monuments of ancient Writers, that the Greeks, the Cimbrians and Britans uſed braſen weapons, although the wounds given with braſſe be leſſe hurtfull, as in which mettall there is a medicinable vertue to heale: according as Macrobius reporteth out of Ariſtotle. But happily that age was not ſo cunning in deviſing meanes to miſchiefe and murthers, as ours is. In the rocks underneath, as alſo along the ſhore every where breedeth the * Pyrrhocorax, a kind of crow with bill and feet red, and not

Barons of Tiei.

* Maine Amber, that is, Ambroſe ſtone.

S. Michaels mount.

Michelſtow.

Laurence Noel.

Weapons of Braſſe.

* Pyrrhocorax: Corniſh chough.

Digitized by Google

A not, as Plinie thought, proper to the Alpes onely. This bird the inhabitants have found to be an Incendiarie, and theevish beside: For, oftentimes it secretly conveieth fire-sticks setting their houses a fire, and as closely filcheth and hideth little peeces of money.

In this place the countrey is most narrow and groweth as it were into an * Isthmus, for it is scarse foure miles over from hence to the Seuern or upper sea. A little above this mount, there openeth a Creeke of good bredth, called of the mount, Mounts-bay, a most safe rode and harbour for ships, when the South and Southeast winds are aloft & bluster, at a mid ebbe and returne of the Sea, six or seven fathom deepe. More

B toward the East ariseth Godolcan hill, right famous for plentifull veines of tin (they call it now Godolphin) but much more renowned in regard of the Lords thereof, bearing the same name, who with their vertues have equalled the ancientnesse of that house and linage. But that name in the Cornish language, came of A white Aegle, and this family hath anciently borne for their armes in a shield Gules, an Ægle displaied Argent, betweene three Flower-deluces of the same shield.

From S. Michaels mount Southward, immediatly there is thrust forth a bi-land o demi-Ile, at the very entrie whereof Heilston sheweth it selfe, called in their country language Hellas, by reason of the salt water flowing thereto: a Towne of great resort for their priviledge of marking and coinage of tin. Under which by the confluence

C and meeting of many waters there is made a lake two miles in length, named Loopoole, divided from the Sea by a narrow banke running betweene, which whensoever it is by the violence of waves broken thorow, a wonderfull roring of waters is heard far and neere all over the countrey adjoining. And not far from thence there is to be seene a militarie fense or rampire of a large compasse built of stones, heaped together and laid without mortar, they call it in their tongue, Earth; of which sort there be others heere and there; raised, as I verily beleeve, in the Danish warre. Neither is it unlike to those fortifications of the Britans, which Tacitus termeth rudes & informes saxorum compages, that is, rude and ilfavoured compacted piles of stone. As for the said Demi-Iland, it selfe being of a good bignesse and replenished with villages, it is na-

D med Meneg, and no doubt that MENNA, which out of Cornellius a writer of Annals (but whether he be Tacitus, I wot not) Iornandes in his Geticks describeth, and is in some copies found written Memma: For, it is, as he saith, In the utmost coast of Britaine, having in it great store of mettall mines, very full of grasse and herbes, bringing forth more plentifully all those things which serve for pastorage of beasts, rather than nourishment of men. But whereas he said, that it hath plenteous store of Mettals, it is now so distitute, that it may seeme long since to have beene exhaust thereof. The Sailers, at this day call the vtmost South-West point thereof Lisard; Ptolomee, The PROMONTORIE OF THE DANMONII, and OCRINVM; Aethicus in that strange Geographie of his, OCRANVM; and he reckoneth it among the mountaines of the West

E Ocean. Which name whether it take of Ocra, which by Sext. Pompeius, signifieth a craggy hill, I dare not affirme. And yet among the Alpes, Ocrea, Ocriculum, and Interocrea, drew their denomination of their steepe and rocky site. But seeing that Ochr betokeneth in the British tongue an Edge, what if I should thinke the name was given to this Promontorie, because it hath a sharp edge and groweth at the end pointed in fashion of a cone? In the turning in of the shore from this Meneg, you meet with a Bay very commodious for ships to harbour in, by reason of so many turnings, cones and angled windings therein, receiving into it the little river Vale. Neere unto which within the countrey, flourished sometime that ancient Towne Voluba, menti-

F oned by Ptolomee: but it is long since either utterly decaied, or hath lost his name; yet it remaineth partly in Valendouth, or Falmouth Haven. This Haven is as noble as Brundusium it selfe in Italie: of exceeding great capacity; for it is able to receive an hundred ships, which may ride therein so apart by themselves, that out of never a one of them the top of another's Mast can be seene: & most safe withall under the wind, by reason that it is enclosed on every side with brims of high rising banks. In the very entrance of this Haven, there mounteth up an high and steep craggy rock, which the

* A narrow passage betweene two creeks or armes of the Sea.

Mounts-bay.

Goldphin Hill.

The familie of the Godolphins.

Loo poole.

Menna, Meneg.

Ocrinum.

The Liskard.

Voluba.

Falemouth.

Brundis.*

Digitized by Google

inhabitants call Crage. The gullet on either hand, as well for the defense and safetie of the place, as for terror to enimies, is fortified with block-houses: to wit, the castle of S. Maudit East-ward, and toward the West, the fort Pendinas, built both by King Henrie the Eighth: Of which fortresses the * Antiquarian Poet writeth thus:

* Leland.

Pendinas.

Pendinas tenet asperi cacumen
Celsum montis, & intonat frequenter.
Mauditi quoque subsidit rotundum
Castrum, & impetu fulminat furenti,
Portus ostia quà patent Falensis.

Pendinas mounted is aloft,
On craggy cliffe, and thundreth oft:
S. Maudit eke a castle round,
That stands beneath on lower ground
With gunshot makes Fale-mouth resound.

Cenionis ostium. But the Haven it selfe is by Ptolomee called Ostium CENIONIS, The mouth of Cenio, doubtlesse of the British word Geneu, which betokeneth a doore and entrance. And this to bee true, the Towne Tregenie neere adjoyning doth testifie: for it is as much (if a man interpret it) as a little Towne by the Mouth. Vpon the innermore creeks and nooks of this Haven, there stand some Townes: namely, Peryn, for a market well frequented, where Walter Bronescome Bishop of Excester, in the yeere 1288. erected a Collegiat Church, (they call it Glasnith) and twelve Prebendaries: Arwenak, the seat of the ancient and noble family of the Killegrewes; Truro, in the Cornish tongue Truru, so called of three Streets encircled, as it were, with two rivers; a Maior towne, as they call it, and endewed with many priviledges, and coynage of tin: also Grampound, which is seated fartherest from the Haven, and neighbour to it is Golden the inheritance of Tregian, a house ancient and well allied. But descending to the Havens mouth you may see Fenten-Golian, in English Hartes-well, lately the seat of Carminow a family anciently of high esteeme for bloud and wealth, betweene whom and the Lord Scrope two hundred yeeres since, was a plea commenced in the Court of Chiualry, for bearing in a Shield Azure a Bend Or. Vnder which on the Sea side lieth the territorie of Rosseland; so named, as some thinke, as if it were a rose-plot: but as I suppose, because it is an heath or place of lings: for so Ros signifieth in the British tongue. Whereof, Rosse in Scotland, and another Rosse in Wales have their names, as being tracts drie, hungry and barren: Howbeit, this heere, through the industrie of the husbandmen is more battle-ground and fruitfull. Beyond this Rosseland presently the Ocean (as the land retireth and giveth back) shooteth in and maketh a larger Bay; they call it Tru-ar-draith Bay, which is by interpretation, The Bay of the towne upon the sand: whereinto fall many fresh rillets, amongst which that is principal which passeth by Lanladron, whose Lord S. Serlo Lanladron was summoned a Baron to the Parlament, in that age when the select men for wisdome and worth amongst the Gentrie were called to Parlament, and their posterity omitted if they were defectiue therein. Scarse two miles from hence, whereas the river Fawey falleth into the Sea, lieth the towne Fowey, Foath in Cornish, stretching out in length upon the sea bank: a towne most renowned in former ages, for sea-fights: which the very armes of the towne doe witnesse, as being compounded of the Cinque-ports arms. By the haven it hath bulwarks on both sides built by King Edward the Fourth: who shortly after being displeased with these townesmen of Fawey, for that when the warre in France was compounded, they practised piracy upon the French; tooke from them all their ships and furniture for shipping. Vpon the other bank over against it standeth Hall, situate on the hanging of an hill with a right pleasant walke, the habitation full well knowen of Sir Reginald Mohun Knight, of an ancient and noble house by birth, as descended from the Mohunes of Dunster; and the Courtneyes Earles of Devonshire. Farther within the countrie, and by the same river, VZELLA mentioned by Ptolomee is seated: which towne having not lost altogether the old name, is at this day called Lest-uthiell: It stood anciently vpon an high hill, where the old Perin.

Glasnith.

Arwenak.

Carminow.

Rossia.

Lanladron. In the time of Edward the First.

Foy.

The Mohuns.

Vzella.

Britans have not the letter X.

Digitized by Google

A old castle Lestmel now sheweth his ruins: but it was removed lower into the valley. From the high situation it receiued the ancient name; for Vchel in the British tongue soundeth as much as [high] or [aloft]: whence * Vxellodunum also in France tooke the name, because the towne standing upon an hill had a very steep fall on every side. In the British storie, this is called Pen-uchelcoit, that is, The high hill in the wood: which some would have to be Exceter. But the situation in Ptolomee, and the name remaining still, prove this to be the ancient Vxella. In these our daies, a small towne it is and nothing populous, because the river Fawey, which aforetime was wont at every tide or high water to flow unto the very towne and to beare and bring in ships, B hath his chanell so choked and dammed up now with sands, comming from the tinworkes (wherewith all the havens in this province are like in processe of time to be choked up) as that it is hardly able to beare the least barge that is. Howbeit, the chiefe towne it is of the whole countie, where the Shiriffe sitteth judicially every moneth and determineth causes: and there the Warden of the Stannaries hath his prison. It enjoieth also the priviledge, by the bounteous favour, as themselves say, of Edmund Earle of Cornwall (who there in times past had his honor) to seale or coyne the tin. But there bee two townes above the rest that hinder the light and eclipse the fame of this; to wit, on the East side therof Leskerd, situat on the top of a very high hill, much frequented for the mercat, & renowned for an ancient castle there: C and on the North side Bodman, which standeth on the side hand of it scarse two miles off: and is named (if I be not deceived) Bosuenna in the Cornish tongue, and Bodminian in old Deeds and Charters. This towne situate thus in no healthy seat betweene two hils, and lying out in length East and West, is for the mercat there kept, of great resort, for the inhabitants populous, beautifull enough for building, and of name for their privilege of coinage of tin: but more famous in ancient time for the Bishops See there. For, about the yeere of our salvation 905, when the State of the Church lay in this tract altogether neglected, by vertue of a decree from Pope Formosus, King Edward the Elder erected heere a Bishops See, and granted at that time unto the Bishop of Kirton, three villages in this countrie, Polton, Caling, and Lanwitham, that D from thence every yeere he should visit the people of Cornwall, to fetch out of them their errours: for, before time they did what they could to resist the truth, and obeied not the Apostolicall decrees. But afterwards, in the furious heat of that terrible Danish warre, the Bishoprick was translated to Saint Germans. Hard by Leskerd lieth that which sometime was the Church of S. Guerir, that is, (if you interpret it out of the British speech) S. Leech or Physician: where, (as writeth Asserius) King Alfred lying prostrate at his praiers, recovered but of a sickenesse. But when Neotus a man of singular holinesse and learning, was afterwards entombed in the same Church, he outshone the light of the other Saint, so as that in his memorie it was named Neotestow, that is, The place of Neotus, and now Saint Neoths: and the religious men that served God there- E in were named Saint Neoths Clerkes, and had for their maintenance rich and large reuenues, as we may see in William Conquerours booke. Neere unto this, as I have learned, within the parish of Saint Clare, there are to be seene in a place called Pennant, that is, The head of the vale, two monuments of stone: of which the one in the upper part is wrought hollow in maner of a Chaire: the other, named Otherhalfe stone, hath an inscription of Barbarous characters, now in maner wome out, in this wise.

Vxellodunum in France.

How the havens in Cornwall come to be stopped up.

Leskerd.

Bodman.

The booke of Winchester Abbay.

S. Neots.

Doomesday.

Which

F

* Doniert Praier for the soule, &c.

Which as I take it, should be read thus,* DONIERT : ROGAVIT PRO ANIMA: unlesse it please you to give this conjecture, that those little pricks after DONIERT, are the reliques of the letter E : and then to read it after this maner, DONIERT EROGAVIT, as if he had given and bestowed upon those religious men, that peece of land, for his soule. As for Doniert, I cannot but think, he was that Prince of Com- D wall, whom the Chronicles name Dungerth, and record, that hee was drowned in the yeere of our Salvation 872.

Hard by, there is a number of good big rockes heaped up together, & under them, one Stone of lesser size, fashioned naturally in forme of a cheese, so as it seemeth to be pressed like a cheese, whereupon it is named, Wring-cheese. Many other Stones besides in some sort foure square, are to be seene upon the plaine adioyning; of which seuen or eight are pitched upright of equall distance asunder. The neighbour Inhabitants terme them Hurlers, as being by a devout and godly error perswaded, they had beene men sometimes transformed into Stones, for profaning the Lords Day, with hurling the ball. Others, would have it to be a Trophee (as it were) or a monu- E ment, in memoriall of some battell: And some thinke verily they were set as meere stones or land marks, as having read in those authors that wrote of Limits, that stone were gathered together of both parties, and the same erected for bounders. In this coast the river Loo maketh way and runneth into the sea: and in his very mouth giveth name to two little townes, joined with a bridge together. That on the West side, which is the newer, flourisheth most: but the other Eastward, time hath much decaied: although it bee a Corporation retaining still the priviledge of a Maior and Burgesses. Somewhat West-ward from this lieth Kilgarth the habitation of the Bevils of especiall good note for antiquity and gentry. From Loo East-ward you meet with no memorable thing, but a small river passing by Minhenet, whereby is Pole the seat F of the Trelawnies, to whom with others the inheritance of the Courtneys Earles of Devon accrewed: vntill you come to the Liver, a little river stored with oisters, that runneth under S. Germans a small towne, unto which during the tempestuous Danish warre, the Bishops Sees were for feare translated: where there is a prety Church dedicated unto S. German of Antiziodorum, who rooted out the heresie of Pelagius, Wring-cheese.

Hurlers.

The river Loo.

S. Germans.

that-

A that sprung up againe in Britaine. Wherein after that some few Bishops had sitten, Levinus the Bishop of Kirton, who was in great favour with Canutus the Dane, obtained by vertue of the Kings authoritie, that it should be joined to his See. Since which time, there hath beene but one Bishop over this Province and Denshire both (whose seat is now at Exceter) and who appointed the little towne of S. Germans to be the seat of his Suffragane. For at this daie, it is nothing else but a village consisting of fishermens cabins, that make a good gainfull trade, by catching store of fish in the Ocean and rivers neere adjoining. Some few miles from hence, upon the same river stand eth Trematon, bearing the name of a Castle, though the wall be halfe downe; in Trematon.

B which, as we find in Domesday booke, William Earle of Moriton had his Castle, and held his mercate, & was the capitall seat of the Baronie belonging to the Earles and Dukes of Cornwall, as we may see in the Inquisitions. When the Liver is past this Castle, neere unto Saltash, sometimes Esse, the habitation in old times of the * Valtorts, and now a towne well repleni shed with Merchants, and endowed with many privileges, it runneth into the river Tamar, the bound of the whole country: where at the East-side Mont-Edgecombe, the seat of that ancient familie of the Edgecombs, Edge-Combe.

C sited most pleasantly hath a prospect into an haven underneath it, full of winding creeks. Next unto which is Anthony, a towne memorable for the elegant building Anthony. thereof, as also for a fish poole that letteth in the Ocean, and yeeldeth sea-fish for profit and pleasure both: but more memorable it is for the Lord thereof, Richard Carew, who so maintaineth his place & estate left unto him by his ancestors, as that in ornaments of vertues he surmounteth them. Hitherto we have surveied the South coast: now let us take a view of the Northern also. The Northern-shore from the very lands end, having for a great length huge banks of sand driven upon heapes against it, shooteth out first to a towne running into the sea with a long ridge like a tongue, called S. Ies, taking the name of one Iia an Irish woman that lived heere in great holinesse, for S. Ies.

D anciently it was named Pendinas. And from her the Bay underneath into which the little river Haile falleth, hath likewise recieued the name, for the Mariners call it S. Ies Bay. As for the towne it selfe, it is now very small: For, the North west wind that plaies the tyrant in this coast by drifts of sand hath so beatten upon it, that from thence it is translated and removed. From hence the country on both sides, still Eastward, waxeth broader, and the Northern shore with a more crooked winding holdeth on *North-east as far as Padstow: neither all that way along hath it any thing In Aquilonem, or North.

E savouring of antiquity, save onely a Chapell built in the sands, to the honor of S. Piran, who being likewise an Irish Saint resteth heere entombed: unto whose Sanctitie a certaine vaine writer in his childish folly hath ascribed this miracle, that with three kine of his owne he fed ten Kings of Ireland and their armies eight daies together: also that he raised from death to life both pigs and men. Then, farther from the S. Columbs. shore is seated S. Columbs a little mercate towne, consecrated to the memoriall of Columba right devout woman and a martyr, & not of Columban the Scot, as now I am given to understand for certaine, out of her life. Neere unto which, but more to the sea-ward, Lhanheron sheweth it selfe, the seat of the Arondels, a familie of Lhanheron. Knights degree, who for their faire lands and large possessions were not long since called, the Great Arondels. In some places they are written in Latin, De Hirundine, and not amisse, if my judgement be ought: For Hirundo, that is, a Swallow, is named Arondell in French: and in a shield sables, they beare for their armes six Swallowes argent. Certes, a very ancient and renowned house this is, spreading far and neere the F branches of their kinred and affinity: unto the name and coat-armour whereof William Brito a Poet alluded, when as he describeth a valiant warriour out of this familie flying as it were upon William of Bar a French noble man, and assailing him, about the yeere of our Lord 1170. in these termes: Lib. 3. Philippeidos, of William Brito, who lived anno 1170.

——Hirundelæ velocior alite, quæ dat
Hoc agnomen ei, fert cuius in ægide signum,
Serapit agminibus medijs, clypeoq; nitenti

Quem

Quem ſibi Guilielmus læva prætenderat ulna, Immergit validam præacuta cuſpidis haſtam.

——more ſwift, than bird hight * Arondell
That giv's him name, and in his ſhield of armes emblazoned well,
He rides amid the armed troupes, and with his ſpeare in reſt
(The ſtaffe was ſtrong, the point right ſharpe) runs full upon the breſt
Of Sir Guillaum, and pierceth through his bright and glittering ſhield, Which on left arme he for defence, againſt him ſtoutly held.

* Swallow.

Within a little hereof, there is a double rampire intrenched upon the pitch of an hill, with a cauſey leading thereto, named, Caſtellan Denis, that is, The Danes Campe; because the Danes when they preied upon the coaſts of England, encamped themſelves there, like as they did in other places of this tract.

Caſtle Denis.

Not farre from hence the river Alan, which alſo is called Camb-alan, and Camel, of the crooked windings and reaches that it makes in his courſe, (for ſo Cam with them doth ſignifie) runneth gently into the upper ſea: which river at the very mouth therof hath Padſtow a pretty market towne, ſo called ſhort for Petrockſtow, (as we read in the Hiſtories of Saints) of one Petrocch a Britan, canonized a Saint by the people: who, ſpent his daies here in the ſervice of God, whereas before time it had the name of Loderic and Laſſenac. The ſite of this towne is very commodious for traffique in Ireland, to which men may eaſily ſaile in foure and twentie houres. And much beautified it is with faire and goodly houſes adjoyning thereto, in maner of a Caſtle, built by N. Prideaux, a Gentleman of ancient gentry in thoſe Weſt parts. At the Spring-head of this river Alan, ſtandeth the little village Camelford, otherwiſe Gaffelford. Leland judgeth, it was in old time called Kamblan, who writeth alſo, That King Arthur our Hector was there ſlaine: For, as hee recordeth, peeces of armour, rings, horſe-harneſſe of braſſe are otherwhiles digged up, and turned out of the ground by husbandmen: and the common fame that continued ſo many ages together, reporteth, that there was a notable battell fought in this place. There are alſo certaine verſes in an unknowen Poet, living in the middle time, of Cambula flowing with bloud, ſhed in a battell of Arthur againſt Mordred: which I will not thinke much of my labour to put downe, becauſe they may ſeeme to have beene written in no bad Poeticall vaine.

Padſtow.

——Naturam Cambula fontis
Mutatam ſtupet eſſe ſui, tranſcendit inundans
Sanguineus torrens ripas, & volvit in æquor
Corpora caſorum, plures natare videres
Et petere auxilium, quos undis vita reliquit.

Then Cambula was ſore agaſt, the nature chang'd to ſee
Of his ſpring-head, for now the ſtreame by this time gan to bee
All mixt with bloud, which ſwelling high the banks doth overflow,
And carry downe the bodies ſlaine, into the ſea below.
There might one ſee how many a man that ſwum and helpe did crave,
Was loſt among the billowes ſtrong, and water was their grave.

And in very deed (not to deny this of Arthur) I have read in Marianus, that the Britans & Saxons fought in this place a bloudy battel, in the yeere of our Lord 820, ſo that this may ſeeme a place conſecrated unto Mars. And if it bee true that Arthur here died, the ſame coaſt was deſtined unto him for his death, as for his birth. For, on the ſhore hard by, ſtandeth Tindagium (the native place of that great Arthur) partly upon a little ridge, putting forth, as it were, a tongue; and partly within an Iland, having both of them ſometime a bridge betweene. They call it at this day Tindagel, being now a glorious ruine onely, in times paſt a ſtately Caſtle: of which a late Poet hath thus written:

Tindagel.

The place of Arthurs Nativitie.

Eſt locus Alrini ſinuoſo littore ponti
Rupe ſitus media, refluus quem circuit æſtus;
Fulminat hic latè turrito vertice caſtrum,
Nomine Tindagium veteres dixere Corini.

There

A There is a place within the winding ſhore of Severne Sea
On mids a rocke about whoſe foote the tides turne-keeping play, Towry-topped Caſtle here farre thundreth over all,
Which Corniſhmen by antient name, Tindagel Caſtle call.

A long diſcourſe it would aske to declare here out of Geffries hiſtory, how Uther Pendragon King of Britaine, within this Caſtle became enamoured upon the wife of Gorlois Prince of Cornwall; and how by Magick ſlights and deluſions, taking the ſhape of her husband upon him, diſhonourably violated the Ladie his wife, and of her begat the ſaid renowned Arthur. It may ſuffice, if I doe but alleage the verſes of our Poet Architrenius.

B Iohn Havillan.

——— Facie dum falſus adulter
Tindagel irrupit, nec amoris Pendragon æſtum
Vincit, & omnificas Merlini conſulit artes,
Mentiturq; ducis habitus, & rege latente,
Induit abſentis præſentia Gorlois ora.

Whiles Pendragon that could not quench his flaming heats of love,
But beare a mind adult'rous ſtill, by meanes brake in above
To Tindagel, diſguiſ'd in face, by Merlin taught thereto,
By magicke and inchauntments ſtrange, which all ſuch feats could doe.
C Duke Gorloes habite, abſent then that was, he tooke by guile;
But preſence of the King in place he did conceale the while.

This Uther Pendragon verily was a Prince flouriſhing in Martiall feats, and who valiantly upheld the decaying ſtate of his countrey againſt the Engliſh Saxons: But whether came from him, That Roiall Banner in England, having the portraict of a Dragon with a golden head, whereof neighbour nations have had experience, and which in far Lands beyond ſea was under King Richard the Firſt, terrible to the Panims, I dare not avouch: I would beleeve rather, it was received from the Romans, who a long time uſed the Aegle, after that Marius had rejected the Enſignes of a Wolfe, of Minotaurus, of an Horſe, &c. And in the end under the latter Emperors, tooke them to the Dra- Banners.

D gon: Whereupon Claudianus writeth thus:

——— Hij picta Draconum
Colla levant ———

The banners theſe advance aloft
With ſpeckled necks of Dragons wrought.

And Nemeſianus:

Signa micant, ſinuatq; truces levis aura Dracones.

Their Enſignes ſhine, and Dragons fell that therein pictur'd ſhow, Wave to and fro with whiffes of wind, as it doth gently blow.

And Hoveden ſheweth, that the Weſt Saxon Kings uſed to carrie in their Ban-
E ners, the Dragon. As for another Banner of the Engliſh, which Beda called Tufa, as alſo the Danes, Reafan, I will ſay nothing of them in this place, for feare I may ſeeme to haue digreſſed too farre from my purpoſe. Betweene Padſtow and Tindagel, inwardly there extendeth a fruitfull veine, and therein flouriſh the families of Roſcarrock, Carnſew, Penkevell, Cavell, Pencavell, of antient name and great reſpect in this coaſt. Tufa, a Banner.

Forward ſtill, Eaſtward on the ſame coaſt which is open, barren, and deſtitute of woods, there butteth upon the ſea Botereaux Caſtle, corruptly by the common peo- Botereaux.
ple, called Boſcaſtle, built by the Lords Botereaux, who gave for their armes three Buſſones, toads ſable in a ſhield Argent. William Botereaux was the firſt famous man of F honour in this familie, who married Alice the daughter of Robert Corbet, whoſe ſiſter was Paramour to King Henrie the Firſt, of whom hee begat Reginald Earle of Cornwall. From this William there flouriſhed eleven ſucceſſively in order. But Margaret the onely daughter and ſole heire of the laſt, was wedded unto Robert Hungerford: by whoſe poſteritie the inheritance is devolved upon the familie of the Haſtings, which inheritance was augmented, and became more honourable by mariages,

Digitized by Google

ges, that those of Botereaux contracted with the heires of the Noble houses, De Moe- A De Sancto Laudo. les, S. Laud, commonly called, S. Lo, and Thweng.

From hence the Land shooting forth into the Sea, extendeth it selfe so farre northward, that the countrey carrieth here full three and twenty miles in breadth, between the two seas, which hitherto went on still drawen after a sort together into a narrow Stow. Greenvils. streit. In this greatest breadth of it, standeth Stow upon the sea-side, the antient habitation of the Greenvils: which verily for Antiquitie and Nobleness of *Rous. birth is a famous house: out of which one Richard, in the raigne of William * Rufus, was for his valour much renowmed among those worthy Knights that subdued Glamorganshire in Wales: and another of late daies forenamed likewise Richard, for his B magnanimitie surpassing the Nobilitie of his bloud, fighting most valiantly against the Spaniards at the Ilands of Tercera, lost his life, as I shall shew more fully in my Stratton. Annals. To this Stratton lieth close to a market towne of no meane name amongst the neighbours for their gardens, and good garlicke: and next unto it Lancels a faire new seat of that old familie, de Calvo monte, or, Chaumond.

The river Tamar. The river TAMARA, now TAMAR, shewing his head heere not farre from the northern shore, taketh his course with a swift running streame southward; encreased with the chanels of many riverets hard by TAMARA, a towne mentioned by Ptolomee, now called Tamerton, by Tamar an antient Manour of the Trevilions, to whom by mariage, the inheritance of Whalesborough and Ralegh of Netlested descended: C also, by Lanstuphadon, that is, Saint Stephens, commonly and contractly Launston, which standeth farther off from his banke: a proper little towne this is, situate upon the pitch of a prettie hill, which of two Burgards, Dunevet and Newport, is growne as it were, into one Burgh. At the first comming of the Normans, William Earl of Mo-
*Canonicorum. riton, built a Castle there, and had a Colledge of *Chanons, or Secular priests, as appeareth out of Domesday book, wherin it is named Ldunstaveton, of that Colledge, no Launston. doubt, built in the honour of Saint Stephen, which Reginald Earle of Cornwall, about the yeere of our Lord 1150, turned into a monasterie. Against which pious worke of his, the Bishops of Excester, caried away overmuch & seduced with humane and private affection, were verie maliciously bent, as fearing exceedingly, lest one D day it would become a Bishops seat, and so prejudice and impeach their jurisdiction. At this day this towne is best knowen, by reason of the common Goale of the countrey, and the Assises, which are often times kept there.

Then Tamar looketh up unto an high hil stretched out in length, with a vast head, which Marianus nameth Henger doun, and interpreteth it, Hengsts mount, commonly called, Hengston-hill. Which in times past was so plentifull of Tinne veines, that the countrey people had this by-word of it, [Hengston downe well ywrought,] [Is worth London deere ybought.] And it was an ordinarie place, where everie seven or eight yeere, the Stannarie men of Cornwall and Denshire, were wont in great frequencie, to assemble together, and to consult about their affaires. At this hill in the yeere of E salvation DCCCXXXI, the British Danmonij, who calling the Danes to aid them of purpose to break into Devonshire, that they might drive out the English from thence, who alreadie possessed themselves of the countrey, were pitiously defeated by King Egbert, and slaine almost to the very last man. Beneath it Tamar leaveth Halton the habitation of the Rouses, antiently Lords of Little Modbery in Devonshire, and Salt-Esse. running nigh unto Salt-Esse, a prettie market towne seated in the descent of an hill, which hath a Major and certaine priviledges of their owne, as I said erewhile, it entertaineth the river Liver, on which standeth that same towne of Saint Germans, whereof I spake before. And now by this time spreading broader, discharged it selfe into the Ocean, making the haven which in the life of Saint Indractus, is called Ta- F merworth, after it hath severed Cornwal from Denshire. For Athelstane, the first English King that brought this countrey absolute under his dominion, appointed this river to be the bound or limit, between the Britans of Cornwal, and his Englishmen, after he had remooved the Britans out of Denshire, as witnesseth William of Malmsburie, who calleth it Tambra. Whereupon Alexander Necham, in his Praises of di- vine

Digitized by Google

A vine wisedome, writeth thus: Loegria Tamaris divisor Cornubiæq́, Indigenas ditat pinguibus Isicijs.
Tamar that Lhoegres doth divide from Cornwall in the west,
The neighbour-dwellers richly serves with Salmons of the best.

The place requireth here, that I should say somwhat of the holy and devout virgin Ursula descended from hence, as also of the eleven thousand British Virgins. But such is the variety of Writers, whiles some report they suffered martyrdome under Gratian the Emperour about the yeere of our Lord CCCLXXXIII, upon the coast of Germanie, as they sailed to Armorica; others by Attila the Hun, that scourge of God, B in the yeere CCCCL. at Coleine upon Rhene, as they returned from Rome; that with some it hath brought the truth of the History into suspition of a vaine fable. And as touching that Constantine, whom Gildas termeth a tyrannous whelpe of the uncleane Danmonian Lioneſſe; as also of the Disforresting of all this countey, (for beforetime it was reputed a Forrest) let Historians speake, for it is no part of my purpose. Saint Vrsula, and 11000. Virgins.

As for the Earles, none of British bloud, are mentioned but onely Candorus (called by others Cadocus) who is accounted by the late writers, the last Earle of Cornwall, of British race, & as they which are skilfull in Heraldry, have a tradition, bare XV. Besaunts V. IIII. III. II. and I. in a shield Sable. But of the Normans bloud the first Earle was Robert of Moriton, halfe-brother to William Conqueror, by Herlotta, their C mother; after whom succeeded William his sonne: who when hee had sided with Robert of Normandie against Henrie the First, King of England, being taken prisoner in battell, lost both his libertie, and his honours; and at last turned Monke at Bermondsey. Then Reginald, a base sonne of Henrie the First, by the daughter of Sir Robert Corbet, (for, that King plied getting children so lustfully, as that hee was father of thirteen Bastards) was placed in his roome. This Reginald dying without issue male legitimate, King Henrie the Second, having assigned unto his daughters certaine lands and Lordships, reserved this Earledome to himselfe, for the behoofe of his owne youngest sonne Iohn, a child of nine yeeres old, upon whom his brother Richard the First conferred it afterwards with other Earledomes. This Iohn afterward D was crowned King of England, and his second sonne Richard, was by his brother King Henrie the Third, endowed with this honour, and the Earldome of Poictou: a Prince verily in those daies puissant, in Gods service devout and religious, in warre right valiant, for counsell sage and prudent, who in Aquitaine fought battels with fortunate successe, and shewed much valour: and having made a voiage into the Holy Land, enforced the Saracens to take truce with him: the Kingdome of Apulia, offered unto him by the Pope he refused; the troubles and tumults in England, hee often times composed; and in the yeere of our Lord MCCLVII, by some of the Princes Electours of Germany was chosen King of the Romans, & crowned at Aquisgrane: wherupon, as if he had made meanes thereto by money, this verse was so rife and currant every E where. Earles of Cornwall. Robert. de Monte. 1175.

Nummus ait prome, nubit Cornubia Romæ.
For me, my money, saieth this,
Cornwall to Rome now wedded is.

For, so well monied he was before, that one, who then lived hath put downe in writing, that for ten yeares together hee might dispend one hundred markes a day. But when as Germanie was all on a light fire with civill warres among competitors of the Empire, he returned quickly into England, where he departed this life and was interred in the famous Monastery of Hales which he had built; a little after that his first begotten son Henry, newly in his return from the Holy Land, whiles he was at divine F service, devoutly occupied within a church at Viterbium in Italy, was by Guy de Montfort, son of Simon Montfort Earle of Leceister, in revenge of his fathers death, wickedly slaine. Edmund therfore, his second son succeeded in the Earldome of Cornwall; who died without any lawful issue: and so his high and great estate of inheritance returned to King Edward the First, as who was the next unto him in bloud, and *found (as our Lawyers say) his heire. Whereas that Richard and Edmund his sonne, Princes

*Hæres inventus.

Digitized by Google

of the bloud roiall of England, bare divers Armes from the Armes roiall of England, A to wit, in a ſhield argent, a Lion rampant, gules crowned, or within a border ſables Bezante, I have with others oftentimes much marvelled at: neither (I aſſure you) can I alleage any other reaſon, but that they in this point imitated the houſe Roial of France, (for the maner of bearing Armes came from the French men unto us.) For, the yonger ſonnes of the Kings of France, even to the time wee now ſpeake of, bare other coats than the Kings themſelves did, as we may ſee in the family of Vermandous, Dreux, and Courtney: and as Robert Duke of Burgundie, brother to Henrie the First, King of France, tooke unto him the antient ſhield of the Dukes of Burgundie: ſo we may well thinke, that this Richard having received the Earldome of Poicton, from Henrie B the Third his brother, aſſumed unto him that Lion gules crowned, which belonged to the Earles of Poicton before him, (as the French writers doe record) and added thereto that border gamiſhed with Beaſaunts, out of the antient coat of the Earles of Cornwall. For ſo ſoone as the younger ſonnes of the Kings of France began to beare the armes of France with differences, ſemblably they did among us, and began firſt at Edward the First his children. But whither am I carried away from my purpoſed matter, as forgetting my ſelfe in the delight I take of mine owne ſtudie and profeſſion? When Cornwall was thus reverted unto the Crowne, King Edward the Second, who had received from his father faire lands and poſſeſſions here, beſtowed the title of Earle of Cornwall, upon Piers Gaveſton a Gaſcon, who had enſnared his C youth by the allurements of corrupt life: But when as hee for corrupting the Prince, and for other hainous crimes, was by the Nobles intercepted and beheaded; there ſucceeded him Iohn of Eltham, a younger Sonne of Edward the Second, advanced thereunto by his brother Edward the Third, who dying young, and without iſſue alſo, Edward the Third erected Cornwall into a Dukedome, and inveſted Edward his ſonne a Prince moſt accompliſhed with martiall proweſſe, in the yeere of Chriſt 1336, Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath on his head, a Ring upon his finger, and a ſilver verge. Since which time, that I may note ſo much under warrant of record, (let the skilfull Lawyers judge thereof) the King of Englands eldeſt ſonne is reputed Duke of Cornwall by birth, and by vertue of a ſpeciall D
Act, the verie firſt day of his nativitie is preſumed and taken to bee of full and perfect age, ſo that he may ſue that day for his liverie of the ſaid Dukedome, and ought by right to obtaine the ſame, as well as if he had been full one and twentie yeeres old: and hee hath his Roialties in certain actions, in Stannary matters, in wracks at ſea, cuſtomes, &c. yea, and divers miniſters or officers aſſigned unto him, for theſe & ſuch like matters. But more plainly and fully inſtructed we are in theſe points by Richard Carew of Anthony, a Gentleman ennobled no leſſe in regard of his Parentage and deſcent, than for his vertue and learning, who hath poliſhed and perfited the deſcription of this countrey more at large, and not in a ſlight and meane manner, whom I muſt needs acknowledge to have given me much light herein. E

* Bande d'Or & d'Azur a la bordeure de Gueules. Memoriales de Aquitaine.

Dukes of Cornwall.

Orig. 35. H. 6.

There be in this Countie Pariſhes 161.

F

Digitized by Google

A

DENSIHRE.

He neerer or hithermore region of the Danmonians, that I ſpake of, is now commonly called Denſhire, by the Comiſh-Britans Deuinan, and by the Welſh Britans Duffneint, that is, Low valleies, for that the people dwell for the moſt part beneath in Vales: by the Engliſh Saxons
B Deuen-ſcyre, whereof grew the Latin name Deuonia, and by that contraction, which the vulgar people uſeth, Denſhire; and not of the Danes, as ſome ſmatterers of meane knowledge moſt ſtifly maintaine: a countrey, which as it extendeth it ſelfe both waies wider than Cornwall, ſo it is harborous on either ſide with more commodious Havens, no leſſe enriched with tin mines, eſpecially Weſtward; gamiſhed with pleaſanter medows, ſightly with greater ſtore of woods, and paſſing well repleniſhed with townes and buildings. But the ſoile in ſome places againe, is as leane and barren: which notwithſtanding yeeldeth fruit to the husbandman plenteouſly, ſo that he be skilfull in husbandry, and both can take paines, and be able
C withall to defray the coſt. Neither is there in all England almoſt any place, where the ground requireth greater charges: For, in moſt parts thereof it groweth in maner barren, if it be not overſtrewed and mingled with a certaine ſand from the Sea, which is of great efficacy to procure fertility, by quickning, as it were, and giving life unto the glebe: and therefore in places far from the ſhore it is bought at a deare rate.

Sand, making grounds fruitfull.

In deſcribing of this region, I will firſt travell over the Weſt-ſide, as the riuer Tamara runneth along, and then the South coaſt which bordereth on the Ocean: From whence by the Eaſterne bounds where it confineth upon Dorſet & Sommerſet ſhires, I will returne backe unto the Northern, which is hemmed in with the Severn Sea.

Tamar which divideth theſe two ſhires, firſt on this part receiveth into it from D the Eaſt a riveret called Lid, which paſſeth by Coriton, and K. Sidenham ſmall townlets, but which have given ſurnames to ancient and worſhipfull families, to Lidſtow a little mercate towne, and Lidford, now a ſmall village, but in ancient time, a famous towne, which in the yeere 997. was moſt grievouſly ſhaken, and ſpoiled by the furious rage of the Danes, which (as it is written in that booke, whereby William the Firſt tooke the ſurvey and valew of England) was not wont to be rated and aſſeſſed at any other time, nor otherwiſe than London was. That little river Lid, here at the bridge, gathered into a ſtreit, and pent in betweene rocks, runneth downe amaine, and the ground daily more and more ſo deepe, that his water is not ſeene; onely a roaring noiſe is heard to the great woonder of thoſe that paſſe over.

E Beneath it, Tamar receiveth Teave a little river, on which Teavistok, commonly called Taviſtoke flouriſheth, a towne in times paſt famous for the Abbay there, which Ordulph the ſonne of Ordgare Earle of Devonſhire, (admoniſhed by a viſion frō heaven) built about the yere of our Saviour Chriſt Dccccl xj. a place, as William of Malmesburie deſcribeth it, Pleaſant in regard of the groves ſtanding ſo conveniently about it, and of the plenteous fiſhing there, for the handſome and uniforme building alſo of the Church, for the ſewers from the river paſſing downe along by the houſes of office, which runne with ſuch a force of their owne, that they cary away with them all the ſuperfluity they find. Saint Rumon is much ſpoken of, and lies as Biſhop there. There is to be ſeene alſo in the ſame Abbay, the Sepulcher of that Ordgar before named: and the huge bigneſſe of his ſonnes tomb,
F who was called Ordolph, is thought to be a rare thing worth the ſight: for he was a man of a mighty ſtature giantlike, and of exceeding great ſtrength, as who was able to burſt in ſunder the bars of great gates, and to ſtride over the riveret there, ten foote broad; if yee liſt to beleeve the ſaid William. But ſcarſely had this Abbay ſtood thirty yeeres after it was firſt founded, when the Danes in their ſpoiling rage burnt it to the ground: yet it flouriſhed againe, and by a laudable ordinance, lectures therein were kept of our ancient Taviſtoke. The Charter of the foundation.

Digitized by Google

Lectures of the Saxon tongue.

ent language (I meane the English Saxon tongue) which continued even to our fathers daies; for feare lest the saide language (a thing that now is well neere come to passe) should be forgotten. Tamar having thus received the Teave, draweth now very neere unto his mouth, where he and the river Plime together fall into the Ocean: of which river the towne adjoining to it, is called Plimmouth: sometime named Sutton: and seemeth to have consisted of two parts. For, we read in the Parlamentary Acts, of Sutton Vautort*, and Sutton Prior, because it belonged partly to the familie of the Vautorts, and partly to the Prior. Of late time it became of a poore fisher village to be a great towne, and for the number of inhabitants growne to that passe, (as now it is to be seene) that it may be compared with a Citie. Such is the commodiousnesse of the haven, which without striking saile admitteth into the bosome thereof the tallest ships that be, & doth harbour them very safely, as well within Tamar as Plime, and is beside against hostility sufficiently fortified: For; before the very mids of the havens mouth, lieth S. Nicholas Isle, strongly fortified both by nature and art: as for the haven it selfe at the very towne, it hath fortifications on both sides, and is chained over when need requireth, having on the South side a Pier against it, and upon an hill next adjoyning a Castle built, as it is thought, by the Vautorts. The whole towne is divided into foure Wards, governed by a* Major, ordained there by K. Henrie the Sixth, and under him every ward had in times past a Capitaine set over it, ech of them likewise had his inferiour officers. As touching that fabulous wrestling betweene Corinæus and Gogmagog the Giant in this place, let it suffice to set downe a verse or two out of Architrenius concerning the same and the Westerne Giants.

Plimmouth, 13. Henrie 4. *De valle torta.

* Valle tortis, sive de valle torta.
* Custodiss.
* Prætor.

Gogmagog.

Hos, auidum belli robur Corinæus Averno
Præcipites misit, cubitis ter quatuor altum
Gogmagog Herculeâ suspendit in aere luctâ;
Anthæum q; suum scopulo detrusit in æquor.
Potavitque dato Thetis ebria sanguine fluctus,
Diuisum q; tulit mare corpus, Cerberus vmbram.

These martiall monsters, Giants strong, by Corinæus slaine;
With Gogmagog twelve cubits high, a combat did remaine:
Whom up he hang'd twixt heaven and earth, (thus once Alcides hung Antæus fell) and from the rock into the Sea him flung.
His bloud gave Thetis the waves to drinke (her selfe therewith was drunke)
His grisly ghost had Cerberus, when bodie torne was sunck.

As for that rock, from whence, they say, this giant was cast down, it is now called the Haw: a very hill standing between the town and the Ocean: on the top wherof, which lieth spred into a most pleasant plaine, there is a right delectable and goodly prospect every way, and for the use of Sailers a very faire Compasse erected. The circuit of this towne not great, but much renowned it is among forraine nations: and not so much for the commodious haven, as the valour of the inhabitants in sea services of all sorts. For (to say nothing of all others) from hence was Sir Francis Drake that famous Knight, and most skilfull man at sea in our daies; who first (as I have heard himselfe relate) to repaire the losses which he had sustained at the Spaniards hands, for two yeeres space together with victorious successe held and kept the Bay of Mexico as it were besieged, and viewed over the *Isthmus of Dariena: From whence when he had once beheld the South sea (as the Spaniards call it) as another Themistocles stirred up with the Trophees of Miltiades, thought he should have neglected himselfe, his country and his owne glory, unlesse he sailed over it, which continually presented it selfe as an obiect to his aduenturous mind. In the yeere therefore 1577. putting to sea from hence, he entred into the streits of Magellane, and in two yeeres and tenne moneths, thorow many alternative varieties of fortune, God being his guide, and valour his consort, was the next after Magellanus, that sailed round about the world. Whereupon, one wrote thus unto him.

Francis Drake.

* Narrow passage.

Drake, peragrati nouit quem terminus orbis,
Quem q; semel mundi vidit vterq; polus.

Si

Digitized by Google

A Si taceant homines, facient te sidera notum,
Sol nescit comitis immemor esse sui.

Sir Drake, whom well the worlds end know, which thou did'st compasse round:
And whom both poles of heaven once saw, which North and South doe bound:
The Stars above will make thee knowen, if men heere silent were,
The Sunne himselfe cannot forget his fellow-travailler.

The rest of his noble exploits, and of others who descended from hence taking example by him, flourished in glorious atchivements by sea, seeing it belongs not to this place, let Histories record in writing. Neither have I ought else to say more of B this towne, but that in the reigne of William *Rufus, there flourished heere one Ealphege, a learned and maried Priest. For, untill the yeere 1102. Preists in England were not forbidden to have their wives. Then, Anselme Archbishop of Canturbury violently forced both the sacred Scripture and nature also, as our writers in those daies doe complaine, & namely, Henry of Huntingdon expresly of Anselme in these termes: He prohibited English Priests to have wives, who before time were not prohibited. Which, as some thought to be a matter of greatest purity: so others againe toke it to be most perilous, lest while by this meanes they aimed at cleannesse above their power, they should fall into horrible uncleannesse, to the exceeding great shame of Christianity.

*Rous.

The first time that Priests were forbidden mariage.

More inward in the countrey, and yet not far from the water of Plim, is Plimpton
C seated, a mercate towne, well frequented, where the remnants and deformed ruines of a castle shew themselves: of which many men have holden as our Lawyers terme it, in Castle garde; for it was the chiefe seat of the Redverses, or the Ripar ij, (for both we read) who were Barons of Plimpton, and Earles of Denshire. Next unto this, stood Plimpton S. Marie, the glorie whereof then fell to decay, when as not long since the College there of Chanons was dissolved, which William Warlewast, Bishop of Exceter, in old time had founded. More, Eastward you see Modbery, a little towne, which acknowledgeth it selfe to appertaine to the ancient and right worshipfull familie of the Campernulphs, Knights, who also are called in old Deeds De campo Arnulphi, but commonly Champernouns, which received much advancement and D reputation by the heire of the Vautorts.

From Plims mouth, where the South shore of this region beginneth, the countrey runneth along with a large and great front as far as to Stert, a cape or promontorie (for, so the word in the English Saxon tongue signifieth) but so soone as the shore hath drawen it selfe back land-ward, the river Dert breaketh out, which arising from the inward part of the countrey runneth downe apace, thorow certaine leane and high grounds, called thereupon Dertmore, (wherein of late were Lode stones found) and carieth downe with it certaine grit and sand out of the Tin-mines, (which by little and little choke up the chanell) thorow the Forrest of Dertmore, where David of Sciredun held lands in Sciredun and Siplegh, by this tenure or service, to find two arrowes, when the King his soveraigne Lord should come to hunt in that Forrest: From
E thence by Dertinton, a Baronie sometimes of the Martins, who were Lords of Keimes in Wales, it holdeth in his streame unto Totnes. Which being an ancient little towne standing pendant upon the fall of an hill, East, and West, flourished some time in great honor. It paid no tribute, as we find in Doomesday, the survey-booke of England, but when Exceter paid; and then it yeelded xl.d. and did service, if any expedition marched by land or went by sea: and Totnes, Barnestaple and Lidford served and paid, as much as Exceter. King Iohn granted unto it power to chuse a Major for the chiefe Magistrate; Edward the First enriched it with sundry liberties; and about that time it was fortified with a castle by the Zouches, as the inhabitants are perswaded. The F possession it was in times past of one Iudeal, surnamed De Totenais; afterwards of William Briwer a right noble personage, by one of whose daughters it came to the Breoses; & from them by a daughter likewise to George De Cantelupo, Lord of Abergevenny, whose sister Melicent wedded unto Eudo De la Zouch, brought it by hir mariage to the familie of the Barons La Zouches: and theirs it was, untill that Iohn, Lord Zouch being attaint and proscribed, because he tooke part with King Richard

*Stert Cauda in dutch a Taile.

Totnes.

*Nongeldubas.

Lord Zouch, called vsually.

Digitized by Google

the Third, Henry the Seuenth bestowed it franckly (as I have hard say) upon Peter Edgecomb a noble and wise gentleman. Adjoining to this towne is Berie Pomerie, so called of the Pomeries a right noble house in those parts, which a little more Eastward and somewhat farther from the river side, had a very proper castle of their owne. These derive their pedigree from Radulph Pomerie, who in William Conquerors time held Wich, Dunnineſdon, Brawerdine, Pudeford, Horewood, Toriland, Helecom and this Berie &c. Of this Totnes, the strond or shore adjoining, was called in old time Totoneſe: where (as the British Historie saith) Brutus the founder of the British nation first landed, and Havillanus, as a Poet, relying thereon versified in this wise: A

Inde dato curſu, Brutus comitatus Achate,
Gallorum ſpoliis cumulatis nauibus æquor
Exarat, & ſuperis, auragꝫ. faventibus uſus,
Littora fœlices intrat Totoneſia portus:

Thence hoising sailes with Gaulish spoiles the fleet fraight sea doth take Our Brutus with his trustiest friend; and through waves way doth make:
The Gods lookt cheerefull on his course, the wind he had at will;
At Totnesse shore, that happy haven, arriu'd he and stood still. B

But, that river Dert, whereof I spake, having passed beyond Totnes bridge, at which it leaveth whole heapes of sands brought downe by his streame from out of the Tin mines, hath for prospect on both sides, nothing but fruitfull fields, untill hee come all weary with this long course, to his mouth; over which upon an hill reaching C

Dertmouth. forth in length, standeth Dertmouth a port towne, by reason of the commodious haven, defended with two castels, much frequented of Merchants and furnished with very good shipping. A Major it hath, by the grant of King Edward the Third. For Lords it acknowledged long since the Zouches, Nicolas of Teukesbury, and the Brients, according to the variable change of the times: & hath sundry times defended it selfe stoutly against the French: but especially in the yeere of Christ 1404. Monsieur De Caſtell, a Frenchman, who by his men of warre and piracies had stopped all intercourse of trafficke in those parts and burnt Plimmouth, whiles he invaded this D

Stoke Fleming. place, was by women and country people intercepted, and slaine withall his companie. And heere I must not passe over in silence Stoke Fleming that lieth hard by, and which taking that name of a noble man of Flanders, sometime Lord thereof, came by the daughter of Mohun to the Carewes.

From this place, as the shore giveth backe Northward, the sea followeth in upon it, and by that meanes with a large and spatious creek, which taketh about ten miles in circuit maketh a bay, called now Torbay: a very safe rode and harbour for ships when the South-west wind is aloft; and hath fast by it a little village so called, where

Briew. sometime the Briewrs dwelt, and built a religious house, who in the daies of King Ri-

See Sommerſetſhire. chard the First and of King Iohn, were men of great renowne and revenue: and afterward the habitation it was of the Wakes. Nere unto it is Cockington, where the family E

Carie of Cockington. of the Caries (a different house from that of the Carewes) hath flourished a long time in great honor and estimation; out of which the Barons of Hunsdon, concerning whom I will speake more in due place, are descended. A little higher appeares in sight

Hacombe. Hacombe, the habitation in old time of Sir Iordan Fitz-Stephen Knight, surnamed of this place, de Hacombe: by whose daughter and heire Cecilie, it came into the familie of the Archdeacons; From which likewise by Hugh Courtney in processe of time,

The familie of the Carews. it was devolved upon the Carews, whose house in these parts is reputed very worshipfull, and spred into many branches. For, Iane the daughter of the said Hugh, and heire to her mother, being joined in mariage to Nicolas Baron Carew, brought F him many children: and when the eldest of them, named Thomas, used not his mother with such dutifull respect as a sonne ought, she made a conveiance of that great and wealthy inheritance to her three younger sonnes (from whom those three families of the Carews, de Hacombe, Anthony, and Bery are sprung) and to Iohn Vere, a sonne that she had by a second husband, from whom the Earles of Oxford are issued.

Then

Digitized by Google

A Then meet you with Teignemouth a little village at the mouth of the river Teigne, whereof it hath also the name: where the Danes that were sent before to discover the situation of Britaine, and to sound the landing places, being first set ashore about the yeere of Salvation 800. and having slaine the governor of the place, tooke it as an ominous good token of future victorie; which indeede afterward they followed with extreme cruelty thorow the whole Iland. More inward, neere unto the source of the river Teigne is Chegford seated, where flourished sometime the noble family of the Prows: then Chidley, which gave the name to that great house and linage of the Chidleyes: and next unto the very mouth thereof, Bishops Teignton, so called because
B it belonged to the Bishops; in which because there was a Sanctuarie, John Grandison descended out of Burgundy, Bishop of Exceter, as presaging what would ensue in future time built a very faire house, to the end that his Successors (these are the very words of his testament) might have a place whereon to leane and lay their heads, if happily their Temporalties should be seized into the Kings hands. But so farre was it off that his purpose tooke effect, that his successors have not onely lost that house, but also been quite dessеized now well neere of all the rest.

Danes, when they first entred Britaine.

About six miles from thence, the river * Isc, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention, which the Britans call Isc, and the English-Saxons Ex, with a large chanell runneth into the Ocean. Whether it tooke this name of Iscaw, that signifieth in the British tongue Elders trees, I wot not. Some fetch it from Reeds, which the Britans
C call Hesk, wherewith Northerne nations, (and such are the Britans) thatched and covered their houses, yea and fastened together, as it were with soder, the joints of their ships. But considering that there be no reeds heere found, I am not hasty to give credit thereto. This river hath his head and springeth first in a weely and barren ground named Exmore, neere unto Severne sea, a great part whereof is counted within Sommersetshire: and wherein, there are seen certaine monuments of anticke worke, to wit, Stones pitched in order, some triangle-wise, others in a round circle: and one among the rest with an inscription in Saxon letters, or Danish rather, to direct those (as it should seeme) who were to travaile that way. Now this Ex or Isc be-D ginning his course first from thence Southward by Twiforaton, so called of two foords, but commonly Teverton, a towne standing much upon clothing, to the great gaine and credit thereof, passeth forward thorow a faire countrey of good and fertile fields, and is augmented with two especial riverets, Creden from the west, and Columb from the East. Upon Creden in the primitive Church of the Saxons, there flourished an Episcopall Sea, in a towne of the same name, anciently called Cridiantun, now by contraction Kirton: where that Winifride or Boniface was borne, who converted the Hæssians, Thuringers, & Frisians of Germany unto Christ, & for that was accounted the Apostle of Germanie, and canonized a Saint. At this present, it is of no great reckoning, but for a small market, and the Bishop of Exceter his house there: but E within our Fathers remembrance of much greater name and request it was for a Colledge there of twelve Prebendaries, who now are all vanished and gone. The river Columb that commeth from the East, passeth hard by Columbton, a little towne bearing his name: which King Alfred by his Testament, bequeathed to his younger sonne: and neere unto Poltimore the seat of that worshipfull, and right antient family of Bampfield, intermingleth it selfe with the waters of Ex. And now by this time, Isc or Ex growing bigger, and sporting himselfe, as it were, with spreading into many streames, very commodious for mils, hieth apace, and commeth close to the citie of Exceter, unto which he leaveth his name: whereupon Alexander Neckam writeth thus, in his Poeme of Divine sapience:

* The river Ex.

Plinie.

Antike stones.

Tiverton.

Poltimore.

* Ex.

F Exonia fama celeberrimus Iscia nomen
Præbuit, ——

To Exceter, Ex a river of fame
(first Iscia call'd) impos'd the name.

This Citie Ptolomee calleth Isca, Antoninus Isca Dvnmoniorvm, for Danmoniorvm; others (but falsly) Augusta, as if the second Legion Augusta had there been

Digitized by Google

v. pl. 634

*Caer Leon or Usk in Monmouthshire.

been resident; Whereas, we shall shew hereafter that it kept station and residence in *Isca Silvrvm. The English-Saxons termed it Exanceaster, and Monketon, of the Monks, at this day it is called Excester, in Latine Exonia, in British Caerisk, Caeruth, and Pencaer, that is, a head or principall Citie. For Caer, (to tell you once for all) with our *Britans is as much to say, as a Citie, whereupon they use to name Ierusalem, Caer Salem; Lutetia or Paris, Caer Paris; Rome, Caer Ruffaine. Thus Carthage in the Punick togue, was called, as Solinus witnesseth, Cartheia, that is, the new City. I have heard likewise, that Caer in the Syriak tongue, signified, a Citie. Now seeing that the Syrians, as all men confesse, peopled the whole world with their Colonies, it may seeme probable, that they left their tongue also to the posteritie, as the mother of all future languages. This Citie, as saith William of Malmesburie, albeit the soile adjoyning be wet, foule and wealie, scarse able to bring forth hungry oates, and many times emptie huskes without graine in them, yet by reason of the statelinesse of the place, the riches of the inhabitants, and frequent concourse of strangers, all kind of traffique, and commerce of merchants is there so fresh, that a man can aske there for no necessary, but hee may have it. Situate it is on the Eastward banke of the river Ex, upon a little hill gently arising with an easie ascent to a pretty heigth, the pendant whereof lieth East and West, environed about with ditches, and verie strong wals, having many turrets orderly interposed, and containeth in circuit a mile and an halfe, having suburbs running out a great way on each side. In it there are xv. Parish Churches, and in the very highest part thereof, neere the East gate, a Castle called Rugemont, sometime the seat of the West Saxon Kings, and afterwards of the Earles of Cornwall: but at this day commended for nothing else, but the antiquitie and situation thereof. For it commandeth the whole citie and territorie about it, and hath a verie pleasant prospect into the Sea. In the East quarter of the City is to be seen the cathedrall Church in the mids of many faire houses round about it, founded as the privat History of the place witnesseth, by King Athelstan in the honour of Saint Peter, and repleniſhed with Monks: which Church at length Edward the Confessour, after he had remooved some of the Monkes from thence to Westminster, and translated thither the Bishops Seas of Cornwall, and Kirton, adorned with Episcopall Dignitie, and made Leofrike the Briton first Bishop there: whose Successours augmented the Church both with Edifices, and also with revenues: and William Bruier the ninth Bishop after him, when the Monkes were displaced, brought in a Deane, and twentie and foure Prebendaries. In which age flourished Ioseph Iscanus borne heere, and from hence taking his surname, a Poet of a most excellent wit, whose writings were so well approoved, as that they had equall commendation with the works of ancient Poets: For, his Poeme of the Trojane warre, was divulged once or twice in Germanie under the name of Cornelius Nepos.

Cornel. Nepos.

*Excester.

When this Citie *Isca came under the Romane Iurisdiction it appeareth not for certaine: For, so farre off am I from thinking that Vespasian wonne it, (as Geffrey of Monmouth affirmeth) what time as he warring in Britaine under Claudius the Emperour, was shewed by the Destinies unto the world, that I thinke it was then scarsely built. Yet in the time of the Antonines, it may seeme to have been vvell knovven: for hither, and no farther this vvay did Antonine specifie any place in his way-faring book. It came not fully into the English-Saxons hands before the 465. yere after their entrance into Britain. For, at that time Athelstane expelled the Britans quite out of the Citie, vvho before had inhabited it in equall right with the Saxons, yea, and drave them beyond Tamar, and then fortified the citie round about with a rampire and wall of foure square stone, and other bulwarks for defence. Since which time, many benefits by the Kings have been bestowed upon it, and among the rest, as we read in William the Conquerours * booke, This Citie paide no tribute, but when London, Yorke, and Winchester paid, and that was halfe a mark of silver for a Souldiers service. And when there was any expedition set out either by sea or land, it served in proportion to five hides. It hath been likewise from time to time much afflicted, once spoiled and sore shaken, by the furious outrage of the Danes, in the yeere of our redemption

William Malmsburie.

*Domesday.

Digitized by Google

A tion 875: but moſt grievouſly by Suen the Dane in the yeare 1003: at which time by the treacherie of one Hugh a Norman Governor of the citie, it was raced and ruined along from the Eaſt gate to the Weſt. And ſcarcely began it to flouriſh againe, when William the Conquerour, moſt ſtraitly beleaguered it: when the citizens in the meane while thought it not ſufficient to ſhut their gates againſt him, but malapartly let flie taunts and flouts at him: but when a peece of their wall fell downe, by the ſpeciall hand of God as the Hiſtorians of that age report, they yeelded immediatly thereupon. At which time as we find in the ſaid ſurvey-booke of his, The King had in this Citie three hundred houſes: it paid fifteen pounds by the yeere, and fortie houſes were
B deſtroyed after that the King came into England. After this it was thrice beſieged, and yet it eaſily avoided all: Firſt, by Hugh Courtney Earle of Denſhire in that civill warre between the two houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke: then, by Perkin Warbecke that imaginarie, counterfeit and pretended Prince, who being a young man of a verie baſe condition, faining himſelfe to be Richard Duke of Yorke, the ſecond ſonne of King Edward the Fourth, ſtirred up dangerous ſturres againſt Henrie the Seventh: thirdly, by ſeditious Rebels of Cornwall, in the yeere of Chriſt 1549: at which time the Citizens, moſt grievouſly pinched though they were with ſcarſitie of all things, continued nevertheleſſe in their faith and allegeance, untill that Iohn Lord Ruſſell, raiſed the ſiege and delivered them.

C But Exceſter received not ſo great damage at theſe enemies hands, as it did by certaine dammes, which they call Weares, that Edward Courtney Earle of Denſhire, taking high diſpleaſure againſt the Citizens, made in the river of Ex, which ſtop the paſſage ſo, that no veſſell can come up to the Citie; but ſince that time all merchandize is carried by land from Topeſham three miles off. And albeit it hath been decreed by Act of Parliament, to take away theſe Weares, yet they continue there ſtill. Hereupon, the little towne adjoining is called Weare, being aforetime named Heneaton: which was ſometime the poſſeſſion of Auguſtine de Baa: from whom in right of inheritance it deſcended to Iohn Holland, who in his ſignet which my ſelfe have ſeen bare a Lion rampant, gardant among flowers de Lys. The civil go-D vernment of this citie is in the power of foure and twentie perſons: out of whom there is from yeere to yeere a Major elected; who with foure Bailiffes ruleth here the State. As touching the Geographicall deſcription of this place, the old tables of Oxford have ſet downe the longitude thereof to bee nineteene degrees, and eleven ſcruples: the latitude fiftie degrees, and fortie ſcruples or minutes.

Weare.

Ch. 24. Ed. 3.

This citie, that I may not omit ſo much, hath had three Dukes. For, Richard the Second of that name, King of England, created Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington and his brother by the mothers ſide, the firſt Duke of Exceſter: whom Henrie the Fourth depoſed from this dignity, and left unto him the name onely of Earle of Huntingdon: and ſoone after for conſpiracy againſt the King he loſt both it and his life
E by the hatchet. Some few yeeres after, Henrie the Fift ſet in his place Thomas Beaufort of the houſe of Lanceſter, and Earle of Dorſet, a right noble and woorthy warriour. When he was dead leaving no iſſue behind him, Iohn Holland ſonne of that foreſaid Iohn, (as heire unto his brother Richard who died without children, and to his father both) being reſtored to his bloud, by the favour and bounty of King Henrie the Sixth recovered his fathers honor; and left the ſame to Henrie his ſonne, who ſo long as the Lancaſtrians ſtood upright, flouriſhed in very much honor; but afterwards when the family of Yorke, was afloat and had rule of all, gave an example to teach men, how il truſting it is to great Fortunes. For this was that ſame Henrie, Duke of Exceſter, who albeit he had wedded King Edward the Fourth his ſiſter, was
F driven to ſuch miſerie, that he was ſeene all tottered, torne, and barefooted to beg for his living in the Low countries. And in the end after Barnet field fought, wherein he bare himſelfe valiantly againſt Edward the Fourth, was no more ſeene, untill his dead bodie (as if he had periſhed by Shipwracke) was caſt upon the ſhore of Kent. A good while after this, Henrie Courtney, Earle of Denſhire, the ſonne of Katharine daughter to King Edward the Fourth, was aduanced to the honor of Marqueſſe

Dukes of Exceſter.

See the Earles of Dorſet.

Philip. Comineus, cap. 50.

Digitized by Google

Marqueſſe of Exceſter. queſſe of Exceſter by Henry the Eight, and deſigned heire apparent. But this Marques as well as the firſt Duke was by his high parentage, caſt into a great tempeſt of troubles, wherein as a man ſubject to ſuſpitions, and deſirous of a change in the State, he was quickly overthrowen. And among other matters becauſe he had with money and counſell aſſiſted Reginald Poole (afterwards Cardinall) then a fugitiue practiſing with the Emperour and the Pope, againſt his owne country, and the King who had now abrogated the Popes authority; he was judicially arraigned, and being condemned, with ſome others, loſt his head. But now of late by the fauour of King Iames, Thomas Cecill Lord Burleigh, enjoyeth the title of Earle of Exceſter, a right good man, and the worthy ſonne of ſo excellent a father, being the eldeſt ſon of William Cecill Lord Burleigh, high Treaſurer of England, whoſe wiſedome for a long time was the ſupport of peace and of Englands happie quietneſſe.

1605. A B

From Exceſter, going to the verie mouth of the river, I find no monument of Antiquitie, but Exminſter, ſometime called Exanminſter, bequeathed by King Ælfred to his younger Sonne; and Pouderham Caſtle built by Iſabel de Riparijs*, the ſeat long time of that moſt noble familie of the Courtneys, Knights: who being lineally deſcended from the ſtocke of the Earles of Denſhire, and allied by affinitie to moſt honourable houſes, flouriſh ſtil at this day, moſt worthy of their deſcent from ſo high Anceſtors. Under Pouderham, Ken a pretty brooke entreth into Ex, which riſeth neere Holcombe, where in a Parke is a faire place built by Sir Thomas Denis, whoſe familie fetcheth their firſt off ſpring and ſurname from the Danes, and were anciently written Le Dan Denis, by which name the Comiſh called the Danes. But lower upon the verie mouth of the river on the other banke ſide, as the name it ſelfe doth teſtifie, ſtandeth Exanmouth; knowen by nothing elſe but the name, and for that ſome fiſhermen dwelt therein.

Pouderham. * Redvers or Rivers. Holcombe. Burnet. Exmouth. C

More Eaſtward, Otterey, that is, The River of Otters, or River-Dogs, which we call Otters, as may appeare by the ſignification of the word, falleth into the ſea; which runneth hard under Honnyton, a towne not unknowen to thoſe that travell into theſe parts, and was given by Iſabell, heire to Earles of Devonſhire, to King Edward the Firſt, when her iſſue failed: and doth impart his name to certaine places. Among which, theſe are of greater note; above Honnyton, Mohuns Otterey, the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Mohuns, from whom by right of marriage it came to the Carews: beneath Honniton Saint Maries Otterey, ſo called of Saint Maries Colledge, which Iohn Grandiſon Biſhop of Exceſter founded, who drew the whole eſtates of all the Clergie men in his Dioceſſe to himſelfe. For hee perſwaded them in their laſt Wils to give up, and make over all that they had unto his hands, as who would beſtow the ſame to godly uſes, in endowing Churches, and in building of Hoſpitals, and Colleges therewith, which verily he (by report) performed accordingly verie devoutly.

Otterey. Honnyton. D

From the mouth of this Otterey, the ſhore runneth Eaſtward with many winding reaches, and turning-creeks, by Budley, Sidmouth, and Seaton, famous ports in times paſt, but now the havens there are ſo choked up with ſand, brought in with the reciprocall courſe of the tides, and heaped up againſt them, that they have almoſt utterly loſt all that benefit. As for Seaton, I would gheſſe it to be that MORIDVNVM, which Antoninus ſpeaketh of, and is placed between DVRNOVARIA and ISCA, (if the booke be not faultie) and called in Peutegerus table by a name cut ſhort, RIDVNVM, conſidering both the diſtance and the ſignification of the name. For, Moridunum in the Britiſh tongue is the verie ſame that Seaton in Engliſh, to wit, A Towne upon an hill by the Sea. Hereto adjoyneth Wiſcomb, a towne memorable in this reſpect, that in it there dwelt William Lord Bonevill, whoſe heire Cecilie by her mariage brought the titles of Lord Bonevill, and Harington with a goodly inheritance in theſe parts, unto Thomas Grey Marqueſſe Dorſet.

E

Moridunum. Wiſcomb. See in Somerſet ſhire. F

Under theſe townes the River Ax diſcharg eth it ſelfe at a very ſmall chanell, after it hath paſſed downe by Ford, where Adelize daughter to Baldwine of Okehampton, founded an Abbey for Ciſtertian Monkes, 1140. and by Axanminſter, a towne renowmed in the antient Hiſtories onely for their Tombes of the Saxon Axminſter.

Princes,

Digitized by Google

A Princes, who were slaine in that bloudy battell at Brunaburg, and translated hither; and situat it is in the very frontire and limit of this Province. Neere unto which Reginald Mohun of Dunster, unto whom the Mannour of Axminster in right of inheritance fell by the Fourth daughter of William de Briewr, built the Abbey of Newenham in the yere of Grace 1246. Hence the East-bound runneth crookedly north-westward, by villages of no fame toward Severn side; along which now let us take our way.

The Regiſter of Newenham.

From Cornwall the first shore in this shire that stretcheth out it selfe in length to the Severne sea, is by Ptolomee called, THE PROMONTORIE OF HERCVLES, and retaineth still some little remnant of that name, being called at this day Herty-
B poinct, and hath in it two prettie townes, Herton and Hertlond, famous in old time for the reliques of that holy man Saint Nectan. In honour of whom there was erected here a little Monasterie, by Githa Earle Goodwines wife, who had this Nectan in especiall reverence, for that she was perswaded, that for his merits her husband had escaped the danger of shipwracke in a violent and raging tempest. Howbeit afterwards, the Dinants, who also are named Dinhams, that came out of Bretagne in France, whose demeans, as in fee it was, were counted the founders thereof: and from them descended Baron Dinham, Lord high Treasurer of England, under K. Henrie the Seventh, by whose sisters and heires, the inheritance was divided between Lord Zouch, Bourchier Fitz-warin, Carew, and Arundell.

Hercules his Promontory.

Saint Nectan.

William Malmesbury.

Dinham.

C The name of this Promontorie hath given credit to a verie formall tale, That Hercules (forsooth) came into Britaine, and vanquished here I wot not what Giants. But if it be true as * Mythologers affirme, that there was never any Hercules, but that by him the power of humane wisedome is understood, whereby vvee overcome pride, lust, envie, and such like monsters: or if, according to the Gentiles divinitie, by Hercules they meane the Sunne, and by those twelve Labours, endured and performed by Hercules, the twelve signes of the Zodiak, which the Sunne in his yeerely course passeth thorow; what it is they say, let them looke to it themselves. But for mine owne part, I willingly beleeve that there was an Hercules, nay, I could be content to grant with Varro, that there were of them forty and three, all whose acts were D ascribed to that Hercules, who was the sonne of Alcmena; yet can I not perswade my selfe, that ever Hercules came hither, unlesse haply hee sailed over the Ocean in that Cup which God Nereus had given him, whereof Athenæus maketh mention. But you wil say, that Franciscus Philelphus in his Epistles, and Lilius Giraldus in his Hercules, averre no lesse. Pardon mee, I pray you; these later writers may well moove mee, but they are not able to remoove me, considering that Diodorus Siculus, who went on with the Greekish historie in order, even from the most remote, and first records of all Antiquitie, in plaine termes affirmeth, that neither Hercules, nor Father Bacchus went ever into Britaine. I am therefore verily perswaded, that the name of Hercules even to this place, came ei-
E ther through the vanitie of Greekes, or from the superstitious Religion of Britans. For, as these being a most warlike Nation themselves had valiant men in marvellous admiration, and as highly esteemed of such as vanquished Monsters: so, the Greeks againe, whatsoever was any where stately and magnificent, that they referred to the glorie of Hercules: and because hee had been a great traveller, such as travelled were wont to offer sacrifice unto him; and to him likewise consecrate the places where they first arrived. Hereof came Hercules-rocke in * Campania, Hercules Haven in * Liguria, Hercules Grove in Germanie: hence likewise, the Promontories of Hercules in Mauritania, Galatia, and Britaine.

Whether ever Hercules came into Britaine.

* Expounders of Morall Tales.

* Terra di Lavaro.

* Riviera di Genoa.

As the shore giveth backe againe from this Promontorie of Hercules, the two F Rivers, Towridge and Taw, which are the onely Rivers in this north part of the Countie, discharge themselves into the sea at one mouth. Towridge springing not farre from Herty poinct above said, runneth South-Eastward, and taking into him the river Ock, whereof Ock-hampton a little market towne tooke the name, where Baldwine the Vicount had his Castle in William the Conquerours time (as appeareth out of Domesday booke) from whom it descended to the Courtneys; suddenly turning his his chanell maketh way Northward, insulating in a maner Potheridge the Mansion of the Familie, surnamed, Monke. Happily for that some one of them being a professed Monke by dispensation to continue his house, returned to temporall state; as that Noble house in France surnamed Archevesque, that is, Archbishop, took that name to continue the memorie that one of their Progenitours of an Archbishop, returned by dispensation to be a Temporall man. Certainly, whencesoever the name came, it is antient, and they have worshipfully matched, and not long since with one of the daughters of Arthur Plantagenet, Vicount Lisle, naturall sonne to King Edward the Fourth. Hence Towridge hasteneth to Tourington, which it giveth name unto, standing over it in a great length upon the brow of a little hill: by Bediford also, a town of right good name for the frequent resort of people, & number of inhabitants, as also for a goodly stone bridge, with arched worke, where straight waies it windeth it selfe into the Taw. This Taw breaking forth out of the very midst & hart of the shire, first runneth downe by Chimligh a little market towne, not farre from Chettlehampton a small Village, where Hieryth., canonized a Shee-Saint, lay interred: from thence having passed by Taunton, where Werstane and Putta, the first Bishops of Denshire had their Sea, about the yeere of our Lord 906, and Tawstoke over against it, now the seat of the right honourable Earle of Bathe, it maketh haste to Berstaple. Reputed this is a very antient towne, and for elegant building, and frequencie of people held chiefe in all this coast, situat amidst hilles in forme of a semicircle upon the river, being as it were, a diameter. Which River, at every change and full of the Moone, by the swelling of the Ocean, overflowerh the fields so, as the very towne it selfe seemeth to be a demie Iland: but when, (as one saith) *the sea reengorgeth it selfe backe againe into the sea, it is so shallow, creeping betweene sands and shelves, as it hardly beareth smaller vessels. On the south side it hath a stately bridge built by one Stamford a citizen of London: In the North part, where North Ewe a little river or brooke runneth, are seene the reliques of a Castle, which by the common report, King Athelstane, but (as others say) Iudaël of Totenais built: for the keeping and defence whereof certaine Lands adjoyning thereabout, are held in Castlegard. It had sometimes a walll about it, but now there remaine scarse any small tokens thereof: The said Iudaël of Totenais received it in free gift in fee of King William the First: after him the Tracies held it for a long time: then the Martines: after whom in the raigne of King Richard the Second, it came to Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, who afterwards was Duke of Excester; and last of all it fell to the Crowne. But Queen Marie, gave the Mannour to Thomas Marrow, whose son sold it way. In K. William the First his daies, as we finde in Domesday booke, It had within the Burgh fortie Burgesses, and nine without. King Henrie the First, endowed it with many priviledges, and King Iohn with more. A Major, and two Bailiffes for a long time it had: but Queene Marie ordained there a Major, two Aldermen, and a Counsell of twentie and foure. The Inhabitants (for the most part) are merchants, who in France & Spain trade and traffick much. Neither must this be passed over with silence, that out of this townes-schoole, there issued two right learned men, and most renowmed divines, Iohn Iewell Bishop of Sarisburie, and Thomas Harding the publike professour in Lovain, who most hotly contended, and wrote learnedly one against the other, concerning the truth of Religion.

Digitized by Google

Poderidge.

Bediford.

John Hooker of the Bishops of Excester.

Berstaple.

Se equor refundit in equor*

Iohn Iewell.

Thomas Harding.

Ralegh.

From hence, the river Taw saluting (as it were) Ralegh, which in times past had noble Lords of that name, but now is the possession of a right worshipfull house, surnamed Chicheſter: and afterwards encreased by Towbridge water, falleth into the Severne Sea, but it meeteth not with Knwith Castle, whereof Asserius maketh mention. For, here about such a Castle there was of that name, for site of the ground about it, verie safe on everie side, save onely on the East quarter: at the which in the yeere of Christ 879. Hubba the Dane, who with many slaughters and overthrowes had harried the English Nation, was (with many other Danes) slaine. And thereupon the place afterwards was called by our Historiographers; Hubbestow. And then it was that the Englishmen wan the Danes banner, called, Reafan. Which, I note therefore Kinvith.

The Danes Banner.

Digitized by Google

A fore the rather, becauſe it may bee gathered out of a pretty tale in Aſſerius Menevenſis, who hath delivered theſe things in writing, that the Danes bare in their Enſigne a Raven wrought (by report) in needle-worke, by the daughters of Lothbroke that is, Leather-breech, the Dane, with ſuch an opinion of good lucke, as they thought that it never ſhould be wonne.

After this, nothing there is to be ſeen upon this coaſt but Ilfarcomb, a good & ſure rode for ſhips, and Comb-Marton bordering hard upon it: under which, old mines of lead, not without veines of ſilver, have of late been diſcovered. As for this word Comb, (to obſerve ſo much once for all) which is an uſuall adjection to names of pla-
B ces in this tract, it ſignifieth, a low ſituation, or a Vale: and derived it may ſeeme to be of Kum a Britiſh word, that betokeneth the ſame: and the French men in their tongue reteine it ſtill in the verie ſame ſenſe, from the antient Gallique language, the ſame with old Britiſh.

Comb, what it ſignifieth. Nicotius.

More South-East from hence, and neere unto Sommerſet ſhire Bampton, ſometimes Baentun, ſheweth it ſelfe: which under William the Conquerour befell unto Walter de Doway, with other right large and faire lands elſewhere: of whoſe poſteritie Iuliana an Inheritrix, maried to William Paganell, commonly Paynell, bare Fulk de Bampton*: and he begat William, & Chriſtian the wife of Cogan of Ireland whoſe poſteritie ſucceeded in the poſſeſſion thereof; for that the iſſue of the ſaid
C William died without children. But from the Cogans, the poſſeſſion deſcended at length hereditarily unto the Bourchiers now Earles of Bathe, by an heire of Hanford, who had married likewiſe an heire of the Lord Fitz-warin.

Bampton.

Paganelli, or Paynels. Fulconem.*

In the prime and infancie of the Normans Empire, (to ſay nothing of Hugh the Norman whom Queene Emnia had before time made Ruler over this countrey) King William the Firſt ordained one Baldwine to be the hereditarie Sheriffe, or Vicount of Denſhire, and Baron of Okehampton; after whom ſucceded in that honour Richard his ſonne, who died without iſſue male. Then, King Henry the Firſt, beſtowed upon Richard de Redverijs, Firſt Tiverton, and afterwards the honour of Plimpton with other places appertaining thereto: and conſequently created him Earle of Denſhire,*
D by granting unto him the third penie of the yerely revenues growing out of the ſame Countie. Now the revenue of the Countie which in thoſe daies was due to the King, was not above thirtie marks: out of which, the ſaid Earle tooke unto him for his part, ten markes yeerely. After this hee obtained of the ſaid King, the Iſle of Wight: whereupon ſtiled he was, Earle of Denſhire, and Lord of the Iſle. Hee had a Sonne named Baldwin, who ſiding with Maude the Empreſſe againſt K. Stephen was baniſhed the Realme. Howbeit, Richard his Sonne recovered this honour of his Fathers: and he left behinde him two Sonnes Baldwin and Richard, who in order ſucceſſively were Earles of Denſhire, and died without iſſue. The honour therefore reverted backe againe to their unkle by their fathers ſide, named, William, ſurnamed, de Vernon, becauſe
E he was there borne. This William begat Baldwin, who departed this life before his father: yet before his death, he had begotten of Margaret, daughter to Gwarin Fitz-Gerold, Baldwine the Third of that name, Earle of Denſhire. This Baldwin had two children, to wit, Baldwin the laſt Earle out of this family, that died without iſſue 1261, who changed the Ghryphon, claſping and cruſhing a little beaſt, (which mark his Anceſtours uſed in their ſeale) into a Scutcheon, or with a Lion rampant, azure, and * Iſabell, who being eſpouſed to William de Fortibus*, Earle of Albemarle, bare to him a Sonne, named Thomas, who died ſoone after, and Avellina a daughter maried to Edmund Earle of Lancaſter, whom ſhee mightily enriched, with the inheritance of her father, & died iſſueleſſe. After ſome time, King Edward the Third, by his F letter miſſive onely, without any other complement of ceremonies, created Hugh Courtney, Earle of Devonſhire, and linked as couſin and next heir to the ſaid Iſabel. For he commanded him by vertue of thoſe miſſives to uſe that title, and by a precept to the high Sheriffe of the Shire, commaunded he ſhould be ſo acknowledged. Reginald Courtney was the firſt of this family that came into England, brought hither by King Henrie the Second, and by him advanced with the mariage of the heire of Earles of Devonſhire.

Regiſter of Ford Abbey. *Redvers or Rivers.

*Called, Iſabella de Fortibus.

Clauſ. 9. Edw. tertii M. 35 in dorſo.

Digitized by Google

the Baronie of Okehampton, for that he procured the mariage betweene the ſaid King, A and Æleonor the heire of Poictu and Aquitaine. But whether hee was branched from the houſe of Courtney before it was matched in the bloud roiall of France, or after, which our Monks affirme, but Du Tillet Keeper of the Records of France doubt-eth, I may ſay ſomewhat in another place. After the firſt Earle Hugh, ſucceeded his ſonne Hugh: whom Edward his Grand-child, by Edward his Sonne followed, who died before him; and when he died, he left it to his ſonne Hugh: and hee likewiſe to Thomas his Sonne, who died in the thirtieth and ſixth yere of King Henrie the Sixth his raigne. The ſaid Thomas begat three ſonnes, namely, Thomas, Henrie, and Iohn: whoſe eſtate during the heat of thoſe mortall diſſenſions betweene the houſes B of Lancaſter and Yorke, was much toſſed and ſhaken, whiles they ſtood reſolutely and ſtiffely for the Lancaſtrians. Thomas taken at Towton field, was beheaded at Yorke: Henrie his brother, and Succeſſour ſeven yeeres after, drank of the ſame cup 9. Edward the Fourth. at Salisburie. And although King Edward the Fourth, advanced Sir Humfrey Stafford of Suthwicke to the Earldome of Denſhire, who within three moneths revolting from King Edward his advancer moſt ingratefully, was apprehended, and without proceſſe executed at Bridg-water: yet Iohn Courtney aforeſaid, the youngeſt brother, would not leave this title, but with his life, which hee loſt in the battell of Tewksburie. For a long time after, this familie lay in ſome ſort obſcured: yet under King Henrie the Seventh, it reflouriſhed: for, hee advanced againe Edward C Courtney, the next heire male unto the honors of his Progenitors. He begat William Earle of Devonſhire, who matched in wedlocke with Katherine, daughter to King Edward the Fourth: of whom he begat Henry Earle of Devonſhire, and Marqueſſe withall of Exceſter, who under King Henrie the Eighth, loſt his head, as we have now ſhewed: whoſe Sonne Edward was reſtored againe by Queene Marie, a moſt noble young Gentleman, and of paſſing good hope, but he died an untimely death at Padua in Italie: for, the beſt men (as ſaith Quadrigarius) are of leaſt continuance. In the for-1603. tieth and ſixth yeere after his death, King Iames gave the honourable title of Earle of Devonſhire, to Charles Blunt Lord Montjoye, & Lieutenant General of Ireland; which title hee affected, as deſcended from a Coſin and heire of Humfrey Stafford Earle D of Devonſhire. He was a worthy perſonage, as well for martiall proeſſe, and ornaments of learning, as for antient nobilitie of birth: for that he had recovered Ireland into the former good eſtate, by driving out the Spaniards, and by ſubduing or enforcing the Rebels to ſubmiſſion: Him (I ſay) hee created Earle of Devonſhire, him he heaped with favours, and according to the bountifull munificence of a King mightily enriched. But within a ſmall while, death envied him the fruition both of honour and wealth, which hee enjoyed as few yeeres, as his Predeceſſour Humfrey Stafford did moneths.

E

There be contained in this Countie Pariſh-Churches 394.

DVROTRI-

F

Digitized by Google

DVROTRIGES.

NExt unto the Danmonians Eastward, Ptolomee placeth in his Geographicall tables ΔΟΥΡΟΤΡΙΓΕΣ, as he wrote in Greek, who in the Latin copies are written DVROTRIGES. The same people were named by the Britans about the yeere of Salvation 890. Dwr-Gwyr, as saith mine author Asserius Menevensis, who lived in that age and was himselfe a Britan borne. The English-Saxons called them Dor-ɼettan, like as we at this day call this Country the County of Dorset and Dorset-shire. That name DVROTRIGES, being ancient and meere British, may seeme by a very good and probable Etymologie to be derived of Dovr, or Dwr, which in the British tongue signifieth Water, and of Trig, that betokeneth an inhabitant, as if a man would say, dwellers by the water or Sea-side. Neither verily from any other fountaine than from water are we to fetch those names of places in old France or Gaule, which vsed in times past the very same language that our ancient Britaine did, which either begin with Dur, and Dour, or doe end in the same; As for example, DVROCASES, DVROCOTTORVM, DVRANIVS, DORDONIA, DVROLORVM, DOROMELLVM, DIVODVRVM, BREVIODVRVM, BATAVODVRVM, GANODVDVM, OCTODVRVM, & a number of that sort, as well in Gaule as in Britaine. As for that English-Saxon word Dor-ɼetta compounded of both tongues, British & English, it carieth loe same sense & signification that DVROTRIGES doth. For, Setta with our old Forefathers, like as with the rest of the Germans, soundeth as much as to inhabite or dwell vpon. And thereof they termed mountaners in their language Dun-ɼettan: the inhabitants of the Chiltern-hilles, Cyltepn-ɼettan: the dwellers by the riuer Arow, Apop-ɼettan: euen as the Germans called the inhabitants of Woods & Forrests Holtsatten: because they dwelt within or among the woods. Neither went our Britans from the reason and meaning of the old name, when they termed these DVROTRIGES, of whom we now treat, Dwr-Gweir, that is to say, Men bordering on the Maritime or Sea-coast. For, their country lieth stretched out with a shore full of turnings or windings in and out for a long tract, to wit by the space of fiftie miles or thereabout, full upon the British sea, from West to East.

Dwr what it signifieth.

Setta what it is.

Digitized by Google

DORSET-SHIRE.

THe Countie of Dorſet as it is on the Northſide bounded with Somerſetſhire and Wiltſhire, on the Weſt with Devonſhire and ſome part of Somerſetſhire, on the Eaſt with Hamptſhire: ſo on the South part, where it carieth the greateſt length, it lieth all open to the Sea, bearing upon the Britiſh Ocean as I ſaid erewhile for fifty miles together or much thereabout. A fruitfull ſoile it is: The North part thereof being overſpred with woods and forreſts; from thence garniſhed with many a greene hill, whereon feed ſlocks of ſheepe in great number with pleaſant paſtures likwiſe and fruitfull valleis bearing corne: it hath a deſcent even to the very Sea ſhore, which in my deſcription I will follow as it leadeth me, for that I can find no better order.

Lime. In the very entrance into this, out of Denſhire the firſt place that ſheweth it ſelfe on this ſhore is Lime, a little towne ſituate upon a ſteepe hill, ſo called of a ſmall river of the ſame name running hard by: which ſcarſely may challenge the name of a Port or Haven towne though it be frequented with fiſhermen, and hath a rode under it called the Cobbe, ſufficiently defended from the force of winds with rocks and high trees. In ancient books I can hardly find any mention thereof: onely thus much I have read, that King Kinwulfe in the yeere of our Lord 774, gave (by theſe words) the land of one Manſion unto the Church of Scireburne, hard by the Werſterne banks of the river Lime, not far from the place where he hideth the courſe of his ſtreame within the Sea: to this end, that for the ſaid Church ſalt might be boiled to the ſuſtening of manifold neceſſities.

Carmouth. Neere thereunto the river Carr diſchargeth it ſelfe into the Sea, and there ſtandeth Carmouth a little village: where the bold-roving Danes having good ſucceſſe in ſea-fights, wonne two victories of the Engliſh, firſt vanquiſhed King Egbert in the yeere of Chriſt 831: and then eight yeeres after King Aethelwulfe. Then there is Burtport. Burtport, or more truly Birtport, placed betweene two ſmall rivers which there meete together: In this towne, in the daies of King Edward the Confeſſor, there were reckoned one hundred and twentie houſes, but in William the Conquerors reigne, as we find in his booke of Doomeſday, one hundred and no more. In our time in reſpect of the ſoile yeelding the beſt hemp, and skill of the people for making ropes and cables for ſhips, it was provided by a ſpeciall ſtatute, to remaine in force for a certaine ſet time, that ropes for the navie of England ſhould be twiſted no where elſe. Neither is this place able to maintaine the name of an haven, albeit in the mouth of the river being on both ſides encloſed within little hilles, nature ſeemes as it were of purpoſe to have begun an haven, and requireth in ſome ſort art and mans helpe to accompliſh the ſame.

Cheſill. From hence the ſhore winding in and out ſhooteth far into the Sea: and a banke called Cheſil of ſands heaped up thick together (with a narrow firth betweene) lieth in length for nine miles which the South-wind when it is up, commonly cutteth inſunder and diſperſeth, but the Northren wind bindeth and hardneth againe. By this

Portland. Bank or Sand-ridge, Portland, ſometime an Iland is now adjoined to the main-land: The reaſon of which name is altogether unknowen, unleſſe it were ſo called becauſe it lieth full againſt the Port Weymouth: but it ſoundeth more neere unto the truth, that this name was given it of one Port a noble Saxon, who about the yeere of our Hiſtorie of Winchester. Salvation 703. infeſted and ſore annoied theſe coaſts. This Portland in the declining ſtate of the Saxons Empire (for beforetime writers never ſpeak of it) felt as much as any other place, from time to time, the violent rage of the Danes. But when the Daniſh warre was ended, it fell to the poſſeſſion of the Church of Winchester. For, at what

A what time as Emme mother to King Edward the Confeſſor (whoſe name was called in queſtion and ſhe charged for incontinencie with Aldwin Biſhop of Wincheſter) had gone barefoot upon nine-culters red hote in Wincheſter Church without harme (an vſuall kind of triall in thoſe daies and then called Ordalium) and ſo cleered herſelfe of that imputation, that ſhe made her chaſtitie by ſo great a miracle more famous to poſterity: She for a memoriall thereof, gave nine Lordſhips to the Church of Wincheſter: and King Edward her ſonne, repenting that he had ſo wrongfully brought his mothers name into queſtion beſtowed likewiſe upon the ſaid Church this Iland with other revenues. It is in compaſſe ſcarſe ſeven miles, riſing B up about the ſides with high rocks, but lying flat and low in the mids: Inhabited ſcatteringly heere and there: plentifull enough of corne, and good to feed ſheepe: but ſo ſcant of woods, that in default of other fewell they make their fire with ox and cow dung dried. The Inhabitants, of all Engliſh-men were the cunningeſt ſlingers; and very often doe find among the weeds or reits of the ſea, Iſidis Plocamos, that is, His haire, which as Plinie reporteth out of Iuba, is a ſhrub growing in the Sea not unlike unto Corall without leafe: cut it up it turneth into a black colour, and if it fall, it ſoone breaketh. On the Eaſt-ſide it hath one onely Church, and very few houſes ſtanding cloſe thereto, and on the North a caſtle built by King Henrie the Eight, which alſo defendeth the entrance into the haven of Weimouth. A little towne this Weymouth. C is, upon the mouth of Wey a ſmall river; over againſt which on the other ſide of the bank ſtandeth Melcomb, ſurnamed Regis, that is, Kings Melcomb, divided from the other onely by the haven betweene. But the priviledges of the haven were awarded from them by ſentence of the Parliament; howbeit afterwards recovered.

Theſe ſtood both ſometimes proudly upon their owne ſeverall priviledges, and were in emulation one of another: but now (God turne it to the good of both) many they are by Authoritie of Parliament incorporated into one bodie, conjoined of late by a bridge, and growen very much greater and goodlier in buildings by ſea-aduentures than heeretofore.

From thence the ſhore ſtretcheth out directly along by the Iſle of Purbeck (as they D call it) which for a great part of it is an heath and forreit like indeed repleniſhed with Deere both red and fallow, having alſo veines of marble running skateringly heere and there under the ground. In the mids whereof, there is an old large caſtle named Corf ſeated vpon a great ſlaty hill, which after a long combat with time ſomewhat yeelded as overcome unto time, vntill of late it hath beene repaired and is a notable teſtimonie and memoriall of a Stepmothers hatred. For, Aelfrith to make way for her owne ſonne Etheldred to the Crowne, when Edward her ſonne in law King of England, came to viſite her in this caſtle from his diſport of hunting, ſet ſome villanes and hackſters to murder him, and like a moſt wicked Stepdame fed her eies with his bloud. For which deed repenting herſelfe when it was too late, ſhe ſought afterward E meruellouſly to waſh out that ſinfull ſtaine, by taking her ſelfe to the mantle thring, in the habite of an holy Votarie, and to building religious houſes. This Purbeck is called an Iſle, although it be onely a Demy Iland, compaſſed round about with the ſea, ſave onely on the Weſt-ſide: For, on the Eaſt, the ſea bendeth the banks inward and breaking in at a very narrow ſtreight betweene the two ſhores (againſt which a ſmall Iſle with a block houſe called Brenſey ſtandeth) maketh a broad and wide bay. On the North ſide wherof in the ſaid Biland, there ſtanding over it the towne Poole, ſo as it is wholly environed with waters except it be on the North-ſide, where it cloſeth with the continent & hath one gate and no more leading into it. We may well think it ſo named, becauſe that bay aforeſaid lying under it, in calme weather when the waters be ſtil F reſembleth a pond, ſuch as we call a poole in our language. This of a Sedgeplot, & of a few fiſhermens cotages, in the laſt foregoing age, grew to be a mercate town exceeding rich & wealthy, beautified alſo with goodly houſes: and King Henrie the Sixth by conſent of the Parliament granted unto it the priviledges of a port or haven towne which he had taken from Melcomb, and licenſed the Major thereof, to wall it about: which worke afterward was begun at the haven, by King Richard the Third, a prince

A ſtepdames hatred, that is, her husbands ſonne.

Digitized by Google

who deserved to be rancked among the worst men and the best Kings. But ever since A that time, by what fatall destinie, I know not, or rather through the idlenesse and sloth of the townesmen, it is decaied: in so much as for want of inhabi tation, the very houses at this day, runne to ruine. Into the West Angle of this Bay falleth the greatest and most famous river of all this tract; commonly called Frome, but the English-Saxons, as witnesseth Asserius, named it Frau; whereupon perhaps, for that this Bay was in old time called Fraumouth, the posterity ensuing tooke the rivers name to be Frome. The head thereof is at Euarshot neere unto the West limit of this shire: From whence he taketh his course Eastward by Frompton, whereto it gave the name, and from the North receiveth a little river running downe by Cerne Ab-bay: which Augustine the Apostle of the English nation built, when he had broken B there in peeces, * Heil the Idol of the heathen English-Saxons, and chased away the fog of paganish superstition. Here was first bred among the religious men (as I have read) Iohn Morton Cardinall and Archbishop of Canterbury borne at S. Andrews Milborn, worthily aduanced to so high places for his good service in working Englands happines by the vnion of the two houses of Lancaster and York; and of this familie there hath issued both R. Bishop of Worcester, and many gentlemen of very good note in this country and elsewhere. Under this somewhat lower, the Frau or Frome (chuse whether you will) maketh an Iland, and so goeth to see that most ancient towne [Dorchester] which in Antoninus his Itinerarium is termed DVRNOVARIA C that is, the river Passage or Ferry, and seemeth in Ptolomee to be named untruly, in sundry copies DVRNIVM and DVNIVM. This is the head towne of the whole Shire, and yet is neither great nor beautifull, being long since despoiled of the walls by the Danes, who raised as it is thought certaine trenches; whereof one is called Maum-bury being an acre indiched, an other Poundbury somewhat greater: and the third a mile off as a camp, with fiue trenches containing some ten acres, called Maiden-castle, which a man may easily coniecture to have beene a summer station or campe of the Romanes. But of her antiquity it sheweth daily expresse tokens, namely the Romane causey of the Fosse high way, and coine of the Romanes both copper and silver found there, and especially at Fordington hard by which the common people there, D call King Dorn his pence, whom by some allusion to the name, they dreame full sweetly, to have beene the founder of the towne. It had anciently a castle in that place where the Grey-friers built their Convent out of the ruines thereof, and hath now but three parish Churches, whereas the compasse of the old towne seemeth to have been very large. But the most grievous hurt that it tooke, was when Sueno the Dane had in most outrageous crueltie renewed the Danish warre: and Hush the Norman who ruled these countries a man of a perfidious and treacherous mind, suffered all to be spoiled and harried. But in what estate it stood soone after the Normans first comming in, take knowledge if it please you, out of Domesday booke being the Survey of England. In King Edwards daies there were in Dorchester 170. E houses, and these for all the Kings service discharged themselves, and paid according to ten Hides: but to the vse of Houscarles one marke of silver, excepting the customes which pertaine ad firmam noctis, that is, to the entertainment of the King for one night. There were in it two Mint Maisters. Now there be therein but 82. houses: and one hundred have beene utterly destroyed since the time of Sheriffe Hugh. If these termes seeme to be very obscure (as Sextus Cecilus said in the like matter) impute it not to the fault of the writers, but to their ignorance who cannot conceive the meaning.

From hence Frome runneth by Woodford, where in old time Guy Brient a Baron and renowned warriour had a little Castle of his owne: which afterward was the ha- F bitation of Hugh Stafford of Suthwick; by one of whose daughters Inheretrices, it came as I have heard to Thomas Strangwaies, who being borne in Lancashire and brought hither by the first Marques Dorset obtained a great and rich inheritance in these parts, and his issue built a very faire house at Milbery. Then holdeth he on his course besids Byndon, in the Saxon tongue Beandun, which also had a monasterie, where Kinegilsus in the yeere 614. in a doubtfull and dangerous battell vanquished
the

* Good health.

Morton.

Strangwaies.

Digitized by Google

A the Britans. Not long since it was the seat of the Lord Marney: now it giveth the honourable title of Vicount unto the Lord Thomas Howard Knight of the order of S. George: whose father Thomas the second sonne of Thomas Howard, the second of that name Duke of Norfolk, Queene Elizabeth created Vicount Howard of Bindon, when he having matched in mariage with the daughter and heire of Baron Marney, was seized heere of a very great inheritance of the Newborows. These who were anciently named de Novo Burgo and commonly Newboroughs, derive there pedigree from a younger sonne of Henrie the First, Earle of Warwick of the Norman line: and held heere Winfrott, with the whole Hundred of the gift of King Henry the First, per servitium Camerarij (these be the words out of the booke of the Offices) in Capite B de Domino Rege: that is, by service of Chamberlaine, in Chef, from our soueraigne Lord the King. But under Edward the Third I have read, that this was held by Sergeantie, namely, by holding the Laver or Ewre for the King his soveraigne Lord to wash, upon his Coronation day. Also Raulph Moien held the Manor, of Owres neere adioining by service of Serieantie in the Kitchin, of the gift likewise of King Henrie the First: and R. de Welles the Manor of Welles heereabout, since the conquest of England, by the service of the Kings Baker. Which I note, onely by the way.

Bindon.

Newborough.

Grand-Sergeanties.

C Where Frome maketh his issue into that Bay, whereupon Poole is situate, hard by the very mouth is planted Warham, in the Saxon tongue Weapeham, a towne strongly seated on every side but Westward, as being fensed on all parts beside, with the rivers Trent, Frome, and the sea together: In King Edward the Confessors time, it had two Mint maisters: but whiles William the Conqueror reigned it could not recken above seuen dwelling houses in it. Yet afterwards it flourished againe, fortified with the wall, furnished with a mint house, a great number of inhabitants and a most strong castle, which that same William the first built it, continued in a most flourishing state untill the daies of King Henrie the Second, who when he came to challenge the Crowne of England in the yeere 1142, hee arriued heere, besie-D ged and tooke the castle which was defended by Robert Lacy, against him in behalfe of King Stephen, and afterward Robert of Lincolne a man of mighty possessions in these parts defended the same against King Stephen. But from that time, by occasion partly of wars, and partly of sudden casualty by fires, by reason also that the sea by little and little with draweth the commodity of an haven, it is almost run to ruine: and in the very heart of the old towne it bringeth forth store of garlick. At this mouth likewise is discharged another small river with Frome, Asserius calleth it Trent, but now the inhabitants thereby name it Piddle: From the North bank whereof scarse three miles off I saw the same ruins of Middleton Abbay, which King Athelstane founded as a satisfaction to appease the ghost and soule of his brother Edwine, whom he E had deprived both of his Kingdome and life. For when that sollicitous desire of reigning had caused him quite to forget all Iustice, he put the young Prince heire apparent to the crowne, with one page, into a little whirrey without any tackling or furniture thereto, to the end he might impute his wickednesse to the waves. And so the young Prince ouercome with griefe of heart and vnable to master his owne passions, cast himselfe headlong into the sea. Under this Middleton, there is voided also another river, which runneth hard by Bere a little mercate towne, where for a long time, that ancient and famous family de Turbida villa, commonly, Turbervill had their chiefe habitation, whereof as some were famous, so Hugh Turbervill in the time of King Edward the First was infamous for his traiterous practises with the French.

Middleton.

F But to go back againe to the West part of the shire: At the spring head of Frome, where the soile is most fruitfull, the forrest of Blackmore sometimes thick and full of trees, but now thinner growen, yeeldeth plentifull gaine for hunting. Thus by a more common and better knowen name is called The Forrest of white hart. The reason of which name, the inhabitants by tradition from their forefathers report to be thus. When King Henrie the Third came hither to hunt, and had taken other Deere, he spared a most beautifull and goodly White-hart, which afterwards T. de la-Lynde a gentleman of this countrey with others in his companie tooke and killed: but Forrest of White-hart.

Digitized by Google

but how perillous a matter it was to be twitching (as they say) of a lion they soone found and felt. For the King conceived great indignation and high displeasure against them, put them to a grievous fine of money for it, and the very lands which they held pay even to this day every yeere by way of amercement a peece of money into the Exchequer, which is called White hart silver. There joineth neere to this forrest Shirburn towne, named also Shirburne Castle, in old time Scipebupn, which by interpretation is Fons Limpidus, or as it is else where written Fons clarus, that is, Pure fountaine or cleere well, sited on the hanging of an hill, a pleasant and proper seat, as William of Malmesbury saith, as well for the frequent number of inhabitants, as the situation: and now it is the most populous and best hanted towne of all this countrey, and gaineth exceeding much by clothing. In the yeere of our redemption 704, an Episcopall seat was heere erected and Aldelme the first Bishop there consecrated: afterwards also in the reigne of Etheldred, Herman the Bishop of Sunning, having obtained this Bishoprick, translated his Episcopall see hither, and joined the said Bishoprick of Sunning unto this, which under William Conqueror the same Bishop translated to Sarisbury and reserved Shirburne to be a retiring place for his Successors, unto whom it belongeth as yet: And one of them, namely Roger, built a strong castle in the East part thereof, under which lay sometime a wide meere and many fish pooles: and now being filled up are converted into most pleasant and rich medow ground. As for the Cathedrall Church, presently upon the translation of the See, it became a monasterie againe, and beareth shew of great antiquity, although not manie yeres past, in a broile betweene the townesmen and the Monks it was fired: which the burnt and skorched colour upon the stones doth as yet most evidently shew. Under this, the river Iuell, whereof I will speake some where else, winding in and out with many curving reaches, runneth Westward to Chiston, the seat sometime of the linage de Maulbauch, from which it descended hereditarily unto the familie of the Horseies, Knights, where it entreth into Sommersetshire.

White hart silver.

Shirburne.

Chiston.

More toward the East the most famous river Stoure passing full of tenches and Eeles especially, arising in Wiltshire out of six fountaines commeth downe to Stourton, the honor and seat of the Barons of Stourton. So soone as it is entred into this Shire it passeth thorow Gillingham forrest, in which Edmund surnamed Iron-side in a memorable battell put the Danes to flight: and three miles from thence saluteth Shaftsbury standing upon an hill top, very defective of water, sometimes called by the Britans as it is commonly, but falsly thought, Caer Paladur, and in Latine by later writers Septonia: by the Saxons Sceaftebyrig, perhaps of the Churches Spire steeple, such as they termed Scheafts. A little before the Normans time it had in it 104. houses, and three Mint masters, as we read in that *booke so often by me alleadged. And afterwards, it flourished the more, by reason of a Nunnerie which Elfgiua a most godly and devout Ladie, wife to Edmund that was King Aelfrids nephews sonne had erected, and of ten parish Churches besides, or there about. But most famous is this place, by occasion of a prety fable that our Historians doe report of Aquila propheſing here of the conversion or change of the Britans Empire: For, some will have the bird, Aquila, that is, an Aegle, others a man so named to have foretold heere, that the British Empire after tha Saxons and Normans should returne againe to the ancient Britans: and these men affirme and maintain that this place is of greater antiquity than Saturne himselfe, whereas most certaine it is, that it was first built by Alfred. For, the Historiographer of Malmesburie hath recorded, that in his daies there was an old storie translated from the ruines of the wall into the Chapter house of the Nuns, which had this Inscription:

Shaftsbury.

*Domesday.

The prophecie of Aquila.

ANNO

ANNO DOMINICAE INCARNATIONIS AELFREDVS REX FECIT HANC VRBEM. DCCC. LXXX. REGNI SVI VIII.

That is,

In the yeere of the incarnation of our Lord, King Aelfred built this City, 880: of his reigne the eighth.

B This inscription I have the more willingly put downe heere for proofe of the Truth, because in all the copies which I have seen it is wanting, save only in that in the Librarie of the late Lord Burghley, high treasurer of England, and I have beene enformed that it continued there vntil the time of King Henrie the Eighth. Yet the inhabitants haue a tradition that an old Citie stood vpon the place which is called the Castle-Greene, and by some Bolt-bury; now a faire plaine so sited that as of one side it ioineth to the Towne, so of another it is a strange sight to looke downe to the vale vnder it: whereby in the West end of the old Chapell of S. Iohn, as I heare now, standeth a Roman inscription reuersed. From thence the Stoure, by Marnhill, of which place L. C Henrie Howard brother of Thomas last Duke of Norfolk receaued of King Iames the title of Baron Howard, of Marnhill, before that he was created Earle of Northampton, makes speed to Stourminster, which is as much to say, as the Monasterie or Minster upon Stoure. A small towne this is, standing somewhat with the lowest: from which there is a stone bridge built reaching to Newton Castle; where offreth it selfe to be seene a loftie mount cast up (as they say) to that heigth with great labour, but of the Castle there remaineth nothing at all, but onely the bare name. Of these, I have nothing of more antiquitie to say than this, that King Aelfred bequeathed Stourminster to a younger sonne of his. Hard by, at Silleston there rise two good great hilles, the one named Hameldon the other Hodde, and both of them fortified with a D three fold Dich and rampier. And not far from thence (but the very place I cannot precisely set downe) stood Okeford, the Capitall honour of the Barenie of Robert, the sonne of Pagan, commonly named Fitz-Payne, who maried the daughter of Guido de Brient, who also in this West part enjoied the honor of a Baron vnder King Edward the Third: but for default of heires males of those Fitz-Paynes, it came to the Poinings, Barons likewise in those daies, and at length by a daughter and heire of Poinings in the reigne of Henrie the Sixth, these Barons titles, Fitz-payne, Brient, and Poinings were conjoined in the Percies Earles of Northumberland: Howbeit within our fathers remembrance through the favour of King Henrie the Eighth, the title of Baron Poinings, reflourished in Sir Thomas Poinings, sonne of Sir Edward Poinings E a martiall man and fruitfull father of much base brood; but with him it soone vanished away, (as bastardly slips seldome take deepe root.)

Barons Fitz-Payne.

Baron Brient.

Barons Poynings.

From hence Stoure passeth on by Brienston, that is, Brients towne, where the Rogerses dwelleth, an ancient familie of Knights degree, to Market Blandford, which since in our time it chanced to be burnt downe, arose againe, built more elegantly, and is better peopled with inhabitants. Then Stoure from thence, by Tarrent, where Richard Poer Bishop of Sarisbury founded a Cell, for Virgins Votaries, speedeth himselfe a pace to that most ancient towne VINDOGLADIA, whereof Antoninus maketh mention. Which in the Saxons tongue is called pynburnham, commonly Winbarne, and of the Monasterie, Winburnminster: and from hence to Dorchester are F counted sixteene miles just so many as the Emperour Antonine in his Itinerarie reckoneth betweene Vindogladia and Durnovaria. The name, as I conjecture, it taketh of the situation, because it is seated betweene two rivers: for, so in the British tongue Windugledy soundeth as much as betweene two Swords: now that the Britans, by a peculiar phrase of their owne, terme rivers, Swords, it appeareth by Aberdugledian, the British name of Milford Haven, which is as much to say, as the mouth of two rivers, for that two rivers named with them Gledian, that is, Swords, run into it. The Blandford.

Vindogladia.

Winburne.

latter

Digitized by Google

latter name also of this town seemeth to be fet from Rivers: For Winburn is compounded of Vin, a parcel of the old name, & the Saxon word Burne, which among them betokeneth a river: and by the addition thereof the Saxons were wont to name places standing upon rivers. The very town it selfe is seated upon the peece of an hill large in compasse, & repleniſhed with inhabitants, but few faire buildings. In the Saxons time right famous it was and much frequented for no other cause, I beleeve, but for that in those daies there remained divers tokens of the Romans majestie. In the yeere 713, Cuthburga sister to Ina King of the West-Saxons, when upon a lothing wearinesse of wedlock she had sued out a Divorce from her owne husband King of Northumberland, built heere a Nunnerie: which yeelding unto the injurie of time, and fallen to decay, there arose in the very place thereof, a new Church with a faire Vault beneath under the quire, and an high spire besides the Toure-steeple. In which were placed Prebendaries in liew of those Nuns. Over whom, in our fathers daies Reginal pole was Deane, who afterwards being Cardinal and Archbishop of Canturbury, over and above the nobilitie of his house (for descended he was of the roiall bloud) became highly renowmed for pietie, wisdome & eloquence. King Etheldred a right good and vertuous Prince brother of Aelfred, slaine in the battell at Wittingham against the Danes, lieth enterred in this Church: upon whose tombe, which not long since hath beene repaired, this new Inscription is to be read:

Burne in the Saxon tongue what it signifieth.

Annales of the English-Saxons.

IN HOC LOCO QVIESCIT CORPVS S. ETHELDREDI REGIS WEST SAXONVM MARTYRIS, QVI ANNO DOMINI DCCCLXXII. XXIII. APRILIS PER MANVS DANORVM PAGANORVM OCCVBVIT.

That is,

Heere lieth at rest the bodie of Etheldred King of the West-Saxons, Martyr, who died in the yeere of our Lord. 872, the 23. of April, by the hands of the Danes, *Infidels.

*Or Painims: Paganorum.

Neere unto whom lieth entombed Gertrude Blunt Marchioness of Excester, daughter to William Lord Montioy, and mother to Edward Courtney the last Earle of Devonshire of that house: and on the other side of the quire Iohn de Beaufort Duke of Somerset with his wife Margaret daughter and heire to Sir Iohn Beauchamp of Bletneshoe: whose daughter Margaret Countesse of Richmond, and mother of King Henrie the Seuenth, a most godly and verteous princesse, erected a schoole heere for the training up of youth. But now will I turne my pen from the Church to the towne: when the Danes by their crafty devices went about to set the Englishmen together by the eares, and would have broken that league and unitie which was betweene King Edward the Elder and his cosen Aethelwald; Aethelwald then lusting after the Kingdome and wholly set against his liege Prince, fortified this towne as strongly as possibly he could: But so soone as Edward came towards him with his forces, and pitched his tents at Baſſan-bipig, now called Badbury, he fled & conveied himselfe to his confederates the Danes. This Badbury is a little hill vpon a faire downe, scarce two miles off, environed about with a triple trench and rampire, and had by report in times past a castle, which was the seat of the West-Saxon Kings: But now, if ever there were any such, it lieth so buried in the owne ruines and rubbish, that I could see not so much as one token thereof. Mary, hard by, a sight I had of a village or mannor called Kingston Lacie, because together with Winburne it appertained to the Lacies Earles of Lincoln: unto whom by covenant it came from the Earles of Leicester, by the meanes of Quincie Earle of Wincheſter. For King Henry the First had given it to Robert Earle of Mellent and of Leicester: and at the last, both places, from the Lacies fell unto the house of Lancaster, whose bounty and liberality Winburne had good triall of.

Badbury.

Kingston Lacy.

From this Winburne Stoure as it passeth, admitteth Alen a little brook, over which standeth

A ſtandeth S. Giles Winburne, the habitation of the worſhipfull and ancient houſe of Aſtleys Knights, alſo Wickhampton, the inheritance ſometime of the Barons de Maltravers: of whom the laſt, in the reigne of Edward the Third, left behind him two daughters onely, the one wedded unto Iohn de Arundell, grandfather to Iohn Earle of Arundell, who left unto his poſterity the title of Barons de Maltravers: the other, wife of Robert Le-Rous, and afterwards of Sir Iohn Keines, Knight. From hence the Stoure paſſeth on by Canford, under which not long ago, Iames Lord Montjoy ſtudious in Minerall matters began to make Calcanthum or Vitriol (we call it Coperas) and to boile Alume: And out of which, in old time Iohn Earle of Warren, to B the great diſteining of his owne good name and the damage of England, tooke, as it were, by ſtrong hand and caried away, as it is to be ſeene in our Chronicles, Dame Alice Lacey, the wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter. And now by this time Stoure leaveth Dorſetſhire behind him, and after he hath travelled thorow ſome part of Hantſhire, at length taketh up his lodging in the Ocean: and yet not before he hath entertained a prety river that runneth to Cranburne, a place well watered. Where in the yeere of Salvation 930 Aelward a noble gentleman, ſurnamed for his whiteneſſe Meaw, founded a little monaſterie: which, Robert Fitz-Haimon a Norman, unto whom fell the poſſeſſions of the ſaid Aelward, leaving heere one or two monks in a cell, tranſlated to Theoksbury: From whom in order of ſucceſſion, by the Clares Earles
C of Gloceſter, and Burghs Earles of Ulſter, it came to Lionell Duke of Clarence, and by him to the Crowne. But now Cranborn hath his Vicount, now Earle of Salisbury, whom King Iames for his approved wiſdome and worth, honored firſt with the title of Baron or Lord Cecil of Eſſendon, and the next yeere after, of Vicount Cranborne. South from hence lieth Woodland emparked, ſometime the ſeat of the worſhipfull familie of Filioll, the heires whereof were maried to Edward Seimor after Duke of Somerſet, and Willoughby of Wallaton.

Canford. Coperoſe or Vitriol. Alum. Th. Walſingham. 1317. Cranburn. Vicount Cranborn. 1604. Filioll.

As touching the Earles and Marqueſſes of this ſhire, King William the Conqueror, having now by conqueſt attained to the Kingdome of England, made Oſmund that was Earle of Seez in Normandie, both Biſhop of Sarisburie, and afterward alſo the D firſt Earle of Dorſet, and his Chancellor; highly admiring the godly wiſedome of the man and his notable good parts. Long after that, King Richard the Second in the one and twentieth yeere of his reigne, advanced Iohn de Beaufort, Iohn of Gaunt his ſonne and Earle of Somerſet, to be Marqueſſe Dorſet, of which dignity King Henrie the Fourth in hatred of Richard the Second deprived him. And when as in the high Court of Parliament, the Commons of England there aſſembled, who loved him very deerely, made earneſt interceſſion that the ſaid dignity of Marqueſſe might be reſtored unto him, hee himſelfe diſtaſting this new title and never heard of before thoſe daies, utterly refuſed it. And then his younger brother named Thomas Beaufort was created Earle of Dorſet: who afterward for his warlick proeſſe and valour
E was by King Henrie the Fifth adorned with the title of Duke of Exceſter, & with the Earledome of * Harcourt. For, he valiantly defended Harflew in Normandie againſt the Frenchmen, and in a pitched field encountring the Earle of Armignac put him to flight. After he was dead without iſſue, King Henrie the Sixth nominated out of the ſame houſe of Lancaſter, Edmund, firſt Earle, afterwards Marqueſſe Dorſet, and laſtly Duke of Somerſet: whoſe ſonnes being ſlaine in the civill wars, Edward the Fourth, when as now the familie of Lancaſter lay as it were ouer troden in the duſt, created Thomas Grey out of the houſe of Ruthin, who was his ſonne in law (for the King had eſpouſed the mother of the ſaid Grey) Marqueſſe Dorſet: when in right of his wife he had entred upon a great ſtate and inheritance of the Bonvilles in this coun-
F try and the territories adjoining. After him, ſucceeded in the ſame honor Thomas his ſonne, and Henrie his nephew, by the ſaid Thomas, who alſo was created by King Edward the Sixth Duke of Suffolk, having wedded Lady Francis daughter of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and neece unto King Henrie the Eighth by his ſiſter. This Duke in Queene Maries daies being put to death for high treaſon, learned too late, how dangerous a thing it is to marie into the bloud roiall; and to feed ambitious Earles and Marqueſſes of Dorſet. The life of Oſmund, manuſcript. See the Dukes of Somerſet. p. 239. * In Normandie. 1553.

Digitized by Google

ambitious hopes, both in himself and in others. From that time the title of Dorset was bestowed upon none, untill King Iames at his first entrance into this Kingdome, exalted Thomas Sackuill; Baron of Buckhurst, and Lord high Treasurer of England; a man of rare wisdome and most careful providence, to the honor of Earle of Dorset, who ended his life with suddaine death 1608. and left Robert his sonne his successor who deceasing within the yeere, left the said honor againe to Richard his hopefull sonne whom he begot of the Lady Margaret Howard Daughter to the late Duke of Norfolk.

A

B

In this County are numbred Parishes 248.

Digitized by Google

BELGAE.

VPon the North and East side of the Durotriges, bordered in times past the Belgæ, who as it is by the name probable, and by authority of writers very likely, passed over from the Belgæ, a people in Gaule, into Britaine. For, those Belgæ having their beginning (as Cæsar according to the information he had from the men of Rhemes) of the Germans, and in old time being brought over the Rhene, finding the sweetnesse and fertility of the place, expelled the Gaules and planted themselves there: From whence, as the same Cæsar saith, they gat them over into Britaine for to spoile, and in warlicke manner to invade the country: and were all of them called after the name of those countries from whence they came: where, after they had made warre they remained and began to till the grounds. But at what time they came hither to dwell, it is not certainly knowen, unlesse Divitiacus King of the Suessones, who flourished before Cæsars time, brought over the Belgæ hither: For, a great part as well of Gaule as of Britaine he had under him. Whence also they were named Belgæ, it is not sufficiently shewed. Hubert Thomas of Liege, a great learned man, supposed Belgæ to be a German word, for that the Germans use to call the French and the Italians Wallen, as strangers, yea and some of them Welgen. Iohn Goropius, himselfe a Belgian, maintaineth it to be derived of the word Belke, which in the Belgicke tongue signifieth wrath or anger, as if they would be sooner incensed with choler than others. But seeing that the name of the Belgæ, seemeth not to be sought for out of that tongue which the Germans of the Lowcountries use at this day, and is almost the same that our English-Saxon language (for from the Saxons it came, whom Charles the Great brought over into Brabant & Flanders) for my part I will in no wise diminish their credit, who fetch it forth of the ancient Gaules tongue, which remaineth in maner uncorrupt among our Welch-Britans, and will have them called Belgæ of Pell, which in that tongue betokeneth Remote or far off. For, of all Gaule they were the furthest, and as they were furthest from the civil behaviour and humanity of the Roman Province, so they were also in situation and seat: and the Poet hath shewed that the Morini were the people of all Belgica most remote, when he wrote thus: Extremiq; hominum Morini, that is; The Morini of all men furthest. But come we now to our Belgæ, who inhabited far and wide in Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and the inner parts of Hantshire.

Belgæ, from the Belgæ in Gaule. Lowcountries. The Nether Lands.

Belgæ, whence they were named.

Digitized by Google

A

SOMERSETSHIRE.

THe Countie of Somerset, commonly called, Somersetshire, is a verie large and wealthy Region: the North side wherof the Severn Sea beateth upon: the West part confineth with Denshire: in the South it bordereth first upon Devonshire, and then upon Dorsetshire: Eastward, upon Wiltshire: and North-east upon part of Glocestershire. The Soile verie rich, yeelding for the most part thereof passing great plentie, both of pasture and corne, and yet not without stonie hilles: Exceeding populous, and full of Inhabitants: furnished also with commodious havens, and ports sufficiently. Some thinke it was so called, for that the * aire there, is so mild and summer-like: and in that sense the Welch Britans at this day terme it Gladerhaf, borrowing that name out of our English tongue. And verily, howsoever in summer time it is a right summer-like Country, yet surely, in winter it may worthily be called, a winterish Region, so wet, and weely, so miry and mooriſh it is, to the exceeding great trouble and encombrance of those that travell in it. But I will beleeve, that this name without all question grew from Somerton, a famous towne in ancient time, and of all others in the shire most frequented, considering that Asserius a writer of great antiquitie, calleth this Countie in every place, Somertunensis, that is, Somertunshire. In the very first limit of the shire West-ward, where Ex riseth in a solitarie and hilly moore, first appeareth Dulverton, a silly market, according to the soile, and neere unto it was a small religious house of Black-chanons at Barelinch, who in latter times acknowledged the Fetyplaces their founders.

B

C

*Or, weather.

Higher upward on the Severne side, where this shire confineth upon Devonshire, first wee meet with Porlock, (in the English-Saxon tongue Porpolocan, and Watchet) in times past Wecedpoort, roades both, and harbours for ships, the which in the yeere 886. were most grievously afflicted by the Danish cruell piracies Betwixt them standeth Dunster Castle upon a flat and low ground, enclosed round about with hilles, saving to the Sea-ward; built by the Moions, or Mohuns. From whose heires by agreements and compositions it came in the end to the Lutterels. A right noble and mightie house this of the Mohuns was for a long time, and flourished from the verie Conquerours daies, (under whose raigne that Castle was built,) unto the time of King Richard the Second. Two Earles there were of this Countie out of that familie, as I shall shew hereafter, William and Reginald, who in the Barons warre lost that honour. The Posteritie afterwards were reputed Barons: of whom the last named Iohn, left three daughters, Philip wife to Edward Duke of Yorke; Elizabeth, wedded to William Montacute, Earle of Sarisburie, the second of that name; and Maud, joyned in mariage to the Lord Strange of Knokin: The Mother of which three Ladies, as the report goes, obtained of her husband so much pasture-ground in Common by the towne side for the benefit of the inhabitants, as shee could goe about in one day barefoot.

D

E

Denshire.

Dunster Castle.

The Familie of the Mohuns, or Moions.

son to Edmond de Langley.

Commons.

Neere to this Castle, there lie two little Villages consecrate unto two peculiar Saints of those places: the one of them is named Caranton, of Carantoc the Britan: the other, Saint Decombs of Decuman; who putting to sea out of Southwales arrived here, in a waste and Desert Wilderneſſe, as we read, in an old * Agonel, overgrowen with shrubs, bushes, and briers, among woods of great thickneſſe, reaching out farre in length and bredth, lying out with high and ſteepe hilles one way, and wonderfully uneven with as deepe and hollow vales another way, where he bidding worldly vanity farewell, was by a murderer stabbed to death, and of the people honoured as a Saint. And betweene these Clives, was an old Abbey of white Monkes, founded by William de Romara, Cosin to the Earle of Lincolne. Somewhat farther from the sea

F

Saint Decumanus.

* Or, Martyrologe, that is, a legend of Martyrs.

Digitized by Google

A ea is ſeated Stoke-Curcy, a Barony ſo named of the Lords therof; the dwelling place of William De Curcy, Sewer to King Henrie the Firſt. Out of which Familie, Iohn Curcy (as ſome write) iſſued, that conquered Vlſter in Ireland; whom nature framed for magnanimitie, gravitie, and all other vertues, a great perſon and a noble: the record and teſtimonie of whoſe approoved valour, is to bee fetched out of the antient Annals of Ireland. From thence the ſhore by little and little beareth out to Stertpoint, where the two greateſt Rivers of all this Shire, meeting in confluence together, at one mouth runne forth into the Severne ſea. Ptolomee calleth this confluence Uzella Aeſtuarium, of the river Ivel, which now hath loſt his name alreadie before he came hither. It ſpringeth in Dorſetſhire, and no ſooner entreth into Somerſetſhire, but he giveth name to Evel a great market towne, which roſe by the decay of Ilcheſter, and taketh into him a rill, neere which is Camalet a ſteepe hill, and hard to get up: on the top whereof are to bee ſeene expreſſe tokens of a decayed Caſtle, with triple rampires of earth caſt up, encloſing within it many acres of ground; (and there appeare about the hill five or ſix ditches, ſo ſteepe, that a man ſhall ſooner ſlide downe, than goe downe.) The Inhabitants name it, King Arthurs Palace: That it was the Romans worke, appeareth by peeces of money of their coine daily digged out there. But what name it had among them, I know not, unleſſe it be the ſame which in Ninnius his Catalogue of antient Cities, is called Caer Calemion, in ſtead of Camelion, by tranſpoſition of the letters. Hereby are two townes, Weſt Camalet, and Eaſt Camalet, or Queens Camalet, happily for that it hath been in dowrie to ſome Queene. As for Cadburie a little towne next unto it, we may gheſſe verie probably to have been that Cathbregion, where K. Arthur, (as Ninnius writeth) defeated the Engliſh-Saxons in a memorable battell. The other of that name, called, North Cadbury, K. Henry the Third, gave unto Nicolas de Moeles, who had maried * Hawiſia, one of the heires of Iames of Newmarket, whoſe poſteritie continued a long time in great fame and honour, untill that Iohn dying in the time of Edward the Third, left two daughters, Muriel and Iſabel; the one wife to William Botereaux, and the former to Thomas Courtney. Here to digreſſe aſide from the River Ivel, Winecaun- 17 56.
D ton, no meane market, is neighbour to this North Cadbury, and neere thereunto is Pen, an obſcure village now, but antiently famous, being ordained by deſtinie as it may ſeeme to the overthrow both of Britans and Danes. For at this verie place Keniwalch a Weſt Saxon, had ſuch a day of the Britans, that they would ſcarſely ever after abide to come into the field againſt the Engliſh-Saxons. And many a yeere after that, King Edmund ſurnamed Iron-ſide, gave there a notable foile to the Danes, as he purſued Canutus their King, then uſurping the Crowne of England from place to place. The houſe of Lorty, called in Latine Records, de Vrtiaco, was great hereabout, poſſeſſing Stoke Triske, Cocklington, and other Mannours, and Henrie Lorty of this houſe, was ſummoned a Baron to the Parliament, in the time of King
E Edward the Firſt.

Now to returne: the river Ivel from hence runneth to Ischalis, mentioned by Ptolomee, now Ivelceſter: named in the Catalogue of Ninnius (if I be not deceived) Pontavel Coit, for Pont-Ivel Coit, that is, Ivel bridge in the wood: by Florentius of Worceſter, Givelceſter: at this day of ſmall account, but onely for the antiquitie, and the market there kept: for, peeces of the Roman Cæſars, or Emperours money, of gold, *braſſe, and ſilver, are other whiles here digged up. That in old time it had been a great towne, and on ſome ſides ſtrengthned with a double wall, the ruines declare, and two towers upon the Bridge. About the time of the Normans comming in, well peopled it was, and much frequented: For, reckoned there were in it one hundred F and ſeven Burgeſſes. A ſure place alſo in thoſe daies, and well fortified: for in the yeere of Grace 1088, when the Nobles of England had conſpired and plotted againſt King William Rufus, to put him down, and ſet up his brother Robert Duke of Normandie in his Roiall throne, Robert Mowbray a warlike man, having burnt Bathe, forcibly aſſaulted this towne, but with loſt labour; yet, what hee could not doe then, long proceſſe of time hath now partly effected, and in ſome ſort over-maſtred it.

The Familie of the Curcies. Iohn de Curcie.

Uzella.

Evell.

Camalet.

Cadburie.

Moeles. * Avis. De novo Mercato.

Vinecauntón Pen.

Lorty, Baron de Vrtiaco.

Iſchalis. Ivelceſter, commonly, Ilcheſter.

* Or, Copper.

Digitized by Google

A little beneath, by Langport a proper market town, the Rivers Ivel and Pedred running together, make betweene them an Iland, called Muchelney, that is to say, The great Iland, wherein are to be seene the defaced walles and ruines of an old Abbey, built by King Athelſtane, as writers report. This Pedred, commonly named Parret, hath his beginning in the verie edge or skirt of the ſhire ſouthward, and holding on a crooked and winding courſe thorow Crockherne, in the Saxon tongue, Cnuecepne, and Pedderton, to whom it gave the name, ſometime Pedridan, the Roiall ſeat of King Ina, (which towne now adaies is of none account, unleſſe it be for the market, and Faire there held, which Henrie Daubeney obtained of King Henrie the Sixth) at this place runneth into Ivel, and robbeth him of his name, when hee is come downe three miles Eaſtward, and hath bidden farewell to Montacute, ſo termed by the Earle of Moriton, brother by the Mothers ſide to King William the Conquerour, (who built a Caſtle upon the verie hill top, and at the foot thereof a Priorie) becauſe the ſaid hill riſeth up by little and little to a ſharpe point: for, before time it was called Logoresburg, and Biſchopeſton. As for the Caſtle, it came to nothing many yeeres ſince: the ſtones thereof being had away to the repairing of the Monaſterie and other houſes. Upon the pitch of the ſaid hill, there was a Chapell afterwards ſet, and dedicated unto Saint Michael, built with arch-worke, and an embowed roofe overhead all of ſtone, right artificially: to which for halfe a mile wel nere, men aſcended up on ſtone-ſtaires, which in their aſcent fetched a compaſſe round about the hil. But now that the Priorie & Chapell both be pulled down, the faire & goodly houſe, which Sir Edward Philips Knight, and the Kings Sargeant at Law built lately at the hill foot, maketh a very beautifull ſhew. This high place Mont-acute hath given ſurname to that right honourable family of Montacute, which had their beginning of Dru the younger. Out of which there were foure Earles of Sarisburie: the laſt of them left one daughter onely, Alice, who by Richard Nevil, bare Richard that moſt renowmed Earle of Warwick, who kept ſuch ſtirres, and made all England to ſhake, alſo Iohn Nevil Marqueſſe Montacute, who were both ſlaine at Barnet field, in the yeere 1472. Afterward King Henrie the Eighth conferred the title of Lord Montacute, upon Henrie Poole, ſonne of Margaret, daughter to George Duke of Clarence, that came of the daughter of that Richard Nevill aforeſaid, Earle of Warwicke: and when he had ſo done, ſtraightwaies made him ſhorter by the head: afterwards Queene Marie advanced Anthonie Browne, whoſe Grandmother was a daughter of Iohn Nevill Marqueſſe Montacute, to the title and honour of Vicount Montacute, which his Grandchild Anthonie who ſucceeded him now honourably enjoyeth.

And here I muſt not forget neither, Preſton, ſometime the ſeat of Iohn Sturton younger ſonne to the firſt Lord Sturton, one of whoſe heires was married to Sidenham of Brimton thereby; neither Odcombe adjoyning thereto, as ſmall a towne as it it is, ſeeing it had a Baron of the owne, William de Briewer (for ſo was his father named, in the Norman-French, becauſe he was borne in an *heath) who being taken up in the new Forreſt, by King Henrie the Second in a hunting journey, prooved a great man, and gratious in the Court (as whom King Richard the Firſt highly favored as his minion, and all the world embraced and loved) grew unto a verie wealthy eſtate, married Beatrix of Vannes, widow to Reginald Earle of Cornwall, and his daughters, for that his ſonne died without iſſue, by their marriages brought great poſſeſſions to their husbands Breos, Wake, La-fert, and Piercy. Under this towne hard by, lieth Stoke under Hamden, where the Gornaies had their Caſtle, and built a Colledge. This familie de Gornaico, commonly named Gornay, was verie antient, and of good account, deſcended from the ſame ſtocke, out of which the Warrens Earles of Surrie, and the Mortimers are ſprung: but in the foregoing age it failed, and ſome of their lands deſcended by the Hamptons, to the houſe of the Newtons Knights, who willingly acknowledge themſelves to bee come out of Wales; and not long ſince to have been named Caradocks. Neither muſt I paſſe over in ſilence, how Matthew Gournay, a moſt famous warriour in the raigne of Edward the Third,

was

Michelney. The River Pedred. Pedderton. Montacute in Domeſday booke, Montagud. Annales of Glaſton. *Drogo Iuvenis. Lords Montacute. *Evicete. Brewers Barons. Odcombe. Register of Dunkeſwell. Gornays. Newtons.

Digitized by Google

A was buried here, who in the fourscore & sixteenth yere of his age, ended this life when (as appeareth by his Epitaph) he had fought at the siege of Algizer, against the Saracens, in the battels of Benamazin, Scluse, Cressie, Ingenos, Poictiers, & Nazars in Spaine.

Then * Pedred watereth Martocke, a little market towne, which in times past William of Bologne King Stephens sonne gave unto Faramuse of Bologne, whose sole heire Sibyll, was wedded to Ingelraine Fienes, from whom descended the Fienes, Barons of Dacre, and Lords Say and Zele. * Parret. Faramuse of Bolen. Fienes.

Parret from hence thorow the mirie and moorish plaine countrey, holding his course Northward, passeth by Langport a market towne well frequented, and Aulre,
B a Village consisting of a few poore Cottages, which seemeth to have beene a towne of good account: for, when King Elfred had given the Danes such an overthrow in battell, and by strait siege compelled them to yeeld, so farre forth, that they tooke an oath immediatly to depart out of his dominions, and Godrus their King promised to become Christian, (as writeth Asserius) at this verie place he with great pompe was Godfather to the said Godrus at the sacred Font. Aulre.

Beneath this place from the West, Parret receiveth into it the river Thone, which springing farre off in the West part of this County, very neere unto Devonshire, runneth thorow most rich and pleasant fields, passing downe neere Wivelscomb, assigned antiently to the Bishops of Bathe, and by Wellington, which in the time of C King Edward the Elder was a land of six* Manentes, what time hee granted it together with Lediard, that had twelve Manentes, Hides, unto the Bishop of Shirburne: Now, a prettie market towne it is, and graced most by the habitation there of Sir Iohn Popham (for, vertuous men, and such as have so well deserved of their countrey, are not to be passed in silence) a man of an ancient worshipfull house, and withall a most upright Iusticer, and of singular industry, who being Lord chiefe Iustice of the Kings Bench, administreth his office toward malefactours with such holesome and available severitie, that England hath been beholden unto him a long time for a great part of her private peace, and home-securitie. Wellington. * Hides. Lediard. Iohn Popham.

From thence with a soft streame, and gentle fall, Thone runneth by Thonton, D commonly Taunton, and giveth it his name. A verie fine and proper towne this is indeed, and most pleasantly seated: in a word, one of the eies of this shire: where Ina King of the West Saxons, built a Castle, which Desburgia his wife raced, and laid even with the ground after shee had expelled from thence Eadbritch, King of the South-Saxons, who now had made himselfe Lord thereof, and used it as a bridle to keepe the countrey under, that he had subdued. When Edward the Confessour was King, it paid tribute (as wee find in the Kings Survey-Booke of England) after the rate of fiftie and foure Hides: and had in it threescore and three Burgers: *The Bishop of Winchester held it as Lord, and his courts or Pleas were kept here thrice in the yeere. And these Customes appertaine to Taunton, Burgherists, Theeves, * Breach of peace, han-*
E nisare, pence of the Hundred, and pence of Saint Peter de Circieto, thrice in the yeere to hold the Bishops Pleas without warning, to goe forth to warfare with the Bishops men. The Countrey here, most delectable on every side with greene medowes; flourishing with pleasant Gardens and Orchards, and repleni shed with faire Mannour houses; wonderfully contenteth the eyes of the beholders. And among these houses; those of greatest note are these: Orchard, which had in times past Lords of that name, from whom in right of inheritance it descended unto the Portmans, men of Knights degree: Hach Beauchamp, and Cory-Mallet, bearing those additions of their Lords. For, this was the seat of the Mallets, that came of the Norman race, and from them in short time, it fell by the female heire to the Pointzes. From among F whom in the raigne of Edward the First, Hugh was ranged in the rank of Parliament Barons, and out of that familie some remaine at this day of great reputation, and Knights in their Countrey. As for those Beauchamps, or de Bello Campo, they flourished in high places of honour, from the time of King Henrie the Second: but especially since, that Cecilie * de Fortibus, which derived her pedigree from the Earles de Ferrarijs, and that great Marshall of England William Earle of Pembroke, matched Taunton. * Penaltie for peace-breaking, Pacis Infractio. Mallet. Pointzes. Beauchamps Barons. * Forts.

Digitized by Google

ed in marriage with this familie. But in the raigne of Edward the Third, the whole A inheritance, was by the ſiſters divided betweene Roger de S. Mauro, or Seimore, I. Meriet, men of ancient deſcent, and great alliance. And hereupon it was, that King Henrie the Eight, when he had wedded Iane Seimor, mother to King Edward the Sixth, beſtowed upon Edward Seimor her brother, the titles of Vicount Beauchamp, and Earle of Hertfort, whom king Edward the Sixth afterwards honoured, firſt with Vicount Beauchamp. the name of Lord and Baron Seimor to bee annexed to his other titles, leſt (as the King ſaith in the Patent) the name of his mothers familie ſhould bee overſhadowed with any other ſtile, and yet afterward created him Duke of Sommerſet.

As you goe from thence, where Thone windeth himſelfe into Parret, it ma- B keth a pretty Iland between two rivers called in times paſt Aethelingey, that is, The Iſle of Nobles, now commonly knowen by the name of Athelney: a place no leſſe famous among us for King Alfreds ſhrowding himſelfe therein, what time as the Danes now had brought all into broile, then thoſe Mariſhes of Minturny among the Italians, wherein Marius lurked, and lay hidden. For, touching that King an antient Poet, wrote thus:

——— Mixta dolori
Gaudia ſemper erant, ſpes ſemper mixta timori.
Si modò victor erat, ad craſtinà bella pavebat,
Si modò victus erat, ad craſtina bella parabat. C
Cui veſtes ſudore jugi, cui ſica cruore
Tincta jugi, quantum ſit onus regnare probarunt.

With dolour great his joyes were mixt, his hope was joyn'd with dread,
If now he victour were, next day of warres he ſtood affraid:
If vanquiſht now, the morrow next forthwith he thought it good
For to prepare for warre: his ſword was aye begoard in blood.
His garments eke with painfull ſweat, were evermore beſtain'd.
Which well did ſhew what burden great he bare while that he raign'd.

And in truth, this Iſle afforded him a very fit ſhrowding corner for that: by reaſon of waters partly ſtanding there in plaſhes, and partly reſorting reflowing thether, which D
Aſſerius termed Gronnas, Latinizing a Saxon word) there is in maner no acceſſe into it. It had ſometime a bridge betweene two caſtles, built by Aelfred, and a very large grove of Alders, full of goales and wild beaſts: but of firme ground ſcarce two acres in breadth: on which, as ſaith William of Malmesbury (whoſe words theſe are and not mine) he founded a little Monaſterie: the whole frame wherof, hanged upon foure maine poſts pitched faſt in the ground, with foure round iſles of Spharick work contrived and brought round about the ſame. Not far from this Iſle Parret having received the ſaid river runneth alone ſwelling with certaine ſandy ſhelfes ſometime in his chancell, by the Hundred of N. Pederton anciently acknowledging the Bluets to haue beene Lords thereof, who are thought to haue brought that name from Bluet in little Britaine: Heere it E taketh into him an other river from Eaſt to beare him company which openeth it ſelfe neere Caſtle Cary which William Louell Lord thereof againſt King Stephen in the behalfe of Mawd the Empreſſe right inheretrix of the Crown of England; whoſe iſſue male failing in the time of King Edward the Third, by heire female it came to Nicholas de S. Maure a Baron (of a diſtinct familie from that which was a few lines before mentioned) and ſhortly after about the time of Henrie the Fift by an heire female againe to the Lord Zouches of Harringworth: as a moitie of the lands of Lord Zouch of Aſhby de la Zouch came before by coheires to the houſe of this S. Maures. But when I. Lord Zouch was attainted by King Henry the Seuenth for aſſiſting King F
Richard the Third, this Caſtle was given by the King to Robert Willoughby Lord Brook as his lands at Bridge-water to the Lord Daubeney and then he was reſtored in bloud. From Caſtle Cary this water paſſeth by Lites-Carye to be remembred in reſpect of the late owner Thomas Lyte a gentleman ſtudious of all good knowledge, & ſo to Somerton, the Shire towne in times paſt, as which gave the name thereto. A Caſtle it had of the Weſt Saxon Kings, which Ethelbald King of Mercia forcing a breach through

* Louell. Lupellus in Latin. Caſtle Carye. Lord Saint Maure.

the

Digitized by Google

A the wals ſieged and kept: But now time hath gotten the maſtry of it ſo, as that there is no apperance at all thereof: and the very towne it ſelfe would have much a doe to keepe that name, were it not fore a Faire of oxen and other beaſts which is kept, there from Palme-Sunday vntill the mids of Iune, with much reſort of people; for that the countrimen all there about are very great Graſiers, breeders, and feeders of cattaile.

No ſooner hath Parret entertained this river, but he ſpeeds him apace toward, a great and populous towne, commonly called Bridg-water: and is thought to have taken that name of the bridge and water there: but the old records and evidences gaine ſay this opinion: where in it is alwaies called in plaine words Burgh walter, that B is, Walters burgh or Burgh-walter: and (as we may very probably conjecture) of that Walter de Duaco, or Doway who ſerved under William Conqueror in his wars, and received at his hands many faire mannors in this ſhire. Neither carieth it any other name in that grant or donation, whereby Fulk Paynes Lord of Bampton paſſed the poſſeſſion of the place over unto William Briwer, to curry favour with him, being ſo great a man and ſo gracious a fauourite with King Richard the Firſt: This Williams ſonne and bearing his name, bettered this hauen, having obtained licence of King Iohn to fortifie a Caſtle, built heere a Fortreſſe: which now time hath wrought her will of: and began a bridge which one Srivet a gentleman of Cornwall with infinite coſt finiſhed: founded alſo the Hoſpitall of S. Iohn heere, and Dunkeſwell Abbay. C But when this William Briwer the yonger left this life without iſſue, in the partition of his heritage it fell to Margaret his ſiſter, in right of whoſe daughter that ſhe had by William De la fert, it came to the houſe of Cadurci or Chaworths, and from it hereditarily to the Dukes of Lancaſter; as ſome lands heereabout by an other ſiſter came to Breos, and ſo by Cantalupe to Lord Zouch. But the greateſt honor that this place had, was by the title of an Earldome, that King Henrie the Eight adorned it withall, what time as he created Henrie Doubeney, Earle of Bridge-water, whoſe ſiſter Cecilie, was maried unto Iohn Bourchier the firſt Earle of Bath out of that houſe.

Earles of Bridge-water.

Vzella.

Beneath this, ſome few miles off, Parret voideth it ſelfe into the Severne ſea at a wide mouth, which, as we ſaid, Ptolomee called Vzella æſtuarium: and ſome even at D this day, Evelmouth: but the old Engliſh-Saxons Peopeban muð, at which place, as Marianus mine author writeth, Ealſtan Biſhop of Shirburne about the yeere of Salvation 845. diſcomfited the Daniſh forces as they were ſtragling abroad. At the ſame mouth where we ſaw Honiſpell an ancient Manour of the Coganes, men of great fame in the conqueſt of Ireland, there meeteth it another river called of ſome Brius, which ariſeth out of that great and wide wood in the Eaſt-ſide of this ſhire, which the Britans named Cort Maur, the Saxons Selwood, that is, (by Aſſerius interpretation) The great wood, but now not ſo great. This river firſt viſiteth Bruiton, to which he leaveth his name: (a place memorable, for that the Mohuns there entombed, who built a religious houſe there) and then entertaining a brooke comming E by Redlinch a well knowne houſe of the Fitz-Iames, runneth a long way by ſmall villages and encreaſed with ſome other brooks, it watereth goodly grounds, vntill it meete with ſofter ſoile then and there, it maketh certaine marſhes and meres, and when the waters riſe, enviroeth a large plot of ground, as an Iſle, ſo called of old time in the Britiſh tongue, the Iſle of Avalon, of Appuls: afterwards, named Inis Witrin, that is, The Glaſſy Iſle, like as in the Saxon Idiome, the ſame ſenſe Glaſ-on-ey, and in Latin Glaſconia. Of which, a Poet of good antiquity writeth thus.

Selwood.

Bruiton.

Inſula pomorum quæ fortunata vocatur,
Ex re nomen habet, quia per ſe ſingula profert.
Non opus eſt illi ſulcantibus arua colonis,
F Omnis abeſt cultus, niſi quem natura miniſtrat,
Vltrò fœcundas ſegetes producit, & herbas,
Nataque poma ſuis præfert ſine germine ſylvis.

The Apple-Iſle and Fortunate, folke of the thing ſo call,
For of it ſelfe it bringeth forth corne, Forage, fruit and all.
There is no need of country clowns to plough and till the fields,

Nor

Digitized by Google

Nor seene is any husbandry, but that which nature yeelds. A
Of the owne accord there commeth up, come, grasse and herbs goodstore, Whole woods there be that apples beare, if they be prun'd before.

William Malmesbury, of Glastenburies antiquity.

In this Isle vnder a great hill rising in great heigth with a tower theron, which they call the Tor, flourished the famous Abbay of Glastenbury, the beginning whereof is very ancient, fetched even from that Ioseph of Arimathea, who enterred the bodie of Iesus Christ, and whom Philip the Apostle of the Gaules sent into Britaine for to preach Christ. For, thus much both the most ancient records and monuments of this Monasterie testifie, and also Patrick the Irish Apostle (who lived there a Monke thirtie yeeres) in an Epistle of his hath left to memorie. Whereupon this place was by B See Romans in Britanie. In confirm. Henric. 2.
our Aunce stors named, The first land of God, The first land of Saints in England, The beginning and fountaine of all religion in England, The tombe of Saints, The mother of Saints, The Church founded and built by the Lords Disciples. Neither is there any cause why we should much doubt heereof, sithence I have shewed before, that the beames of Christian religion in the very infancie of the primitive Church were spred and shined upon this Iland, yea and Freculphus Lexoviensis hath written, that the said Philip conducted barbarous nations, neere unto darknesse and bordering just upon the Ocean, to the light of knowledge and port of faith. But to our Monasterie, and that out of Malmesburie his booke touching this matter. When that old Cell or little chapell which Ioseph had built by continuance of time was in the end decaied, Devi Bishop C of Saint Davids erected a new one in the same place, which also in time falling to ruine, twelve men comming out of the North part of Britaine repaired it, and lastly King Ina (who founded a schoole in Rome for the training up and instruction of English youth, & to the maintenance thereof, as also for almes to be distributed at Rome, had laid an imposition of Peter-pence upon every house thorowout his realme) having demolished it, built there a very faire and stately Church, to Christ, Peter, and Paul: and under the very highest coping thereof round about caused to be written these verses:

Syderei montes, speciosa cacumina Sion, D
A Libano gemina flore comante, cedri;
Cœlorum portæ lati duo lumina mundi,
Ore tonat Paulus, fulgurat arce Petrus:
Inter Apostolicas radianti luce coronas,
Doctior hic monitis, celsior ille gradu,
Corda per hunc hominum reserantur, & astra per illum:
Quos docet iste stylo, suscipit ille polo.
Pandit iter cœli hic dogmate, clauibus alter,
Est via cui Paulus, ianua fida Petrus.
Hic Petra firma manens, ille Architectus habetur, E
Surgit in hijs templum quo placet ara Deo.
Anglia plaude lubens, mittit tibi Roma salutem, Fulgor Apostolicus Glasconiam irradiat.
A facie hostili duo propugnacula surgunt,
Quod fidei turres vrbs caput orbis habet.
Hæc pius egregio Rex Ina refertus amore,
Dona suo populo non moritura dedit.
Totus in affectu diva pietatis inhærens,
Ecclesiæque iuges amplificauit opes.
Melchi-sedech noster meritò Rex, atq; Sacerdos, F
Compleuit veræ relligionis opus.
Publica iura regens, & celsa palatia seruans,
Vnica Pontificum gloria, norma fuit.
Hinc abiens, illinc meritorum fulget honore,
Hic quoque gestorum laude perennis erit.

These verses with some little change are found in the fourth booke of Venantius Fortunatus his Poems: in the praise partly of the Church in Paris and partly of Nants.

Two

A Two mountaines high that reach the ſtars, two tops of Sion Faire,
From Libanon two cedar trees their flouring heads doe beare.
Two roiall gates of higheſt heaven, two lights that men admire,
Paul thundreth with his voice aloft, Peter he flaſheth fire.
Of all the Apoſtles crowned crew, whoſe raies right glittering bee,
Paul for deepe learning doth excell, Peter for high degree.
The one doth open the hearts of men, the other heaven doore,
For Peter lets thoſe into heaven, whom Paul had taught before.
As one by meanes of doctrine ſhewes the way how heaven to win,
B By vertue ſo of th'others Keys, men quickly enter in.
Paul is a plaine and ready way for men to heaven hie,
And Peter is as ſure a gate, for them to paſſe thereby.
This is a rocke remaining firme: a Maſter builder hee:
Twixt theſe a Church and altar both, to pleaſe God, built we ſee.
Rejoice ô England willingly; For, Rome doth greet thee well,
The glorious Apoſtles light in Glaſton now doe dwell.
Two bulwarks ſtrong afront the Foe are raiſ'd; Theſe towres of faith
In that this Citie holds, the head even of the world it hath.
Theſe monuments King Ina gave of perfect meere good will
C Unto his ſubiects; whoſe good deeds remaine and ſhall doe ſtill.
He with his whole affection in godlineſſe did live,
And holy Church to amplifie great riches alſo give.
Well might he our Melchiſedech, a Prieſt and King, be thought,
For he the true religious worke to full perfection brought.
The lawes in common weale he kept, and ſtate in Court beſide,
The onely Prince that prelats grac'd, and them eke rectifide.
And now departed hence to heaven, of right he there doth reigne,
Yet ſhall the praiſe of his good deeds, with us for ay remaine.

In this firſt age of the primitive Church, very holy men and the Iriſh eſpecially ap-
D plied the ſervice of God in this place diligently, who were maintained with allowances from Kings, and inſtructed youth in religion and liberall ſciences. Theſe men embraced a ſolitarie life, that they might the more quietly ſtudie the Scriptures, and by an auſtere kind of life exerciſe themſelves to the bearing of the croſſe. But at length, Dunſtane a man of a ſubtile wit and well experienced, when he had once by an opinion of his ſingular holineſſe and learning wound himſelfe into the inward acquaintance of Princes, inſtead of theſe, brought in monks of a later order, called Benedictines, and himſelfe firſt of all others became the Abbat or ruler heere of a great couent of them; who had formerly, and afterward gotten at the hands of good and godly Princes a roiall revenue. And having reigned as it were in all affluence 600.
E yeres (for al their neighbors round about were at their beck) they were by King Henry the Eighth diſpoſſeſſed & thruſt out of all; & this their Monaſtery, which was growen now to be a prety Citie, environed with a large wall a mile about, & repleniſhed with ſtately buildings, was raced and made even with the ground: and now onely ſheweth evidently by the ruines thereof, how great and how magnificent a thing it was.

Now, I might be thought one of thoſe that in this age have vanities in admiration, if I ſhould tell you of a Walnut tree in the holy Churchyard heere, that never did put forth loafe before S. Barnabies feaſt, and upon that very day was rank and full of leaves; but that is now gone, & a young tree in the place: as alſo of the Hawthorne in Wiral-park hard by, which upon Chriſtmaſday ſprouteth forth as well as in May. And
F yet there be very many of good credit, if we may beleeve men of their word, who avouch theſe things to be moſt true. But, before I returne from hence, I will briefly ſet downe unto you that, which Giraldus Cambrenſis an eie-witneſſe of the thing, hath more at large related touching Arthurs Sepulcher in the Churchyard there.

When Henrie the Second King of England, tooke knowledge out of the Songs of Britiſh Bards, or Rhythmers, how Arthur that moſt noble Worthy of the Britans, who by Arthur, the warlike Worthy.

Digitized by Google

by his Martial proweſſe, had many a time daunted the fury of the Engliſh-Saxons, lay A buried here between two Pyramides, or ſharpe-headed pillars, hee cauſed the bodie to be ſearched for: and ſcarcely had they digged ſeven foot deepe into the earth, but they lighted upon a Tomb or Grave-ſtone, on the upper face whereof was faſtened a broad Croſſe of lead groſly wrought: which being taken forth ſhewed an inſcription of letters: and under the ſaid ſtone almoſt nine foot deeper, was found a Sepulchre of oake made hollow, wherin the bones of that famous Arthur were beſtowed, which Inſcription or Epitaph, as it was ſomtime exemplified, & drawn out of the firſt Copie in the Abbey of Glaſcon, I thought good for the antiquitie of the characters here to put downe. The letters being made after a barbarous maner, & reſembling the Gothiſh B Character, bewray plainly the barbariſm of that age, when ignorance (as it were) by fatall deſtinie bare ſuch ſway, that there was none to be found, by whoſe writings the renowme of Arthur might be blazed, and commended to poſteritie. A matter and argument doubtleſſe, meet to have been handled by the skill and eloquence of ſome right learned man, who in celebrating the praiſes of ſo great a prince, might have wonne due commendation alſo for his owne wit. For, the moſt valiant Champian of the Britiſh Empire, ſeemeth even in this behalfe onely, moſt unfortunate, that he never met with ſuch a trumpetter, as might worthily have ſounded out the praiſe of his valour. But behold the ſaid Croſſe and Epitaph therein.

Hic jacet ſepultus
Inclitus Rex Arthu-rius in inſula
Avalonia.

Neither

A Neither will it be impertinent, if I annex hereunto what our Countrey man, Ioseph, [a Monke] of Excester, no vulgar and triviall Poet, versified, sometime of Arthur in his Poeme Antiochis, wherein he described the warres of the Christians for recoverie of the Holy Land, and was there present with King Richard the First, speaking of Britaine.

Hinc celebri fata felici claruit ortu
Flos Regum Arthurus, cujus cum facta stupori,
Non micuere minus, totus quòd in aure voluptas,
Et populo plaudente favus. Quemcunq; priorum
*Inspice, Pelæum commendat fama tyrannum,
B Pagina Cæsareos loquitur Romana triumphos, * Alexandrum Magnum.
Alcidem damitis attollit gloria monstris.
Sed nec pinetum coryli, nec sydera solem
Æquant: Annales Latios, Graiosq; revolve,
Prisca parem nescit, æqualem postera nullum
Exhibitura dies. Reges supereminet omnes,
Solus præteritis melior, majorq; futuris.

For famous death, and happie birth, hence flourish'd next in place,
Arthur the flower of noble Kings: whose acts with lovely grace Accepted and admired were, in peoples mouth and eare,
C Noleſſe than if ſweet hony they, or pleaſant muſicke were.
See former Princes, and compare his worth even with them all:
That King in Pella borne, whom we great Alexander call,
The trumpe of fame doth ſound aloft. The Roman Stories eke Much praiſe and honour both, of their Triumphant Cæſars ſpeake.
And Hercules exalted is for taming Monſters fell:
But Pine-trees, hazels low, (as Sunne the Starres) doe farre excell:
Both Greeke and Latine Annals read: no former age his Peere,
Nor future time his match can ſhew. For this is plaine and cleere,
D In goodneſſe hee and greatneſſe both, ſurmounts Kings all and ſome, Better alone, than all before, greater than thoſe to come.

And this worthy Knight, (that I may note ſo much alſo by the way out of Ninnius the Britan, if it be worth the noting) was called, Mab-uter, that is, A terrible or dreadfull Sonne, becauſe hee was from his childhood cruell; and Artur, which in the Britiſh tongue importeth as much as a horrible beare, or an yron mall, wherewith the Lions jawes are bruiſed and broken.

Lo here alſo, if it pleaſe you, other monuments of this place, though they bee not of the greateſt antiquitie, out of the foreſaid William of Malmesburie. That (quoth he) which to all men is altogether unknowen, I would gladly relate, if I could picke out the The Pyramides of Glaſtenburie.
E truth: namely, what thoſe ſharp pillars or pyramides ſhould meane which being ſet diſtant certaine feet from the old Church, ſtand in the front, and border of the Churchyard. The higheſt of them, and that which is neerer to the Church, than the reſt, hath five ſtories, and carrieth in height ſix and twentie foot: Which albeit for age it be ready to fall, yet hath it certaine antiquities to bee ſeen, that plainly may be read, although they cannot ſo eaſily bee underſtood. For in the uppermoſt ſtorie, there is an Image in habit and attire of a Biſhop: in the next under it, the ſtatue of a King in his roiall robes, and theſe Letters, HER. SEXI. and BLISVVERH. In the third, theſe names likewiſe, and nothing elſe, WEMCHESTE. BANTOMP. WINEVVEGNE. In the fourth, HATE. WULFREDE, &c. EANFLEDE. In the fifth, which is the loweſt, a portraict, and this writing, F LOGVVOR. WESLIELAS, &c. BREGDENE. SVVELVVES. HVVINGENDES. BERNE. The other Pyramis is eighteene foot high, and hath foure floores or ſtories; in which you may read, HEDDE* Biſhop, &c. BREGORRED, &c. BEORVVALDE. * Epiſcopus. What all this ſhould ſignifie, I take not upon me raſhly to define: but by conjecture I gather, that in ſome hollowed ſtones within, are contained the bones of thoſe, whoſe names are read without. Surely LOGVVOR is affirmed for certaine, to be the ſame man, of whoſe name

the

Digitized by Google

the place was ſometime called LOGVVERESBEORGH, which now they call Mont-acute A
And BEORVVALDE ſemblably was Abbat next after HEMGISELUS.

Edgar the Peaceable. To reckon up here the Kings of the Weſt-Saxons, that were buried in this place, would be but needleſſe: Howbeit, King Edgar the Peaceable, who alwaies tendred peace, in regard thereof, if there were nothing elſe, I cannot but remember, and put downe his Epitaph, not unbeſeeming that age wherein he lived.

Auctor opum, vindex ſcelerum, largitor honorum, Sceptriger Edgarus regna ſuperna petit.
Hic alter Salomon, legum pater, orbita pacis,
Quòd caruit bellis, claruit inde magis. B
Templa Deo, templis monachos, monachis dedit agros, Nequitiæ lapſum, Iuſtitiæq; locum.
Novit enim regno verum perquirere falſo,
Immenſum modico, perpetuumq; brevi.

That Well of wealth, and ſcourge of ſinne, that honour-giver great,
King Edgar hence is gone to hold in heaven his roiall ſeat:
This ſecond Salomon that was, law-father, Prince of peace,
In that he wanted warres, the more his glorie had increaſe.
Churches to God, to Churches Monkes, to Monkes faire Lands he gave,
Downe went in his daies wickedneſſe, and Iuſtice place might have: C
A pure crowne for a counterfeit he purchaſed once for all,
An endleſſe Kingdome for a ſhort, a boundleſſe for a ſmall.

Godney Moore. Beneath Glaſcon three Rivers which there meet, doe make a meere, and iſſuing forth at one little mouth, runne all in one chanell Weſt-ward, to Uzella Frith, firſt by Gedney or (as others will have it) Godney moore, which (they ſay) ſignifieth, Gods Iland, and was granted to Ioſeph of Arimathea: then, by Weadmoore, a Mannour of King Ælfreds, which by his laſt Will and Teſtament, hee gave as a legacie to his ſonne Edward, and ſo by that moory or fenny-country Brentmarſh, that runneth out verie farre, which the Monkes of Glaſtenburie interpreted to be the Counttey of Fen frogges, like as the little towne Brentknoll there, which ſignifieth, D Frog-hill.

Mendip-hils. From thence Eaſtward, Mendippe hils extend themſelves in length and bredth; Leland calleth them Minerarios, that is the Minerall hils; and rightly (as I ſuppoſe) ſeeing they be in old writings named Munedduppe: for, rich they are in lead mines, and good to feede cattell. Among theſe hils there is a cave or denne farre within the ground, wherein are to be ſeene certaine pits and riverets, the place they call Ochie-hole, vvhereof the Inhabitants feine no fevver tales, nor deviſe leſſe dotages, than the Italians did of their Sibyls Cave in the mountaine Apenninus. The name (no doubt) grevv of Ogo, a Britiſh vvord, that betokeneth, a Den: even as of the like den, the Iſle Eubœa, vvas by ſuch another name ſometime called Ocha. Not far hence, in E the raigne of K. Henrie the Eighth, vvas turned up vvith the plough, a table of lead ſomevvhat long, vvhich lay long at Lambith in the Duke of Norfolkes houſe, erected ſometime for a trophee in token of victorie, with this inſcription:

Ochy hole.

Strabo.

TI. CLAUDIUS CÆSAR. AUG. P.M.
TRIB. P. VIIII. IMP. XVI. DE BRITAN.

This Tribuneſhip of Claudius here mentioned, fell out to be in the 802. yeere after the foundation of Rome, when Antiſtius and M. Suillius were Conſuls, what time P. Oſtorius Governour of Britaine as Vice-Pretour, was welcomed thither with many troubles. Out of this time, give me leave, I pray you, to frame certain conjectures: That in this yeere Claudius erected two Trophees, or monuments of victorie over the Britans, his owne antient coine ſheweth as a moſt certaine witneſſe, in the forepart

Digitized by Google

A part whereof is this plaine Inſcription, TI. CLAVD. CÆSAR. AVG. P.M. TR. P.VIIII. IMP. XVI. P.P. and in the reverſe thereof, DE BRITAN. and there is expreſſely ſtamped a triumphall Arch, with an Image of one gallopping on horſebacke, and with two triumphall pillars. What Britans theſe were then vanquiſhed, Tacitus ſheweth, teſtifying that this yere Claudius by the conduct of Oſtorius ſubdued two Nations of the Britans this yeere, to wit, The ICENI, and the CANGI. But forasmuch as the Iceni, lay (as it were) in another climate. What if I ſaid, this trophee was ſet up in token of victorie over the Cangi, a ſmaller nation among our Belgæ, and that thoſe CANGI, were ſeated in theſe parts. For, not farre B from hence is the ſea, that lieth toward Ireland, neere which hee placeth the Cangi, of whoſe name there ſeemeth as yet in certaine places of this tract, ſome ſhadow to remain, namely, in Cannington, and Cannings, pettie countreys and Hundreds: as alſo in Wincaunton, which elſewhere is called Cangton. But of theſe matters let the reader be judge; my ſelfe (as I ſaid) doth no more but conjecture, whiles I ſeeke to trace out theſe their footſteps, and hope to find them out ſome where elſe.

See before among the Coines.

Cangi, a people of Britaine.

Among theſe hils ſtandeth Chuton, which was the habitation, (if I take not my markes amiſſe) of William Bonvill, whom King Henrie the Sixth called by his writ of Summons to the Parliament, by the name William de Bonvill and Chuton, among other Barons of the Realme, made him Knight of the Garter, and richly matched C his ſonne in mariage with the ſole daughter of Lord Harington. But when he (unthankfull man that hee was) in the heat of civill warre, revolted, and tooke part with the houſe of Yorke, as if vengeance had purſued him hard at heeles, that onely ſonne of his he ſaw taken from him by untimely death, and his nephew by the ſame ſonne, Baron of Harrington, ſlaine at the battell of Wakefield: and immediatly after, (that his old age might want no kinde of miſerie) whiles hee waited ſtill, and long looked for better daies, was himſelfe taken priſoner in the ſecond battell of Saint Albans, and having now runne thorow his full time by courſe of nature, loſt his head, leaving behind him for his heire, his Grandchilds daughter Cecilie, a Damſell of tender yeeres, who afterwards with a great inheritance, was wedded to Thomas Greie, Marqueſſe D Dorſet. But his bloud after his death was by authoritie of Parliament reſtored.

Bonvill.

1. Edward 4.

Under Mendip hils northward, there is a little village, called, Congersburie, ſo named of one Congar, a man of ſinguler holineſſe. Capgrave hath written, that hee was the Emperours ſonne of Conſtantinople, who lived there an Eremite: alſo Harpetre, a Caſtle by right of inheritance, fell to the Gornaies, and from them deſcended to the Ab-Adams, who as I have read, reſtored it to the Gornaies again. Southward, not farre from the foreſaid hole, where Mendip ſlopeth downe with a ſtonie deſcent, a little citie with an Epiſcopall Sea, is ſituat beneath at the hill foot, ſometime called, (as ſaith Leland) but whence he had it, I wot not, Theodorodunum, now Welles, ſo named E of the Springs, or Wels, which boile and walme up there: like as Suſa in Perſia, Croia in Dalmatia; and Pagaſe in Macedonia, were named of the like fountaines; in their counttey ſpeech: whereupon this alſo in Latine, is called, Fontanenſis Eccleſia, as one would ſay, Fountain-Church. For multitude of Inhabitants, for faire and ſtately buildings, it may well and truely chalenge the preheminence of all this Province. A goodly Church it hath, and a Colledge, founded by King Ina, in honour of Saint Andrew, and ſoone after endowed by Princes and great men with rich livings, and revenewes: among whom King Kinewolph by name, in the yeere of our Lord 766. granted unto it verie many places lying thereabout. For, in a Charter of his wee read thus, I Kinewulph, King of the Weſt-Saxons, for the love of God, and (that which is not openly to be ſpoken) for ſome vexation of our enemies, thoſe of the Corniſh Nation, with F the conſent of my Biſhops and Nobles, will moſt humbly give and conſecrate ſome parcell of Land to Saint Andrew the Apoſtle, and ſervant of God, that is to ſay, as much as commeth to Eleven Hides, neere to the River called Welwe, for the augmentation of that Monaſterie, which ſtandeth neere the great fountaine that they call Wiclea.* This Charter have I ſet downe, both for the antiquitie, and becauſe ſome have ſuppoſed, that the place tooke name of this River; verily, neere the Church there is a Spring, called Harpetre.

p. 364.

Welles.

Steph. in urbibus, and Bartetius.

Manentium XI.

Digitized by Google

Saint Andrews Well, the faireſt, deepeſt, and moſt plentifull that I have ſeen, by and A by making a ſwift Brooke.) The Church it ſelfe all thorowout is verie beautifull, but the Frontiſpice thereof, in the weſt end, is a moſt excellent and goodly peece of worke indeede, for it ariſeth up ſtill from the foot to the top all of imagerie, in curious and antike wiſe wrought of ſtone carved, and embowed right artificially, and the Cloiſters adjoyning very faire and ſpatious.

A gorgeous pallace of the Biſhops, built in manner of a Caſtle, fortified with walles, and a mote ſtandeth hard by, Southward; and on the other ſide faire houſes Combes. of the Prebendaries. For, Seven and Twentie Prebends, with nineteen other pety Prehends, beſide a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chancellour, & three Archdeacons belong B to this church. In the time of K. Edward the elder, a Biſhops Sea was here placed. For, when the Pope had ſuſpended him, becauſe the Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline and juriſ-diction in theſe weſterne parts of the Realme, began openly to decay, then he knowing himſelfe to be a maintainer, and Nurſe-father of the Church, ordained three *Kirton. new Biſhopricks, to wit, of *Cridie, Cornwall, and this of Welles, where he made 905. Eadulph the firſt Biſhop. But many yeeres after, when Giſo ſat Biſhop there, Harald Earle of the Weſt-Saxons, and of Kent (who gaped ſo greedily for the goods of the Hiſtorie of Bathe. Church) ſo diſquieted and vexed him, that he went within a little off quite aboliſhing the dignitie thereof. But King William the conquerour, after he had overthrowen Harold, ſtretched out his helping hand to the ſuccour of baniſhed Giſo, and C reliefe of his afflicted Church. At what time, (as witneſſeth Domeſday booke) the Biſhop held the whole towne in his owne hands, which paid tribute after the proportion of fiftie Hides. Afterwards in the raigne of Henrie the Firſt, Iohannes de Villula of Tours in France, being now elected Biſhop, tranſlated his Sea to Bathe, ſince which time the two Seas growing into one, the Biſhop beareth the title of both; ſo that he is called, The Biſhop of Bathe and Welles. Whereupon the Monkes of Bathe, and Ca-See in the Decretals. Ne ſede vacante aliquid innovetur. nons of Welles, entred into a great quarrell, and skuffled, as it were, each with the other about the chooſing of their Biſhops: Meane while, Savaricus Biſhop of Bathe, being alſo Abbot of Glaſtenburie, tranſlated the Sea of Glaſtenburie, and was called Biſhop thereof: but when hee died, this title died with him: and the D 1193. Monkes and Canons aforeſaid, were at length brought to accord, by that Robert, who divided the Patrimonie of Welles Church into Prebends, inſtituting a Deane, Sub-deane, &c. Ioceline alſo, the Biſhop about the ſame time, repaired the Church with new buildings, and within remembrance of our Grandfathers, Raulph of Shrewsburie, (ſo ſome call him) built a verie fine Colledge for the Vicars and ſinging men, faſt by the North ſide of the Church, and walled in the Biſhops Palace. But this rich Church, was diſpoiled of many faire poſſeſſions in the time of King Edward the Sixt, when England felt all miſeries which happen under a child-King. As yee goe from the Palace to the market-place of the towne, Thomas Beckington the Biſhop built a moſt beautifull gate: who alſo adjoyned E thereto paſſing faire houſes all of uniforme height neere the Market-place; in the middes whereof is to bee ſeen a Market-place, ſupported with ſeven Columnes or pillars without, arched over-head right daintily, which William Knight the Biſhop, and Wolman the Deane founded for the uſe of people reſorting thither to the Market. Thus much of the Eaſt-part of the towne: In the weſt-ſide thereof, I have ſeene the pariſh Church of Saint Cuthberts: next unto which ſtandeth an Hoſpitall, founded by Nicolas Bubwith Biſhop for foure and twentie poore people.

Out of thoſe Mendip or Mine-hils, ſpringeth the River Frome, which running Eaſtward, by Cole-pits, before it hath held on a long courſe that way, turneth F Farley. Philips Norton. North-ward, and ſerveth in ſtead of a bound confining this ſhire and Glocester-ſhire; and paſſeth hard under Farley, a Caſtle not long ſince of the Lord Hungerfords, ſituat upon a Rocke, where Humfrey Bohun built ſometime a Monkerie, not farre from Philips Norton, a great Market-towne, which tooke the name of a Church, conſecrate to Saint Philip.

Lower

Digitized by Google

A Lower than it, Selwood, whereof I ſpake erewhile; ſpreadeth long and large: a wood ſtanding well and thick of trees, whereof the country round about adjoining was named (as Ethelward mine author writeth, Selwoodſhire: and a towne ſteeply ſeated thereby is yet called Frome Selwood, which gaineth very much by the trade of clothing: From which, Weſtward, not full two miles, there ſheweth it ſelfe, a Caſtle (little though it be) yet fine and trim conſiſting of foure round Turrets, which being built by the Delamares, and named thereupon Monney de la Mare; from them came by way of inheritance to the Powlets. And not far from thence is Witham; where King Henry the Third erected a Nunnerie, which afterward was the firſt B houſe and as it were mother of the Cartuſianes or Charter-houſe Monks in England; as Hinton not far of neere Farley Caſtle was the ſecond. And now by this time, Frome growne bigger by ſome riverets iſſuing out of this wood, joineth with the noble river Avon: which holding on a crooked courſe, runneth anon to that ancient City which of the hote Bathes Ptolomee called ΥΔΑΤΑ ΘΕΡΜΑ, that is, Hote waters: Antoninus, AQVAE SOLIS, that is, The waters of the Sunne: the Britaines Yr ennaint Twymin and Caer Badon, the Saxons Baþancerꝑ ꝥep, haꝺ Baþan, and of the concourſe thether of diſeaſed people Akmancheſter, that is, The City of ſick'ly folke: Stephanus nameth it Badiza, we at this day Bath, and the Latiniſts commonly, Bathonia. Seated it is low in a plaine, and the ſame not great; environed round about with hilles al- C moſt all of one height, out of which certaine rilles of freſh river waters continually deſcend into the City, to the great commoditie of the Citizens. Within the Citie it ſelfe there buble and boile up three ſprings of hote water, of a blewiſh or ſea colour, ſending up from them thin vapours and a kind of a ſtrong ſent withall, by reaſon that the water is drilled and ſtrained through veines of Brimſtone and a clamy kind of earth called Bitumen. Which ſprings are very medicinable and of great vertue to cure bodies ouer-charged and benummed (as it were) with corrupt humors: For, by their heat they procure ſweat, and ſubdue the rebellious ſtubbemeſſe of the ſaid humors. Yet are not they wholſome at all houres: For, from eight of the clocke in the forenoone unto three afternoone, they are in maner ſkalding hote and doe D worke: and being thus troubled caſt up from the bottome certaine filth: during which time they are ſhut: neither may any bodie goe into them, untill by their ſluces they cleanſe themſelves and rid away that filthineſſe. Of theſe three, The Croſſe bath (ſo called of a croſſe ſtanding upright in old time in the mids of it) is of a very mild and temperate warmth: and hath twelve ſeats of ſtone about the brink or border thereof, and is encloſed within a wall. The ſecond, diſtant from this not fully 200. foot is much hoter: whereupon it is termed Hote Bath: Adjoining to theſe, is a Spittle or Lazar houſe, built by Reginald Biſhop of Bath for the reliefe of poore diſeaſed perſons. And theſe two are in the mids of a Street on the Weſt-ſide of the Citie. The third, which is the greateſt and after a ſort in the very boſome and heart E of the Citie, is called the Kings Bath, neere unto the Cathedrall Church, walled alſo round about, and fitted with 32. ſeats of arched worke: wherein men and women may ſit a part, who when they enter in put upon their bodies linnen garments, and have their guids. Where the ſaid Cathedrall Church now ſtandeth, there was in ancient time, as the report goeth, a temple conſecrated to Minerva. Cortes, Solinus Polyhiſtor ſpeaking (no doubt) of theſe hot Bathes ſaith thus, In Britaine, there are hot ſprings very daintily adorned and kept for mens uſe: the patroneſſe of which fountaines is the Goddeſſe Minerva: in whoſe temple the perpetuall fire never turneth aſhes and dead coles, but when the fire beginneth to die, it turnes into round maſſes of ſtone. Howbeit Athenæus writeth, that all hot Bathes which naturally breeke out of the bowels of F the earth are ſacred to Hercules. And in very deede, there is to be ſeene in the walles of this Citie an ancient Image (ſuch as it is) of Hercules graſping in his hand a Snake, among othet old monuments by the injurie of time now altogether defaced: But that we may not contend about this matter, let us grant (if it be ſo thought good) that Bathes were conſecrated to Hercules, and Minerva, iointly. For the Greeks doe write that Pallas firſt miniſtred water unto Hercules for to bath him, af-

Selwood.

Monney de la Mare.

Bathie. Aquæ Solis.

Hot waters.

The Temple of Minerva.

Digitized by Google

ter he had atchieved his labours. For my purpose it shall suffice, if I be able to prove A by the authority of Solinus (who writeth that Pallas was the Patroness of these Bathes) this Citie to be the same which the Britans in their tongue called Caer Pal- Caer Palladur. laddur, that is, The Citie of Pallas-water, or Vrbs Palladiæ Aquæ, if a man turne it into Latin. For, the matter, the name, and signification doe most fitly agree. The finding Britans addicted to Magicke. out of these Bathes our Fables attribute to the King of Britans Bleyaen Cloyth, that is, Bleyden the Magician; but with what probability, that I leave to others. Plinie indeed affirmeth, that the Britans in old time used the practise of magick with so great ceremonies, that it seemed they taught it the Persians: yet dare I not ascribe these Bathes to any art magicall. Some of our writers, when their minds were busied in other B matters, report Iulius Cæsar to have beene the first finder of them: But my opinion is, that later it was ere the Romans had knowledge of them, seeing Solinus is the first that hath made mention of them. The English-Saxons about the 44. yeere after their comming into Britaine, when they had broken league and covenant, and kindled againe the coles of war which had already beene quenched, besieged this Citie:
But when the warlike Arthur came upon them, they tooke the hill named Mons Badonicus, where, when courageously a long while they had fought it out to the uttermost, a great number of them were slaine. This hill seemeth to be the very same, which now is called Bannesdowne, over a little village neere this Citie, which they call Bathstone, on which there are banks, and a rampire as yet to be seene. Yet some C there be, I know, who seeke for this hill in Yorkshire: But Gildas may bring them backe againe to this place: For, in a manuscript Copie within Cambridge-Librarie, where he writeth of the victorie of Aurelius Ambrosse, thus we read: Vntill that yeere wherein siege was laid to the hill Badonicus, which is not farre from Severne mouth.
But in case this may not perswade them, know they, that the vale which runneth here along the river Avon, is named in British Nant Badon, that is, The Vale of Badon: and where we should seeke for the hill Badonicus, but by the Vale Badonica, I cannot hitherto see. Neither durst the Saxons for a long time after, set upon this Citie, but left it for a great while to the Britans. Howbeit in the yeere of Christ 577, when Cewa- lin King of the West-Saxons, had defeated the Britans at Deorham, in Glocestershire, D being both streitly besieged, and also assaulted, it yeelded at first: and within few yeeres recovering some strength grew up to great dignity and therewith got a new name, Akmancester, as I said. For, Osbrich in the yeere 676. founded a Nunnery there: and immediatly after, when the Mercians had gotten it under them, King Offa built another Church, both which in the time of the Danish broiles were overthrowen.
Out of the ruins of these two, arose afterwards the Church of S. Peter, in which Eadgar surnamed the Peace-maker, being crowned and sacred King, bestowed upon the Ci-tie very many Immunities, the memorie of which thing the Citizens yeerely with Solemne plaies doe yet celebrate. In Edward the Confessors time, (as we read in Domes-booke of England) it paied tribute according to 20. Hides, when as the Shire E paid. There, the King had 64. Burgers, and 30. Burgers of others. But this prosperity of theirs endured not long: for, soone after the Normans comming in, Robert Mowbray Nephew to the Bishop of Constance, who had raised no small Sedition against King William Rufus, sacked and burned it. Yet in short space it revived and recovered it selfe, by meanes of Iohn de Villula of Tours in France, who being Bishop of Welles, for five hundred marks (as saith William of Malmesburie) purchased this Citie of King Henrie the First, and translated his Episcopall chaire hither, retaining also the title of Bishop of Welles, and for his owne See built a new Church: which being not long since ready to fal, Oliuar Bishop of Bathe began to found another hard by that old (a curious and stately peece of worke, I assure you) and almost finished F the same: Which if he had performed indeed, it would no doubt have surpassed the most Cathedrall Churches of England. But the untimely death of so magnificent a Bishop, the iniquity and troubles of the time, and the suppression of religious houses ensuing, with the late avarice of some, who have craftily conveied the money collected thorowout England for that use, another way (if it be true that is reported)

have

Digitized by Google

A have envied it that glorie. But nevertheleſſe this Citie hath flouriſhed as well by clothing, as by reaſon of vſuall concourſe thither for health twice euery yeere, yea & hath fortified it ſelfe with walles, wherein there are ſet certaine Antique Images and Roman inſcriptions for the proofe of their antiquity; which now by age are ſo eaten into and worne, that they can hardly be read. And that nothing might be wanting to the ſtate and dignity of Bathe, ſome noble men it hath honored with the title of Earle. For, we read, that Philibert of Chandrw deſcended out of Bretaigne in France, was by King Henry the Seuenth ſtiled with this honor. Afterwards, King Henrie the Eighth, in the 28. yeere of his reigne created Iohn Bourcher Lord Fitzwarin, Earle Earles of B of Bathe. Who died ſhortly after, leaving by his wife the ſiſter of H. Daubeney Earle of Bathe.
Bridge-water, Iohn ſecond Earle of this familie, who by the daughter of George Lord Roos Inquiſit. 31.
had Iohn Lord Fitz-Warin, who deceaſed before his father, having by Fr. the daughter of Henrie 8.
S. Thomas Kitſon of Her graue William now third Earle of Bathe, who endevoureth to beautifie and adorne his nobility of birth, with commendable ſtudies of good letters. The longitude of this Citie is according to Geographers meaſure 20. degrees and 16. minutes. But the Latitude 51. degrees and 21. minutes. And now for a farwell, loe heere Nechams verſes, ſuch as they be, of theſe hot waters at Bathe, who lived 400. yeeres ſince.

Bathonia thermas vix præfero Virgilianas,
C Confecto proſunt balnea noſtra ſeni.
Proſunt attritis, colliſis, inualidiſque,
Et quorum morbis frigida cauſa ſubeſt.
Præuenit humanum ſtabilis natura laborem;
Seruit naturæ legibus artis opus.
Igne ſuo ſuccenſa quibus data balnea ſeruent,
Aenea ſubter aquas vaſa latere putant.
Errorem figmenta ſolent inducere paſſim.
Sed quid? ſulphureum nouimus eſſe locum.

Our Baines at Bath, with Virgils to compare,
D For their effects, I dare almoſt be bold:
For feeble folke and craſie good they are,
For bruis'd, conſum'd, far-ſpent, and very old:
For thoſe likewiſe, whoſe ſickneſſe comes of cold.
Nature prevents the painfull skill of man;
Arts worke againe, helps nature what it can.
Men thinke theſe Baths of ours are made thus hot,
By reaſon of ſome ſecret force of fire,
Which under them as under brazen pot
Makes more or leſſe, as reaſon doth require,
E The waters boile, and walme to our deſire:
Such fanſies vaine, uſe errors forth to bring,
But what? we know from Brimſtone veines they ſpring.

Have heere alſo, if you liſt to read them, two ancient Inſcriptions very lately digged up neere the Citie in Waldcot field, hard by the Kings highway ſide, which Robert Chambers, a ſtudious lover of antiquities, hath tranſlated into his garden: From whence I copied them out,

G. MVRRIVS. C. F. ARNIENSIS.
F FORO. IVLI. MODESTVS. MIL.
LEG. II. *AD. *P. *F. IVLI. SECVND.
AN. XXV. STIPEND.
*H. S. E.

* Adiutricis,
* Pia.
* Fœlicis.
* Hic ſitus eſt.

Digitized by Google

A

DIS. MANIBVS.
M. VALERIVS. M.
POL. EATINVS. *C. EQ.
MILES. LEG. AVG. AN.
XXX. STIPEN. X.
H. S. E.

*Cohortis Equitum.

B

I have ſeene theſe Antiquities alſo faſtened in the walles on the in-ſide, betweene the North and Weſt gates; to wit, Hercules bearing his left hand aloft, with a club in his right hand. In the fragment of a ſtone in great and faire letters

*DEC. COLONIÆ*GLEV.
VIXIT AN. LXXXVI.

*Decurioni.
*Gleui, that is, Of Gloceſter.

Then, leaues folded in, Hercules ſtreining two Snakes: and in a grave or Sepulcher-table, betweene two little images, of which the one holdeth the Horne of Amalthæa, in a worſe character which cannot eaſily be read, C

D. M.
SVCC. PETRONIÆ VIXIT
ANN. IIII. *M. IIII.
*D. XV. EPO.
MVLVS ET VICTISIRANA
*FIL. KAR. FEC.

D

Diis Manibus, that is, To the dead ghoſt.
Menſis*, that is, Monethis.
D. Dies*, that is, Daies.
Filiæ Kariſimæ fecerunt.*

A little beneath in the fragment of a ſtone in greater letters

VRN. IOP.

Betweene the Weſt and South gates, Ophiuchus enwrapped with a ſerpent, two mens heads with curled haire within the cope of the wall, a hare running, and annexed thereto upon a ſtone in letters ſtanding overthwart, VLIA. ILIA.

A naked man laying hand, as it were, upon a ſouldier, within the battlement alſo of the wall: two lying along kiſſing and clipping one another: a footeman with a ſword brandiſhing and bearing out his ſhield, a footeman with a ſpeare, and upon a ſtone with letters ſtanding overthwart, E

III. VSA.
IS. VXSC.

And Meduſaes head with haires all Snakes.

Along the ſaid river of Avon, which now is heere the bound betweene this ſhire & Gloceſterſhire, upon the bank Weſtward we have a ſight of Cainſham, ſo named of one Keina, a moſt devout and holy Britiſh virgine, who (as the credulous age beforetime, perſwaded many) transformed ſerpents into ſtones, becauſe there be found there in Stone quarries, ſuch ſtrange works of nature, when ſhe is diſpoſed to diſport herſelfe. For, I have ſeene a ſtone brought from hence reſembling a ſerpent, winding round in maner of a wreath, the head whereof being ſomewhat unperfect bare up in the Circumference thereof, and the end of the taile tooke up the centre within. But F

moſt

Digitized by Google

A most of these are headlesse. In the fields neere adjoining and other places beside, is found Percepier, an herbe peculiar unto England. Bitter it is in taste, and hath a biting sharpnesse withall: it never groweth above a span high, and commeth up all the yeere long of it selfe: small leavy flowres of a greenish hew it beares, without any stalke at all: Which herbe mightily and speedily provoketh urine: and out of it the distilled water serveth for great use, as P. Pæna in his Adversaries or Commentaries of Plants hath noted. Percepier.

Scarse five miles from this place, the river Avon passeth thorow the mids of Bristow, in Welch-British, Caer oder Nant Badon, that is, The Citie Oder, in the Vale of Bristow.
B Badon. In the Catalogue of ancient Cities, Caer Brito: In Saxon Bpiȝ̃ȝ̃tpeop, that is, A bright or shining place. But such as have called it Venta Belgarum, have deceived both themselves and others. This Citie standing partly in Somerset, and partly in Glocester-shires, is not to be reputed belonging either to this or that, having Magistrates of the owne by it selfe, and being of it selfe entire and a County incorporate. Situate it is somewhat high betweene Avon and the little river Frome, sufficiently defended with rivers and fortifications together: For, environed it was sometime with a double wall. So faire to behold by reason of buildings as well publicke as private, that it is fully correspondent to the name of Bright stow: With common Sewes or Sinks, (they call them Goutes) so made to run under the ground for the con-
C veiance and washing away of all filth, that for cleanlinesse and holesomnesse a man would not desire more: whereupon there is no use heere of carts: so well furnished with all things necessarie for mans life, so populous and well inhabited withall, that next after London and Yorke, it may of all Cities in England justly challenge the chiefe place. For, the mutuall entercourse of trafficke and the commodious haven, which admitteth in ships under saile into the very bosome of the Citie, hath drawne people of many countries thither. For the Avon, so often as the Moone declineth downward from the meridian point, and passeth by the opposite line unto it, so swelleth with the tide from the Ocean, that it raiseth up the ships there riding and lying in the oze 11. or 12. els afloat in water. And the Citizens themselves are rich Mer-
D chants, and trafficke all over Europe, yea and make Voiages at sea so far as into the most remote parts of America. But, when, and by whom it was built, it is hard to say. Old it seemeth not to be, for as much as in all those spoiles and sackages that the Danes made, there is no mention of it in our Historians. And verily mine opinion is, that it first grew up to some name, when the English-Saxons Empire was much declining, seeing that it is no where named before the yeere of our Lord 1063; when Harold (as Florentinus of Worcester writeth) embarked himselfe and his armie, and put to sea from Bristow to Wales. In the first yeeres of the Normans, Berton, a maner adjoining, And Bristow, paid unto the King (as we find in the booke of Domesday) 110. marks of Silver, and the Burgers said, that Bishop G. hath 33. marks, and one marke of E Gold. After this, Robert Bishop of Constance that plotted seditious practises against King William Rufus, chose it for the seat-towne of the whole warre, fortified it, being then but a small Citie, with that inner (wall as I take it) which at this day is in part standing. But a few yeeres after, the circuit thereof was every way enlarged. For, on the South, Radcliffe, wherein there stood some small houses under the Citie side, is by a stone bridge, with houses on each hand built upon it, more like a street than a bridge, joined to the Citie: enclosed within a wall, and the inhabitants thereof enfranchised Citizens: yea and hospitals in every quarter thereof for the benefit of poore people and faire Parish-churches to the glorie of God were erected. The most beautifull of all which by far, is S. Maries of Radcliffe without the walles, into which F there is a stately ascent upon many staires: so large withall, so finely and curiously wrought, with an arched roofe over head of stone artificially embowed, a steeple also of an exceeding height, that all the Parish-churches in England which hetherto I have seene, in my judgement it surpasseth many degrees. In it, William Cannings the founder, hath two faire monuments: upon the one lieth his image portraied in an Aldermans robe: For, five times hee had beene Major of this Citie: upon the other,

Digitized by Google

other, his image likewise in sacerdotall habite; for that in his old age he tooke the or- A ders of priesthood, and was Deane of that Colledge which himselfe instituted at Westburie. There is hard by, another Church also, which they call the Temple, the lanterne or towre whereof when the bell rings shaketh to and fro, so as it hath cloven and divided it selfe from the rest of the building, and made such a chinke from the bottome to the top, as that it gapeth the bredth of three fingers, and both shutteth and openeth whensoever the bell is rung. And heere I must not overpasse in silence S. Stephens Church, the towre steeple whereof being of a mightie heigth, one Shipward, alias Barstaple a Citizen and Merchant, within the memorie of our grandfathers, right sumptously and artificially built. From the East-side also and the North, B augmented it was with a number of edifices, enclosed within a wall and fenced with the river Frome, which having runne by the wall side gently falleth into the Avon, and yeeldeth a dainty harbour for ships, with a wharfe convenient for the shipping and vnlading of Merchandise in and out, (they call it the Kay.) Under which betweene the confluents of Avan and Frome, there is a plaine beset round about with trees, yeelding a most pleasant walking place: South-east, where no rivers are to gard it, Robert the base sonne of King Henrie the First, whom they commonly name Robert Rufus, and Consull of Gloceſter, because he was Earle of Gloceſter, built a large and strong Castle for the defense of this Citie; and of a pious & devout affection appointed every tenth stone to the building of a Chapell neere unto the C Priorie of S. James, which he likewise founded by the Citie side. This Robert had to wife Mabile the onely daughter and heire of Robert Fitz-Hamon, who held this towne by vassallage in Capite, of King William Conqueror. This castle was scarsely built, when King Stephen besieged it, but with lost labour: for, he was compelled to raise his siege and depart: and a few yeeres after, was imprisoned in the same, giving thereby a testimonie and proofe how uncertaine the chance of war is. Beyond the river Frome which hath a bridge over it, at Frome-gate there riseth an high hill, with a steepe & crooked ascent, so as it is painfull to goe up unto it: From whence yee have a most faire and goodly prospect to the Citie and haven underneath. This hill in the very top and pitch thereof, spreadeth presently into a large, greene and D even plaine, which in the midst is shadowed with a double row and course of trees, and among them stands a pulpit of Stone and a Chapell, wherein (by report) lieth enterred Jordan the companion of Augustine the Englishmens Apostle. Now it is converted to a schoole, and on both sides (to say nothing of the neate and fine houses of private men) beautified it is with publike and stately buildings. Of the one side was a collegiat Church called Gaunts, of the founder one Henrie Gaunt Knight, who relinquishing the world, in this place betooke himselfe to the service of God: but now through the bounty of Thomas Carr a wealthy citizen, converted to the keeping of Orphans: on the other side directly over against it stand two Churches dedicated to S. Augustine, the one (which is the lesse) a Parish-church: the o- E ther, that is greater, the Bishops Cathedrall Church, endowed with six Prebenda-ries, by King Henrie the Eighth: the greatest part whereof is now destroied, where the Colledge-gate workmanly built carieth in the front this Inscription,

REX HENRICVS II. ET DOMINVS RO-
BERTVS FILIVS HARDINGI, FILII RE-GIS DACIÆ, HVIVS MONASTERII
PRIMI FVNDATORES EXTITERVNT.

That is,

King Henry the Second, and Lord Robert the sonne of Harding, the King of Denmarks sonne, were the first founders of this Monasterie.

This

Digitized by Google

A This Robert, called by the Normans Fitz-Harding, descended of the bloud roiall of Denmarke was an Alderman of Bristow, of King Henrie the Second so entirely beloved, that by his meanes Maurice his sonne maried the daughter of the Lord of Barkley. Whereby his posterity, who flourished in great honor, are unto this day called Barons of Barkley; and some of them have beene buried in this Church. Barons de Barkley.

From hence as Avon holdeth on his course, there are on ech side very high cliffes by nature set there (as it were) of purpose, the one of them which on the East-side overlooketh the river beareth the name of S. Vincents rock, so full of Diamants, that a man may fill whole strikes or bushels of them. These are not so much set by, because
B they be so plenteous. For in bright and transparent colour they match the Indian Diamants, if they passe them not: in hardnesse onely they are inferior to them; but in that nature her selfe hath framed them pointed with six cornered or foure cornered smooth sides; I thinke them therefore worthy to be had in greater admiration. The other rocke also on the West-side is likewise full of Diamants, which by the wonderfull skill and worke of nature, are enclosed as young ones within the bowels of hollow and reddish flints: for, heere is the earth of a red colour. When Avon hath left these rocks behind him, with full chanell at length he disengorgeth himselfe into the Severn-sea.

Then remaineth now to reckon up the Earles and Dukes of this County. The first
C Earle of Somerset, by tradition, was William de Mohun or Moion, who may seeme to be the very same, whom Maude the Empresse in a charter whereby she created William de Mandevill Earle of Essex; taketh as a witnesse under this name, Comes. W. de Moion. Neither from that time meete we with any expresse and apparent mention of Earles of Somerset, unlesse it be in these letters Patents of King Henrie the Third, unto Peter de * Mawley, which, that I may draw out the iudgement of others, I will heere set downe literally. Know yee, that we have received the homage of our welbeloved Uncle William Earle of Sarisbury for all the lands that he holdeth of us, & principally for the County or Earldom of Somerset, which we have given unto him with all appertenances for his homage and service, saving the roialty to our selves: and therefore we will & command*
D you, that yee see he have full seisine of the foresaid Earldome, and all the pertinances thereto, and that ye intermeddle not in any thing from henceforth, as touching the County or Earledome aforesaid &c. And commandement is given to all Earles, Barons, Knights and Freeholders of the County of Somerset, that unto the same Earle they doe fealty and homage, saving their faith and allegeance unto their soveraigne Lord the King, & that from henceforth they be intentive and answerable unto him as their Lord. Whether by these words in the Patent he was Earle of Somerset, as also of Denshire (for, of the same William hee wrote like wise in the very same words unto Robert de Courtney) I leave for other men to judge. Under this King Henrie the Third (as we find in a booke written in French, which pertaineth to the house of the Mohuns Knights) it is recorded,
E that Pope Innocentius in a solemne feast, ordained Reginald Mohun Earle de Ests, (that is, as the author doth interpret it, Of Somerset) by delivering unto him a golden consecrated rose, and an yeerely pension to be paied upon the high Altar of S. Pauls, in London. So that this Reginald may seeme to have beene not properly an Earle; but an Apostolicall Earle. For, so were they termed in those daies who had their creation from the Bishop of Rome, (like as they were called Earles Imperiall whom the Emperor invested) and such had power to institute Notaries and Scribes, to legitimate such as were base borne, &c. under certaine conditions. A long time after Iohn de Beaufort the base sonne of Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster by Catharine Swinford, being made legitimate by King Richard the Second, together with his brethren and F sister, with consent of the Parlament, was preferred to the honor of Earle of Somerset, and afterwards created Marquesse Dorset; but soone after deprived thereof by King Henrie the Fourth, having the title onely of Earle of Somerset left unto him. The said Iohn had three sonnes, Henrie Earle of Somerset, who died in his tender age; Iohn, created by King Henrie the Fifth, the first Duke of Somerset, who had one sole daughter named Margaret, mother to King Henrie the Seuenth: and see page 453.

Earles and Dukes of Somerset.

Patents. Anno primo Henric. tertij.

* De malo lacu.

* De Comitatu.

Earle Apostolicall.

See Earles of Dorset. pa. 217.

Edmund

Digitized by Google

Edmund who ſucceeded after his brother in the Dukedome: and having been a certaine time Regent of France, being called home, and accuſed for the loſſe of Normandie, after he had ſuffred much grievance at the peoples hands in that regard, was in that wofull war betweene the houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke ſlaine in the firſt battaile of S. Albans. Henrie his ſonne being placed in his rowne, whiles he ſerved the times ſliding one while with Yorke, and another while with Lancaſter, in the battaile at Exham was by thoſe of the houſes of Yorke: taken priſoner, and with the loſſe of his head paied for his unconſtant levity. Edmund his brother ſucceeded him in his honor, who of this family was the laſt Duke of Somerſet, and when the whole power of the Lancaſtrians was diſcomfited at Tewkesbury, was forcibly pulled out of the Church into which all embraced with bloud he fled as into a Sanctuary, and then beheaded. Thus all the legitimate males of this familie being dead and gone, firſt King Henry the ſeuenth honored with title Emund his owne ſonne a young child, who ſhortly departed this world: afterwards King Henrie the Eight, did the like for his baſe ſonne, named Henry Fitz-Roy. And ſeeing hee had no children, King Edward the Sixth, inveſted Sir Edward de Sancto Mauro, commonly, Seimor, with the ſame honor, who being moſt power-able, honorable, and loden with titles, for thus went his ſtile, Duke of Somerſet, Earle of Herrford, Vicount Beauchamp, Baron Seimor, Vnkle to the King, Gouernor of the King, Protector of his Realmes, Dominions and ſubiects, Lieftenant of the forces by land and ſea, Lord high Treaſurer and Earle Marſhall of England, Captaine of the Iſles Gernſey and Iarſey &c. Was ſuddainly overwhelmed, as it were by a diſport of fortune which never ſuffereth ſuddaine over greatneſſe to laſt long, and for a ſmall crime, and that vpon a nice point ſubtlely deuiſed and packed by his enemies, bereaued both of thoſe dignities and his life withall.

In this countrey are numbred Pariſhes. 385.

WILSHIRE.

Digitized by Google

A

WILSHIRE.

Il-ſhire, which alſo perrained to the BELGAE, called in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue, Wil-ꝛeꝺꝺa, in Latine commonly termed, Wiltonia, taking that denomination of Wilton, ſomtime the chiefe towne, like as it of the River Willy, is altogether a mediterranean or mid-land countrey. For, encloſed it is with Somerſetſhire on the Weſt, Berkſhire and Hampſhire on the Eaſt; on the North, with Gloceſterſhire; and on the South, with Dorſetſhire, and a part of Hamſhire. A Region, which, as it breedeth a number of warlike and hardy men, who in old time, with Cornwall and Denſhire together challenged by reaſon of their manhood, and martiall proweſſe the prerogative in the Engliſh armie of that regiment, which ſhould ſecond the maine battell, (as ſaith Iohn of Sarisburie in his Polycraticon) ſo it is exceeding fertile, and plentifull of all things, yea, and for the varietie thereof, paſſing pleaſant and delightſome. The Northerne and upper part, which they call, North-Wilſhire, riſeth up ſomewhat with
C delectable hils, attired in times paſt with large and great woods, (which now beginne to grow thinne) and watered with cleere rivers. For, Iſis the principall, and as it were, Prince of all the Engliſh Rivers; which afterwards taketh to him the name of Tamiſis, that is, Thames, being now as yet but little and ſhallow, together with other Rivers of leſſe name, which I will ſpeake of in their proper places, water it plentifully. The South part with large graſſie plaines, feedeth innumerable flocks of ſheepe, having his Rivers, ſwelling Brookes, and rils of everliving fountaines. The middeſt of this ſhire, which for the moſt part alſo, lieth even and plain, is divided overthwart from Eaſt to Weſt, with a Dike of wonderfull worke, caſt up for many miles together in length: The people dwelling there about, call it Wanſdike, which D upon an errour generally received, they talke and tell to have been made by the divell upon a Wedneſday. For in the Saxon tongue it is called, Woꝺeneꝛ ꝺic that is to ſay, the Ditch of Wooden or Mercurie, and as it ſhould ſeeme, of VVoden that falſe imagined God, and Father of the Engliſh-Saxons. But I have alwaies been perſwaded, that the Saxons made it, as a limit to divide the two Kingdomes of the Mertians and weſt-Saxons aſunder. For, this was the verie place of battell between them, whiles they ſtrove one with another, to enlarge their Dominions. And neere unto this Dike ſtandeth VVodensburge a little Village, where Ceauline, the moſt warlike King of the weſt-Saxons, in the yeere of grace 590, whiles hee defended his Marches, in a bloodie fight, received ſuch a foile and overthrow by the Britans and Eng-
E liſhmen, that hee was forced to flie his countrey, and to end his daies in exile, a pitious and lamentable ſpectacle, even to his verie enemies. And at this dike, to ſay nothing of other accidents, Ina the weſt-Saxon, and Ceolred the Mercian, joyned battell, and departed the field on even hand: Like to this was that ditch, whereby King Offa kept the Britans off from his Mercians; called even at this day Offa-dike: others alſo are ſtill to bee ſeene, among the Eaſt-Angles in Cambridgeſhire, and Suffolke, wherewith they limitted their territory, and defended themſelves from the in-rodes and invaſions of the Mercians.

The river Iſis or Ouze.

Wanſdike.

Dikes of the Marches.

In the North-part of Wil-ſhire, which is watered with Iſis, or the Thames, there is a towne called Creckelade by Marianus, by others Greekelade of Greeke Philoſophers, F as ſome are readie to beleeve; who, as the hiſtorie of Oxford reporteth, began there an Univerſitie, which afterwards was tranſlated to Oxford. Weſt from that is Highworth highly ſeated, a well knowne Market, but ſouth from Crekelad, I ſaw Lediard Tregoze, the ſeat of the familie of Saint-Iohn, Knights: the which Margaret de Bello Campo, or Beauchamp, afterwards Ducheſſe of Somerſet, gave to Oliver of Saint Iohn her ſecond ſonne. For, to her it came as an inheritance, by Patiſhul, Grandiſon, and Lediard. Saint Iohn.

Digitized by Google

Wood-toun, or, Wotton Bruſſet.

and Tregoze, names of great honour. Wotton Baſſet bordeth hard upon this, having his primitive name from VVood, the addition doth prove, that it belonged to the Noble houſe of the Baſſets. But in the latter fore-going age, it was (as I have heard ſay) the habitation of the Duke of Yorke, who made there a verie large Parke, for to encloſe Deere in. From hence Breden wood, now Breden Forreſt, ſtretched it ſelfe farre and wide, which in the yeere 905, by Ethelwald Clyto*, and the Danes that aided him, was laid waſte, and the inhabitants endured all calamities of warre. A Breden Forreſt.

*Prince of the bloud.

On the weſt ſide whereof, the River Auon, above mentioned, gently runneth, which breaking forth almoſt in the North limit of this ſhire, keepeth his courſe ſouthward, and (as Aethelward noteth,) was ſometime the bound between the Kingdoms of the weſt-Saxons, and the Mercians: upon which many great battels from time to time were fought: whiles it is but ſmal, he ſlideth under Malmesbury hill, & receiving another ſtreame, well neere encloſeth the place. A verie proper towne this is, and hath a great name for clothing, which (as wee read in the Eulogie of Hiſtories) Cunwallo Mulmutius, King of the Britans, built together with Lacocke and Tetburie two Caſtles, and named it Caer Bladon, which being at length by heat of warres deſtroied, out of the ruines thereof there aroſe, as writers record, a Caſtle which our Anceſtors in their tongue, called, Ingelborne: at which time, the Saxon petie Kings had their roiall palace at Caerdurburge, now Brokenbridge, a little village ſcarſe a mile off. Neither verily was this towne for a long time knowen by any other name than Ingelborne, untill one Maidulph an Iriſh Scot, a man of great learning, and ſinguler holineſſe of life, taking delight to a pleaſant grove, that grew up here under the hill, lived for a time a ſolitarie Heremite there: and afterwards teaching a ſchoole, and with his ſcholars betaking himſelfe to a monaſticall life, built him a little monaſterie, or Cell. From this time, of that Maidulph, the towne began to bee called, Maidulfesburge for Ingleborne, termed by Beda, Maidulphi Vrbs, that is, Maidulphs Citie, and afterwards ſhort, Malmesburies and in ſome of our Hiſtories, and antient Donations made unto this place, Meldunum, Malduburie, and Maldunsburg. Among the Diſciples of this Maidulph, flouriſhed chiefely Aldelme, who being elected his ſucceſſour, by the helpe of Eleutherius, Biſhop of the VVeſt-Saxons, unto whom the place of right belonged, built there a verie faire Monaſterie, and was himſelfe the firſt Abbot thereof: of whom alſo in a certaine manuſcript, this towne is called Aldelmesbirig. But this name ſoone periſhed, yet the memorie of the man continueth ſtill: for canonized he was a Saint: and on his feſtivall day, there was here kept a great Faire, at which uſually there is a band of armed men, appointed to keepe the peace among ſo many ſtrangers reſorting thither. And right worthy is he, that his memorie ſhould remaine freſh for ever, in regard, not onely of his Holineſſe, but of his learning alſo, as thoſe times were. For the firſt, he was of the Engliſh nation, who wrote in Latine, and the firſt that taught Engliſhmen the way, how to make a Latine verſe: the which in theſe verſes, hee both promiſed of himſelfe, and performed, B

Malmesbury.

Ingleborne.

Maidulph the Scot.

Aldelme. D

E

Primus ego in patriam mecum, modò vita ſuperſit,
Aonio rediens deducam vertice Muſas.

I will be firſt, God lending life, that into countrey mine,
From Aon top at my returne, ſhall bring the Muſes nine.

This Adelme after his death, Athelſtane that Noble Prince, choſe to be his peculiar protectour and tutelor Saint, and for that cauſe beſtowed verie great immunities upon this towne, and enriched the monaſterie with as large and ample endowments. In which he made choiſe to be buried, and his monument the inhabitants ſhevv to this day. After Athelſtane, this Monaſterie flouriſhed long in continuall wealth, and among other famous Clerks, and great ſcholars, brought forth VVilliam, ſurnamed thereof Malmesburienſis, unto whom for his learned induſtry, the Hiſtories of England both civill and Eccleſiaſticall, are deepely indebted. The tovvne alſo maintained and upholden, as it vvere, by the meanes of the Monaſterie, vvas likevviſe fortified F

William Malmesbury.

Digitized by Google

A tified by Roger Bishop of Salisburie, who in the beginning of the warres betweene Henrie of Anjou, and King Stephen strengthned it with walles, and a Castle, which being once besieged by King Henrie the second, defended it selfe. Moreover that magnificent Bishop, both here and at Salisburie built houses, for receit verie large, for cost as sumptuous, and for shew right beautifull; so even and orderly were the stones couched, and laid together, that the joints could not be seene, and the whole wall thorowout seemed to the eie one entire stone. But the Castle not many yeeres after by K. Iohns permission, was pulled downe to the use of the Monkes (for enlarging their monasterie) who increased it still continually both in buildings, livings,
B and revenues, untill that fatall thunder-clap overthrew all the Monasteries of England. Then their lands, rents, and riches that had been so many yeeres in gathering and heaping up together, which were (as our Forefathers reputed them) The vowes of the faithfull, the raunsome and redemption of sinnes, and the patrimonies of poore people, were quite scattered: and the verie Minster it selfe should have sped no better than the rest, but beene demolished, had not T. Stumpes a wealthy clothier, by much suit, but with a greater peece of money, redeemed and bought it for the townesmen his neighbours, by whom it was converted to a Parish-church, and for a great part is yet standing at this day. Councell at Aix.

From this Maidulphs Citie, or Malmesbury, as Avon runneth, it cometh to Dantesey,
C that gave name unto the possessions thereof, worshipfull Knights of old time in this tract: from whom by the Easterlings, commonly called Stradlings, it came unto the familie of the Danvets. Out of which, Henrie Danvers, thorow the favour of King Iames, obtained of late the title and honour of Baron Danvers of Dantesey. Six miles from hence, Avon taketh unto him from the East, a Brooke, which runneth thorow Calne, an old little towne situat upon a stony ground, having in it a faire Church to commend it: at which place when great adoe there was between the Monkes, and Priests about single life, a frequent Provinciall Councell, or Synod was holden in the yeere of our redemtion, 977. But behold, whiles they were debating the matter, the D Convocation house, wherein the States sat, by breaking of the maine timber-worke, and falling asunder of the floore, fell suddenly downe, together with the Prælates, Nobles, and Gentlemen there assembled: with the fall whereof many were hurt, and more slaine outright: onely Dunstane, President of the said counsell, and held with the Monkes, escaped without harme: which miracle (for so that age took it) is thought wonderfully to have credited the profession of Monkerie, and weakned the cause of married Priests. Dantesey. Baron Danvers. Calne. A Synode at touching the single life of Priests.

From hence Avon now growen greater, Chippenham, in Saxon Cyppanham, of E note at this day for the market there kept; whereof it tooke the name: For, Cyppan, in the Saxon tongue, is as much to say as to buy, and Cyppman, a buyer, like as with us, Cheapen, and Chapman: and among the Germans, Coppman. But in those daies, it was the Kings manour: and by King Ælfred in his testament, bequeathed to a younger daughter of his. Nothing is there now worth the sight but the Church, built by the Barons Hungerford, as appeareth every where by their coats of Armes set up thereon. Directly over against this, but somewhat farther from the banke, lieth Cosham, now a little Village, but sometime King Etheldreds mansion house, and F for that the Earles of Cornwall, were wont to retire themselves, and sojourne there, it was of good account: within view whereof, is Castlecombe, an old Castle, ennobled sometime by the Lords of it, the Walters of Dunstavill, men of great renowme in their time: out of whose house, the Writhoslaies Earles of Southampton are descended, * Petronilla or Parnell daughter and sole heire of the last Walter, was wedded unto Robert de Montfort, and bare unto him William his Sonne, who sold this castle, with the rest of his lands, and possessions unto Bartholmew Badilsmer: from whom (as I have heard) it passed to the Scroopes, who ever since have held it. But now returne we unto the river: upon which are seated, Leckham, the possession of the noble familie of the Bainards, where peeces of Romane money have oftentimes been found: and Lacocke, where the most godly and religious woman, Dame Ela Chippenham. Cyppan, what it is. Cosham. Castlecombe Dunstavile. * Pernell. Leckham. Lacocke.

Digitized by Google

Counteſſe of Salisburie (being now a widdow) built a Monaſterie, (like as ſhee did another at Henton) in the yeere 1232, to the honour of the bleſſed Virgin Marie, and Saint Bernard, in which her ſelfe devoutly dedicated, both her bodie and ſoule to the ſervice of God. A

Avon from hence ſhadowed with trees, holdeth on his courſe, not far from Brumham, an inhabitation (in times paſt) of the Baron Samond, or truly De Sancto Amando, Saint Amand, afterward of the Baintons from them: before hee admitteth to him a little riveret from the Eaſt, that putteth forth his head neere unto the Caſtle De Vies, Devizes, or the Vies. Florentius of Worceſter calleth it Diviſio, and Neuburgentis, Diviſa. Heretofore a ſtately place, I aſſure you, very ſtrong as well by naturall ſituation, as by mans hand, but through the injurie of time, now decaied and defaced. This Caſtle, that it might diſgrace, and put downe all other Caſtles in England, Roger Biſhop of Salisburie (whom from a poore maſſe-Prieſt, Fortune had exalted unto the higheſt authoritie next the King) at his exceſſive charges built. But Fortune (as one ſaith) hath ſet no man ſo high, but ſhe threatneth to take from him as much, as ſhe hath permitted him to have. For, King Stephen upon a diſpleaſure, wrung from him both this Caſtle, and that alſo of Shireburne, together with all his wealth and riches, as great as it was, yea, and brought the ſilly old man ſo low in priſon, what with hunger, and what with other miſeries, that between the feare of death, and torments of this life, he had neither will to live, nor skill to die. At which time was handled, or canvaſed, rather toſſed to and fro this queſtion, whether by the Canons and Decrees of Church, Biſhops might hold Caſtles; or if this bee by indulgence tolerated, whether they ought not in dangerous and ſuſpected times, ſurrender them up into the Kings hands. Saint Amand Barons. The Vies. Devizes. B C

Avon having received this riveret to beare him company, maketh way weſtward: and ſtraight waies another brook from the South runneth into him, which hath given name to the houſe ſtanding upon it, called likewiſe Barons Brooke, which as it afforded habitation in old time to Iohn Pavely, Lord of VVeſtburie Hundred, ſo afterwards it gave the title of Baron, to Robert VVilloughby, becauſe by the Cheynies hee derived his pedigree from Paveley, what time as King Henry the Seventh, advanced him to a Barons dignitie, as being high in his favour, Steward of his houſe, and appointed (by report) for a while Admirall. Whereupon he uſed the Helme of a ſhip for a ſeale in his ring, like as Pompeie in times paſt, Governour of the Romane Navie, the ſtemme or Pro thereof in his coines. But this familie fading, as it were, and dying in the verie blade, quickly came to an end. For, he left a ſonne Robert Lord Brooke, who of a former wife, begat Edward his ſonne that died before his father, leaving a daughter married to Sir Foulk Grevil; and of a ſecond wife two daughters, by whom a great inheritance, and rich eſtate, was conveighed to the Marques of Wincheſter, and Lord Montjoy. D

Edindon. Neere unto this, Eaſtward lieth Edindon, in old time Eathandune, where King Alfred in as memorable a battell as any time elſe, moſt fortunatly vanquiſhed the bold, inſolent and outragious Danes, and drave them to this hard paſſe, that they ſwore in a ſet forme of oath, forthwith to depart out of England. In which place alſo VVilliam de Edindon, Biſhop of Wincheſter, whom King Edward highly favoured, here borne and taking his name from hence, erected a Colledge, Bonis hominibus*, Bon-homes, as they called them, that is, for good men. But at the little river aforeſaid, ſomewhat higher, ſtandeth upon a hill Trubridge, ſometimes Truabrig, that is, a ſure and truſty bridge. But for what cauſe this name was ſet upon it, it is not for certaine knowen. In great name and proſperitie it is in theſe daies, by reaſon of clothing, and ſheweth the remaines of a caſtle, which belongeth to the Duchie of Lancaſter, and ſometime to the Earle of Salisburie. Avon thus increaſed by this riveret, watereth Bradford, in the foregoing times Bradanford, (ſo named of a broad foord) ſituat upon the deſcent or fall of an hill, and built all of ſtone: where Kenilwacuh King of the Weſt-Britans, embrued his ſword with blould in civill warre againſt Cuthred his neere kinſman. Here Avon biddeth Wil-ſhire farewell, and entreth cloſely into the Countie E F

*Bon-hommes.

Trubridge.

Bradford. Anno 652.

of

Digitized by Google

A of Somerset, minding to visit the Bathes.

The West limit of this shire goeth downe directly from hence southward, by Long-leat, the dwelling place of the Thins, (descended from the Bottevils) a verie faire, neat, and elegant house, in a foule soile, which although once or twise it hath been burnt, hath risen eftsones more faire. Also, by Maiden Bradley, so called of one of the Inheritrices of Manasses Basset, a most noble personage in his time, who being her selfe a maiden infected with the leaprosie, founded an house heere for maidens that were leapers, and endowed the same with her owne Patrimonie and Livetide, like as her Father before time had thereabout erected a Priorie: Like-
B wise, by Stourton, the seat of the Lords Stourton, whom King Henrie the Sixth raised to this dignitie, after their estate had beene much bettered in lands and revenues, by marriage with the Daughter and heire of the familie, Le Moigne, or Monke of Essex, and not of Mohun, as some hitherto have been falsely perswaded: and hereupon it is, that they have borne for their Creast, A Demi-Monke, with a whip in his hand. The place tooke his name of the River Stour, that under this towne walmeth out of sixe fountaines: which the Sturtons Lords of the place, have brought into their shield sables.

By Maiden Bradley aboveside, glideth Dever-rill, a prettie small Rill, so called, for
C that, like as Anas in Spaine, and Mole in Surrey, (which tooke their names thereupon) it diveth (as it were) under the ground, and a mile off rising up here againe, hasteneth toward VERLVCIO, a most ancient towne, whereof the Emperor Antonine maketh mention in his Itinerarie: which having not quite lost the name, is called, Werminster, compounded of that old name, and the English Saxon word, Minster, which signifieth, a Monasterie. In times past, it enjoyed great immunities and freedomes: For, as we read in the Booke of King William the Great, Nec geldavit, nec hidata fuit: that is, It paid no tribute, nor was rated by the Hide. Now onely, for a round Corn-market, it is exceeding much frequented: for hardly a man would beleeve what a mightie deale of Corne is weekely brought hither, and quickly sold. But for remnants of Romane Antiquities, I could discover none
D here, onely on the East side are seene some trenches upon the hilles, and on the West, a natutall round and high copt hill, called, Clay-hill.

Heere by beginneth, North, South, and Eastward thorow the mids of the Shire, the Plaines so wide and open, that hardly a man can see from one side to another, and doe limit the Horizon; whereupon they are named, The Plaines, they are but rarely inhabited, and had in late time a bad name, for robberies there committed. On the South side thereof, there runne quietly two most still Rivers, Willey-borne, which Asserius nameth Guilou, and Nadder, commonly called, Adderbourn. Willey-bourne rising at Werminster, runneth neere Heitesburie, or Hegtresburie an antient mansion place of the Family of Hungerford; but in the E Church which hath beene Collegiate, there is seene but one defaced monument of them. The last Lord Hungerford, created by King Henrie the Eight, had his denomination of this place, but enjoyed that honour a short while being condemned of a crime not to bee uttered. Hence it hieth to Willy, a Village some few miles distant: over against it a verie large warlike fence or hold, and the same fortified with a deepe and duple Ditch: the neighbour-dwellers call it Yanesburie Castle. And by the forme and maner of making, a man may easily know it was a Romane Campe. There are, who verily thinke it was Vespasians Campe, considering that hee being Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion under Claudius the Emperour, subdued unto the Romane Empire, two nations in this tract:
F and they suppose that in the name Yanesburie, there remaine some reliques still of Vespasians name. Opposit to this on the other side the water is another lesse campplace singly ditched, called Dun-shat, and about one mile and a halfe from Yanesbury, another likewise with a single trench, named Woldsbury. I have noted the names as the country people terme them, that other may collect some matter thereby more than I can. As for Nadder, that springeth out of the South limit of the shire, it creepeth with Long-Leat.

Maiden Bradley.

p. 574.

Dever rill.

Verlucio.

Werminster.

Sarisburie Plaines.

Lord Hungerford of Heitesburie.

Yanesburie.

Digitized by Google

crooked windings, like an Adder, (whereof it may seeme to have been so called) not farre from Wardour, a proper fine Castle, appertaining sometime to the Progenie, surnamed Saint Martins. But (to say nothing of many owners between, and amongst them of the Lord Brooke, who repaired it, and died at it) now it belongeth to Thomas Arundell, who being of late by King Iames, created Baron Arundell of Wardour, is worthy to be with praise remembred: For that being a young Gentleman, he of a pious and godly mind, undertaking a journey to serve in the warres against the Turks, sworne enemies of Christendome, for his singular prowesse shewed at the winning of Strigonium in Hungarie, deserved by honourable Charter, (from Rodolph the Second of that name, Emperour) to be made a Count of the Empire, the tenour of which Patent, is thus: For that hee had borne himselfe valiantly, and manfully in the feld, and in assaults of Cities and Castles, and shewing good proofe of valor in forcing of the water tower neere Strigonium, tooke from the Turks with his owne hand their Baner, both himselfe, and all and everie one his children, heires and issue whatsoever of both sexes, descending from him lawfully, either borne alreadie, or that ever shall, from generation to generation be borne, we have created, made, and named Counts and Countesses, have endowed and adorned, and with the title, honour, and dignitie of a Count imperiall. Over against it lieth Hach, a place at this day of small reckoning, but which in the time of King Edward the First, had his Lord Eustach de Hach, summoned among the Peeres of the Realme for a Baron, unto the high Court of Parliament. And a few miles from thence is Hindon a quick market, and knowen for nothing else that I could see.

Wardour Castle. Baron Arundell. Aquaticum. 1595. Count-Imperiall. L. Hach. Hindon.

At the meeting of these two rivers, Willey giveth his name to VVilton, a place well watered, and sometime the head towne of the whole Shire, which thereof tooke the name. In antient times it was called Ellandunum: for so we are enformed by the testimonie of old parchment records, which have in expresse termes VVeolfthan Earle of Ellandunum, that is to say, of VVilton: and in another place, that hee founded a little Monasterie at Ellandunum, that is, at VVilton. By this name Ellan, I am partly induced to thinke, that this is the river Alan, which Ptolomee mentioneth in this coast of the Countrey. At this towne it was, that in the yeere of our redemption 821. Egbert King of the West-Saxons, obtained a victorie against Beor Wulf of Mercia, but so mortall a battell it was to both parties, that the very river flowed commixt with the blood of those, who were allied in bloud, and differed in faction. At this towne also in the yeere of salvation 871. Ælfrid joyning battell with the Danes, had the better hand at first, but immediatly the alternative fortune of war comming about, he was put to the worst, and driven to retire. In the Saxons time it flourished with the best in numbers of inhabitants, & King Eadgar, as our Chronicles beare witnes, beautified it was with a Nunnery, wherof he made his owne daughter Edith, Prioresse. But by the antient Charter of Eadgar himselfe, bearing date, An. 874, it appeareth certainly to bee of more antiquitie. For, therein it is thus written: The Monasterie which by King Edward my great Grandfathers Grandfather, was founded in a well frequented and peopled place, that by a knowen name is by the Inhabitants called VVilton. And in the life of Saint Edward the Confessor, we read thus, VVhiles S. Edward went in hand with the building of the Monasterie of S. Peter in VVestminster, Editha his wife began at VVilton, (where she was brought up) a Monastery princely built of stone, in lieue of the Church, made of timber, following the Kings good affection with the like devotion of her own. And albeit Sueno the Dane spoiled this towne most grievously in the raging heat of hostilitie, yet fell it not so greatly to decay, untill the Bishops of Salisbury turned another way, the common passage that lay before through it, into the West countries. For, then by litle and little it fell to ruine, and is now, as it were, a small Village, having nothing to boast of, but a Major, for the head Magistrate, and in it a passing fine house of the Earles of Pembroks, raised out of the ruines of the old religious house. But most of all, it was over-topped, and shadowed first by SORBIODVNVM, and now by Salisburie, that is risen out of the ruine thereof. For, so Antoninus in his Itinerarie, calleth that which the Saxons afterwards named, Seapyrbyrig, and the vulgar Latinists, Wilton. Ellandunum. Alan the river. Sorbiodunum.

Digitized by Google

A Latinists Sarum, Sarisburia, & Salisburialia. Moreover, the account taken by miles of distant places from it, and the tracts remaining of the name, testifie no lesse, if I should say never a word. For, who would ever make doubt, that Searesbirig proceeded from Sorbiodunum, by addition of the Saxon word, Byrig, which signifieth, a Burg or town, in stead of Dunum, which the Britans & Gaules, both used to put unto places seated on higher grounds, such as this Sorbiodunum was? In so much (as I have been told by one right skilful in the British tongue) that Soruiodunum, is by interpretation, as much as, The dry hill: a conjecture surely more probable than theirs, who with much adoe have derived the name from one Saron in Berosus, or from the Emperour Severus, and B have named it, forsooth, Severia. For it mounted upon a high hill, and as our Historiographer of Malmesburie saith, In stead of the Citie, there was a Castle fenced with a wall of no small bignesse, indifferently well provided otherwise of necessaries, but so scant of water, that it is good chaffer there, sold at a wonderfull price. Whereupon these verses were made of old Sorbiodunum, by one living in those daies.

What Dunum signifieth among the Britans and Galles.

Est ibi defectus lymphæ, sed copia cretæ,
Sæuit ibi ventus sed philomela silet.
No water there, but chalke yee have at will:
The winds there sound, but nightingales be still.

C By the ruins yet remaining, it seemeth to have beene a strong place sufficiently fortified, and to have contained in circuite some halfe mile. Kinric the Saxon, after he had wonne a most fortunate Victorie of the Britans, was the first of all the Saxons that forced it, in the yeere 553: and Canutus the Dane about the yeere 1003, by setting it on fire did much harme unto it. But it revived, when by the authority of a Synode, and the ascent of William the Conqueror, Herman Bishop of Shirburne and Sunning, translated his See hither: whose next successor Osmund built a Cathedrall Church. And King William the Conqueror, after he had taken the survey of England summoned all the States of the Kingdome hither, to sweare unto him fealty: at which time (as it stands upon record in Domesday booke) it payd after the rate of 50. D hides. Of the third penny of Salisbury the King hath xx. shil. ad pensum, de Cremento*, IX. libras adpondus. Which I note therfore, because in our forefathers daies, like as among the old Romans, monie was wont to be paied as wel by the weight as tale. But not many yeeres after, in the raigne of Richard the first, partly for the insolencie and misrule that the garizon souldiers made there, against the Church-men, and in part for want of water, the Churchmen first, and then the inhabitants began to leaue it, and planted themselves in a lower ground scarse a mile off, South-east from it, where there is a receit as it were of many riverets, and where Aven and Nadder meet. Of this their removing Petrus * Blesensis in his Epistles maketh mention. For, thus of old Salisbury he wrote. A place that was, open to the winds, barraine, dry and desert: In it stood E a towre like that of Siloem, which oppressed the townesmen with the burden of long seruitude. And againe: The Church of Sarisburie was captive in that hill. Let us therefore in Gods name goe downe to the plaine countrie, where the valleies will yeeld store of wheat and other corne, where also the large fields are rich and fat in pasture. And the Poet aforesaid, in verse thus:

* Or, for mony weighed out and told.

* Of Bloys. New Sarisburie.

Quid Domini domus in castro? nisi fœderis arca
In templo Baalim; carcer vterque locus.
What is Gods house in Castle pent, but like that Arke of blisse
In Balaims temple Captivate? Ech place a prison is.

And the place whereunto they descended he thus describeth:

F Est in valle locus nemori venatibus apto
Contiguus, celeber fructibus, vber aquis.
Tale Creator is mâtri, natura creata
Hospitium toto quæsijt orbe diu.
Neere to a Parke well stor'd of game, there lies in vale, a ground,
Where corne and fruits in plentie grow, where water-streames abound.

Digitized by Google

Such lodging long throughout the world, when nature daughter deere A
Had for her Creatours mother ſought, at laſt ſhe found it heere.

When they were now come downe, becauſe they would begin firſt with the houſe of God, Richard Poore the Biſhop, in a moſt delectable place, named before Meriſield began to found a moſt ſtately and beautifull Minſter. Which with an exceeding high ſpeared ſteeple, and double croſſe yles on both ſides, carrying with it a venerable ſhew as well of ſacred hilarity as religious majeſtie, was with great coſt finiſhed forty yeeres after: and in the yeere of our Lord 1258, dedicated even in the preſence of King Henrie the third: Whereof the ſaid old Poet hath theſe prety verſes:

Regis enim virtus templo ſpectabitur iſto, B
Præſulis affectus, artificumq́; fides.

For why? This Church a Prelats zeale ſets forth unto the ſight,
The workmens truſty faithfulneſſe, A princes power and might.

But much more elegantly the moſt learned Daniel Rogers, as concerning the ſaid Church:

Mira canam, Soles quot continet annus in vna
Tam numeroſa, ferunt, ædc, feneſtra micat.
Marmoreaſq́; capit fuſas tot ab arte columnas,
Comprenſas horas quot vagus annus habet.
Totq́; patent portæ, quot menſibus annus abundat, C
Res mira, at vera res celebrata fide.

Wonders to tell: How many daies in one whole yeere there beene,
So many windows in one Church (men ſay) are to be ſeene.
So many pillars caſt by Art, of marble there appeere,
As houres doe flit and flie away throughout the running yeere.
So many gates doe entry give, as monthes one yeere doe make,
A thing well knowen for truth though moſt it for a wonder take.

For, the windows as they reckon them anſwere juſt in number to the daies, the pillars great and ſmall, to the houres of a full yeere, and the gates to the twelve monthes. A cloiſter it hath beſide on the South ſide, for largeneſſe and fine work- D manſhip inferior to none: whereunto joineth the Biſhops pallace, a very faire and goodly houſe: and on the other ſide a high bell towre and paſſing ſtrong withall, ſtanding by it ſelfe apart from the Minſter. Moreover, in ſhort time it grew to be ſo rich in goods, and endowed with ſo great revenewes, that it well maintaineth a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chauncellor, a Treaſurer, and three and thirty Prębendaries: of whom the Reſidents, as they terme them, have very goodly houſes alſo adjoining to the Church, and all theſe buildings ſtand within the cloſe wall ſevered from the Citie. As the Biſhop was buſied about erecting of Gods houſe, the Citizens likewiſe for their parts did their beſt to found the Citie, they eſtabliſhed their civill government, deriued rilles and ſervers of waters into every ſtreet, and caſt a deepe dich all along E that ſide, on which it is not fenſed with the running river, having obtained licence of Simon the Biſhop thus to ſtrengthen and fortifie the ſame. And in ſuch ſort grew up this new Salisburie by little and little, out of the ruins of old Sorbiodunum, that ſo ſoone as they by the Kings warrant, had turned hither the high way, that leadeth into the Weſt parts it became the ſecond Citie in all this tract, paſſing well inhabited and frequented, plentifull of all things, eſpecially of fiſh, adorned with a very ſtately market place, wherein ſtandeth their common Hall of timber worke, a very beautifull edifice. But nothing is there, whereof it may ſo much boaſt, as of John Iewell not long ſince Biſhop there, a wonderfull great and deepe Divine, a moſt ſtout and earneſt maintainer of our reformed religion againſt the aduerſaries by his learned books. F Old Sarbiodunum from thence forward decaied more and more, and in the reigne of King Henrie the Seuenth, became utterly deſolate, ſo as at this day, there remaineth onely a towre or two of the Caſtle, which notwithſtanding a long time after the departure of the towneſmen from thence, was the dwelling houſe of the Earles of Salisburie: and about which in King Edward the Thirds time, there aroſe a memorable

Digitized by Google

A ble controverſie and ſuite. For, Robert Biſhop of Salisburie ſturred William Monteacut Earle of Salisburie by vertue of a proceſſe which our Lawyers terme Breve de Recto, that is, A write of right, for this Caſtle: and hee made anſwere that he would defend his right by combat. Whereupon, at a day appointed, the Biſhop brought forth his champion to the railes or bars of the Liſts, clad in a white garment reaching downe to his mid-leg: upon which he had a mandilian or caſſocke garniſhed with the Biſhops Armes: at whoſe heeles followed a Knight carrying a ſtaffe, and a page with a ſhield: Immediatly after, the Earle brought in by the hand his owne champion alſo, arraied in the like apparell, accompanied with two Knights bearing white ſtaves. 29 Edw. 3. Term. Hilarij. Combat for the Caſtle of Sarum or Shirburn, as ſome will have it.

B Now when theſe Champions were to enter the Liſts, commanded they were to withdrawe themſelves a ſide, that their weapons of both parts might be viewed, and they ſearched whether they had any Amulets or Enchantments about them. But all on a ſuddaine, vnlooked for came the Kings precept, to reprive and defer the matter to a further day, that the King might looſe thereby none of his right. Meane while, they grew to this compoſition: That the Earle for the ſumme of 2500. marks paied and received, ſhould yeeld up all his title and intereſt in the Caſtle, to the Biſhop and his ſucceſſors for ever.

This Salisburie had long a goe Earles of that name, whoſe pedigree I will derive ſomewhat farther off & more truly out of the ſhort reports of Lacock Hiſtorie. William C Conqueror of his bounty and liberality, aſſigned vnto Gualter de Euereaux Earle of Roſmar in Normandie, faire lands and large poſſeſſions in this ſhire, which hee left vnto Edward named de Sarisburia a younger ſonne borne in England: like as to Walter his eldeſt ſonne, other lands in Normandie, with the Title of Earle of Roſmar: whoſe iſſue within a while after was extinct. That Edward of Sarisburie aforeſaid, flouriſhed in the twentieth yeere of the Conquerors reigne, and is often times barely named, in the Indiciarie booke of England, without the title of Earle. His ſonne Walter built a little monaſterie at Bradenſtocke, and there in his old age tooke him to the habit of a Canon, or Regular prieſt, after he had firſt begotten his ſonne Patricke (the firſt Earle of Salisbury) upon Sibil de Caducis: This Patricke, I ſay the D firſt Earle, in his returne from his pilgrimage at S. Iames of compoſtella in Spain in the yeere of our Lord 1169, being ſlaine by one Guy of Luſignian, left William his ſonne to ſucceede: who died in King Richard the firſt his time. His onely daughter Ela, through the favour of the ſaid King Richard, was married to William Long Eſpe, ſurnamed ſo of a long ſword that he did vſually weare, a baſe ſonne of King Henrie the ſecond; and her marriage honored him with the title of Earle, and her owne coat of Armes be Azur: adorned with ſix Lions rampant. This William had a ſonne named likewiſe William Long-Eſpee, againſt whom King Henrie the Third conceauing great diſpleaſure, for that without licence obtained, he was gone to ſerve in the holy land, taking the croſſe (as they termed it upon him) tooke from him both the ti- E tle of Earle and alſo the Caſtle of Salisbury. But he holding ſtill his purpoſe went into Ægypt with S. Lewis King of France, and neere vnto Damiata which the Chriſtians had wonne, carrying a brave and valorous minde, fighting manfully among the thickeſt troups of his enimies died an honorable and glorious death, a little before that holy King was vnfortunately taken priſoner. His ſonne named likewiſe William, lived without the title of Earle, and begat one onely daughter Margaret, who nevertheleſſe being reputed Counteſſe of Salisburie, became the wife of Henrie Lacy Earle of Lincoln, vnto whom ſhe bare one onely daughter Alice, wedded to Thomas Earle of Lancaſter: Who being attainted, King Edward the Second ſeized vpon thoſe poſſeſſions, which ſhe had granted and diminiſed vnto her husband: out of which King F Edward the Third gave away vnto William Mont-acute, Trowbridg, Winterbourn, Amibresbury, and other Lordſhips in theſe words: So fully and wholly as the Progenitours of Margaret Counteſſe of Salisbury at any time held the ſame. And even then, he preferred the ſaid William Mont-acute to be Earle of Salisbury, and by the cincture of a ſword inveſted him in the ſaid Earldome. This William became Lord of the Iſle of Mann, and begat two ſonnes, William who ſucceeded in his Fathers honor, and died without iſſue Earles of Salisburie. Hiſtorie of Lacock Abbay.

Walſingham pag. 74.

Digitized by Google

issue having vnhappily slaine his onely sonne while hee trained him at Tilting: and A Iohn a Knight, who died before his brother, leaving behind him a sonne named Iohn Earle of Salisburie, whom hee had by Margaret daughter and heire of Thomas de Mont-Hermer; who being of an unconstant and changeable nature, and plotting the destruction of King Henrie the Fourth, was in the yeere of our Lord 1400. killed at Chichester, and attainted afterwards of high treason. Howbeit, his sonne Thomas was fully restored, a man worthy to be ranged with the bravest Captaines and Commanders, whether you respect paines taking in his affaires, industrie in action, or expedition in dispatch, who lying at the siege before Orleance in France, was with a bullet levelled out of a great peece of Ordinance wounded in the yeere 1428, and B
Pat. 2. Henr. 6. thereof died. Alice his onely daughter, being wedded unto Richard Nevill aug-1461. mented his honor with the title of Earle of Salisburie, who siding with the house of Yorke, was in the battell fought at Wakefield, taken prisoner and beheaded: leaving to succeede him Richard his sonne, Earle of Warwicke and of Salisburie; who de-lighting in dangers and troubles, enwrapped his native country within new broiles of Civill warre, wherein himselfe also left his life. The one of his daughters named Isabell was married unto George Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward the Fourth, and she bare him a sonne called Edward Earle of Warwicke who being a very child and innocent, was by King Henrie the Seuenth beheaded like as his sister Magaret, suffered the same death under King Henrie the Eighth. An usuall C pollicie and practise among suspicious princes: For the security of their owne persons and their posterity, by one occasion or other, that evermore are soone offred and as quickly picke, to make away or keepe under the next of their bloud. Anne, the other daughter of Richard Nevill Earle of Warwick and Salisburie, became wife to Richard Duke of Glocester, brother to King Edward the Fourth, and brought him a sonne, whom his vncle King Edward in the 17. of his reigne created Earle of Salisbury, & Richard his father vsurping the kingdome made Prince of Wales But he departed this life in his tender yeres, about that time that his mother also died, not without suspition of poison. King Henrie the Eighth afterward, about the fift yeere of his reigne in a full Parliament restored and enabled in bloud Margaret daughter to D George Duke of Clarence to the name, stile, title, honor and dignity of Countesse of Salisburie, as sister and heire to Edward late Earle of Warwicke and Salisburie. And about the 31. yeere of the said King, she was attainted in Parliament with divers others, and beheaded when she was 70. yeeres old. Since which time that title of honor was discontinued vntill in the yeere of our Lord 1605. our soueraigne Lord King Iames honored therewith S. Robert Cecill second sonne of that Nestor of ours;
William Cecill: vpon whom for his singular wisdome, great emploiments in the affaires of State to the good of Prince and Countrey, he had bestowed the honorable titles of Baron Cecill of Essendon, and Vicount Cranburn. Thus much of the Earles of Salisburie. E

Lower still and not far from this Citie, is situate upon Avon, Dunction or Donke- ton, a burrough (as they say) of great antiquity, and well knowen by reason of the house therein of Beavois of Southampton, whom the people have enrolled in the number of their brave worthies for his valour, commended so much in rhime to posterity.

This Salisburie is environed round about with open fields and plaines, vnlesse it be Eastward, where lieth hard unto it Clarindon, a very large and goodly parke, passing fit for the keeping and feeding of wild beasts, and adorned in times past with an house of the Kings. Of which parke and of the twenty groves enclosed therin Master Michaell Maschert Doctor of the Civill lawes, hath pretily versified in this wise. F

This name himselfe poetically deuised.

*Nobilis est lucus, cervis clausura, saronam
Propter, & a claro vertice nomen habet.
Viginti hinc nemorum partito limite, boscis
Ambitus est passus mille cuiq; suus.

A

Digitized by Google

A famous Parke for Stag and hind, neere Salisburie doth lie,
The name it hath of one faire downe or hill, that mounts on hie:
Within the same stand xx. groves enclos'd with severall bound:
Of which, in compasse every one a mile containes in ground.

Famous in this Clarindon for that heere in the yeere 1164. was made a certaine recognition and record of the customes and liberties of the Kings of England, before the Prelates and Peeres of the Kingdome, for the auoiding discentions betweene the Clergie, Iudges and Barons of the Realme which were called The Constitutions of Clarindon. Of the which so many as the Pope approoved haue beene set downe in the Tomes of the Councels, the rest omitted; albeit Thomas Becket then Archbishop of Canterburie, and the rest of the Bishops approved them all. Heereby is Iuy Church sometime a small Priory where as a tradition runneth, in our grand fathers remembrance was found a grave and therein a corps of twelve foote, and not farre of a stocke of wood hollowed, and the concaue lined with lead with a booke therein of very thicke parchment, all written with Capitall Romane letters. But it had lien so long that when the leaues were touched they fouldred to dust. S. Thomas Eliot who saw it iudged it to be an Historie. No doubt hee that so carefully laied it vp, hoped it should be found and discouer some things memorable to posteritie.

* Constitutions of Clarinders.

An auncient booke.

Toward the North, about six miles from Salisburie, in this plaines before named, is to be seene a huge and monstrous peece of worke, such as Cicero termeth Insanam substructionem. For, within the circuit of a Ditch, there are erected in maner of a Crowne, in three ranks or courses one within another certaine mighty and unwrought stones, whereof some are 28. foote high, and seuen foote broad, upon the heads of which, others like ouerthwart peeces do beare and rest crossewise, with a small tenents and mortescis, so as the whole frame seemeth to hang: whereof we call it Stonehenge, like as our old Historians termed it for the greatnesse Chorea Gigantum; The Giants Daunce. The description, or draught whereof such as it is, because it could not so fitly be expressed in words, I have caused by the gravers helpe to be portraied heere underneath as it now standeth weather beaten and decaied.

Stone-henge.

Digitized by Google

A. Stones called Corsestones, Weighing 12. tunne, carrying in height 24. foote; in bredth, 7. foote; in compasse, 16.

B. Stones named, Cronetts, of 6. or 7. tunne weight.

C. A place, where mens bones are digged up.

Digitized by Google

A Our countrie-men reckon this for one of our wonders and miracles. And much they marvaile: from whence such huge stones were brought, considering that in all those quarters bordering thereupon, there is hardly to be found any common stone at all for building: as also by what meanes they were set up. For mine owne part, about these points I am not curiously to argue and dispute, but rather to lament with much griefe that the Authors of so notable a monument are thus buried in oblivion. Yet some there are, that thinke them to be no naturall stones heawen out of the rocke, but artificially made of pure sand, and by some glewie and unctuous matter knit and incorporate together, like as those ancient trophees or monuments of victo-

B rie which I have seene in Yorkshire. And what marvaile? Read we not I pray you in Plinie, that the sand or dust of Puteoli being bovered over with water, becometh forthwith a very stone: that the cesternes in Rome of sand digged out of the ground, and the strongest kind of lime wrought together grow so hard, that they seeme stones indeed? and that Statues and images of marble chippings and small grit grow together so compact and firme, that they are deemed entier and solide marble: The common saying is, that Ambrosius Aurelianus, or his brother Vther did reare them up by the Art of Merline that great* Mathematician, in memorie of those Britans who by the treachery of Saxons were there slaine at a parley. Whereupon Alexander Nechan, a Poet of no great antiquitie, in a poeticall fit, but with no speciall grace

C and favour of Apollo, having his instructions out of Geffreys British historie, comes out of these verses:

Nobilis est lapidum structura, Chorea Gigantum,
Ars experta suum posse, peregit opus.
Quod ne prodiret in lucem segnius, artem
Se, vires q; suas consuluisse reor.
Hoc opus adscribit Merlino garrula fama,
Filia figmenti fabula vana refert.
Illa congerie fertur decorata fuisse
Tellus, quæ mittit tot Palamedis aues.

D Hinc tantum munus suscepit Hibernia gaudens,
Nam virtus lapidis cuilibet apta fuit.
Nam respersus aquis magnum transfundit in illas
Vim, quæ curatis sæpius ægra gerit.
Vther Pendragon malens transnexit ad Ambri
Fines, devicto victor ab hoste meus.
O quot nobilium, quot corpora sacra virorum,
Illic Hengisti proditione jacent:
Intercepta fuit gens inclita, gens generosa
Intercepta, nimis credula, cauta minus.

E Sed tunc emitut præclarè consulis Eldol
Virtus, qui lethi septuaginta dedit.

The Giants Daunce, a famous stone-worke stands,
Art did her best in bringing it to passe,
Vaine prating fame, reports by Merlins hands.
In manner strange this worke effected was.
The stones (men say) in that land first did lie,
* Whence * Cranes in flockes so many use to flie.
From thence conveied, as things of charie price,
The Irish soile received them with joy.

F For why? their vertue in a wondrous wise,
Of cures the griefe that doth sicke folke annoy.
For, waters cast and sprinkled on these stones
Their vertue take, and heale the grieved ones.
The noble Vther that Pendragon hight,
Them over seas to Ambresburie brought;

Made Stones.

* Puzzole.

* Magician. Mathematici.

* Scythia. * Palamedis aves.

Returning

Returning thence, where he by martiall might A
Had quel'd his foes in battell fiercely fought.
O worthy Wights, how many on that plaine,
Of you lie dead by Hengists treason slaine!
The Britans brave, that race of noble blood,
Entrap't by little heed and too much trust,
Were kild alas, in parley as they stood,
Through faithlesse fraud of enemies unjust.
But Eldol Earle his manhood excellent
Then shewed, to death who seventie persons sent. B

Others say, that the Britans erected this for a stately Sepulchre of the same Ambrose in the verie place where hee was slaine by his enemies sword: that hee might have of his countreys cost such a peece of worke, and tombe set over him as should for ever be permanent, as the Altar of his vertue and manhood. True it is, that mens bones have many times been digged up heere, and the village lying now on Avons side, is called Ambresburie, that is to say, Ambrose his towne: where, certaine antient Kings, by report of the British Historie, lay interred. And the Booke called Eulogium saith, that a Monasterie stood there of three hundred Monkes: which, one Gurmundus (I wot not what Pagan and Barbarian) spoiled and rifled. In that place afterward Alfritha King Edgar his wife, by repentance and some good deed C to expiat, and make satisfaction for murdering of King Edward her sonne in Law, built a stately Nunnerie, and endowed it with livings: In which Queen Æleonor King Henrie the thirds widdow, renouncing all roiall pompe, and princely state, devoted her selfe unto God among other holy Nuns. The said Ambrose Aurelianus, who gave name unto the place, when the Romane Empire drew now to an end, tooke upon him the imperiall purple Robe in Britaine, (as saith Paulus Diaconus) succoured his decaying countrey, and the aid of that warlike Arthur represt the violent rage of the enemies, overthrew puissant armies, consisting of the most couragious Nations in Germany, and at the last in a battell fought upon this Plaine, lost his life in the defence of his countrey. Now, seeing both Gildas and Bede doe D write, that his Parents wore the purple Robe, and were slaine, why may not I suppose him to be descended of that Constantine, who in the Fourth Consulship of Theodosius the younger, was elected Emperour heere in Britaine in hope of his luckie name, and afterwards slaine at Arles. I have heard that in the time of King Henrie the Eight, there was found neere this place a table of mettall, as it had been tinne and lead commixt, inscribed with many letters, but in so strange a Character, that neither Sir Thomas Eliot, nor master Lilye Schoole-maister of Paules, could read it, and therefore neglected it. Had it been preserved, somewhat happily might have been discovered as concerning Stoneheng, which now lieth obscured.

Ambresbury.

Ambrosius Aurelianus.

The Emperours before.

Scarse foure miles from Ambresburie, (on this side Aven) there is a Warren of E hares, commonly called Euerlie Warren, where there is great increase of hares for Gentlemen in the countrey there dwelling, to disport themselves with game: yet not such store as that the neighbour inhabitants should require the help of souldiers in their defence against them, as the men of the Isles Baleares sometime did, by Plinies relation: albeit, they did likewise much harme heere unto the Corne fields: and neere neighbour unto it is Lutgershall, where stood sometimes (as I read) the Castle of Geffrey Fitz-Peter, Lord chiefe Iustice of England in his time, and Earle of Essex, a man of exceeding great wealth. Not much higher is Wolfhall, which was the house of the Noble Familie of Seimor, now Earle of Hertford, or of Saint Maur, to whom by marriage accrewed a great inheritance of the Estурmies in this F tract, who bare argent three Demy-Lions Gueules: and from the time of King Henrie the second, were by right of inheritance, the Bailiffes and Guardians of the Forrest of Savenac lying hard by, which is of great name for plentie of good game, and for a kind of Ferne there, that yeeldeth a most pleasing savour. In remembrance whereof, their Hunters horne of a mightie bignesse, and tipt with silver, the Leporarium.

Wolshal.

Estermie or Sturmy.

Savernac Forrest.

Digitized by Google

A the Earle of Hertford keepeth unto this day, as a monument of his progenitours.

More somewhat into the East, the River Cunetio, in the Saxon tongue Cýnetan, commonly Kenet, ariseth neere unto a litle Village of the same name, which some would have to bee that CVNETIO mentioned by Antoninus: but the distance of both sides gain-sayeth it. Here Selburie a round hill mounteth up aloft, to a great height, which by the forme of the hill it selfe, and the outward setling of the earth beneath, may seeme to have beene cast up by mans hand. And many of that sort, round and with sharpe toppes are to bee seene in this tract: Burrowes they call them B and Barrowes, raised, happily in memoriall of Souldiers there slaine. For bones are found in them, and read I have, how an usuall thing it was with the Northerne nations, that everie souldier remaining alive after a foughten field, should carrie his head-peece full of earth toward the making of their fellowes tombes that were slaine. Although I am of opinion rather, that this of Selburie, was set there in stead of a limit, if not by the Romans, then certainly by the Saxons: Like as that fosse called VVodensdike, considering that betweene the Mercians and the West-Saxons there was much bickering in this Shire many a time, about their Marches: and both * Boetius and the * Gromaticall Writers have made mention of such Mounts raised for bounds. Within one mile of Selburie, is Atburie, an uplandish C village built in an old Campe as it seemth, but of no large compasse, for it is environed with a faire trench, and hath foure gappes as gates, in two of the which stand huge Stones as jambes, but so rude, that they seeme rather naturall than artificiall, of which sort, there are some other in the said village. This River Kenet runneth at the first Eastward, thorow certain open fields, out of which there stand up aloft every where stones like rockes, and off them a little village there is, called, Rockley: among which there breaketh out sometimes at unawares water in maner of a streame or sudden Land-flood, reputed the messenger, as it were, and forerunner of a dearth, and is by the rusticall people of the countrey, called Hungerborne. From hence Kenet* holdeth on his course to a towne bearing his name, cal- D led of Antoninus CVNETIO, and is placed from Verlucio twentie miles. At which distance just, from thence, that antient towne called by a new name Marleborow in old time Marleberge, standeth upon this river * Cunetio now Kenet, stretching out East and West on the pendant of an hill. Whether this name Marleborow came in latter ages of Marga, which in our language wee call Marle, and use in stead of dung to manure our grounds, I am not readie to affirme. Certes, it lieth neere a chaulkey hill, which our Ancestours before they borrowed this name Chaulke of the Latine word Calx, named Marle, But the Etymologie thereof, that Alexander Necham in his Booke of divine wisedome hath coined and drawen from Merlins Tombe (as appeareth by this Distichon of his making) is ridiculous.

E

Merlini tumulus tibi Merlebrigia nomen
Fecit, testis erit Anglica lingua mihi.

O Merlebridge towne, of Merlins Tombe thou had'st thy name:
Our English tongue will testifie, with me the same.

The fatall end of this towne Cunetio, and the name together, and the estate thereof with the ancient memorie also, from the comming in of the Saxons unto F the Normans time, is utterly vanished and gone: for, in all this space betweene, our histories doe not so much as once name it. But in the age next ensuing, wee read, that Iohn * surnamed Sine terra, that is, Without Land, (who afterwards was King of England) had a Castle heere, which when hee revolted from his brother King Richard the First, Hubert Archbishop of Canterburie, tooke by force:

Kenet River.

Barrowes and Burrows. Tombes.

In his Geometrie.

198. Aibury.

Rockley.

* Famis rivus.

* Kenet. Cunetio, a towne.

Marleborow.

* Kenet.

*Or nick-named, Iohn Lack-land.

Digitized by Google

and which afterwards was moſt famous by reaſon of a Parliament there holden, A wherein by a generall conſent of the States of the Kingdome there aſſembled, a law paſſed for the appeaſing of all tumults, commonly called, the Statute of Marleborow. But now being daunted by time, there remaineth an heape of rammell and rubbiſh witneſſing the ruines thereof, and ſome few reliques of the walles remaine within the compaſſe of a dry ditch, and an Inne there is adjoyning thereto, which in ſtead of the Caſtle, hath the ſigne of a Caſtle hanging out at it: The inhabitants of the place, have nothing to make greater ſhew of, than in the Church of Preſhut hard by, of a Chriſtning Font, as it ſeemeth, of Touchſtone, or of Obſidian ſtone, (by their report) certaine Princes (I wot not who) B were in times paſt baptized and made Chriſtians. Neither verily can I conceale that which I have read, that everie Burger heere admitted, is by an old order and cuſtome among them, to preſent unto the Major, a brace of hounds for the hare, a couple of white Capons, and a white Bull.

The blacke prince as they ſay.

Ramesburie.

On the ſame River, and the ſame ſide thereof, is ſeated Ramesburie, a pretty village, having nothing now to commend it but pleaſens, meadowes about it, howſoever in old time famous it was for the Biſhops Sea there, who had this Shire for their Dioceſſe: but that ſeat being by Herman the Eighth Biſhop, laid unto that of Shirburne, and at length (as I ſaid before) tranſlated to Salisburie, carried away with it all the name and reputation of this place, becauſe at Rames- C burie, there was neither any Covent of Clerkes, nor ought for their maintenance. From the other ſide of the River more Eaſtward, Littlecot ſheweth it ſelfe not long ſince a ſeat of the Darels, a place worthy to bee remembred, for the late Lord thereof Sir Iohn Popham, who being the chiefe Iudge in the Kings Bench executed juſtice, (as I have ſaid alreadie) againſt malefactours, to his high praiſe and commendation. And here by runneth the limit betweene this Shire and Berkſhire.

William Malmesburie, of Biſhops.

Littlecot

Thus farre forth have wee taken a ſlight view and ſurvey of Wilſhire, which (as wee find in the Domeſday booke and worth the noting it is) *paid unto the King tenne pounds for an Hawke, twentie ſhillings * for a ſtrong Steed, for hey one* D hundred ſhillings, and five ores: now what kind peece of money, and of what kind that Ore was, I wote not; but out of a Regiſter of Burton Monaſterie, I have obſerved thus much, that twentie Ores, are worth two Markes of ſilver.

* Pro ſummario. Haply a Sumpter horſe.

Ore, what it is.

Earles of Wilſhire.

This province can reckon out of divers and ſundry houſes, but few Earles, beſides thoſe of Salisburie, whom I have named before: for to omit Weolſthan before the Normans Conqueſt, it had none to my knowledge, unto King Richard the Second his daies, who preferred William Le Scrope to that honour. But this mans good fortunes ſtood and fell together with his Prince. For, when the one was depoſed, the other loſt his head. After whom, within ſhort time ſucceeded E Iames Butler Earle of Ormund, advanced to that dignitie by King Henrie the Sixth. Howbeit, when the Lancaſtrians were downe the winde, and hee was attainted, his eſtate forfeited, and Iohn Stafford a younger ſonne of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, by the favour of King Edward the Fourth received this title, whoſe ſonne Edward ſucceeded him, and died without iſſue. The ſame honour afterwards King Henrie the Eighth, beſtowed upon Henrie Stafford of the ſame houſe of Buckingham; who having enjoyed it a little while, departed likewiſe, and left no children behinde him. In the end the favour of the ſaid King brought it into the family of the Bullens: for Thomas Bullen Vicount Rochfort, Sonne to one of the Daughters and coheires of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormund, F hee created Earle of Wilſhire: whoſe Daughter Anne, the King tooke to wife: A marriage this was to her ſelfe, and her brother vnhappie and deadly, to her Parents wofull, but for all England right happie. For it brought forth to us Queene Elizabeth, a moſt gracious and excellent Prince, worthy of ſuperlative Queene Elizabeth.

praiſe

Digitized by Google

praiſe, for her moſt wiſe and politicke government of the Common-wealth, and for her heroicke vertues farre above that ſexe. But when the ſaid Thomas Bullen, overcome with the griefe and ſorrow that hee tooke for the infortunate fall and death of his children, hee ended his daies without iſſue: this title lay ſtill, untill that King Edward the Sixth, conferred it upon William Powlet Lord Saint Iohn, whom ſoone after hee made Marqueſſe of Wincheſter, and Lord Treaſurer of England, in whoſe family it remaineth at this day.

See Bſiang in Hant-ſhire.

This Countie containeth in it Pariſhes, 304.

HANT-SHIRE.

Digitized by Google

HANTSHIRE.

NExt to Wilshire is that country which sometimes the Saxons called Hantercyre, and is now commonly named Hantshire: of which, one part that beareth farther within the land, belonged, no doubt, to the Belgæ, the other which lieth upon the sea appertained, without question, to the Regni, an ancient people of Britaine. On the West it hath Dorsetshire and Wilshire, on the South the Ocean to bound it: on the East it joineth to Sussex and Surreie, and on the North it bordereth upon Barkshire. A small province it is, fruitfull in corne, furnished in some places with pleasant woods standing thicke and well growen; rich in plenteous pasture, and for all commodities of sea most wealthy and happie. It is thought that it was with the first brought under subjection to the Romans. For, our Histories report, that Vespasian subdued it, and very probable reasons there are inducing us to beleeve the same. For, Dio witnesseth, that Plautius and Vespasian, when they were sent by the Emperor Claudius against the Britaines, did give the attempt upon this Iland, with an armie divided into three parts, least if they should have ventured to land in one place only they might have beene driven backe from the shore. Suetonius also writeth, that in this expedition Vespasian fought thirtie battailes with the enemie, and subdued the Isle of Wight which lieth against this country and two other right puissant nations with it. For which his victories, as also for passing over the Ocean so safely. Valerius Flaccus speaketh unto Vespasian himselfe, as one more fortunate than Iulius Cæsar, in this maner.

Tuq; O Pelagi cui major aperti
Fama, Caledonius postquam tua Carbasa vexit Oceanus, Phrygios prius indignatus Iulos.

And thou for Seas discovery whose fame did more appeare,
Since that thy ships with sailes full spred in Northren Ocean were,
Which skorn'd before, of Phrygian line the Iulij to beare.

And of the very same Vespasian, Apollonius Collatius Novariensis, the Poet versified thus:

Ille quidem nuper felici Marte Britannos Fuderat.

He verily of late by happie fight
Had won the field, and Britains put to flight.

But how in this war Titus delivered Vespasian his father, when he was very streight ly besieged by the Britans: and how at the same time likewise, an adder grasped him about, and yet never hurt him, (which hee tooke as a lucky foretoken of his Empire) you may learne out of Dio and Forcatulus. I, for my part, (to come to my purpose) beginning at the West side of this province, will make my perambulation along the sea coast and the rivers that runne into the Ocean, and after that survey the more in-land parts therof.

Hard by the Westerne bounds the river Aven carrieth a still streame and no sooner runneth into this shire, but it meeteth with the sourd of Cerdicus, in old time Cerdicks-ford, afterward Cerdeford, and now by contraction of the word, Chardford, so named of Cerdic that Warlicke English-Saxon. For, heere the said Cerdic in a set battaile so daunted the Britains, that not onely he enlarged the bounds of his Empire, but also delivered an easie warre unto his posterity: having before time in the yeere of our Salvation 508, after great conflicts in this tract, vanquished the most mighty King of the Britains, Natanleod, called also Nazaleod by others, with many of his people. Of whose name likewise, a small region reaching unto this place was termed Cerdici vadum Cerdicks ford.

5091.

Natanleod or Nazaleod.

Digitized by Google

A termed Natanleod, as we read in the Annales of the Englisſh Saxons: which I ſought very curiouſly for, but hitherto could not find ſo much as any ſmall ſigne or ſample of that name: neither can I gueſſe who that Natanleod ſhould be. But moſt certaine it is, that Aurelius Ambroſe, at the very ſame time skirmiſhed otherwhiles with the Saxons in this tract with alternative fortune: and yet thoſe Chronicles of the Engliſh Saxons no where made mention of him; as who, (a thing that I have obſerved) being over much affectionate to themſelves, reported only their owne fortunate battailes, and victories but never made words of their foiles & overthrowes. From thence the ſaid river runneth on by Regnewood or Ringwood, called in the Domeſday booke of B England Rincewood. Which, that it was the ſame RIGNVM, the chiefe towne of the Regni whereof Antoninus maketh mention, the accompt of the diſtance from other places, the remaines of the name and the very ſignification thereof doe plainly prove. For, Ring-wed by that Saxon addition ſeemeth to ſignifie the Wood of the Regni. A towne in ancient time of great fame, as may be gathered by the Hundred adjoining, which is named thereof: but now it is a well frequented mercate towne and no better: Aven being departed from hence, entertaineth the river Stoure comming down out of Dorſetſhire, where betweene the meeting of theſe two ſtreames, there ſtandeth a prety towne of trade and well peopled. At this day of a Church there dedicated unto Chriſt, named Chriſt-church: but in old time Twinamburne, C becauſe it is ſituate betweene the two rivers, right in the ſame ſenſe that Interamna in Italie hath his name. It was fortified in times paſt with a Caſtle, and beautified with an ancient Church of Prebendaries, which being built in the Saxons time and after repaired by Rau'ph Flammard Biſhop of Durrham (who was Deane there) in the reigne of William Rufus, and by Richard de Riparijs Earle of Devonſhire (whom King Henrie the firſt enfeoffed in this place) endowed alſo with great rents and revenewes, continued in very great name untill the daies of King Henrie the Eighth, and that fatall and finall houre of the Monaſteries of England. Under this towne Stoure and Aven joining together doe emptie themſelves into the ſea at one mouth, which Ptolomee called the mouth of the River Alaun; and rightly too: For I cannot re- D ſolve with my ſelfe to thinke, that that riuer properly was named Aven, conſidering this is a common name, and the Britans by that terme, called all rivers. But I would take it, that ſome time it was called Alaun, becauſe there remaine yet ſome reliques (as it were) of that name in the villages vpon it, to wit, in Allington, Allingham, &c.

Whether Natanleod and Aurelius Ambroſe be the ſame.

Chriſt-church.

Along the Eaſt banke of this river in this Shire, King William of Normandie pulled downe all the townes, villages, houſes, and Churches far and neere, caſt out the poore inhabitants, and when he had ſo done brought all within thirty miles compaſſe or thereabout into a forreſt and harbour for wild beaſts, which the Engliſhmen in thoſe daies termed Ytene, and we now call New forreſt. Of which Act of his, Gwalter E Maps who lived immediatly after, wrote thus. The Conqueror tooke away land both from God and men, to dedicate the ſame unto wild beaſts and Dogs-game: in which ſpace he threw downe ſix and thirty Mother-churches, and drave all the people thereto belonging quite away. And this did he, either that the Normans might have ſafer and more ſecure arrivall into England, (For it lieth over againſt Normandie) in caſe after that all his wars were thought ended any new dangerous tempeſt ſhould ariſe in this Iland againſt him: or for the pleaſure which he tooke in hunting: or elſe to ſcrape and rape money to himſelfe by what meanes ſoever he could: For, being better affected and more fauorable to beaſts than to men, he impoſed very heavy fines and penalties, yea and other more grieuous puniſhments, upon thoſe that ſhould medle with his F game. But Gods juſt judgement not long after followed this ſo unreaſonable and cruell act of the King. For, Richard his ſecond ſonne, and William Rufus King of England, another ſonne of his, periſhed both in this Forreſt: William by chance ſhot through with an arrow by Walter Tirell; the other blaſted with a peſtilent aire. Henrie likewiſe his grand child by Robert his eldeſt ſonne, whiles hee hotely purſued his game in this Chaſe was hanged amongſt the bowghes and ſo died: that we may

New forreſt.

Elegium.

Digitized by Google

learne thereby. How even childrens children beare the punishment of their Fathers A sonnes. There goe commonly abroad certaine verses, that Iohn White Bishop of Winchester made of this forrest: Which although they falsly make William Rufus to haue ordained the same, yet because they are well liked of many, I am likewise well content heere to set them downe.

Templa adimit Diuis, fora ciuibus, arua colonis
Rufus, & instituit Beaulensi in rure foresta:
Rex cervum insequitur, Regem vindicta, Tirellus
Non bene provisum transfixit acumine ferri.

From God and Saint King Rus did Churches take, B
From Citizens town-court, and mercate place,
From Farmer lands: New forrest for to make,
In Beaulew tract, where whiles the King in chase
Pursues the hart, just vengeance comes apace,
And King pursues. Tirrell him seeing not,
Unwares him slew with dint of arrow shot.

He calleth it Beauley tract, for that King Iohn built hard by, a prety Monasterie, for the pleasant situation called Beaulieu, which continued ever unto our Fathers memorie, of great fame as being an unviolated sanctuarie & a safe refuge for all that fled to it: in so much that in times past, our people heere thought it unlawfull and an hai- C nous offense by force to take from thence any persons whatsoever, were they thought never so wicked murderers or traitours: so that our Ancestors when they erected such Sanctuaries, or Temples (as they terme them) of Mercie, every where throughout England, seemed rather to have proposed unto themselves Romulus to imitate than Moses: who commaunded that wilfull murderers should be plucked from the altar and put to death: and for them onely appointed Sanctuarie, who by meere chance had killed any man.

Sanctuaries. Exod. 21. Iosephus, Antiquitatum lib. 4.

But least the sea coast, for so long a tract as that forrest is heere, should lie without defense all open and exposed to the enimie, King Henrie the Eighth began to strengthen it with forts, for, in that foreland or promontorie shooting far into the D sea: From whence we have the shortest cut into the Isle of Wight, hee built Hurst Castle, which commandeth sea ward every way. And more toward the East he set up also another fortresse or blockhouse, they name it Calshot Castle for Caldshore, to defend the entrie of Southampton Haven, as more inwardly on the other are the two Castles of S. Andrew, and Netly. For, heere the shores retiring as it were themselves a great way backe into the land, and the Isle of Wight also; butting full upon it doe make a very good harbour, which Ptolomee calleth The mouth of the river Trisanton, (as I take it) for Traith Anton: that is, Anton Bay. For Ninnius an old writer giveth it almost the same name when he termeth it Trahannon mouth. As for the river running into it, at this day is called Test, it was in the foregoing age (as wee read E in the Saints lives) named Terstan, and in old time Ant, or Anton: as the townes standing upon it, namely Ant port, Andover and Hanton in some sort doe testifie.

Hurst Castle.

So far am I of (pardon me) from thinking that it tooke the name of one Hamon a Romane, (a name not vsed among Romanes) who should be there slaine. And yet Geffrey of Monmouth telleth such a tale, and a Poet likewise his follower who pretily maketh these verses of Hamon.

Ruit huc, illucque ruentem
Occupat Aruiragus, eiusque in margine ripa
Amputat ense caput, nomen tenet inde peremti
Hammonis Portus, longumque tenebit in aeuum. F

Whiles Hamon rusheth heere and there within the thickest ranke, Arviragus encountreth him, and on the rivers banke,
With sword in hand strikes of his head: the place of him thus slaine, Thence forth is named Hamons-Haven, and long shall so remaine.

But upon this Haven standeth South-hanton, a little Citie, neere unto which on South-Anton.

the

A the North-east, there flourished in old time another of that name: which may seeme to be Antonine his CLAVSENTVM, by the distance of it, as well on the one side from Ringwood, as from Venta on the other. And as Trisanton in the British language signifieth the Bay of Anton, so Clausentum in the same tongue, is as much as the Haven of Entum. For, I have heard, that Claudh among the Britans, is that which the Grecians call χωσιμα, that is, a forced Haven made by digging and casting up the earth. Now, that this place was called Hanton and Henton, no man needs to doubt, seeing in that booke wherein King William the first made a survey of all England, this whole shire is expressely named Hantscyre and in some places Hentscyre,
B and the very towne it selfe for the South situation of it, South-hanton. What maner of towne that Clausentum was, it is hard to say: but seated it was in that place, where the field is which now they call S. Maries; and reached euen to the Haven: and may seeme also to have taken up the other banke or strand of the river: For, a little above at Bittern over against it, Francis Mills a right honest gentleman there dwelling, shewed unto me the rubbish, old broken wals, and trenches of an antient castle, which carrieth halfe a mile in compasse, & at every tide is compassed for three parts of it with water a great breadth. The Romane Emperors ancient coines now and then there digged up, doe so evidently prove the antiquitie thereof, that if it were not the Castle of old Clausentum, you would judge it to be one of those forts or fen-
C ses which the Romans planted upon the South coast of the Ocean, to represse, as Gildas writeth, the piracies and depredations of the Saxons. When all became wasted, by the Danish warres, old Hanton also was left as a pray in the yeere of our Lord 980. to be sacked and rifled by them: and King William the Conqueror in his time had in it but fourescore men and no more in his demaine. But above 200. yeeres since when Edward the Third King of England and Philip Valois bustled for the very Kingdome of France, it was fired by the French and burnt to the ground. Out of the ashes whereof, presently sprung the towne which now is to be seene, but situate in a more commodious place betweene two rivers: for number of houses and those faire built much renowned, for rich inhabitants and concurse of merchants wealthy:
D fenced round about with a double ditch, strong wals, and turrets standing thicke betweene: and for defense of the Haven a right strong Castle it hath of square stone, vpon a Mount cast up to a great height, built by King Richard the Second. And afterward King Henrie the Sixt granted to the Maior, Balliues and Burgesses that it should be a Countie by it selfe, with other liberties. Memorable is that of the most puissant Canutus King of England and of Denmarke, by which he in this place repressed a flatterer who bare the King in hand that all things in the Realme were at his wil & command. He commanded (saith Henrie of Huntingdon) that his chaire should be set on the shore, when the sea began to flow. And then in the presence of many, said he to the sea as it flowed. Thou art part of my Dominion, and the ground on which I sit is mine, nei-
E ther was there ever any that durst disobey my commandement and went away free and unpunished. Wherefore, I charge thee, that thou come not upon my land, neither that thou wet the clothes or body of thy Lord. But the sea according to his usuall course flowing still, without any reverence of his person wet his feet. Then he ritiring backe said. Let all the inhabitants of the world know, that vaine and frivolous is the power of Kings, and that none is worthy the name of King, but hee, to whose command the heaven earth and sea by bond of an everlasting law are subiect and obedient, and never after that time set hee the crowne upon his head, &c.

Of those two rivers, betweene which this South-anton standeth, that in the West now called Test, and in times past Anton, (as I suppose) springing out of the forrest of F Chate goeth first to Andover, which in the Saxon language is Anbeapapan, that is, The Passage or Ferry over And: where in the yeere of our Salvation 893, Aetheldred King of England, when the Danes harried and spoiled his Kingdome on every side, to the end that heo might at length refresh and cherish his weakened and wearied countries with sure and quiet peace, inserted into his owne familie by way of adoption Aulaf the Dane: which notwithstanding soone after tooke small or none effect:

For,

Digitized by Google

For, this great honor done to the barbarous Dane, could not reclaime and ſtay his minde, from rapine and ſpoiling ſtill. From thence it runneth downe and receaueth from the Eaſt a brooke paſſing by Bullingdon, in whoſe pariſh is a place called Tibury hill, and containeth a ſquare field by eſtimation of ten acres ditched about, in ſome places deeper than other, wherein hath beene found tokens of Wels, and about which the ploughmen haue found ſquared ſtones, & Romane coines, as they report, for the place I haue not ſeene. This brooke entreth into Teſt neere Wortwhell, where Queene Aelfrith built a Monaſterie to expiate and make ſatisfaction for that moſt foule and hainous fact, wherwith ſo wickedly ſhe had charged her ſoule by making away King Edward her husbands ſonne: as alſo to waſh out the murdering of her former husband Athelwold a moſt noble Earle, whom King Edgar trained forth hither a hunting and then ſtrake him thorow with a dart, becauſe hee had deluded him in his loue ſecrets, and by deceitfull and naughty meanes prevented him and gotten for himſelf this ſame Aelfrith the moſt beautifull Ladie that was in thoſe daies. After this Teſt having taken into it a little river from Wallop, or more truly Well-hop, that is, by interpretation out of our forefathers ancient language, A prety well in the ſide of an hill, whereof that right worſhipfull familie the Wallops of Knights degree dwelling hard by tooke name: ſeeketh for BRIGE or BRAGE an ancient towne likewiſe placed by Antonine nine miles from Sorbiodunum: at which diſtance betweene Salisburie and Wincheſter he findeth not farre from his banke, Broughton a ſmall countrie towne: which if it were not that BRAGE, I verily beleeve it was then utterly deſtroied when William of Normandie laid all euen with the ground heereabouts to make that foreſt, before mentioned. Then goeth this river to ſee Rumſey, in Saxon ſpeech Rumrez. A nunnery founded by King Edgar, the large Church whereof yet ſtandeth; out of the which Marie daughter of King Stephen being there Abbeſſe, & his only heire ſurviuing, was conueied ſecretly by Mathew of Alſace ſonne to the Earle of Flaunders, and to him married. But after ſhe had borne to him two daughters, was enforced by ſentence of the Church to returne hither again according to her vow. Thence glideth this water ſtreight into Anton Haven, at Arundinis Vadum, as Bede called it and interpreteth it himſelfe Reedeford: but now of the bridge where the foord was named, for Redeford, Redbridge: where, at the firſt ſpringing up of the Engliſh Saxon Church, there flouriſhed a Monaſterie, the Abbat whereof Cymbreth, as Beda writeth, baptiſed the two brethren being very little ones of Arvandus the pety King of Wight, euen as they were ready to be put to death. For, when Cedwalla the Saxon ſet upon the Iſle of Wight, theſe ſmall children to ſaue their lives fled to a little towne called Ad lapidem, and hid themſelves there, untill at length being betraied, they were at Cedwallaes commandement killed. If you aske me, what this litle towne, Ad lapidem, ſhould be, I would ſay it were Stoneham, a ſmall village next to Redebridge, which the very ſignification of the name may euidently proue for me. The other river that runneth forth at the Eaſt-ſide of Southamton, may ſeeme to haue beene called Alre: For, the mercate towne ſtanding upon the banke thereof, not farre from ponds out of which it iſſueth, is called Alreſ-ford, that is, The ford of Alre. This towne, (to uſe the words of an old Record of Wincheſter): Kinewalce the religious King inſtructed in the Sacraments of faith by the Biſhop Birinus at the very beginning of Chriſtian religion (in this tract,) with great deuotion of heart gaue unto the Church of God at Wenta. In the yeere of grace 1220. Godfrey Lucy Biſhop of Wincheſter made a new market place heere and called it Novum forum that is, New mercate, in regard haply of old Alreſ-ford adjoining thereto. But this new name continued not long with the people, who in the matter of ſpeech carrie the greateſt ſtrok. Neere heereunto is Tichborn, which I muſt not omit, for that it hath giuen name to a worſhipfull and ancient familie.

Vpon the Weſt banke of this river is ſituate the moſt famous Citie of the Britiſh Belgians, called by Ptolomee and Antoninus Venta Belgarum, by the Britans of Wales even at this day, Caer Gwent: by the Saxons in old time Wintanceaſtep, in Latine commonely Wintonia, and by us in theſe daies of Wincheſter. Yet there be ſome Tibury, ſome ſay for Titusbury.

Wallop. Brige.

Rumſey.

Redbridge.

*Regeſti.

Digitized by Google

A some which affirme this to be Venta Simenorum, & doe grace Buistow, with the name of Venta Belgarum. But that there were never any Simeni at all in this Iland, I will prove when I come to the Veni. In the meane season, though they should seeke all the townes that Antoninus placeth on every side in the way to or from VENTA, BELGARVM, as narrowly as Emmots paths, yet shall they find nothing for their purpose to make good this their assertion.

The Etymologie of this name Venta, some fetch from Ventus, that is, Wind, others from Vinum, that is, Wine, and some againe from Winz a Bishop: who all of them be farre wide, and should doe well to pray for better judgement. Yet like I rather the B opinion of Leland: who hath derived it from the British word Guin or Guen, that is, White, so that Caer Guin should signifie as much, as the White Citie. And why not? seeing the old Latines named these their Cities, Albalonga, and Alba regia, of whiteneſſe: yea and the Grecians also had their Leuca, Leucas, and other nations also many places taking name of whiteneſſe. For, this Venta, like as the other two of the same name, to wit, VENTA SILVRVM, and VENTA ICENORVM, are seated all three in a soile that standeth upon chalke and a whitish clay.

A Citie it was no doubt, flouriſhing even in the Romans times, as in which the Emperours of Rome seeme to have had their sacred houses of weaving and embrodering peculiar to their owne persons, and vses: seeing among all the VENTAS in
C Britaine, it was both the chiefe and also neereſt unto Italie. For, in the booke of Notitia, mention is made of the Procurator [Master or Governour] Cynegij VENTENSIS or BENTENSIS, in Britaine: where the onely flowre of Lawyers, Iames Cuiacius readeth Gynecij and in his Paratitles upon the Code interpreteth it, Sacrum textrinum, that is, The sacred workhouse or shop of embrodering and weaving. And right if his minde is Guidus Pancirolus, who writeth that those Gynecia were instituted for the weaving of the Princes and souldiers garments, of Ship-sailes, of linnen sheets, or coverings and such like cloths, neceſſarie for the furniture of mansions. But Wolfgangus Lazius was of opinion, that the Procuratour aforesaid, had the charge heere of the Emperors dogs. And to say truth, of all the dogs in Europe, ours
D beare the name; in so much, as Strabo witnesseth, our dogges served as souldiers, and the ancient Galles made especiall use of them even in their wars. And of all others, they were in most request both for those baitings in the Amphitheaters and also in all other publicke huntings among the Romanes. For, as the same Strabo writeth, they were ἐυφυῆς πρὸς τας κυνηγέσιας, that is, of a generous kind and framed naturally for hunting. Whereupon Nemesianus wrote thus:

Cynæcium.

British dogs.

diuisa Britannia mittit
Veloces, nostrique orbis venatibus aptos.

Though Britaine from this world of ours doth ly secluded farre, Swift hounds it sends which for our game most fitly framed are.

E Gratius also, of their price and excellencie, saith thus:

Quod freta si Morinûm dubio refluentia ponto
Veneris, atque ipsos libeat penetrare Britannos,
O quanta est merces, & quantum impendia supra?

If that to Calice-streights you goe,
Where tides uncertaine ebbe and flow.
And list to venture further more,
Crossing the seas to British shore:
What meede would come to quite your paines:
What overdeale beside, of gaines.

F Yea and that very dog with us, which of the old name Agaseus, we call yet at this day a Gasehound those ancient Greekes both knew and also had in great price. And this will Oppian in his first booke of his Cynegeticks tell you, in these Greek verses.

A Gasehound.

Agasens, a British hound.

Ἐστι δὲ σκυλάκων γένος ἄλκιμον ἰχνεύτηρον,
Βαιὸν, ἀτὰρ μεγάλης ἀντάξιον ἐμπνοὴ ἀρούρης.
τὸς τρέφουσιν ἄγειαι φῦλα βρεταννῶν ἀιολογέστων,
Ἀὐτὰρ ὀπηλίδιοὶ σφέας Ἀγασσαίους ὀνομήνας,
Τῶν ἦτοι μέγεθος μὲν ὁμοῖον ἐπιδαυσίοισι
Λίχνοις ὀτικδίοισι τεχήσεαι κυνέουσι.

Which

Digitized by Google

Which, Bodine turned into Lathine thues: A

Est etiam catuli species indagine clara,
Corpus huic breue, magnipes sed corpore digna,
Picta Britannarum gensilos affera bella,
Nutrit, Agaseasq; vocat, vilissima forma
Corporis, vt credas parasitos esse latrantes.

And may be Englished in this wise,

Stout hounds there and those of Finders kind,
Of bodie small but doughtie for their deed:
The painted folke, fierce Britans as we find Them Gasehounds call, for they with them doe bred. B
In making, like house dogs, or at a word,
To lickerous curs that craven at our bord.

Claudian also, touching our Mastives writeth in this sort:

Magnaq; taurorum fracturi colla Britanni.

And British mastives downe that puls,
Or breake the necks of sturdy bulls.

I haue to far digressed about dogges, yet hope a fauorable pardon.

In this Citie, as our owne Historiagraphers doe report, in the time of the Romans, was that Constans the Monke, who by his father Constantine was first elected Cæsar, C and afterwards Augustus: that Constantine I say who upon hope of this name had assumed the Imperiall purple robe that is, vsurped the Empire against Honorius. For, long since, (as Zosinus recordeth speaking of those times) as well in villages as in Cities, there were great colledges peopled (as it were) with Monks', who before time flying the light lived scattering heere and there among mountaines, woods and forrests all solitary by themselves, whereof also they were so called. Now, of this Colledge wherein the said Constans was, those old broken wals which are seene of that thickneſse and strength, at the West-gate of the Cathedrall church, may seeme to be the ruins and reliques. But this imperiall monke taken out from hence suffered See before in the Emperours. soone after condigne punishment, both for his fathers ambition and also for the D contempt of his professed religion. During the Heptarchie of the Saxons, this Citie albeit once or twice it suffered much calamity & miserie, yet it revived and recovered againe: yea and became the seat roiall of the West-Saxons Kings, adorned with magnificent Churches and a Bishops Sea: furnished likewise with six mint houses by King Aethelstane. In the Normans time also it flourished very much, and in it was erected an office for keeping of all publicke records and evidences of the realme. In which prosperous estate it continued a long time: but that once or twice it was defaced by misfortune of suddaine fires, and in the civill war betweene Stephen and Maude about the Kingdome of England, sacked by the unruly and insolent souldiers. Whereupon Necham our countriman who lived in that age, writeth thus: E

Guintoniam titulis claram, gazisque repletam
Nouerunt veterum tempora prisca patrum.
Sed tam sacra fames auri, iam cæcus habendi,
Vrbibus egregijs parcere nescit amor.

Our ancestours knew Wincheſter sometimes a goodly towne,
In treasure rich and plentifull, in name, of great renowne:
But now, for hunger after gold our men so greedy are;
That even such Cities excellent, they know not how to spare.

But of these losses it recovered it selfe by the helpe of Edward the third, who heere appointed the mart for woole and cloth, which we commonly call the Staple. What F was the face and outward shew of this Citie in these foregoing times, a man can hardly tell, considering that, as the said Necham writeth:

——Flammis toties gens aliena dedit.
Hinc facies vrbis toties mutata, dolorem
Pretendit, casus nuntia vera sui.

So

Digitized by Google

A So many times a nation ſtrange
Hath fir'd this towne, and made ſuch change;
That now her face and outward hue
Her griefe bewray's, and tels full true.

In theſe daies of ours it is indifferently well peopled and frequented, having water plentie, by reaſon of the River turned and conveighed divers waies into it, lying ſomewhat in length from Eaſt to Weſt, and containeth about a mile and halfe in circuit within the wals: which open at ſix gates, and have every one of them their ſuburbs reaching forth without, a good way. On the South ſide of the Weſt gate B there mounteth up an old caſtle, which oftentimes hath been beſieged, but moſt ſore and ſtreightly, above the reſt what time as Mawd the Empreſſe held it againſt King Stephen, and at length by a rumour given out that ſhe was dead, and cauſing her ſelfe to be caried out in a coffin like a coarſe deceived the enemy. As concerning that round table there, hanging up againſt the wall which the common ſort uſeth to gaze upon with great admiration, as if it had beene King Arthurs table, I have nothing to ſay but this, That, as any man which vieweth it well may eaſily perceive, it is nothing ſo antient as King Arthur. For, in latter times when for the exerciſe of armes and feats of warlike proweſſe, thoſe runnings at tilt, and martiall juſtlings or torneaments, were much practiſed: they uſed ſuch tables, leaſt any contention or offence for C prioritie of place ſhould through ambition ariſe among Nobles and Knights aſſembled together. And this was a cuſtome of great antiquitie, as it may ſeeme. For, the antient Gaules, as Athenæus writeth, were wont to ſit about round tables, and their Eſquiers ſtood at their backs, holding their ſhields. About the mids of the citie, but more inclining to the South, Kenelwalch King of the Weſt-Saxons after the ſubverſion of that Colledge of Monkes which flouriſhed in the Romans time, (as William of Malmesburie ſaith) Firſt founded to the glorie of God, the faire Church that was in thoſe daies; in which verie place, the poſteritie afterwards in building of a Cathedral ſeat for the Biſhop, although it were more ſtately than the firſt, yet followed juſt in the verie ſame ſteppes. In this Sea, there have ſitten ſince Wina, whom the ſaid Ke- D nelwalch ordained the firſt Biſhop there, Many Biſhops ſome renowned for their wealth and honourable port, and ſome for holineſſe of life. But among other, Saint Swithin continueth yet of greateſt fame, not ſo much for his ſanctitie, as for the raine which uſually falleth about the Feaſt of his tranſlation in Iuly, by reaſon the Sunne then Coſmically with Præſepe and Aſelli, noted by antient writers to be rainie conſtellations, and not for his weeping, or other weeping Saints Margaret the Virgine, and Marie Magdalen, whoſe feaſts are ſhortly after, as ſome ſuperſtitiouſly-credulous have beleeved.

The round Table.

Torneaments.

Deipnoſophiſt. lib. 4.

Biſhops of Wincheſter.

This by the way, pardon mee I praie you, for I digreſſe licentiouſly. Thus Biſhops of Wincheſter haue beene aunciently by a certaine peculiar preroga- E tive that they haue, Chancellours to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and for long time now Prelats to the order of the Garter: and they haue from time to time to their great coſt reedified this church, and by name, Edington and Walkelin, but Wickham eſpecially: who built all the Weſt part there of downe from the quire, after a new kind of worke, I aſſure you, moſt ſumptuouſly, In the mids of which building is to bee ſeene his owne tombe of decent modeſtie betweene two pillers. And theſe Biſhops haue ever and anon conſecrated it to new Patrons and Saints, as to Saint Amphibalus, Saint Peter, Saint Swithin, and laſt of all to the holy Trinitie: by which name it is knowne at this day. The Engliſh Saxons alſo, had this Church in great honour for the ſepulture of certaine Saints and Kings there, (whoſe bones F Richard Fox the Biſhop gathered, and ſhrining them in certaine little gilded coffers placed them orderly with their ſeverall Inſcriptions in the top of that wall which encloſeth the upper part of the quire) and they called it in times paſt Ealden Mynſter, that is, The old Minſter, for difference from another more lately built, which was named Nepan Mynſter, that is, The new Minſter; which Ælfred founded; and for the building of houſes of office belonging to the ſame purchaſed of the Biſhop a plot

William Malmesburie.

of

of ground; and for every foote of it paid him downe a marke after the publick weight. A

This monasterie as also that other the older, was built for married priests, who afterwards, upon I know not what miracle of a Crosse that spoke, and disliked their mariage, were thrust out by Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury, and Monkes put in their place. The walls of these two monasteries stood so neere and close together, that the voices of those that sung in the one troubled the chanting of the other: whereupon there arose grudge and heart-burnings betweene these Monks, which afterwards brake out into open enmities: By occasion whereof, and because at this new monasterie there gathered and stood much water which from the Westerne gate came downe thither along the currant of the streets, and cast forth from it an B wholesome aire, the Minster Church two hundered yeares after the first foundation of it, was removed into the Suburbs of the cittie on the North part, which they call Hide. Where, by the permission of King Henrie the first, the Monks built a most stately and beautifull monasterie; which a fewe yeares, after by the crafty practise of Henrie de Blois Bishoppe of Winchester (as the priuate historie of this place witnesseth) was pitiously burnt. In which fire, that Crosse also was consumed, which Canutus the Dane gaue, and upon which, as old writings beare record, he bestowed as much as his owne yeares revenewes of all England came unto. The monasterie nevertheless was raised up againe and grew by little and little to a wonderfull greatnesse, as the very ruines thereof even at this day doe shew, untill C that generall subuersion and finall period of over monasteries. For then, was this monasterie demolished: and into that other of the holy Trinity, which is the Cathedrall church, when the monkes were thrust out were brought in their stead, a Deane, twelue Prenbendaries, and there placed. At the East side of this Cathedrall church, standeth the Bishops palace, called Wolvesey: a right goodly thing and sumptuous; which being towred and compassed almost round with the streame of a prety river, reacheth even to the cittie walls: and in the South-suburbes, iust over against it be holdeth a faire Colledge: which William Wickham Bishop of this See, the greatest father and Patron (of all Englishmen) of good literature, and whose praise for ever to the worlds end will continue, built for a schoole, and thereto dedicated it: out of D which, both for Church and common welth there riseth a most plentifull encrease of right learned men. For, in this Colledge, one warden, ten fellowes, two schoolemaisters and threescore and ten schoolers, with divers others are plentifully maintained. There have beene also in this cittie, other faire and goodly buildings, (for very many were heere consecrated to religion) which I list not now to recount, since time and avarice hath made an end of them. Onely, that Nunnery, or monasterie of vailed Virgins, which Ælfwida, the wife of King Ælfred founded, I will not overpasse: seeing it was a most famous thing as the remainder of it now doth shew: and for that, out of it King Henrie the first tooke to wife Mawde the daughter of Malcolne King of Scots, by whom the royall bloud of the auncient Kings of England be- E came united to the Normans, and hee thereby wonne much loue of the English nation. For, neiphew she was in the second degree of descent, vnto King Edmond Ironside, by his sonne Edward the Banished. A woman, as adorned with all other vertues meet for a Queene, so especially inflamed with an incredible loue of true piety and godlinesse. Whereupon was this Tetrastich made in her commendation, Hide Abby.

Wickham Colledge.

William Wickham.

Saint Mary Abbay.

* Matildis Mawde wife to King Henry the first.

Prospera non lætam fecêre, nec aspera tristem:
Aspera risus ei, prospera terror erant.
Non decor effecit fragilem, non sceptra superbam,
Sola potens humilis, sola pudica decens.

No prosp'rous state did make her glad, F
Nor adverse chances made her sad:
If fortune frown'd, she then did smile;
If fortune frown'd, she feard the while.
If beauty tempted, she yet said nay,
No pride she tooke in scepters sway:

She

Digitized by Google

A Shee onely high, her ſelfe debaſ't,
A lady onely faire and chaſt.

Concerning Sir Guy of Warwick, of whom there goe ſo many prety tales, who in ſingle fight overcame here that Daniſh giant and Golias, Colbrand: and of Waltheof Earle of Huntingdon, that was here beheaded, where afterwards ſtood Saint Giles chappell: as alſo of that excellent Hoſpital of Saint Croſſe there adjoyning, founded by Henrie of Blois brother to King Stephen, and biſhop of this City, and augmented by Henrie Beaufort Cardinall, I neede not to ſpeake: ſeeing every man may read of them in the common Chronicles.

B As touching the Earles of Wincheſter, to ſay nothing of * Clyto the Saxon whom the Normans deprived of his auncient honovr King Iohn created Saier Quincy, Earle of Wincheſter, who uſed for his armes a militare belt, they call it a Feſſe, with a fabell of ſeaven as I haue ſeene upon his ſeales. After him ſucceeded Roger his ſonne, who bare, Guevles ſeaven Maſcles voided, Or: but with him that honour vaniſhed and went away, ſeeing hee died without iſſew male. For, hee married the eldeſt daughter and one of the coheires of Alan Lord of Galloway in Scotland by a former wife, in right of whom hee was Conſtable of Scotland. Hee had by her three onely daughters, the firſt married to William de Ferrarijs Earle of Derbie, the ſecond to Alan de la Zouch, the third to Comine Earle of Bucqhanan in Scotland. Along time after Earles of Wincheſter.

C Hugh le Diſpencer, hauing that title beſtowed upon him for terme of his life, by King Edward the ſecond, whoſe minion, he was and onely beloved, felt together with his ſonne what is the conſequence of Princes extraordinary fauours: For both of them envied by moſt were by the furiovs rage of the people put cruelly to ſhamefull death. And long it was after this, that through the bounty of King Edward the fourth, Lewis of Bruges * a Netherlander Lord of Gruthvſe, Prince of Steinhuſe &c. Who had given him comfort and ſuccour in the Netherlands, when hee was fled his natiue country, receaued this honour with Armes reſembling thoſe of Roger Quincy, in theſe words Azur a dix Maſcles D'or en orme d'vn Canton de noſtie propre Armes d'Engleterre, ceſt favour, de Goul vn Leopard paſſant d'or, armeè d'azur. Pr. p. Pat. Anno 12. E. 4.

D All which, after King Edwards death, hee yeelded up into the hands of Henrie the ſeaventh. But lately within our memorie King Edward the ſixth, honoured Sir William Powlet Lord Treaſurer of England, Earle of Wilſhire, and Lord Saint Iohn of Baſing, with a new title of Marqueſſe of Wincheſter. A man prudently pliable to times, raiſed not ſodainly but by degrees in Court, exceſſiue in vaſte informous buildings; temperat in all other things, full of yeares for he lived nintie ſeaven years, and fruitfvll in his generation, for hee ſaw one hundred and three iſſued from him by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Sir William Capell Knight. And now his grand-child William enjoieth the ſaid honours: For the Geographicall poſition of Wincheſter, it hath beene obſerued by former ages to bee in longitude two and twenty degrees,

E and in latitude fiftie one.

From Wincheſter more Eaſtward the river Hamble at a great mouth emptieth it ſelfe into the Ocean. Beda calleth it Homelea, which, as he writeth, by the lands of the Iute entreth into Solente: for ſo termeth he that frith our narrow ſea, that runneth between the Iſle of Wight & the maine land of Britaine: in which the tides at ſet houres ruſhing in with great violence out of the Ocean at both ends, and ſo meeting one another in the mids, ſeemed ſo ſtrange a matter to our men in old time, that they reckoned it among the wonders of Britaine. Whereof, read heere the very words of Beda. The two tides of the Ocean which about Britaine breake out of the vaſt Northen Ocean daily encounter and fight one againſt another, beyond the mouth of the river Hamble. Solente friuh.

F lea: and when they haue ended their conflict, returne back, from whence they came and run into the Oceane. Into this Frith that little river alſo ſheadeth it ſelfe, which hauing his head neere Warnford, paſſeth betweene the Forreſts of Waltham (where the Biſhop of Wincheſter hath a goodly houſe), and of Bere, whereby is Wickham a manſion of that auncient familie of Vuedal and then by Tichfild, ſometime a little monaſterie founded by Petre de Rupibus Biſhop of Wincheſter * where the mar- * Roche.

Digitized by Google

riage was ſolemnized betweene King Henrie the ſixth, and Margaret of Anion; and now the principall ſeat of the Lord Writheoſleies Earles of South-hamton. From thence forthwith, the ſhore with curving crookes draweth it ſelfe in, and the Iſland named Porteſey maketh a great creeke, within the more inward nooke or corner whereof ſometimes flouriſhed Port-peris; (where, by report Veſpaſian landed) An haven towne which our Aunceſtours by a new name called Port-cheſter, not of Porto the Saxon, but of the port or haven. For, Ptolomee tearmeth it Μέγας λιμὴν, that is THE GREAT HAVEN, for the wideneſſe of it, like as that Portus Magnus alſo in Africk, as Plinie witneſſeth. And verily there remaineth yet a great Caſtell which hath a faire and ſpatious proſpect into the haven underneath. But when as the Ocean by with-drawing it ſelfe, tooke away, by little and little the commodity of the haven, the inhabitants flitted from thence into the Iſland Portſey adjoining, which taketh in circuit much about foureteene miles, beeing at every full ſea floated round about with ſalt-waters, out of which they boile ſalt, and by a bridge that hath a fortreſſe adjoining unto it, is united to the Continent. This Iſland Athelſtede King Eadgars wife had given to the New monaſterie of Wincheſter. And in it at the very gullet, or mouth where the ſea entreth in, our fore-fathers built a towne, and thereupon named it Portſmouth, that is, the mouth of the haven. A place alwaies in time of warre well frequented, otherwiſe little reſort there is to it: as beeing more favourable and better affected to Mars and Neptune, than to Mercurie, that is to warre rather than to Traffique. A Church it hath of the old building, and an Hoſpitall (Gods houſe they call it) founded by Peter de * Rupibus, Biſhop of Wincheſter. Fortified it is with a wall made of timber and the ſame well covered over with thicke bankes of earth: fenſed with a platforme alſo or mount of earth in times paſt on the North-eaſt, nere to the gate: and two block-houſes at the entry of the haven made of new heawen ſtone: Which being by King Edward the fourth begunne, King Henrie the ſeauenth as the Inhabitants report, did finiſh, and ſtrengthened the towne with a garriſon. But in our remembrance, Queene ELIZABETH at her great coſt and charges ſo armed it (as one would ſay) with new fortifications, as that now there is nothing wanting, that a man would require in a moſt ſtrong and fenſed place. And of the garriſon-ſoldiors ſome keepe watch and ward both night and day at the gates: others upon the towre of the church, who by the ringing or ſound of a bell giue warning how many horſe or foote are comming, and by putting forth a banner ſhewe from what quarter they come.

Portſey.

Portus Magnus.

Porteſmouth.

* Roch.

From hence as the ſhoare fetcheth a compaſſe and windeth from Portes-bridge, wee had the ſight of Havant a little mercate towne, and hard by it, of Warblington, a goodly faire houſe belonging ſome-times to the Earles of Salisbury; but now to the family of the Cottons Knights. Before which, there lie two Iſlands, the one greater named Haling, the other leſſe, called Thorney, of thornes there growing: and both of them have their ſeverall pariſh church. In many places along this ſhore, of the ſea waters flowing up thither, is made ſalt of a paliſh or greene collour: the which by a certaine artificious deviſe, they boile untill it bee exceeding white. And of this ſea or Bay-ſalt, and not of ours made out of ſalt ſprings, is Saint Ambroſe to bee underſtood, when hee writeth thus; Conſider wee thoſe things which are uſuall with many very grace-full: namely, how water is turned into ſalt, of ſuch hardneſſe and ſolidity, that often-times it is hewed with axes. This in the ſalts of Britaine is no wonder, as which carrying a ſhewe of ſtrong marble, doe ſhine and glitter againe with the whiteneſſe of the ſame mettall, like unto ſnow, and bee holeſome to the bodie. &c.

Britiſh ſalt.

Hexameron. lib. 5. cap. 11.

Farther within the land, the MEANVARI dwelt, whoſe country togither with the Iſle of Wight Edilwalch King of the South Saxons receiued in token of Adoption from Wlpher King of Mercians, godfather unto him at the Font, when hee was baptiſed. The habitations of theſe Meanuari, ſcarſe changing the name, at this day is divided into three hundereds; to wit, Means-borow, Eaſt-mean, and Weaſtmean: and amongſt them there mounteth up an high Hill, inuironed in the top with a large rampier, Meanuari Bede lib. 4. cap. 13.

Digitized by Google

A rampier, and they call it old Wincheſter: at which, by report, there ſtood in old time a cittie, but now neither top nor toe, as they ſay remaineth of it: ſo as a man would quickly judge it to haue beene a ſummer ſtanding campe, and nothing els. Vnder this is Warnford ſeated where Adam de Portu a mighty man, in this tract and of great wealth in the reigne of William the firſt, reedified the church a new, as a couple of rude verſes ſet faſt upon the wall doe plainly ſhew. Vpon theſe, more high into the land, thoſe SEGONTIACI, who yeelded themſelves unto Iulius Cæſar, had there ſent toward the North limite of this ſhire, in and about the hundred of Holeſhot: wherein are to bee ſeene Mercate Aultun, which King Ælfred bequeathed by his B will unto the keeper of Leodre: alſo Baſingſtoke a mercate towne well frequented: upon the deſcent of an hil, on the North ſide whereof ſtandeth ſolitarie a very faire chappell conſecrated unto the holy Ghoſt by William, the firſt Lord Sandes, who was buried there. In the arched and embowed rooffe whereof is to bee ſeene the holy hiſtorie of the Bible painted moſt artificially, with liuely portraicts and images repreſenting the Prophets, the Apoſtles, and the Diſciples of Chriſt. Beneath this, Eaſtward lieth Baſing, a towne very well knowne, by reaſon of the Lords bearing the name of it, to wit, Saint Iohn, the Poinings and the Powlets. For, when Adam de Portu, Lord of Baſing matched in marriage with the daughter and heire of Roger de Aurevall, whoſe wife was likewiſe daughter and heire to the right noble houſe of Saint C Iohn; William his ſonne, to doe honour unto that familie aſſumed to him the ſurname of Saint Iohn, and they who lineally deſcended from him haue ſtill reteined the ſame. But when Edmund Saint Iohn departed out of this world without iſſue in King Edward the third his time, his ſiſter Margaret, bettered the ſtate of her husband Iohn, Saint Philibert, with the poſſeſſions of the Lord Saint Iohn: And when ſhee was dead without children, Iſabell the other ſiſter wife unto Sir Luke Poinings, bare unto him Thomas, Lord of Baſing, whoſe Neice Conſtance by his ſonne Hugh, (unto whom this fell for her childs part of inheritance) was wedded into the familie of the Powlets, from her deſcended that Sir William Powlet who being made Baron. Saint Iohn of Baſing by King Henrie the Eighth, and D created by King Edward the Sixth firſt Earle of Wilſhire, and afterward Marqueſſe of Wincheſter, and withall was Lord Treaſurer of England, having in a troubleſome time runne through the higheſt honours, fulfilled the courſe of nature with the ſatietie of this life, and that in great proſperity, (a rare bleſſing among Courteours) after he had built a moſt ſumptuous houſe heere, for the ſpatious largeneſſe thereof admirable to the beholders, vntill for the great and chargeable reparations his ſucceſſors pulled downe a good part of it. But of him I haue ſpoken before.

Warnford. Adelhic Portu benedicat Solis ab Ortu Gens Deodicata, per quem ſic ſum renouata.

Segontiaci.

Baſingſtoke.

Baſing Saint Iohn.

Out of an old Miſſall of the Familie, of Powlet.

Neere unto this houſe, the Vine ſheweth it ſelfe, a verie faire place, and Manſion houſe of the Baron Sands, ſo named of the vines there, which wee haue had in Britaine, ſince Probus the Emperours time, rather for ſhade than fruit. For, hee permitted the Britains and others to haue vines. The firſt of theſe Barons was Sir William Sands, whom King Henrie the Eight advanced to that dignitie, being Lord Chamberlaine unto him, & having much amended his eſtate by marrying Margerie Braie, daughter and heire of Iohn Bray, and couſin to Sir Reinold Bray, a moſt worthy Knight of the Order of the Garter, and a right noble Baneret: whoſe Sonne Thomas Lord Sands, was Grandfather to William L. Sands that now liveth. Neighbouring hereunto is Odiam glorious in theſe daies for the Kings houſe there: and famous for that David the Second King of Scots, was there impriſoned: a burrough corporate, belonging in times paſt to the Biſhop of Wincheſter: the fortreſſe whereof in the F name of King Iohn, thirteene Engliſhmen for fifteene daies defended moſt valiantly, and made good againſt Lewis of France, who with his whole armie beſieged and aſſaulted it verie hotely.

Vines in Britaine. Vopiſcus.

Barons Sands.

Odiam.

Mathew Paris.

A little aboue, among theſe Segontiaci, toward the North ſide of the country, ſometimes ſtood VINDONVM, the chiefe citie of the Segontiaci, which caſting off his own name, hath taken the name of the Nation, like as Lutetia hath aſſumed unto it the Vindonum.

Digitized by Google

name of the Parisians there inhabiting: for, called it was by the Britans Caer Segonte, A Silcester. that is to say, the Citie of the Segontiaci. And so Ninnius in his catalogue of cities named it: wee at this day called it Silcester: and Higden seemeth to clepe it of the Britans Britenden: that this was the antient Vindonum, I am induced to thinke by reason of the distance of Vindonum in Antoninus, from Gallena or Gualleneford, and Venta or Winchester: and the rather, because between this Vindonum and Venta, there is still to bee seene a causey, or street-way. Ninnius recordeth, that it was built by Constantius the sonne of Constantine the Great, and called sometime Murimintum, haply, for Muri-vindum, that is, the wals of Vindon. For, this word Mur borrowed from the provinciall language, the Britans retained still, and V. the consonant, they B change oftentimes in their speech, and writing into M. And to use the verie words of Asinnius, though they seeme ridiculous, the said Constantius, sowed upon the soile of this citie three seedes, that none should be poore that dwelt therein at any time: Like as Dinocrates, when Alexandria in Ægypt was a building, strewed it with meale or flower (as Marcellinus writeth) al the circular lines of the drought, which being done by chance, was taken for a fore-token, that the citie should abound with al maner of victuails. He reporteth also, that Constantius died here, and that his Sepulcher was to bee seene at one of the gates, as the inscription sheweth. But in these matters let Ninnius cleere his owne credit; for, stuffed hee hath that little booke with many a pretty lie. Yet this I may be bold to affirme, that it flourished in great honour about C that time: and I my selfe have lighted here upon verie many peeces, of the coine of Constantine, the younger sonne to Constantine the Great: which in their reverse have the portraict of an house with this inscription PROVIDENTIA CAES. Now that this Constantius whom he maketh the builder of this citie, died at Mopsuestia in Cilicia, and was interred in Constantinople in the Sepulcher of his Ancestours, it is Sepulchers of honour. knowen for certaine and confessed. Yet I will not denie, but that he might have in this citie a monument erected in honour and remembrance of him. For, many there were that had such monuments built, about which the souldiers, were wont yeerely to just, and keepe solemne turneaments in honour of the dead.

When the declining Romane Empire hastened to an end, and barbarous nations D began everie where to waste and spoile the Provinces: their armies heere in Britaine, fearing least the flame of this fire, wherewith their next neighbours in France, were consumed, would catch hold of them, set up and created Emperours to themselves: first Marcus, then Gratian, whom they soone slew: and last of all in the yeere after Constantine Emperour, chosen in hope of his name. Christs birth 407, our Constantine for his names sake, they forced wild he, nild he, to usurpe the Empire, & to put on the imperiall purple robe in citie Caer Segont, as both Ninnius and Gervase of Canterburie, doe witnesse. This Constantine putting to sea out of Britaine, landed at * Bologne in France, and drew all the Romane armies, * Bononia. even as farre as the Alpes to side and joine with him in his warres. Hee stoutly defended Valentia in France, against the power of Honorius the Emperour: the River E Rhene which long before had beene neglected, he fortified with a garrison. Upon the Alpes, where any passage was, hee built fortresses. In Spaine, under the conduct of his sonne Constans, whom of a Monke he had declared Emperour, he warred fortunately: and afterwards having sent his letters unto Honorius, and craved pardon for suffering the souldiours: to put upon him the purple perforce, whether hee would or no; he accepted at his hands the imperiall investure, which he freely gave him. Whereupon being puffed up with pride, after hee had passed the Alpes, his mind was wholly set upon a journey to Rome. But hearing that Alarichus the Gothe who had favoured his part was dead, hee returned to Arles, where hee setled his imperiall seat, caused the citie to bee called Constantina, and commanded the courts F and assemblies of seven Provinces, there to be holden. In the meane time Gerontius excited the souldiers against their Lord, and when he had treacherously slaine his sonne Constans at Vienna in France, besieged Constantine also himselfe within Arles. But after that one Constantius sent by Honorius with a great armie, made head against him, Gerontius killed himselfe. And Constantine being now streitly

Digitized by Google

A ly beſieged, and by reaſon of the unhappie ſucceſſe of his men paſt all hope, laid aſide the purple and his great eſtate entred into the Church, became a Prieſt: and ſtreight-waies when Arles was yeelded up, and he carried into Italie, was himſelfe, together with his Sonne Iulian (unto whom he had given the title of * Nobiliſſimus) and his brother Sebaſtian, beheaded. Thus much briefly of theſe occurrents (which before are diſcourſed more at large) out of Zoſimius, Zoſomenus, Nicephorus, Oroſius, and Olympiodorus, to the end that Veritie may triumph over their vanitie, who have beſprinkled this ſtorie with moſt ridiculous and fooliſh lies of their owne deviſing.

* Heire apparent. Iulianus Nobiſſimus.

B Moreover in this citie (our Hiſtoriographers write) that our warlike Arthur was inveſted and crowned King. But not long after it was raſed quite, either in the Saxons warres, or when Adelwolph being offended with his brother King Edward, upon a malicious mind, together with the helpe of the Daniſh rovers, waſted this countrey even to Baſing-ſtoke. And now remaineth nothing ſave the wals, which although they want their battlements, curtain, and coppe, yet they ſeeme to have been of a verie great height. For, the earth is ſo growne up with the rubble, that I could ſcarſe with ſtouping low paſſe through an old poſterne, which they call, Onions Hole. Theſe walles in ſome ſort continue whole, but that they bee broken through in thoſe places where the gates were: and out of the verie walles, I ſaw grow oakes of that
C bigneſſe, and thoſe ſeeming (as it were) bredde with the verie ſtones, with ſuch huge roots claſping one another a great way, and ſpreading forth ſo mightie armes and boughes all abroad, that it would make the beholders to wonder thereat. Theſe walles take in compaſſe about two Italian miles. Whereupon haply the Saxons called this citie Selceſter, as one would ſay, The great citie: for Sel may ſeeme to ſound with them as much as Great, ſeeing Aſſerius hath interpreted the Saxon word, Selwood, The Great wood. And before the wals weſtward, where is a plaine, there lieth a banke of a great length, raiſed and caſt up for a defenſe and fortification. The

Sel, what it is.

ſite of this old citie, containeth about fourſcore acres of ground within, which being D a ſoile ploughed up and tilled, are divided into corne-fields; with a little grove in the Weſt-ſide: but on the Eaſt, neere unto the gappe in the wall, there ſtandeth a Farme-houſe, and a pretty Church more lately built, in which, while I ſearched for ancient inſcriptions, I found nothing, but onely in the windowes certaine armes, to wit, In a field ſable, ſeven Fuſils argent in Bend, likewiſe in a ſhield ſables, a Feſſe between two Cheverns, and in an Eſcutcheon, or an Eagle diſplaied with two heads, gules. This laſt, I have heard ſay, was the coat of the Blewets, unto whom this land came, about the Conquerours time. The ſecond belonged unto the ancient houſe of the Bainards of Leckham: but the firſt to the Cuſanz, by whom from the Blewets it deſcended hereditarily, to the ſaid Bainards. But in the raigne of William the Conquerour, Armes of the Blewets, Bainards, and Cuſantes.

E it was the poſſeſſion of William de Ow, a Norman, who being accuſed of high treaſon, and deſirous to prove his innocencie by combat, was overcome in fight, and by commandement of King VVilliam Rufus, had his two eies pluckt out of his head, and loſt both his genetours. This is found by continuall obſervation (as I have learned of the inhabitants of this place) that although the ground bee fertile and fruitfull inough; yet in certaine places croſſing one another, the corne doth not thrive ſo well, but commeth up much thinner then elſe where, by which they ſuppoſe the ſtreets of the citie went in old time. There are heere daily digged up, bricks ſuch as we call Britaine-bricks, and great ſtore of Romane coine which they terme Onions pennies. For, they dreame that this Onion was a Giant, and dwelt in this citie. There are digF ged up alſo many times inſcriptions, of which the unskilfull rurall people envie us the having. Onely one was brought from hence to London, vvhich was to bee ſeene in the gardens of the right honourable Sir VVilliam Cecill, Lord Burghley, and high Treaſurer of England, to wit:

Digitized by Google

A

MEMORIÆ
FL. VICTORI-
NÆ. T. TAM:
VICTOR CONIUX
POSVIT.

That this Tombe was erected for that Victorina which was called Mater Castrorum, B that is, The mother of the campe, and who against Gallienus the Emperour, excited in Gaule and Britaine, the two Victorini, her sonne, and sonnes sonne, Postumus likewise, Lollianus, Marius, and Tetricus Cæsars, I would not with others affirme. Yet I have read, that two of the VICTORS, were in some place here in Britaine, and those at one and the selfe-same time, the one Maximus the Emperour his sonne, the other Præfectus Protorio to the same Emperour, of whom Saint Ambrose maketh mention in his Epistles, but I dare avouch, that neither of these twaine reared this monument for his wife.

As one high way or street of the Romans went straight from hence southward to Winchester, so there was another ran west ward through Pamber forrest, very full of C trees, and other by-places now standing out of the way, hard by Litchfield, that is, the field of dead bodies, to the Forrest of Chute pleasant for coole shade of trees, & plentifull game: in which the Hunters and Forresters themselves do wonder at the bank or ridge thereof, so evident to be seene, paved with stone, but broken here and there.

Kings-Clere. More toward the North, in the verie edge and frontier of this Shire, we saw Kings-Cleare, a market towne in these daies well frequented, the residence in times past of the Saxon Kings, by it Fremantle in a parke where King Iohn much haunted, also Sidmanton. Sidmanton, the habitation of the Kinesmils, Knights: and Burgh-Cleare situate under an high hill, in the top whereof a warlike rampire (such as our countreymen called a Burgh) hath a trench taking a great compasse about it: from whence, there being a D faire and open prospect every way over the country lying underneath, there standeth

* Specula. a *Beacon, that by light burning fire the enemies comming, may bee shewed to all the neighbour-inhabitants round about. And verily such watches or signals as this, we terme in common speech Beacons, of the old word Beacnian, that is, to shew by a

Beacon. signe, and for these many hundred yeeres, they have been in right great request, and much used among us: in some places, by heaping up a deale of wood, in others by barrels full of pitch fastened to the top of a mast or pole in the highest places of the countrey, at which, by night some doe ever more watch: and in old time, there were set horsemen as posts in many places, whom our Ancestors called Hobelers, who in the day time should give notice of the enemies approch. E

This shire, like as the rest which hitherto we have run over, belonged to the west-Saxon Kings: and when they had deposed Sigebert from his Kingdome, for his tyrannie, evill intreating and lewd managing of his province, this countrey, as Marianus writeth, was assigned unto him least hee should seeme altogether a private person. Whom notwithstanding afterward, for his wicked deeds, they likewise expelled from hence: and so far was it off, that this afflicted state of a King moved any man to take pitie of him, that a Swineheard in the end, slew him in the wood Anderida, where he had lurked and hidden himselfe.

This Shire can reckon but verie few Earles, besides those of VVincheſter which I have alreadie named. In the first time of the Normans, Bogo or Beavose the English F man, vvho fought against the Normans in the battell at Cardiff in VVales, is reputed to have been Earle of South-hampton, a man for warlike prowesse much renowned, vvhom whiles the Monks laboured to set out vvith their fained fables, they have obscured his doughtie deeds in greater darknes. From vvhich time unto the daies of K. Henry the Eight, there was no Earle of South-hampton that I read of: but he created

William

Digitized by Google

A William Fitzwilliams descended from the daughter of Marquesse Montacute, both Earle of Southhamton, and also Admiral of England, when he was now well stricken in yeeres. Who dying streight after without issue; King Edward the Sixth, in the first yeere of his reigne conferred the said honor upon Thomas Vvriotheosley Lord Chanceller, whose grand-child Henrie by his sonne Henrie, enjoieth the same at this day: and in the prime and flowre of his age hath by good literature and militarie experience strengthend his honorable parentage, that in riper yeeres he might be more seruiceable to his Prince and country.

B There be found in this shire Parishes 253. and mercate townes 18.

VECTA INSVLA
ISLE OF WIGHT.

C

THIS Countie of Southhampton belongeth that Iland which lieth out in length over against the midst of it South-ward, called by the Romanes in times past VECTA, VECTIS, & VICTESIS, by Ptolomee ΟΥΙΚΤΗΣΙΣ, by Britans Guith by English-Saxons Wiht-land, and Wicþea; (For, an Iland they termed ea) & by us in these daies, the Isle of Wight and the Whight. Streight running by so small a streight, anciently called Solent. It is severed from the mainland, that it may seeme to have beene conioined to it: whereof that British name of it Guith, which betokeneth a separation; as Ninnius saith is thought to have beene given: even as Sicilie also being broken off (as it were) and cut from Italie got the name from Secando the Latin word (which signifieth cutting) as the right learned Iulius Scaliger is of opinion. Whereupon, (under correction alwaies of the Iudicious Criticks) I would read in the sixt Quest. Natural. of Seneca, thus; Ab Italia Sicilia resecta, that is, Sicilie cut from Italie: whereas it is commonly read there, rejesta. By this Vicinity of site, and affinity of name, we may well thinke, this Vecta to be that Ictа, which as Diodorus Siculus writeth, seemed at every tide to be an Iland, but when it was ebbe, the ancient Britans were wont that way to carry tinne thither by carts, which should be transported into France. But yet I would not deeme it to be that MICTIS in Plinie, which likewise commeth very neere unto VECTA: For that in it there was plenty of tinne, but in this of ours there is not to my knowledge any vaine at all of mettall.

D

E

This Isle, betweene East and West in an old forme, stretcheth out twenty miles in length: and spreadeth in the mids, where it is broadest twelve miles: having the one side turning to the North, and the other Southward. The ground (to say nothing of the sea exceeding full of fish) consisteth of soile very fruitfull, and is thankfull to the husbandman, in so much as it doth affoord corne to be carried forth: breeding every where store of conies, hares, partridges and phesants. One little forrest

F it hath likewise and two parks repleniſhed with deere, for game and hunting pleasure. Through the mids thereof runs a long tract or chaine of hils, yeelding plentie of pasture and forrage for sheepe. The wooll of which, next unto that of Lemster and Cotteswold, is esteemed best and in speciall request with Clothiers, whereby there groweth to the inhabitants much gaine and profit: The North part is all over greene with meddows, pastures, and woods: the south side lieth wholly in maner, bedecked bedecked with corne fields encloſed, where at each end the ſea on the North ſide doth ſo inboſome, encroatch within it ſelf, that it maketh almoſt two Ilands: & verily ſo the Ilanders call them: namely, Freſh-water Iſle which looketh Weſt, and Binbrige Iſle, Eaſtward. In Bedas daies it was counted to containe a thouſand and two hundred Hides: now it reckoneth upon 36. townes, villages and Caſtles: which for eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction belong to the Biſhop of Winchreſter, and for civill government, to the County of South-hanton. The inhabitants of this Iſle were wont merrily to make their boaſt, that their caſe was happier than all others, becauſe they had neither hooded monks, nor cavilling Lawyers, nor yet crafty foxes. A

Digitized by Google

Newport. The places of greater name be theſe, Newport, the principall mercate towne of the whole Iſle, called in times paſt Medena, and Novus Burgus de Meden, that is, The new Burgh of Meden: whereof the whole country is divided into Eaſt Meden and Weſt Meden, an ordering as to their ſituation Eaſt or Weſt either way. Caeres-broke an old Caſtle, ſo clepid and clipped ſhort for Whitegaresburg, is in the very heart and mids of the Iſle, taking the name of Whitgar the Saxon, of whom more heereafter: and of late magnificently reedified by the meanes of the Captaine: unto which Caſtle there belonged very many Knights Fees, and aboue all other places it hath heere the glorie for antiquity: Brading, another mercate Towne Newton and Yarmouth anciently called Eremue, which have their Maiors, and ſend Burgeſſes to the Parliament. This Yarmouth and Sharpnore have Caſtles in them, which together with Worſleys fort or Blockhouſe (ſo named of a worſhipfull familie) defend the Seaſhore at the North-weſt. Iuſt over againſt it ſcarcely two miles off ſtandeth Hurſt a fortification of South Hamptonſhire, ſituate upon a little necke of land lying into the ſea: Quarre, where was founded a Nunnerie in the yeere of our Lord 1132: Gods-Hill, in which Iohn Worſley erected a ſchole for the training up of young wits, Weſt Cowe and Eaſt-Cowe, that is now ruinous: both which, King Henrie the eight built at the very entrie of New port: and concerning them Leland wrote in this wiſe: B C D

Coua fulminea dua coruſcant
Hac caſum colit, ille Solis ortum.
Vectam quà Neoportus intrat altam.

Two Cowes full oppoſite there ſtand,
At Weſt an Eaſt, in all mens ſight:
They flaſhen fire from either hand,
Where Newport, entreth Iſle of Wight.

Alſo on the North-eaſt ſide Sandham Caſtle, furniſhed as the reſt, with great ordinance. Neither are there wanting for the defence of this Iſle naturall fences. For, encircled it is with a continuall ridge and raunge as it were of craggy clifts; there are under the waters likewiſe hidden ſtones: and every where there lie againſt it, bankes and rockes perilous for ſailers: but the moſt dangerous of all the reſt are the Needles, E ſo called becauſe they are ſo ſharpe, and the Shingles; which ſtand forth againſt the Weſt angle of the Iſle: as alſo the Owers and Mixon that lie before the Eaſt. Beſides theſe, The Brambles, which are Shelves and perilous for Sailers, in the North coaſt. Moreover if there be any place that ſeemeth open and meete for a landing place, the ſame by an old order and cuſtome among them is piled with ſtrong ſtakes driven and pitched deepe into the ground.

The inhabitants. But verily this Iſle is neither with theſe rockes, nor with thoſe fortreſſes above ſaid ſo well fenſed, as with the very inhabitants themſelves, who naturally being moſt warlicke, bold and adventurous, are through the diligence and care of the Captaine of the Iſle, confirmed ſo by continuall exerciſe in ſtrength and militarie diſcipline, F that they exactly know before hand, (what accidents of ſervice ſoever may happen in warre) namely with their peeces to ſhoot point-blanke and not miſſe the marke, to keepe their rankes, to march orderly and in ray, to caſt their ſquadrons if neede be cloſe into a ring, or to diſplay and ſpred the ſame at large, to take paines, to runne and ride, to endure both Sunne and duſt, and fully to performe whatſoever warfare doth doth require. Of these souldiers thus trained the Isle it selfe is able to bring forth into the field 4000: and at the instant for all assaies appointed there be three thousand more of most expert and practised servitours out of Hamshire, and two thousand beside out of Wilshire, to be ever prest and in redinesse for the defence of the Isle. And to the end that all hostile forces whatsoever might be with stoode more speedily and with greater facility, the whole country is divided into eleven parts: and every of them hath their severall Centoner, as one would say Centurion, their Vintons also, leaders as it were of twenty, their great peeces of ordinance, their Sentinels and warders. Who keepe watch and ward at the Beacons standing on the higher grounds: their posts also or runners, whom by an old name grown almost out of use, they terme still Hoblers, who presently give intelligence of all occurrents to the Captaine and governour of the Isle.

Digitized by Google

The first that brought it in subjection to the Romans, Vespasian, whiles he served as a private person under Claudius Cæsar: For, thus writeth Suetanius of him. Vnder the Emperour Claudius, by especiall favour of Narcissus, he was sent into Germanie as Lieftenant of a legion: and from thence being removed into Britaine, he fought thirty battailes with the enemie. Two most mighty nations and above twenty townes, together with the Isle of Wight, lying next to the said Britaine he subdued, under the conduct partly of A. Plautius a Consular Lieftenant, and in part of Claudius himselfe. For which service he received triumphall ornaments, and in short space two sacerdotall dignities, &c. At this Isle also, the navie of Allectus; after he had usurped the imperiall dignity in Britaine, lying in espiall and ambush, awaited the Romans comming against him, who notwithstanding by the happy meanes of a mist passed by their enemies undescried, gat to land and set fire on their owne ships, that there might be no refuge for them, to escape unto by flight. Lord Cerdic was the first English-Saxon that subdued it, and he graunted it unto Stuffa and Whitgar, who iointly togither slew well-neare all the British inhabitants (for few there were of them remaining) in Whitgaraburge a town so called of his name, and now by contraction shortned into Caresbroke. After, Wolpher King of the Mercians reduced the Isle of Wight under his obedience, and assigned it over to Edelwalch King of the South Saxons, together with the province of the Menuari, what time as hee became his Godfather and answered for him at his Baptisme. Then, Cædwalla King of the West-Saxons, when the said Edelwalch was slaine and Aruandus the pety King of the Iland made away annexed it to his Dominion, and in a tragicall and lamentable massacre killed every mothers child almost of the inborne inhabitants, and the fourth part of the Isle, to wit as much land as contained 300. Hides, he gave unto Bishop Wilfrid. The first that instructed the Ilanders in the knowledge of Christian religion. But these matters Beda will informe you best, writing as he doth, in these words.

In Vespatian. cap. 4.

Anno D. 530.

Bede lib. 4. cap. 13.

After then that Ceadualla had obtained the kingdome of the Geuissi, hee wonne also the Isle of Wight: which unto that time had beene wholly given to Idolatrie; and then endevoured what he could to make a generall massacre and tragicall slaughter of all the native inhabitants thereof, and in steed of them to plant there people of his owne province; binding himselfe with a vow, although he was not yet regenerate and become Christened, that in case he won the Isle, he would give unto God a fourth part both of it & also of the whole booty. Which vow he so payed, as that he offered this Isle, unto Wilfrid the Bishop (who being of his nation hapend then to come thither & be present) to the use & glory of God. The measure of the same Islands according to the English mēs estimation is proportionable to one thousand and two hundred hides of land. Whereupon the Bishop had possession, given him of so much Land as arose to three hundered Hides. But hee, commended that portion which hee received unto one of his Clarks named Bernwin, and his sisters sonne hee was, giving unto him a priest named Hildila, for to minister unto all that were desirous of salvation, the word and laver of life. Where I thinke it not good to passe over in silence, how, for the first fruits (as one would say) of those who of the same Isle were saved by their beleife two young children brethren, of the royall bloud, to wit the sonnes of Arvandus King of the Isle, were by the especiall favour of GOD crowned with martirdome) For, when the enemies approached

Bede lib. 4. cap. 16.

Digitized by Google

proached hard unto the Iſland, theſe children ſlipt ſecretly out of the Iſle, and were remoo- A ved into the province next adjoining; where being brought to a place called Ad Lapidem, when they had committed themſelues upon truſt, to be hidden from the face of the King that was conqueror, betrayed they were and commaunded to be killed. Which when a certaine Abbot and Prieſt named Cynbreth heard, who not farre from thence had his monaſterie in a place named Reodford, that is the Ford of reed, hee came unto the King, who then in thoſe parts lay ſecretly at cure of thoſe wounds which hee had receiued whiles hee fought in the Iſle of Wight, and requeſted of him, that if there were no remedy but that the children muſt bee murdered, they might yet bee firſt taught the Sacraments of Chriſtian faith before their death. The King granted his petition, and he then having catechized them in the B word of truth, and bathed them in the fount of ſalvation, aſſured them of their entrance into the everlaſting Kingdome of heaven. And ſo within a while after, when the executioner, called inſtantly for them, they joyfully ſuffered that temporall death of the body, by which they made no doubt their paſſe unto the eternall life of their ſoules. In this order and maner therefore after all the Provinces of Britaine had embraced the faith of Chriſt, the Iſle of Wight alſo received the ſame: in which notwithſtanding for the calamity and trouble of forraine ſubjection, no man tooke the degree of Miniſterie and Sea Epiſcopall before Daniell, who at this day is the Biſhop of the VVeſt Saxons and the Geviſſi. Thus much Beda.

From this time forward our writers for a great while haue not one word of Wight C vnto the yeere of our Lord, one thouſand ſixtie ſix, in which, Toſtie King Haralds brother with certaine men of warre and rouers ſhips out of Flanders in hatred of his brother inuaded it, and after he had compelled the Flanders to pay him tribute, departed. Some few yeeres after, as we read in the old booke of Cureſ-broke Priorie, which Maſter Robert Glouer Somerſet, ſhewed me, who carried as it were the Sunne light of ancient Genealogies and Pedigrees in his hand. Like as, ſaith this booke, William the Baſtard conquered England euen ſo William Fitz-Oſbern his Mareſchal and Earle of Hereford, conquered the Iſle of Wight, and was the firſt Lord of Wight. Long after this, the Frenchmen in the yeere 1377. came ſuddenly at vnwares vnder ſaile, inuaded and ſpoiled it: and the ſame French in the yeere 1403. gaue the like attempt, but in vaine; For valiant- D ly they were driuen from landing euen as in our fathers daies, when the French Gallies ſet one or two ſmall cottages on fire and went their way.

Lords of the Iſle of Wight. As touching the Lords of this Iſle, after that William Fitz-Oſbern was forth with ſlaine in the warre of Flanders, and his ſonne Roger outlawed and driuen vnto exile, it fell into the Kings hands: and Henrie the Firſt, King of England gaue it vnto Richard Ridvers (otherwiſe called Redvers and de Riparijs) Earle of Deuſhire, and withall, the Fee or inheritance of the Towne Chriſt-Church. Where, like as at Careſbroke, that Richard built certaine Fortreſſes: but Baldwin his ſonne, in the troubleſome time of King Stephen, when there were in England ſo many Tyrants, as there were Lords of Forts and Caſtles, who tooke vpon them euery one to ſtamp money E and challenged other rights of regall Majeſtie, was by Stephen diſſeized and expelled from hence. Howbeit, his poſterity recouered their ancient right, whoſe Genealogie we haue already put downe when we treated of the Earles of Denſhire.

Chriſtchurch.

But in the end, Iſabell widow to William de Fortibus, Earle of Albemarle and Holderneſſe, ſiſter and heire of Baldwin the laſt Earle of Deuonſhire of that houſe, after much intreaty was ouercome to make ouer by charter all her right and intereſt, and to ſettle it vpon King Edward the Firſt, with the Manours of Chriſt-church, and Fawkeshaul, &c. For foure thouſand Markes.

Euer ſince which time, the Kings of England held the Iſle, and Henry de Beau- F champ Earle of Warwicke was by King Henry the Sixt, vnto whom hee was moſt deere, crowned King of Wight, and afterwards nominated, The firſt or principall Earle of all England. But together with him this new and vnuſuall title died and vaniſhed quite. Afterwards Richard Wideuile Earle Riuers was by King Edward the fourth ſtiled Lord of the Iſle of Wight, & Sir Reginald Bray tooke it of King Henry the pl 670.

Seuenth

Digitized by Google

A Seuenth,(with whom he was moſt inward)in Fee farme, for a rent chargd, of three hundred markes yeerely to be paid. Alſo, beſide theſe Lords, this Iſle had a noble familie, named de Inſula, or Liſle, out of which in the reigne of King Edward the Second, one was ſummoned unto the Parliament by the name of Sir Iohn Liſle, of the Iſle of Wight.

B

C

D

ATTRE-

E

F

Digitized by Google

ATTREBATII.

*Or Gaule.

*S in France, so also in Britaine, next adjoining unto the Belgæ, are ATTREBATII, which name beeing now altogether out of use, the place which they inhabite is commonly called Barkshire. For, let this stand as graunted, (seeing Cæsar writeth that forrainers comming out of Gallia Belgica inhabited the sea coasts of Britaine, and reteined still the names of their countries) that these our ATTREBATII, came hither from the ATTREBATES of Gaule: who as Ptolomee recordeth, held the maritime part of Gaule, lying upon the river Sein, and namely that very country, which after a sort lieth full opposite and over against our Attrebatij. It was not therefore without good cause, if Cæsar wrote, that Comius Attrebatensis was of great authority in these countries, namely among his owne countrimen; and that after hee was by Cæsar vanquished, hee fled hither: what time, as Frontinus writeth, whiles his ships were grownded upon a shelfe, hee commaunded his sailes to bee hoised up, and so disappointed Cæsar (who pursued him) of his purpose: who kenning a farre-of, his full sailes, and supposing that with a good gale of forewind hee sailed away, gave over further pursuit. Whence these Attrebatij were so called, it resteth doubtfull: For whereas some fetch the originall from Attrech, which in the old Gauls tongue they would have to signifie a land of Bread, I neither approue nor disproue their opinion. Sufficient it may bee for us, to have shewed, from whence they came into Britaine; as for the derivation of their name, let others search into it.

France.

Comius Attrebaytensis.

In stratagemat.

Digitized by Google

BARKSHIRE.

THat countrie which wee call Barkſhire, the late Latine writers terme Bercheria, and was ſometime by the Engliſh Saxons named Beppocrcype. Which name Aſſerius Menevenſis deriveth from a certaine wood called Berroc where grew good ſtore of box: others from a naked, or bare oake (for ſo much the name Beroke it ſelf importeth), unto which, the Inhabitants in daungers and troubleſome times of the commonwealth were wont in old time to reſort, there to conſult about their publike affaires. The North part hereof the river Iſis which afterwards is called Tamiſis, that is, the Tamis, running with a winding chanell full of reaches, but yet carryning a very gentle ſtreame, doth pleaſantly water it, and firſt ſevereth it from Oxfordſhire, afterwards from Buckinghamſhire. The South ſide, where it beareth toward Hantſhire, the river Kenet cutteth through, untill it runnes into the Tamis. In the West, where it bordereth upon Wiltſhire and carrieth the greateſt breadth, as alſo in the middle part, rich it is of it ſelf and full of commodities, yeelding corne in plenty; eſpecially where it falleth lower to a valley: which I wote not from what ſhape of a white horſe imagined to appeere in a whitiſh chalky hill, they terme, The vale of Whitehorſe. As for the Eaſt part that confineth with Surrie, it groweth very baraine, or at leaſt wiſe the ſoile is leſſe fertile, as ſtanding upon forreſts and woods that take up a great ground in length and breadth. Aſſerius.

In the Weſt march thereof neere unto * Iſis, ſtandeth Farendon, ſeated high: famous now, for a mercate there kept, but in times paſt, for a certaine Fort, which Robert Earle of Gloceſter built againſt King Stephen, who notwithſtanding wonne it with bloudy aſſaults, and laid it ſo levell with the ground, that now it is not to bee ſeene. But the plot of ground whereon it ſtood, as wee finde in the Chronicle of Waverley Abbay, king Iohn in the yeere of our Lord 1202. prevented by divine inſpiration graunted with all the appertenances to the building of an Abbay for the Ciſtertiens order. *Ouze. Farendon. Guil. Newbrigenſis.

From hence the river having with a great turning compaſſe after much wreſtling, gotte out towards the North, paſſeth a long hard by many villages of ſmal reckoning till at length with a returne, and diſporting himſelfe with winding branches and diviſions, he commeth to Abbendon, a proper towne, and populous: called at firſt by the Engliſh Saxons Sheouerham, then Abbandune, no doubt, of the Abbay, rather than of one Abben I wote not what Iriſh Eremite, as ſome haue written. A place this was (as we finde in an old booke of Abbendon) upon the plaine of an hill very faire and delectable to ſee to, a little beyond the towne which now is called Suniggewelle, betweene two moſt pleaſant riverets, which encloſing within them the place it ſelfe (as it were a certaine nooke) yeeld a delightſome ſight to the beholders, and a meete ſuccour to the Inhabitants. The very ſame was in times paſt called Sheoveſham, a City famous, goodly to behold, full of riches, compaſſed about with moſt plentuous fields, with greene medowes, ſpatious paſtures, and flockes of cattell ſpinning forth milke abundantly. Heere was the Kings ſeat: hither reſorted and aſſembled the people, when ſoeuer there was any treaty about the chiefe, and higheſt affaires of the kingdome. But ſo ſoone as Ciſſa King of the Weſt Saxons had built the Abbay, it beganne by little and little to lay downe the old name, and to bee called Abbendun, and Abbingtun, that is, Abbay-towne. This Abbay had not long flouriſhed, when all of a ſodaine in a tempeſtuous fury of the Danes it was ſubverted; Yet ſoone after it was reared againe through the bounty of king Edgar, and afterwards by the meanes, and travaile of the Norman Abbats grew by little and little to ſuch magnificence, that among all the Abbaies of Britaine for richeſſe, and Abbendune or Abington.

Digitized by Google

Henricus Quintus quarto fundaverat anno. Rex, pontem Burford super undas, atq; Cullhamford.

ſtatelineſſe it would hardly giue place to any. Which the very rubble and ruines A at this day doe teſtifie. As for the towne, albeit along time it had a great ſtay of the Abbay, yet ſince the yeare of our ſalvation 1416. in which king Henrie the Fifth built a bridge over the river, (as witneſſeth a verſe written in a window of Saint Helens church there) and turned the kings high way hither for to make a ſhorter paſſage, it beganne to bee frequented and traded ſo, that among all the townes of this ſhire it goes for the chiefe, hath a Major in it, and maketh great gaine by that ſteeped barly ſprouting and chitting againe, which the Greekes terme Byne and wee Malt: and beſides, hath a Croſſe, of ſingular workemanſhip in the mids of their mercate place (which by report), in the reigne of king Henrie the ſixth, the Brotherhood B of Saint Croſſe inſtituted by him, did erect.

As Ciſſa founded this monaſterie for Monkes: ſo Cilla (out of an old booke I ſpeak) the ſiſter of king Cedwalla built the Nunnerie at Helneſtowe nere the Tamis, where her ſelfe was Ladie Abbaſſe over the Virgins, who afterwards were tranſlated to Witham. And whiles the warre grew hote betweene Offa & Kinulphie, when a Caſtle was there built, the Nunnes retired themſelues out of the way. For, after that Kinulph was overthrown, whatſoever lay under his juriſdiction from the towne of Wallingford in the South part, from Ichenildſteete unto Eſſebury, and in the North ſide to the river Tamus. King Offa uſurped and ſeized into his owne hands.

Now, Aſhbury nere to Whitehorſe hill.

Nere unto it, Northweſt lieth Lee, which by the daughter of a certaine worſhipfull knight ſurnamed thereupon, de Lee, fell to the familie of Beſiles, and thereof it C came to bee called Beſiles Lee: and from that houſe in right of marriage, to Richard Fetiplace: whoſe Progenitor Thomas brought ſome honor to his poſterity by matching with Beatrice the baſe daughter of Iohn the firſt, king of Portugall, and widdow to Gilbert Lord Talbot, of whom they are deſcended. But now, let us returne. Hard by Abendon, Ocke a little river that runneth by the South ſide of the towne, (over which in times paſt Sir Iohn of Saint Helenes, knight, built a bridge,) gently falleth into * Iſis: This Ocke ſpringeth in that vale of Whitehorſe ſcarce a mile or two from Kingſton-Liſle, in old time the poſſeſſion of Warin de Inſulâ, or Liſle, a noble Baron. From whom when as Sir Iohn Talbot the younger ſonne of that renow- D ned warrior, Iohn Earle of Shrewsburie was deſcended by his mother, hee was created by king Henrie the Sixth Lord Liſle, like as Warin de Inſula in times paſt in regard of the poſſeſſion of this place, (as if that dignity were annexed thereto) & afterwards Vicount Liſle: by a Patent without any ſuch regard. This title through the gratious favor of kings flouriſhed ſtill in his poſterity one after another ſucceſſiuely. For, breifly to knit up their ſucceſſion. When Sir Thomas Talbot ſonne of the ſaid Iohn departed this life without iſſue, beeing deadly ſhot into the mouth with an arrow in a skirmiſh defending his poſſeſſions againſt the Lord Barkley, Sir Edward Grey, who had married his ſiſter, received the ſame at the hands of king Richard the third, and left it to Iohn his ſonne, and ſucceſſour. Whoſe onely daughter and heire king Henrie the E Eighth aſſured to Sir Charles Brandon, and thereupon created him Vicount Liſle. But when as ſhee died in tender yeares before the marriage was ſolemniſed, hee alſo relinquiſhed that title. Which king Henrie afterward beſtowed vpon Sir Arthur Plantagenet baſe ſonne to king Edward the fourth. Who had wedded Elizabeth ſiſter to Sir Iohn Grey Vicount Liſle, and widdow of Edmund Dudley. And when hee deceaſed without heires male, the ſaid king honoured therewith Sir Iohn Dudley ſonne of Edmund by the ſame Elizabeth Grey, who in the time of king Edward the ſixth was created Duke of Northumberland, and afterward attainted by Queene Marie. His ſonne Sir Ambroſe Dudley beeing reſtored in bloud, was by Queene Elizabeth on one and the ſelfe ſame daie created Lord Liſle, and Earle of Warwicke, F who ended his life iſſueleſſe. And now lately Sir Robert Sidney his ſiſters ſonne was honoured with the ſtile of Vicount Liſle by king Iames, who had before created him (beeing Chamberlane to the Queene his wife) Baron Sidney of Penſherſt.

Beſiles Lee. Fetiplace.

* Ouſe.

Vicount Liſle.

See the Earles of Shrewſbury.

1605.

Then runneth the river Ock aforeſaid, betweene Puſey, which they that are named

A med de Puſey hold it yet by the horn from their anceſtors, as given unto them in ancient time by K. Canutus the Dane, & the two Denchworths the one & the other, wher flouriſhed for a long time two noble & auncient houſes, to wit, de Hide at the one, & Fetiplace at the other; which families may ſeeme to haue ſprung out of one and the ſame ſtocke, conſidering they both beare one and the ſame coat of armes. Then entertaineth Ock a nameleſſe river, which iſſueth out of the ſame vale, at Wantage called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Wanating, where ſome time there was a Manour houſe of the kings, and the place wherein Ælfred that moſt noble and renowned king was borne and bred, which at his death hee bequeathed to Alfrith. Long
B time after, it became a mercate towne by the meanes and helpe of Sir Fulk Fitzwarin that moſt warlike knight, upon whom Roger Bigod Mareſchall of England had beſtowed it for his martiall proweſſe, and at this daie it acknowledgeth for Lords thereof the Bourchiers, Earles of Bath deſcended from the race of the Fitzwarins, of whoſe familie ſome were here buried.

Puſey. Denchworth. Wantage. Fitzwarin.

Iſis being departed once from Abbendon, ſtraightwaies receiveth into it out of Oxford ſhire, the river Tame (of which elſewhere) and now by a compound word being called Tamiſis, firſt directeth his courſe to Sinodun an high hill, and fenſed with a deepe trench, where ſtood, for certaine, in old time a fortreſſe of the Romanes: for, the ground being now broken up with the plough, yeeldeth otherwhiles to the C ploughmen, ſtore of Romane peeces of coine, as tokens of antiquitie. Under it at Bretwell, there was a Caſtle, (if it were not that upon this hill) which King Henrie the Second woone by force, a little before that he made peace with King Stephen. From hence Tamis, holdeth on his way to the chiefe citie in times paſt of the Attrebatians, which Antoninus termeth, GALLEVA of Attrebats, Ptolomee GALEVA, but both of them through the careleſneſſe of the Scriveners name it wrong, for, GALLENA: and they likewiſe in their Greeke copies have thruſt upon us, Νάλλνα, for Gallena, by tranſpoſition of letters. I have thought it was ſo named in the Britiſh tongue, as it were Guall hen, that is, The old rampire or fort. Which name being ſtill kept, and [Ford] added thereto, which is a ſhallow place in the river: the Engliſhmen in old
D time called it Guallengaforo, and Wallengaforo, and we at this day, ſhorter, Wallengford. In King Edward the Confeſſors time, it was counted a Burgh, (and contained (as we find in that Book wherin K. William the Firſt, took the Survey of all England) two hundred, threeſcore, and ſixteene Hages, that is to ſay, Houſes, yeelding nine pounds de Gablo, and thoſe that dwelt there, did the King ſervice on horſebacke, or by water. Of thoſe Hages eight were deſtroied for the Caſtle. In old time it was compaſſed about with walles, which, as men may ſee by their tract, tooke up a mile in circuit. It hath a Caſtle ſituate upon the river, verie large (I aſſure you) and ſtately: ſo fortified in times paſt, that the hope in it, (as imprenable, and invincible) made divers over-bold and ſtowt. For, vvhen England burned (as a man may ſay) in a gene-
E rall flame of warres, we read, that it was by King Stephen belaied once or twiſe with ſieges, but all in vaine. The greatneſſe and magnificence thereof I much wondered at when I was young, and remooved thither from Oxford (for a place it is novv for the Students there of Chriſtchurch, to retire unto) as having a double range of walles about it, and being compaſſed round likevviſe vvith a duple rampire and ditch: and in the mids of it, there ſtandeth a tower or Keepe, raiſed upon a mightie high mount: in the ſteep aſcent whereof by ſteps, we ſaw a Well of an exceeding depth. The Inhabitants are verily perſwaded, that it was built by the Danes; but I ſhould rather judge, that ſome thing was heere erected by the Romanes, and afterwards raſed by Saxons, and Danes, what time as Sueno the Dane, ranging and roving this way ſpoi-
F led, and harried the countrey. That it was at length reedified under King William the firſt, we know aſſuredly by Domeſday book, ſeeing that it yeeldeth record (as even now I noted) of eight Hages or Houſes deſtroyed for the Caſtle. Yet William Gemeticenſis makes no mention of this Caſtle, when he writeth, that William of Normandie having defeited Harold, led his armie forthwith to this citie (ſo he tenneth it) and after he had paſſed over the Tamis at the ford, pitched his tents heere before hee Tamiſis or Tamis the River. Sinodun. Bretwell. Robert Montenſis. Gallena. Wallengford Domeſday booke. Cook. f. 4 b. 2. p. 142. & 213.

Digitized by Google

came to London. At which time Wigod an Englishman was Lord of Wallengford, A Records of Wallingford. who had one onely daughter given in marriage to Robert D'Oyley, of whom hee begat Mawd his sole heire, first wedded to Miles Crispin, and after his death, through the goodnesse and favour of K. Henrie the First, maried unto Brient, called Fitz Countie. Filius Comitis. Who being brought up in warlike feats, and taking part with Mawd the Empresse, most manfully defended this Castle against King Stephen, who had raised a fort just over against it at Crausmesh: and hee made it good, untill that peace so much wished of all England, was concluded in this place: and that most grievous dissention about the crowne, betweene K. Stephen, and Henrie the Second ended. For, then the love of God tooke such place in the hearts of the said Brient, and his wife, that they B cast off this fraile and transitorie world, and devoted themselves in religious life unto Christ: so was this Honour of Wallengford escheated into the Kings hand. Which appeareth out of an old Inquisition in the Exchequer, by these words. To his most beloved Lords, the King our soveraigne Lord, his Iustices, and Barons of the Exchequer, the Constable of Wallengford sendeth greeting. Know ye, that I have made diligent inquiry by the Knights of my Baliwicke, according to a commandement of my Lord the King, directed unto me by the Sheriffe: and of the Inquisition thus made, this is the summe. Wigod of Wallingford, held the honour of Wallingford in King Harolds time, and afterwards in the daies of King William the First: He had by his wife a certaine daughter whom hee gave in marriage to Robert D'Oyly. This Robert begat of her a daughter, named Mawd, who C was his heire. Miles Crispin espoused her, and had with her the honour aforesaid of Wallingford. After the decease of Miles, our soveraigne Lord King Henrie the first, bestowed the foresaid Mawd upon Brient Fitz Count, who both tooke themselves to a religious life, and King Henrie the Second seised the honour into his hand, &c. Yet afterwards in the time of K. Henrie the Third, it belonged to the Earles of Chester: and then to Richard King of the Romans, and Earle of Cornwall, who repaired it, and unto his sonne Edmond, who within the inner Court founded a collegiate Chappell, who dying without issue, it fell againe to the crowne, and was annexed to the Dukedome of Cornwall: since which time it hath by little and little decaied. And verily about the time when that most mortall Plague which followed the conjunction of Saturne D and Mars in Capricorne, reigned hotely throughout all Europe, in the yeere of our Lord 1348. This towne was so dispeopled by reason of continuall mortalitie there, that whereas before time it was passing well Inhabited, and had twelve Churches in it, it can shew now no more than one or two. But the cause of this desolation the Inhabitants lay rather upon the bridges of Abbindon and Dorchester, whereby London portway was turned from thence.

Of the honor of Wallingford. in Testa Nevill in the Exchequer.

A most grievous Pestilence.

From hence Southward, the Tamis passeth most mildly between verie rich and fertile fields on both sides, by Moul's-ford: which K. Henrie the first gave unto Girald Firz-Walter, from whence the Noble family of the Carewes is descended. To this house, much lands, honour, and reputation accrewed, in Ireland by descent, and in E
England by matching in mariage with right noble families of the Mohuns, Dinhams, and others. Not farre from hence is Aldworth, where be certaine tombes and portraictures, bigger than the ordinary proportion of men: which thereupon the unlearned multitude keeps a vvondering at, as if they had been Giants: vvheras indeed, they vvere but of certaine Knights of the Family de la Beche, vvhich here had a Castle, and is thought in the raigne of King Edward the Third to have beene extinguished for default of issue male. And now at length Tamis meeteth with Kenet, which River, as I said ere-while, vvatering the South part of this shire, at his first entry vvhen he hath left Wilshire behind him, runneth under Hungerford, named in old time Ingleford Charnam-street: a very small towne, and seated in a moist place; how- F beit, it hath given name & title to the honorable family of the Barons of Hungerford, which was first raised to greatnesse by Walter Hungerford, vvho under King Henrie the Fifth, being Seneschall or Steward of the kings house, vvas for his vvarlike prowesse liberally rewarded by the said king & infeoffed in the Castle and Barony of Homet in Normandie, To have and to hold unto him and his heires-males by homage and service

Moules-ford.

Carew.

Aldworth.

The River Kenet. Hungerford.

1. pars dupl. patent Norm. 6. H. 5.

Barons of Hungerford.

Digitized by Google

A vice, to find the King and his heires at the Castle of Roan, one Launce with a Fox taile hanging downe thereat: vvhich pleasant conceit, I thought not amisse to insert here among serious matters. The same Walter in the raigne of Henrie the Sixth, being high Treasurer of England, and created vvithall Baron Hungerford, as vvell by his singular vvisedome, as his marriage vvith Catherine Peverell (descended from the Moels, and Courtneys,) mightily augmented his state. His sonne Robert, vvho vvedded the daughter and heire of the Lord Botereaux, enriched the same house verie much, Sir Robert likewise his sonne, who matched with Æleanor, the daughter and heire of William Molines (whereupon he was summoned among the Barons of the Realme B by the name of Lord Molines) and during the civill warre betweene the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke, was beheaded at Newcastle, advanced the name not a little. His sonne Thomas, slaine at Salisbury, while his father was living left his only daughter named Marie, whom Edward Lord Hastings tooke to wife with a great and rich inheritance. But Walter, brother to the said Thomas, begat Edward Hungerford, father of that Walter, whom King Henrie the Eighth created Baron Hungerford of Heitesbury, and condemned him afterwards for a crime not to be spoken of: howbeit, Queen Marie restored his children unto all his estate, save onely the name and title of Barons. Not farre from hence Southward is Widehay, the C seat for a long time of the Baron* Saint Amand, whose inheritance Gerard Braybrooke entred upon in right of his wife, whose eldest Niece by his sonne Gerard, named Elizabeth, by her mariage brought the same unto VVilliam de Beauchamp, who being sommoned to the Parliament by the name of VVilliam Beauchamp de Saint Amando, flourished among other Barons, like as his sonne Richard, who left no issue lawfully begotten.

v. Brooks repproofs p. 23, 24, 25.

Buggery.

Widehay.

*De S. Amando Barons de S. Amand.

Beauchamp De S. Amand.

Kenet keeping on his course downward from thence, betweene Hemsted Marshall, which sometimes was held by the rod of Marshalsee, and appertained to the Mareschals of England where S. Thomas Parry Treasurer of Queene Elizabeths household, built a very proper house, and Benham Valence in a Parke so called, because it belonged to William de Valencia Earle of Pembroch. But Queen Elizabeth gave it to Iohn Baptista D Castilion a Piemontes, of her priuie chamber for faithfull service in her daungers. So the river passeth on to that old town Spinæ, wherof Antonine made mention: which retaining still the name as at this day called Spene: but now in steed of a towne it is a very little village standing scarce a mile off from Newbury a famous towne that arose and had beginning out of the ruins of it. For, Newbury with us is as much to say, as the Newburgh, in respect no doubt, of that more ancient place of habitation which is quite decayed and gone, and hath left the name also in a peece of Newburie it selfe which is called Spinham Lands. And if nothing else, yet this verily might prove that Newburie sprang out of Spine, because the inhabitants of Newbury acknowledge the village Spene as their mother, although in comparison of Spene it be passing faire E and goodly, as well for buildings as furniture: become rich also by clothing, and very well seated in a champion plaine, having the river Kenet to water it. This towne at the time that the Normans conquered England, fell to Emulph de Hesdin Earle of Perch: whose successour Thomas Earle of Perch, being slaine at the siege of Lincolne, the Bishop of Chalons his heire sold it unto William Mareschall Earle of Pembroke, who also held the Manore of Hempsted hard by (whereof I have spoken) and his successors also Mareschals of England, untill that Roger Bigod for his obstinacie lost his honor and possessions both, which notwithstanding by intreaty he obtained againe for his life time.

Spine.

Newbury.

Kenet passeth on hence and taketh into him Lamborn a little river, which at the F head and spring thereof imparteth his name to a small mercate towne, that in old time by vertue of King Aelfreds testament belonged unto his cousin Alfrith, and afterward to the Fitz Warins, who of King Henry the Third obtained libertie of holding a mercate, but now appertaineth unto the Essexes Knights: A familie that fetcheth their pedigree from William Essex Vnder-treasurer of England under Lamborn.

Digitized by Google

King Edward the Fourth, & from thoſe who in times paſt carried the ſame ſurname, A & flouriſhed as men of very great fame in Eſſex. From thence he runneth under Dennington, which others call Dunnington a little caſtle, but a fine and proper one, ſituate with a faire proſpect upon the brow of a prety hill full of groves, and which inwardly for the moſt part letteth in all the light. Built, they ſay, it was by Sir Richard de Abberbury Knight, who alſo under it founded for poore people a * Godshouſe. Afterward, it was the reſidence of Chaucer, then of the Dela Poles, and in our fathers daies of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

* Almes houſe.

Aldermaſton.

Kenet having now finiſhed a long courſe, by Aldermaſton which King Henrie the First gave unto Robert Achard: From whoſe poſterity by the Delamares it came at B length in right of mariage to the Foſters a familie of Knights degree, falleth at the laſt into Tames, preſently after it hath with his winding branches compaſſed a great part of Reading. This towne Reading, called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Rheabyge, of Rhea; that is, The River, or of the Britiſh word Redin, that ſignifieth Fearne, (which groweth heere in great plentie) excelleth at this day all other townes of this ſhire in faire ſtreets, and goodly houſes: for wealth alſo of the townſmen and their name in making of cloth, although it hath loſt the greateſt ornaments it had, to wit, a beautifull Church and a moſt ancient Caſtle. For this the Danes kept as their hold, (ſo Aſſerius writeth) when they made a rampier betweene Kenet and Tamis, and into this they retired themſelves for ſafety when at Inglefield (a village C neere unto it, which gave name to an ancient familie) they were by King Aethelwolfe diſcomfited and put to flight.

Reading.

But King Henrie the Second ſo raſed it (becauſe it was a place of refuge for King Stephens followers) that nothing now remaineth of it but the bare name in the next ſtreet. Nigh whereunto, King Henrie the Firſt having plucked downe a little Nunnerie that Queene Alfrith had founded in former times, to make ſatisfaction for her wicked deeds, built for Monks a ſtately and ſumpteous Abbay, and enriched it with great reuenewes. Which Prince, to ſpeake out of his very Charter of the foundation, Becauſe three Abbaies in the Realme of England were in old time for their ſinnes deſtroied, to wit, Reading, Chelſeie and Leonminſter, which a long time were held in Lay mens D hands: by the adviſe of the Biſhops, built a new Monaſterie of Reading and gave unto it Reading, Chelſeie and Leonminſter. In this Abbay was the founder himſelfe King Henrie, buried with his wife both vealed and crowned for that ſhee had beene a Queene, and a profeſſed Nunne, and with them their daughter Mawde, as witneſſeth the private Hiſtorie of this place, although ſome report, that ſhe was enterred at Bece in Normandie. This Mawde as well as that Lacedemonian Ladie Lampido, whom Plinie maketh mention of, was a Kings daughter, a Kings wife, and a Kings mother: that is to ſay, daughter of this Henrie the Firſt, King of England, wife of Henrie the Fourth, Emperour of Almaine, and mother to Henrie the Second, King of England. Concerning which matter have you here a diſtichion engraven on E her tombe, and the ſame verily in my judgment conceiued in ſome gracious aſpect of the Muſes.

Mawde the Empreſſe.

Magna ortu, maior-que viro, ſed maxima partu,
Hic iacet Henrici filia, ſponſa, parens.

The daughter, wife, the mother eke, of Henrie, lieth heere;
Much bleſt by birth, by mariage more, but moſt by iſſue deere.

And well might ſhe be counted greateſt by her iſſue: For, Henrie the Second her ſonne, as Iohn of Salisburie who lived in thoſe daies wrote; was the beſt and moſt vertuous King of Britaine, the moſt fortunate Duke of Normandie and Aquitain: and as well for valiant exploits, as for excellent vertues highly renowned. How courageous, how F magnificent, how wiſe and modeſt he was even from his tender yeeres, envy it ſelfe can neither conceale nor diſſemble: ſeeing that his acts be freſh and conſpicuous: ſeeing alſo, that he hath extended forward and held on in a continued traine, the titles of his vertue from the bounds of Britaine unto the marches of Spaine. And in another place of the ſame King, Henrie the Second the moſt mighty King that ever was of Britaine, ſhewed his

King Henry the Second.

Digitized by Google

A his puiſſance about the river Garumna; and laying ſiege to Toloſe, with fortunate ſucceſſe terrified not onely thoſe of Provinces as farre as to Rhoſne and the Alpes, but alſo by raiſing fortreſſes & ſubduing nations, he made the princes of Spaine and France to quake for feare, as if he had beene ever more at the point to ſet upon them all. I will, alſo if it pleaſe you, adjoine heereto a word, or two concerning the ſame King, out of Gairaldus Cambrenſis. From the Pyrenean mountaines, ſaith hee, vnto the Weſterne bounds, and furtheſt limits of the North Ocean, This our Alexander of the Weſt hath ſtretched forth his arme. As farre therefore as nature in theſe our parts hath enlarged the land, ſo farre hath hee marched with victories. If the bounds of his expeditions were ſought for, ſooner would the
B globe of earth faile, than they end. For where there is a valiant and courageous minde, howſoever earth and land faile, victories cannot faile: well may there be wanting, matter of triumph, but triumphs will never be wanting. How great an addition to his glorious titles and triumphs was Ireland? with how great valour and praiſe-worthy proweſſe pearced he through the very ſecrets and hidden places of the Ocean? But lo heere an old verſe of his death, which briefely in one word containeth fully both all this and alſo the renowne of his ſonne King Richard the firſt.

Mira cano, Sol occubuit, nox nulla ſequuta eſt.

A wounder great, the Sunne was ſet, and night there followed more.

For, ſo farre was King Richard his ſonne from bringing darkneſſe with him, that King Richard the firſt.
C with the beames of his victories atchieved in Cypres and Syria, he made our countrey of England moſt famous and renowned through the world. But theſe are things without our Element. Let us returne againe from perſons to places. This Monaſtery wherein that noble King Henry the Firſt was buried is now converted to be the Kings houſe, which hath adioining unto it a very goodly ſtable ſtored to the full with princelike and moſt generous ſteeds. But as touching this place, liſten alſo to the Poet deſcribing the Tames as he paſſeth heereby.

Hinc videt exiguam Chawſey, properatque videre
Redingum nitidum, texendis nobile pannis.
Hoc docet Aelfredi noſtri victricia ſigna,
D Begſcegi cædem, calcata cadauera Dani:
Vtque ſuperfuſo maduerunt ſanguine campi.
Principis hîc Zephiro Cauroque parentibus orti
Cornipides crebris implent hinnitibus auras,
Et gyros ducunt, greſſus glomerantque ſuperbos,
Dum cupiunt noſtri Martis ſeruire lupatis.
Heccine ſed pietas? heu dira piacula, primum
Neuſtrius Henricus ſitus hîc, inglorius vrna
Nunc iacet eiectus, tumulum nouus aduena quærit
Fruſtrà; nam regi tenues inuidit arenas
E Auri ſacra fames, Regum metuenda ſepulchris.

From hence he little Chawſey ſeeth, and haſtneth for to ſee Faire Reading towne, a place of name, where Cloth's ywoven be.
This ſhewes our Ælfrids victorie, what time Begſceg was ſlaine,
With other Danes, whoſe carcaſſes lay trampled on the plaine;
And how the fields ydrenched were with bloud upon them ſhed;
Where as the Prince in Stable now hath ſtanding many a ſtede
Of nobleſt kind, that neigh and ſnort into the aire a lowd
Tracing the ring and keeping pace that ſtately is and prowd, Whiles they deſire to learne withall in our warres for to ſerve,
F But where (alas) is piety? Such curſed deeds deſerve Purged to be by ſacrifice. A King of Normans race
Henry the firſt, enterred heere, now turn'd out of his place,
An out caſt lies diſhonoured. Who ſeekes his tombe ſhall miſſe:
For Covetiſe envied that King the ſmall mould which was his.
See ſee, how Princes monuments it ranſacks where it is.

Scarce

Digitized by Google

Scarce halfe a mile from Reading, betwixt moſt greene and flowring medowes, A the Kenet is coupled with the Tamis, who now runneth with a broader ſtreame by Sunning. a ſmall village called Sunning, which a man would mervaile to have beene the Sea of eight Biſhops who had this ſhire and Wiltſhire for their Dioceſe (yet our Hiſtories report as much) the ſame afterwards by Herman was tranſlated to Shirburne, and in the end to Salisburie, unto which Biſhopricke this place ſtill belongeth. Heereby falleth Ladden a ſmall water into the Tamis, and not farre off ſtandeth Laurents Waltham, where are to be ſeene the foote foundations of an old fort, and divers Romane coines often times digged up and next to it Billingsbere the inhabitation of Sir Henry Neuill iſſued from the Lords Abergevenny. From Sunning the Tamis paſſeth B Biſham. by Biſtleham, now called ſhort, Biſham, at firſt a Lordſhip of the Knights Templars, them of the Montacutes and amongſt them, William the firſt Earle of Salisburie of his familie founded a Priory, wherein ſome ſay hee was buried. Certes his wife the Grandiſon. daughter of the Lord Grandiſon was buried there, and in the inſcription of her tombe it was ſpecified, that her father was deſcended out of Burgundie, coſin-german to the Emperour of Conſtantinople, the King of Hungary, and Duke of Bauare, and brought into England by Edmund Earle of Lancaſter. Now it is the poſſeſſion * of Sir Edward Hoby Knight, of me eſpecially to be obſerued, whoſe ſingular kindneſſe toward me the often conſideration thereof ſhall keepe ſo freſh, that it ſhall never vaniſh out of my remembrance. C

Tamis having now left Biſham behind it, fetcheth it ſelfe with a compaſſe about to a little towne named in the former ages Southealington afterward Maiden-hith, and at this day Maindenhead, of the ſuperſtitions worſhipping of I wote not what Britiſh
Maiden-head. Maidens-head, one of thoſe eleuen thouſand Virgins, who as they returned from Rome into their country with Vrſula their leader, ſuffered as Martyrs at Colein in Germaine, under that ſcourge of God, Attila. Neither is this towne of any antiquity: for, no longer agoe then in our great Grandfathers daies, there was a Ferrey in a place ſomewhat higher, at Babhams end. But after they had built heere a bridge of timber piles, it beganne to flouriſh with Innes and goe beyond her mother Bray hard by, which notwithſtanding is farre more ancient, as having given name to the whole D Hundred. This parcell of the ſhire, I have beene of opinion that the Bibroci, who Bibroci. yeelded themſelves under Caſars protection, inhabited in times paſt: And why ſhould I thinke otherwiſe? The reliques of them remaine yet moſt evidently in the name. For, Bibracte in France is now alſo drawen ſhorter into Bray: and not far from hence Caſar paſſed over the Tamis with his armie, as I will ſhew in due place, what time as the people of that ſmall Canton put themſelves to the devotion of Caſar. Certes, I a man ſhould hunt for theſe Bibroci elſe where, he ſhould I beleeve, hardly find them. f

Within this Hundered of the * Bibroci, Windeſore beeareth a goodly ſhew: in Windeſore. the Saxon tongue, haply of the winding ſhore called Wyndlerhopa for ſo it is named E
* Bray. downe in the Charter of King Edward the Confeſſour, who in this forme of words made a grant unto the Monks of Weſtminſter. To the praiſe of almighty God, I have granted as an endowment and a perpetuall inheritance to the uſe and behalfe of thoſe that ſerve the Lord, Windle-ſhore with the appertenances. And I have read nothing more ancient, concerning Windſore. But the Monks had not long held it in poſſeſſion, when William of Normandie by making an exchange drew it backe to himſelfe. For in this tenure goeth his Charter. With the conſent and favour of the venerable Abbot of Weſtminſter, I have made a compoſition for Windleſor to be the Kings poſſeſſion, becauſe that place ſeemed profitable and commodious by reaſon of water hard adioining to it: and the wood fit for game & many other particulars lying there meet & neceſſary for kings: F yea & a place very convenient to receive and entertaine the King: in lieu whereof I have granted to the Monks Wokendune and Ferings.

Surely a Princes ſeat cannot lightly have a more pleaſant ſite. For, from an high hill that riſeth with a gentle aſcent, it enjoieth a moſt delightfull proſpect round about. Fore right in the Front it overlooketh a vale lying out farre and wide,

garniſhed

A garnished with corne-fields flourishing greene with medowes, decked with groves on either side and wathered with the most mild and calme riuer Tamis. Behind it arise hils every where, neither rough nor over high, attired, as it were, with woods and even dedicated as one would say by nature to hunting game. With the pleasantnes of this place Princes were allured, very often to retire themselves hither: and heere was Edward the Third that most puissant King borne to conquer France: who heere built new out of the ground a most strong Castle in bignesse equall to a pretie Citie, fortified with ditches and bulwarks made of stone: and forthwith after hee had subdued the French and Scots, held at one and the selfe same time Iohn B King of France, and David King of Scotland prisoners together in the same. This Castle is divided into two courts: the inner more toward the East, containeth in it the kings pallace, than vvhich for the order and contriving, there can be no building more lightsom, nor more magnificent. On the north side, where it looketh down to the riuer, Q. Elizabeth adioined a most pleasant Terrace, or open walking place. The utter base court hath at the very first entrance a most stately Church consecrated by King Edward the Third unto the blessed Virgine Marie and to Saint George of Cappadocia: but brought unto that sumpteous magnificence, which now we see it came, by King Edward the fourth, and Sir Reginald Bray.

Order of the Garter.

In this place, king Edward the third, for to adorne martiall prowesse, with honors, Anno 1344. C the guerdon of vertue, ordained that most noble order and society of knights, whom (as some report) for his owne garter given forth as signall of a battaile that sped fortunately, hee called knights of the Garter: who weare on their left legge somewhat under the knee a blew garter: carying this Empresse wrought with golden letters in French HONY SOIT QVI MALY PENSE, and fasten the same with a buckle of gold as with the bond of a most inward society, in token of concord and unity, that there might bee among them a certaine consociation and communion of vertues. But others there be, that doe attribute it unto the garter of the Queene or rather of Ioan Countesse of Salisburie, a Lady of incomparable beauty, which fell from her as shee daunced, and the King tooke up from the floore: for, when a number of Nobles D and Gentle men standing by laughed thereat, he made answere againe, that shortly it would come to passe that garter should bee in high honour and estimation. This is the common and most received report: Neither need this seeme to be a base originall thereof, considering how, as one saith,

Anno 1344.

Shame to him that evill thinketh.

Nobilitas sub amore jacet.
Nobility lies under loue.

There be also, that would have the invention of this order to be much more ancient, fathering it upon King Richard the first, and are verily perswaded, that King Edward at length brought it into use againe: but how truely, I know not. Yet in the verie booke of the first Institution, which William Dethicke Garter, principall E King of armes, a Gentleman most studious in all such things as concerne Honour, shewed unto me, thus we read. Richardo cum contra Turcas & Agarenos, &c. that is, when K. Richard warred upon the Turks and Saracens, Cypres and Acon, and was wearie of so lingring delay, whiles the siege continued long in wonderful care & anxiety, at length upon a divine inspiration, by the comming in & apparition (as it was thought) of S. George, it came into his mind to draw upon the legs of certaine choise Knights of his a certaine Garter or tach of leather, such onely as he had then readie at hand, whereby they being distinguished, and put in minde of future glorie promised unto them, if they wonne the victorie, they might be stirred up, and provoked to performe their service bravely, and fight more valiantly: in imitation of the Romanes, who had such varietie of Coronets, wherewith militaF riemen for divers and sundry causes, were rewarded accordingly: to the end that by these instigations (as it were) cowardise being shaken off, the valour of mind and courage of hart might arise and shew it selfe more resolute. But upon what occasion soever it began, the mightiest Princes of Christendome, reputed it amongst their greatest honour to be chosen and admitted into this companie: and since the first institution thereof, there have been alreadie received, and enrolled into this order, which consisteth of Soveraignes.

six

six and twentie Knights, two and twentie Kings, or thereabout, besides our Kings of England, who are named Soveraignes thereof: to speake nothing of Dukes, and others of most high calling, verie many. And here I am willing to set down their names that were first chosen into this order, and be commonly called, the Founders of the Order: for, their renowme is not to be abolished, who in those daies for stowt courage, and warlike prowesse, had few or no peeres, and were in that regard advanced to this honour. A Founders of the Order.

Edward the Third King of England.
Edward his eldest Sonne, Prince of Wales.
Henrie, Duke of Lancaster.
Thomas, Earle of Warwicke.
The Capdall de Buch.
Ralph, Earle of Stafford.
William de Monteacute Earle of Sarisburie.
Roger Mortimer, Earle of March.
Sir Iohn Liste.
Sir Bartholomew Burgwash.
Sir Iohn Beauchampe.
Sir Iohn Mohun.
Sir Hugh Courtney.
Sir Thomas Holland. B
Sir Iohn Grey.
Sir Richard Fitz Simon.
Sir Miles Stapleton.
Sir Thomas Walle.
Sir Hugh Wrothesley.
Sir Neel Loring.
Sir Iohn Chandos.
Sir James Awdeley.
Sir Otes Holland.
Sir Henrie Eme. C
Sir Zanchet D'brigecourt.
Sir Walter Pavely.

On the left side of the Church, are the houses of the Custos, or Deane, and twelve Prebendaries. On the right side standeth an house, not unlike to the Græcians Prytaneum: wherein twelve aged militarie men, Gentlemen borne, are maintained: who wearing every day a red or skarlet kirtle, reaching downe to ther ankles, with an upper mantle of purple over it, are bound daily to bee present at divine service, there to commend unto God in their prayers, the knights of this Order. Betwixt the two Courts before said, there riseth up an high mount, on which is set a round tower: and D hard by it ariseth another loftie tower, called Winchester tower, of William Wickham Bishop of VVinchester, whom king Edward the Third made overseer of the worke, when he built the Castle. Some report, that the said VVickham, after hee had built and furnished this Tower, in a certaine inner wall, engraved these words, This made VVickham: which maner of speech in the English tongue, that seldome maketh distinction of cases, carrieth such a doubtfull construction, that uncertaine it is, whether he made these buildings, or the buildings made him. Hereof information was given to the King by some privie back-biters for to worke him a displeasure; and that in such termes, as if Wickham did arrogantly challenge to himselfe all the honour of the building. VVhich when the King tooke in verie evill part, and sharply rebuked E him for it: he made this answere, That he had not arrogated, and ascribed to himselfe the praise of so sumptuous, and princely an edifice, but accounted this building, and peece of work to have been the meanes of all his dignities and preferments: neither have I (quoth he) made this Castle, but this Castle hath made me, and from low estate raised me unto the Kings favour, unto wealth, and dignitie. Under the Castle toward the West and South, lieth the towne of good bignesse and populous withall, which from the time of King Edward the Third began to flourish: and the other which standeth farther off, and is now called, Old Windsore, fell by little and little to decay. In which, (whiles VVilliam the First raigned, as we read in his booke) *there were an hundred Hages, or houses, whereof two and twentie were * quit from Gable, out of the rest there went thirtie shillings.* F No other memorable thing is here to bee found, but Aeton, which is hereto adjoyned by a wooden bridge over the Tamis, and in it a faire Colledge, and a famous Schoole of good literature, founded and built by King Henrie the Sixth: wherein, besides the Provost, Eight fellowes, and the singing Choristers, there are threescore Scholars, instructed in Grammar, and in due time preferred to the Universitie of Cambridge Almes-Knights.

Wickham his Apophthegm.

*Or, free.

Eaton.

Digitized by Google

A Cambridge. But this towne and colledge is in Buckingham-shire, and not in Barkshire: Now there remaineth nothing to say more of Windsore, but that there is an honourable family of Barons, surnamed of Windsore, who fetch their originall from Walter the son of Other, Castellan of Windsore in the time of K. William the First: from whom also master Robert Glover most studious, and skilfull in Heraldrie, and who in the company of Heralds, bare the title of Somerset, hath prooved, the Fitz-Giralds in Ireland, Earles of Kildare and Desmond to bee derived. Neither thinke much of your labour, to runne over these verses of Windsore, taken out of the Poëm, entituled, The mariage of Tame and Isis, and penned certaine yeeres past: wherein B father Tamisis endevoureth to set forth, as well the dignitie of the place, as the majestie of Queene Elizabeth, keeping her Court therein. Barons of Windsore.

Iam Windesoræ surgunt in culmina ripæ
Turrigeræ, celsa lambentes vertice cælum,
Quas ubi conspexit doctæ gratatus Etonæ,
Quæ fuit Orbilijs nimium subiecta plagosis;
Cæruleum caput ille lavans, ita farier infit.
Aerias moles, gradibus surgentia templa,
Ferratos postes, pinnas, vivaria, vere
Perpetuo lætos campos, Zephyroq; colono
C Florentes hortos, Regum cunabula, regum
Auratos thalamos, regum præclara sepulchra,
Et quæcunq; refers: nunc Windesora referre
Desine. Cappadocis quanquam sis clara Georgi
Militia, procerumq; cohors chlamydata nitenti
Cincta periscelidi suras, te lumine tanto
Illustret, tantis radijs perstringit & orbem,
Vt iam Phryxæum spernat Burgundia vellus,
Contemnat cochleis variatos Gallia torques,
Et cruce conspicuas pallas, Rhodus, Alcala, & Elba,
D Solaq; militiæ sit splendida gloria vestræ;
Desine mirari lætari, desine tandem.
Omnia concedunt uni, superatur in uno
Quicquid habes: tibi maior honos, & gloria surgit,
Accola quod nostræ ripæ sit, & incola vobis
Elizabetha. (simulq; suo quasi poplite flexo Tamisis en placidè subsidet, & inde profatur)
Elizabetha suis Diva & Dea sola Britannis:
Cuius inexhaustus laudes si carmine nostro
Complecti cuperem, Melibocco promptius Alpes
E Imponam, numeremq; meas numerosus arenas.
Si quasdam tacuisse velim, quamcunq; tacebo
Maior erit; Primos actus, veteresq; labores
Prosequar? ad sese revocant præsentia mentem.
Iustitiam dicam? magis at Clementia splendet.
Victrices referam vires? plus vicit inermis.
Quòd pietas floret, quòd non timet Anglia Martem,
Quòd legi nemo, quod lex dominatur & omni,
Quód vicina truci non servit Scotia Gallo,
Exuit atq; suas sylvestris Hibernia mores,
F Criniger Vltonius, quod iam mitescere discit;
Laus cadit hæc illi, nil non debetur & illi.
Crimina quæ pellant tanta quæ principe digna
Omnes templa sacro posuerunt pectore Divæ;
Religio superos sanctè monet esse colendos,
Iustitia utilibus semper præponere iustum.

Edocet;

Digitized by Google

Edocet, ut præceps nil ſit Prudentia ſuadet;
Temperies ut caſta velit, cupiatq; pudica
Inſtruit; immotam mentem Conſtantia firmat.
Hinc EADEM SEMPER, rectè ſibi vendicat illa.
Proferet undoſo quis tantas carmine laudes?
Sola tenet laudum quicquid numerabitis omnes.
Sit fœlix, valeat, vivat, laudetur, ametur;
Dum mihi ſunt fluctus, dum curſus, dum mihi ripæ.
Angligenum fœlix Princeps moderetur habenas;
Finiat una dies illi annos, & mihi curſus.

And now the tour-ſupporting bankes, at Windſore mount on hie,
That with their loftie-headed tops reach tothe cloudy skie.
Which when* he ſaw, and had withall greeted that learned Eaton,
His ſea-like head he lifting up in this wiſe gan to ſay;
Thy long diſcourſe (O Windſor) I wiſh thee now to ſtay,
Of high-raiſ'd mounts, of temples, wals that riſe vvith ſtately ſtaire,
Of yron-bound beames, of battlements, and pinnacles ſo faire:
Of gamefull parks, of meadowes freſh, ay-ſpring-like pleaſant fields,
Of goodly gardens clad with flowers, that holeſome Zephyrus yeilds,
Of nurſeries, gilt-mariage bowers, and ſumptuous tombes of Kings,
Relate no more, but make an end of all ſuch glorious things.
VVhat though thou much renowned be, by many a Georgian Knight,
And Nobles clad in mantles rich, vvith coſtly garter dight,
Doe cauſe thy name to ſhine ſo much, and thence to thy great praiſe
Through out the vvorld are ſpred abrode ſo bright and glittering raies,
That Burgundie deſpiſeth novv his goodly Toiſon D'or,
And France of colars gartriſht faire vvith cockles ſets no ſtore,
Nor Rhodes, with Alcal and Elba, regard the robes with Croſſe
Sightly beſet; ſo that they count their Orders all but droſſe, Compar'd vvith Knighthood this of thine, vvhich onely beares the name;
Ceaſe novv to joy, ceaſe novv at length to wonder at the ſame.
All yeeld to one, vvhat ev'r thou haſt in one is drovvned all,
For greater glorie grow's to thee, and honour more doth fall,
In that there dwels upon my banke, and ſeated is in thee,
Elizabeth (and therevvith Tamis ſeeming to bovv his knee,
And gently crouch, obeiſance made, and then he thus vvent on) Elizabeth, of Engliſhmen ſole Goddeſſe, Saint alone.
Whoſe praiſe-vvorth vertues, if in verſe I novv ſhould take in hand
For to comprize, on Meliboc an hill that high doth ſtand,
I might as eaſily ſet the Alps, or number all my ſand.
If ſome I vvould in ſilence paſſe, vvhat ever I ſuppreſſe,
Will greater proove than all the reſt: If I my ſelfe addreſſe,
Her formoſt acts, and travailes old to count, I then ſhall find,
That thoſe of preſent times, to them will dravv avvay my mind.
Say, that of juſtice I relate; more ſhin's her mercies lore;
Speake I of her victorious armes? unarm'd ſhe gained more.
That piety novv flouriſheth, that England feares no vvarre,
That none rules law, but unto law all men obedient are,
That neighbour Scots be not enthral'd to Frenchmen rigorous,
That Iriſh wild doe now caſt off their faſhions barbarous,
That ſhag-hai'rd Ulſter Kern, doth learne civility anew,
The praiſe and thanks is hers alone. What is not to her due?
Thoſe Goddeſſes that vices chaſe, and are beſeeming beſt
A Prince ſo rare, are ſeated all, and ſhrined in her breſt.
Religion Firſt, puts her in mind to worſhip God aright,

* Tamis.

Queene Elizabeth.

Digitized by Google

A And Iuſtice teacheth to preferre before all gaine, the right.
Prudence adviſeth nought to doe raſhly without fore-caſt.
Then Temperance perſwades to love all things both pure and chaſt.
And Conſtancie her reſolute minde doth ſettle firme and faſt.
Hence juſtly ſhe, ALVVAYS THE SAME, claimes and keepes to the laſt.
Who can deſcrive in* waving verſe ſuch noble vertues all?
Praiſe-worthy parts ſhee hath alone, what all yee reckon ſhall.
Then happineſſe, long life and health, praiſe, love, may her betide,
So long as waves of mine ſhall laſt, or ſtreame and banks abide;
B So long may ſhee, moſt bleſſed Prince, all Englands ſcepter ſway,
Let both my courſe, and her life end, in one and ſelfe-ſame day.

Queen Elizabeths Mot, or Empreſſe.

* Flowing or rolling.

The reſt of *Barkſhire which lieth ſouthward from Windſor, is ſhadowed with woods, and thickets, commonly called, the Forreſt of Windleſor, in which the townes and villages ſtand but thinne (whereof Ockingham is of greateſt name, by reaſon of the bigneſſe thereof, and trade of clothing:) but verie full it is of game in everie place. Now, for as much as we have often times made mention, and ſhall ſtill, of the Forreſts: what a Forreſt is, and the reaſon of that name, if you deſire to know, (but ſee you laugh not thereat) take it here out of the blacke booke of the Exchequer. A Forreſt is a ſafe harbor, and abiding place of deere or beaſts, not of any whatſoever, but C of wilde, and ſuch as delight in woods: not in every place, but in ſome certaine and meet for that purpoſe, and hereupon a forreſt hath the name, as one would ſay, Fereſta, that is, a ſtation of wild beaſts. And incredible it is how much ground the kings of England have ſuffered every where to lie untilled, and ſet apart for to empale & encloſe ſuch deere, or, as they uſe to ſay, have afforeſted. Neither can I think, that any thing elſe was the cauſe thereof, but only the over much delight in hunting, or to maintaine the Kings houſhold (although ſome attribute it to the infrequencie of people to inhabit the countrey) ſeeing that ſince the Danes were heere, they for a long time afforeſted more and more, and for the maintenance, and keeping of ſuch places ordained moſt ſtraight lawes, and an overſeer, whom they cal, Protoforeſtarius, that is, Chiefe foreſter, D or Maſter of the Foreſts, who ſhould heare cauſes belonging unto Forreſts, and puniſh either by death or loſſe of a lim', whoſoever killed Deere within any parke or chaſe. But Iohn of Sariſburie ſhal in his own words tell you theſe things briefely out of his Polycraticon; that which you may marvell more at, to lay grins for birds, to ſet ſnares to allure them with nooze or pype, or by any waies laying whatſoever to entrappe or take them, is often times by vertue of an Edict, made a crime, and either amerced with forfeiture of goods, or puniſhed with loſſe of limme and life. You have heard that the fowles of the aire, and fiſhes of the ſea are common: But theſe ywis belong unto the King, which the Forreſt Law taketh hold of, and claimeth whereſoever they flie. With-hold thy hand, forbeare and abſtaine leſt thou alſo be puniſhed for treaſon, fall into the hunters hands as a prey. Husband- E men are debarred their fallow fields whiles Deere have libertie to ſtray abroad, and that their paſtures may be augmented, the poore farmer is abridged, and cut ſhort of his grounds. What is ſowen, planted, or graffed, they keepe from the husbandmen that be tenants: both paſturage from heardmen, drovers & graziers, and Bee-hives they exclude from flowry plots: yea, the verie Bees themſelves are ſcarcely permitted to uſe their naturall libertie. Which courſes ſeeming too inhumane, were the occaſion otherwhiles of great troubles and uproares, ſo long, until in the end by the riſing and revolt of the Barons, there was wreſted from King Henrie the third, the Charter de Foreſta: wherein thoſe rigorous lawes being made void he granted others more indifferent, whereunto they are bound even at this day, who dwell within compaſſe of the Forreſts. And from that time, F two Iuſtices were appointed for theſe cauſes, whereof the one overſeeth all Forreſts on this ſide the river Trent, the other, all the reſt beyond Trent as farre as Scotland, with great authoritie. Throughout all this Province or county (as wee find in the Survey booke of England,) The Taine or Kings Knight, holding of him as Lord, whenſoever he died, left unto the King for a reliefe all his armour, one horſe with a ſaddle, and another without a ſaddle. And if he had either hounds or hawkes, they were tendred and

* Or, the Attrebatij.

Windſor Forreſt.

Chaſes or Forreſts.

Forreſt, what it is, and whence ſo called.

Protoforeſtarius.

Iuſtices of the Foreſts.

The Kings Knight.

Digitized by Google

presented unto the King, that hee might take them if he would. When Gelt was given in the time of King Edward [the Confessour] generally throughout all Barkshire, an Hide of Land yeelded three pence halfepenny before Christmas, and as much at Whitsontide. Thus much of Barkshire, which (as yet) hath given the title of Earle to no man.

Within the compasse of this shire, are Parishes 140.

THese Regions which hetherto we have travailled thorow, that is to say, of the Dammonij, Durotriges, Belgæ, and Attrebatij; what time as the Saxons bare Soveraigne rule in Britaine, fell to the Kingdome of the West-Saxons, which they in their language, called, Weaſt-Seaxanric, and themselves Gegyŷriſ, of Cerdics Grandfather, who first erected this Kingdom. Whence they were termed Gervissi, and by others also Visi-Saxones, from their West situation, like as the Westerne Gothes, are named Visi-Gothi. These at the lengh in the best and flourishing time of the Empire, reduced the English Heptarchie into the Saxons Monarchie: which notwithstanding afterward, through the lither cowardise of their Kings, quickly aged, and soone vanished. So that herein, that may be verified which we daily see. The race or issue of the most valiant men, and noblest Families, like as the of-spring of plants, hath their springing up, their flowring and maturitie: and in the end begin to fade, and by little and little to die utterly.

The Kingdome of west-Saxons.

Geguises.

REGNI.

Digitized by Google

A

B

REC

C NExt unto the Attrebatij Eastwa..,
REGNI, by Ptolomee PHINOI, inhabited those Regions which wee at this day, doe commonly terme Surry, and South-sex, with the Sea coast of Hantshire. As touching the Etymologie of this named, I will passe over my conceits in silence, because peradventure they would carrie no more truth with them, than if I should thinke they were by Ptolomey, called, PHINOI, for that it was Regnum, that is, a Kingdome, and the Romans permitted the people therof to remaine under a regall government. For, in this tract it was, that as Tacitus writeth, certain Cities according to an old Custome of the people of Rome, were given to Cogidumus, a British D king, that they might have even Kings also, as instruments to draw others into bondage and seruitude. But this conjecture seeming to my selfe not probable, and haply to others absurd, I utterly reject: and willingly embrace the Saxon originall of these latter names: to wit, that South-sex taketh denomination of the South-Saxons, and Suthrey of the South situatuation upon the River, for, no man may denie, that Suth-rey importeth so much, considering that Over-rhey, in the old English tongue, signifieth, Over, or beyond the river.

Rhey.

E

F

Digitized by Google

-REY.

...n Bede nameth Suthriona, commonly cal-
... Surrey, and by the Saxons, of bordering ... river, Suð-þea, for Suð, with them betoke-
... and þea a river or floud) from the West,
... upon Barkshire and Hantshire, from the ... sex: and from the East on Kent: toward B
...watered with the river Tamis, and by it
... ddlesex. A country it is not very large,
...ugh, where it beareth upon Tamis, and
... yeeldeth corne meetely well, and forrage
..., where a continuall valley falling lowe by
...olmesdale of the woods therein, runneth downe
...ation of the delectable varietie of groues, fields, and me-dowes. On each hue there bee prety hills rising up a great way along in the country, parkes every where repleniſhed with Deare, rivers alſo full of fiſh: whereby it affordeth for pleaſure faire game of hunting, and as delightſome fiſhing. Likened it C is by ſome unto acourſe freeſe garment with a greene gard, or to a cloath of a great ſpinning and thin woven, with a greene liſt about it, for that the inner part is but ba-raine, the outward edge or skirt more fertile. In my perambulation through this ſhire, I will follow the Tamis and the rivers running into it as guides of my journey:
ſo, ſhall I bee ſure to omit no memorable thing, ſeeing that the places which are of greater marke and antiquity doe all abutte upon theſe rivers.

Chertſey. The Tamis (that we may follow his courſe with the ſtreame, as it runneth downe) ſo ſoone as hee hath taken his leaue of Barkſhire paſſeth hard by Chertſey, which Beda calleth the Iſle of Cerotus. Now ſcarce halfe an Iſland, unleſſe it bee by winter waters: wherein, as in a place ſevered from all intercourſe and commerce with men, D Frithwald, as hee calleth himſelfe in the charter of the foundation, a petty Prince or regent of the Province of Surrey, under Woilpher King of the Mercians, and Erchen-
666. wald Biſhop of London in the firſt riſing of the Engliſh primitiue church, founded a Henry the ſixth. little monaſterie, wherein for a time that moſt devout king Henrie, the ſixt lay interred, whom being depoſed from his regal dignity, the houſe of Yorke to eſtabliſh their kingdome ſecurely, deprived alſo of his life, and here without any honour, buried him. But king Henrie the Seauenth afterwards having tranſlated his bodie to Windeſor, and beſtowed it in a new tombe, ſolemnized his funeralls after a princely manner, and ſo much admired his Godly and holy vertues (for, hee was the lively patterne of Chriſtian pietie and pacience) that hee delt with Pope Iulius, to have him E made a Saint. But the reaſon why this tooke no effect was the Popes covetouſneſſe, who demaunded too great a ſumme of money for a kings Canonization, as Hiſtor. of Canterbury. they terme it, ſo that hee might ſeeme ready to graunt thoſe kind of honours not for the Princes holineſſe ſake, but for gold. A little beneath this, the river Wey runneth into Tamis, which flowing forth out of Hantſhire, ſo ſoone as it is come into Farnham. Suthrey viſiteth Feornham, commonly termed Farnham, ſo named of much ferne growing in that place: which Æthelbald king of the Weſt Saxons to vſe his owne * Congrega-tion. words *Gaue unto the Biſhop and * congregation of Wincheſter church*. Here, about the yeare of our Lord 893. king Ælfred with a ſmall powre put to flight the Danes as they ſpoiled and harried the country: and afterwards when King Steph.n, had F granted leaue to as many as ſided with him to build Caſtles, Henrie of Bloys Brother to King Stephen erected a ſpatious Caſtle upon an hill that ouertopped the towne: which beeing a place of refuge for rebellious and ſeditious per-ſons, king Henrie the third caſt it downe: Howbeit the Biſhops of Wincheſter, unto whom it belonged built it up againe. And not farre from hence, at Waverley,

William

Digitized by Google

A William Giffard Biſhop of Wincheſter founded an Abbay for Monkes of the Ciſtercien order * commonly called, White Monkes. Which Abbay being a grand-child as they termed it from Ciſterce in Burgoundy, was ſo frutifull here in England that it was mother to the Abbaies of Gerondon-Ford, Tame, Cumb, and grandmother to Bordeſly, Bidleſden, Bruer, Bindon, and Dunkeſwell. For ſo religious orders were wont to keepe in pedegree manner the propagation of their orders, as a deduction of Colonies out of them. From thence, Wey holding on his courſe by Godelming, which king Ælfred bequeathed unto Æthelweld his brothers ſonne, not farre from the Mannor of Cateſhull, which Hamon of Catton held to bee the * Mareſitum of B harlots when the king came into thoſe parts: nor farre from Loſeley, where wee ſaw a large faire houſe belonging to the familie of the Mores, knights, within a parke, it commeth to Guilford, in the Saxon tongue Gulde-popo, and in ſome copies, written Gegldford. A mercate towne it is now well frequented, and full of faire Innes, but in old time it was a roiall manſion of the Engliſh Saxon kings, which alſo that noble Æthelweld held as a legacie from his Unkle by the fathers ſide, the king hath now thereby a decaying houſe, and not farre from the river are to be ſeene the broken walles of an old large caſtle. But in the mids of the towne there is a church, the weſt end whereof made of ariched worke, and embowed over head ſeemeth to bee very ancient. Heere, as is to bee ſeene in William the firſt his booke, the king had C ſeauenty fiue Hages, that is, houſes, wherein remained one hundred ſeaventy and fiue men. But for nothing it is ſo famous, as for the treacherie, and cruelty of Godwin Earle of Kent, who in the yeare of Chriſt 1036. When Ælfred king Etheldreds ſon, and heire apparent to the crowne of England came out of Normandie to claime his right, entertained him with faithfull promiſe of ſafety, but forthwith hardly entreated him contrary to his word: For, ſodainly in the dead of the night, hee ſurpriſed and put to death in this place ſixe hundred Normans, who had accompanied the young Prince, by tithing them as our Writers report. Neither ſlew hee every tenth man of them drawne by lot according to the old militarie cuſtome, but even as hee had killed nine, hee let the ſixth man goe by: and even theſe tenth men thus reD ſerved hee went over againe, and moſt cruelly retithed them. As for Ælfred him ſelfe, hee delivered him into the hands of Harold the Dane, who after hee had pulled both eyes out of his head, ouer layed him with irons, and kept him in cloſe priſon, even unto his dying day.

Waverley. Cateſhull. Guildford. Haga. Decimation.

Wey bieing, paſſed from hence with a long courſe Northward, ſheweth nothing memorable beſides Sutton, the reſidence of the Weſtons an ancient familie of knights degree bettered by an heire of T. Camel, Oking, where king Henrie the ſeauenth repaired and enlarged the Mannor houſe beeing the inheritance of the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richard his mother.

Oking, or Woking. Richmond

Newark ſometime a ſmall Priory inviroued with divided ſtreames: Pyriford, where E in our remembrance Edward Earle of Lincon Lord Clinton and Admirall of England built him an houſe; and Ockham hard by, where that great Philiſopher and father of the Nominals William de Ockam was borne and whereof hee tooke that name (as of the next village Ripley, R. de Ripley a ringleader of our Alchimiſts, and myſticall impoſtor.) But where this Wey is diſcharged into Tamis at a double mouth, Otelands a proper houſe of the King offereth it ſelfe to bee ſeene within a parke: nere unto which, Cæſar paſſed over Tamis into the borders of Caſſivelaunus. For, this was the onely place where a man might in times paſt goe over the Tamis on foote and that hardly too, which the Britains themſelues improuidently bewraied unto Cæſar. For, on the otherſide of the riuer, there was a great power F of the Britains well appointed and in readineſſe: and the very banke it ſelfe was fenſed with ſharpe ſtakes faſtned affront againſt the enemy, and others of the ſame ſort pitched downe in the Chanell, ſtucke covered with the riuer. The tokens whereof, ſaith Beda, Are ſeene this day, and it ſeemeth to the beholders that every one of them carrying the thickneſſe of a mans thigh and covered over with lead, ſticke unmoueable, as beeing driven hard into the bottome of the river. But the Romanes entred the William Ockham. Pater Nemi-nalium. Croſſed the Tamis.

Digitized by Google

river with such force, when the water reached up to their verie chinnes, that the Britains could not abide their violence, but left the banke and betooke themselues to flight. In this thing, I cannot bee deceived, considering that the river heere is scarce sixe foot deepe, the place at this daie of those stakes is called Coway-stakes, and Cæsar maketh the borders of Cassivelaunus where hee setteth downe his passage over the river to bee about fourescore Italian miles from the sea which beateth vpon the East-coast of Kent, where hee landed: and at the very same distance is this passage of ours. A Coway-stakes.

The river Mole.

Within some few miles from thence the river Mole, having from the South side passed through the whole country, hasteneth to joine with the Tamis; but at length beeing letted by overthwart hils, maketh him selfe a way under the ground in manner of mouldwarp, like unto that famous river Anas in Spaine: whereof it may seeme it tooke name, seeing that creature living within the ground, is called also in English a Mole. But upon this river, there is not any thing of note, save onely a good way off from the spring and head of it and neere unto an old port way of the Romanes making which men call Stanystreet) there stands the towne Aclea, commonly Ockley: so named of Okes where Æthelwolph the sonne of Egbert, who having beene professed in the holy orders and released by the Popes authority, when hee had possession of his fathers kingdome by right of inheritance, joined battaile with the Danes, fought with good successe, and slew all the valiantest men amongst them: Yet did hee little, or no good to his natiue country, the Danes evermore renewing their forces still as they were overthrowne, like unto that serpent Hydra. A little from the fountaines where this river springeth standeth Gatton which now is scarce a small village, though in times past it hath beene a famous towne. To proue the antiquity thereof it sheweth Roman coines digged forth of the ground, and sendeth unto the Parliament two Burgesses. Lower than it is seated Rhie-gat, (which if a man interprete according to our auncient language, is as much as the Rivers course), in a vale running out farre into the East, called Holmesdale; the Inhabitants whereof, for that once or twise they vanquished the Danes as they wasted the country, are wont in their owne praise to chaunt this ryhme. B C D

Anas a river in Spaine.

Ockley.

Gatton.

Rhie-gat.

Holmesdale.

The vale of Holmesdall,
Never wonne, ne never shall.

This Rhie-gate carrying a greater shewe for largenesse than faire buildings, hath on the South side a Parke thicke sette with faire groves, vvherein the right Noble Charles, Earle of Notingham, Baron of Effingham, and Lord Admirall of England, hath a house; where the Earles of Warren and Suthrey had founded a prety monasterie. On the East side, standeth a castle mounted a loft, now forlorne and for age readie to fall; built by the same Earles and of the vale wherein it standeth, commonlie called Holmecastell: under which I sawe a wonderfull vault carried under the ground of arch worke over head, hollowed with great labour out of a soft gritte and croumbling stone, such as the whole hill standeth of. These Earles of Warren, as wee finde in the Offices or Inquisitions held it in cheife of the King * in their Baronie, * from the conquest of England. Hence runneth this river downe by Bechworth Castle, for which Sir Thomas Browne obtained of King Henrie the Sixth the libertie of holding a Faire. For it is the habitation of the Brownes, Knights: out of which familie since our grand-fathers can remember, when Sir Antonie Browne had married Ladie Lucie the Fourth daughter of Iohn Nevil Marquesse Mont-a-cute Queene Marie honoured his sonnes sonne. With the title of Vicount Mont-acute. Some few miles from hence Westward Effingham sheweth it selfe, the possession not long since of William Howard (sonne to that Noble Thomas Duke of Norfolke that triumphed over the Scots) who being created by Queene Marie Baron Howard of Effingham, and made Lord High Admiral of England, was first Lord Chamberlain unto Queene Elizabeth of most happy memorie, and then Lord privie Seale: whose sonne Charles now flourisheth, Lord great Admirall of England, whom in the yeere of E F

Holmes castle.

* Or Inquisitions.

* In Baronia sua de Conquestu Anglie.

Effingham.

our

Digitized by Google

A our Lord 1597. the ſame Queene Elizabeth honoured alſo with the title of Earle of Notingham, of whom more in my Annales, but now returne we to the river.

The Mole now being come as farre as Whitehill, whereon the Box tree groweth in great plentie, at the foote thereof hideth himſelfe, or rather is ſwallowed up, and thereof the place is called the Swallow: but after a mile or two neere unto Letherhed bridge boiling up and breaking forth, taketh joy to ſpring out againe. So that the inhabitants of this tract may boaſt as well as the Spaniards, that they have a bridge which feedeth many flockes of ſheepe: For, this is a common by-word, moſt rife in the Spaniards mouthes, as touching the place where their river Anas, now called B Guadiana, hideth himſelfe for ten miles together. Thus our Mole riſing up a freſh haſteneth faire and ſoftly by Stoke Dabernoun ſo named of the ancient poſſeſſors the Dabernouns gentlmen of great good note, afterward by inheritance from them the poſſeſſion of the Lord Bray; and by Aeſher ſometime a retiring place belonging to the Biſhops of Wincheſter. And then very neare Moleſey whereunto it giveth name, ſheadeth himſelfe into the Tamis.

The Swallow, or Swallow-hole.

A bridge on which flockes of ſheepe are paſtured.

L. Bray.

After Tamis hath taken unto him the Mole, hee carrieth his ſtreame Northwardly and runneth faſt by Kingſtone, called in times paſt Mereford, as ſome will have it; a very good mercate towne for the bigneſſe, and well frequented; well knowne alſo in old time by reaſon of a Caſtle there belonging to the Clares Earles of Gloceſter. C Which towne had beginning from a little towne more ancient than it of the ſame name, ſtanding upon a flat ground and ſubject to the inundation of Tamis. In which when England was almoſt ruinated by the Daniſh wars, Athelſtan, Edwin, and Ethelred were crowned Kings vpon an open ſtage in the Marke place, and of theſe Kings heere crowned, it came to be named Kingſton, as one would ſay, The Kings Towne. Tamis now turning his courſe directly Northward, viſiteth another place: which the Kings choſe for themſelves ſometime to ſoiourne at, which of the ſhining brightneſſe they called Shene: but now it is named Richmond, wherein, the moſt mighty Prince, King Edward the Third when he had lived ſufficiently both to glorie and Nature, died; with ſorrow that hee conceived for the death of that moſt valiant and Martiall D Prince his ſonne which ſorrow pierced ſo deepe and ſtucke ſo neere to him and all England beſide, that it farre exceeded all comfort. And verily at this time if ever elſe, England had good cauſe to grieve: For, within one yeere after, it loſt the true praiſe of militarie proweſſe and of accompliſhed vertue: For, both of them by bearing their victorious armes throughout all France, ſtrucke ſo great a terror whereſoever they came, that as the father might moſt worthily with King Antiochus carrie the name of Thonder-bolt, ſo his ſonne with Pyrrhus deſerved to be named the Aegle. Heere alſo departed Anne wife to King Richard the Second, ſiſter of the Emperor Wenzelaus, and daughter to the Emperour Charles the fourth, who firſt taught Engliſh women that manner of ſitting on horsback which now is uſed: where E as before time, they rode very unſeemely aſtride, like as men doe. Whoſe death alſo her paſſionate husband tooke ſo to the heart that he altogether neglected the ſaid houſe, and could not abide it.

Richmond.

Both the place and the village before the time of King Henrie the Seuenth called Shene.

Edward the Third.

Howbeit King Henry the Fifth readourned it with new buildings, and in Shene a prety village hard by, he joined thereto a little religious houſe of Charthuſian Monks, which he called, The houſe of Ieſu of Bethelem. But in the raigne of Henrie the Seuenth, this princely Place was with a wofull ſudden fire conſumed all moſt to aſhes; Howbeit riſing up againe forthwith farre more beautifull and glorious as it were a Phœnix out of her owne aſhes, by the meanes of the ſame King Henrie: it tooke this new name Richmond, of the title he bare, being Earle of Richmond, before he obtained the F Crowne of England. Scarce had that Noble King Henry the Seuenth finiſhed this new worke, when in this place he yeelded unto nature, and ended his life; through whoſe care, vigilancy, pollicy and fore-caſting wiſdome for times to come, the State and common-weale of England hath to this day ſtood eſtabliſhed and invincible. From hence likewiſe his ſonnes daughter Queene Elizabeth a moſt gracious Ladie ninetie and foure yeeres after, having lived fully to the contentment of nature, (For, 70.

Digitized by Google

70. yeere old ſhe was or much thereabout) when it pleaſed God to call her out of this world, was received into the ſacred and celeſtiall ſocietie. A prince above her ſex of a manly courage, and high conceit, who lively reſembled as well the roiall qualities of her Grandfather, as ſhe did his princely preſence and countenance, the Worlds love, and joy of Britaine. And ſo farre was ſhe, a woman though ſhe were, from degenerating and growing unlike her noble Progenitours in that continued courſe of their vertues, that if ſhe ſurmounted them not, ſurely ſhe equalled them to the full. Well, poſterity may one day heereafter be ſo thankfull as to yeeld heereto a gracious credite (neither doe I heere by way of flatterie ſet a falſe colour and gloſſe upon the truth) that a Virgine for the ſpace of forty foure yeeres: ſo ruled the roiall Scepter, as that her ſubjects loved her, enemies feared her, and every one with admiration honored her, a thing in all foregoing ages of rare example. For, whoſe death England throughout, running all to teares, amid mones, and grones ſhould have lien forlorne in moſt piteous caſe comfortleſſe, had not preſently upon her departure out of this world, the moſt mild and gratious King Iames (on whom as the true and undoubted heire to her Crowne all mens minds were ſet and eies fixed) with his ſacred and bright beames ſhone unto us, and thereby put us in moſt comfortable hope of endleſſe joy. Whom ſo long as we behold heere, we beleeve not that ſhe is deceaſed. And why ſhould we once ſay that ſhe is deceaſed? whoſe vertues live ſtill immortall, and the memoriall of whoſe name conſecrated in mens hearts and in eternity of times, ſhall ſurvive for ever.

The death of Queene Elizabeth, 1603.

How farre the Tamis ebbeth and floweth.

Thus farre ſwelleth the Tamis with the acceſſe of the flowing tide of the ſea, about lx. Italian miles by water from his mouth. Neither to my knowledge is there any other river in all Europe, that for ſo many miles within land feeleth the violence of the Ocean forcing and ruſhing in upon it, and ſo driving backe and with-holding his waters, to the exceeding great commodity of the inhabitants bordering thereupon. Whither this commeth by reaſon that from hence he hath in maner on crooked turnings and winding reaches, but with a more ſtreight and direct chanell carrieth his currant into the Eaſt, as being for the moſt part reſtreined, and kept in with higher bankes, and dilating himſelfe with a wider mouth than all other rivers, lieth more expoſed and open to the Ocean, which by that moſt ſwift whirling about of the celeſtiall Spheres from Eaſt to Weſt is forceably driven and carried that way (as ſometimes I have beene of opinion) let Philoſophers diſcuſſe, unto whom I willingly leave theſe matters and ſuch like to handle. Yet ſome few verſes as touching theſe places and this argument, have heere out of the Marriage betweene Tame and Iſis, if haply they may content your taſt:

Why Tamis ebbeth and floweth ſo farre within Land.

A dextra, nobis Richmondia, Shena vetuſtis
Celſa nitet, ſapiens namque hanc Richmondia dici
Henricus voluit, ſibi quod retuliſſet honorem
Et titulos Comitis Richmondia iure paterno:
Hectoris Edwardi ſed deflet funera noſtri;
Proh dolor hîc illi regi mens libera ceſſit
Corpore contempto, ſedes habitura ſupernas.
Quem ſi non ſubitò rapuiſſent ferrea fata,
Aut te Valeſijs rapuiſſet Gallia victor,
Aut tibi Valeſios.

Then on the right hand Richmond ſtands, a faire and ſtately thing,
So cal'd of us, (but Shene of old) which name that prudent King
*Henrie it gave, becauſe to him it brought in fathers right
The Honor and the Stile, whereby, he Earle of Richmond hight.
But it of* Edward King (helas) our Hector, wailes the death,
Whoſe ſoule heere freed from body which it skorn'd, with vitall breath,
Departed hence right willingly, in heaven to live for ay:
Whom had not cruel-ſudden death untimely fetcht away,

*The ſeuenth

*The Third.

He

A He would by ſword have thee bereft, O France, of Valois line,
Or them of thee.

And after a few verſes ſet betweene,

Tamiſis a'ternum ſentit reditumque fugamque
Huc reflui pelagi, quoties vaga Cynthia pronos.
Octauâ librat cœli ſtatione iugales,
Aut tenet oppoſitam varianti lumine plagam,
B Plenior increſcit celeremque recurrit in æſtum:
Atque ſuperbus ait, concedant flumina nobis,
Nulla per Europæ dotatas nomine terras
Flumina, tam longè ſic certis legibus vndas
Alternas renouant, niſi fratres Scaldis, & Albis.

Tamis heere by turnes alternative doth feele both ebbe and flow
Of Sea, by courſe of wandring Moon that rules tide heere below.
As oft as ſhe with ech eight point of heaven above doth meete,
Or holds the points full oppoſit, as lights doe change and fleete.
C He growes more full, and ſooner hath recourſe to flowing tide:
And then in pride of heart he ſaith. All rivers elſe beſide
Vaile unto me. No ſtreame ſo farre through Europe keepes againe
His tide ſo juſt, unleſſe the Scheld, and Elb my bretheren twaine.

About foure miles from the Tamis within the Country, Noneſuch a retiring place of the Princes putteth downe, and ſurpaſſeth all other houſes round about: which, the moſt magnificent Prince King Henrie the Eighth, in a very healthfull place called Cuddington before, ſelected for his owne delight and eaſe, and built with ſo great ſumpteouſneſſe and rare workmanſhip, that it aſpireth to the very top of oſtentation for ſhew; ſo as a man may thinke, that all the skill of Architecture D is in this one peece of worke beſtowed, and heaped up together. So many ſtatues, and lively images there are in every place, ſo many wonders of abſolute workmanſhip, and workes ſeeming to contend with Romane antiquities, that moſt worthily it may have, and maintaine ſtill this name that it hath of [Noneſuch] according as Leland hath written of it: None-ſuch.

Hanc quia non habeant ſimile laudare Britanni Sæpè ſolent, Nulliq; parem, cognomine dicunt.
The Britans oft are wont to praiſe this place, For that through all
The realme they cannot ſhew the like, and Noneſuch they it call.

As for the very houſe it ſelfe, ſo environed it is about with Parkes full of Deare, E ſuch dainty gardens and delicate orchards it hath, ſuch groves adorned with curious Arbors, ſo prety quarters, beds, and Alleys, ſuch walkes ſo ſhadowed with trees, that Amenitie or Pleaſantneſſe it ſelfe may ſeeme to have choſen no other place but it: where ſhe might dwell together with healthfulneſſe. Yet Queene Marie made it over to Henrie Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell for other Lands: and he, when he had enlarged it with a Librarie paſſing well furniſhed, and other new buildings, paſſed over all his right when he died to the L. Lumley, who for his part ſpared no coſt, that it might be truly anſwerable to the name: and from him now is it returned againe by compoſitions and conveiances to the Crowne. Neere heereunto (and worth the noting it is) there is a vaine of potters earth highly commended and therF fore the deerer ſold, for the making of thoſe crucibles and ſmall veſſels which goldſmiths uſe in melting their gold.

Not farre from hence the cleere riveret Wandle in Latin * Vandalis, ſo full of the beſt Trouts, iſſueth forth from his head neare Caſhalton and Woodcot where by a tuft of trees vpon an hil-top there are to be ſeene manifeſt ſignes of a prety towne, and diverſe wels built of flint ſtones: Concerning the populouſneſſe and wealth whereof * Vandalis. Woodcote. Noviomagus.

the

Digitized by Google

the neighbour inhabitants report very much: This in my conceit was that Citie A which Ptolomee called NOIOMAGVS, and the Emperour Antonine NOVIOMA-Noviomagus. GVS. Neither neede we to seeke from elsewhere proofe heereof, but from the correspondency of distance. For as the old Itinerary noteth, it is ten miles from London, and twenty eight from Vagniacj now Maidston. Many a mile therefore went they out of the way that placed Nouiomagus either at Buckingham, or at Guildford.
This was a principall Citie of the REGNI not vnknowne to Marinus Tyrius a most ancient Geographer, whom Ptoleme taking vpon him to censure, taxeth for that he had set NOVIOMAGVS of Britaine by Climate more North, and by accoumpt B of miles more South than London.

Croidon. Wandle while it is yet small receaueth his first increase by a rill springing at Croi- don in times past called Cradiden: which standing under the hils is very wel knowne, as well for the house of the Archbishops of Canterburie, unto whom it hath belonged now this long time, as for Char-coles which the townesmen make good chaffer of. The inhabitants report, that in old time there stood an house of the Kings in the West part of the towne neere unto Haling, where the husband men dig up other-whiles rubble stone, which house the Archbishops having receiued it by gift from the King, translated unto their owne neerer the river. And neere unto this, the right reverend father in God D. Iohn Whitgift Archbishop of Canterburie of most praise worthy Memorie in his pious affection founded, and endowed with living a very faire C Hospitall for the releefe of poore people, and a schoole for the furtherance of learning. As for that sudden swelling water or Bourne which the common people reports to breake foorth heere out of the ground, presaging, I wote not how, either dearth of corne or the pestilence, may seeme not worthy once the naming, and yet the euentes sometime ensuing hath procured it credit. Neere unto this place stands Beddington. Beddington, wherein is to be seene a very faire house beautified with a delightful shew of right pleasant gardens and orchards, by Sir Francis Carew Knight: For, the ancient seat it is of the Carews, who being descended from the Carews of Moulesford (of whom also are come the Carews of Devonshire) have for a long time flourished in D this country: but especially since Sir Iames Carew matched in marriage with the daughter and one of the coheires of the Baron Hoound Haslings. To digresse a little Addington. from the river, Eastward from Croidon standeth Addington now the habitation of Sir Oliff Leigh, wherby is to be seene the ruble of a Castle of Sir Robert Aguilon, and from him of the Lords Bardolph, who held certaine lands here in fee by Serianty to find in the Kings Kitchin at the coronation one to make a dainty dish which they called Mapigernoun, and Dilgerunt. What that was I leaue to the skillfull in ancient Cookerie, and returne to the river. Wandle increased with Croidon water passing Aguilon. by Morden, diuideth it selfe to water Merton, in the old English tongue Mepedun, situate in a most fruitfull soile. A towne made famous in times past by the death of E Kinulph King of the West Saxons who was by a Clito, that is, a Prince of the bloud, Merton. slaine heere in a small cotage of an harlot vpon whom he was enamoured, and Clito himselfe by K. Kinulphes followers immediatly stabbed, suffred condigne punishment for his disloiall treachery. Now it sheweth onely the ruines of a Monastery, that King Henry the first founded for blacke Canons by the procurement of Gilbert High Sheriffe of Surry in the yeere 1117. which was famous for the Statute of Merton enacted heere in the 21. of King Henrie the Third, and also for Walter de Merton founder of Merton College in Oxford borne and bred heere. Aboue Merton farther Wimbledon. from the river is seated Wibandune, now commonly Wimbledon: where, when ouer much prosperity had hatched civill broiles among the English Saxons; after the Bri- F tish warres were now ceased; Ethelbert King of Kent struck up the first Alarme of civill warre against his owne countrimen; but Ceaulin King of the West Saxons discomfited him in this place with a mighty great slaughter, and losse of his men having slaine his principall leaders Oslan & Kneben, of whom peraduenture that entrenched rampier, or fort which we have heere seene of a round forme, is called Bensbury for Knebensbury.

Digitized by Google

A But now, the greateſt ornament of this place is that goodly houſe ſo beautifull for building, and ſo delectable for faire proſpect and right pleaſant gardens, which Sir Thomas Cecil knight, ſonne to that moſt prudent Counſellor of ſtate Lord Burgley, built in the yeare 1588. when the Spaniſh Armada made ſaile upon the coaſt of England.

Wandle now after a few miles entreth the Tamis, when it hath given name to Wandleſworth, betweene Putney the natiue ſoile of Thomas Cromwell one of the flowting-ſtocks of fortune, and Baterſey, ſome-times in the Saxons tongue called Paṽpꝛ┐ea, and in latine Patricij Inſula, that is, Patricks Iſle: and, which now we ſeeke, Putney See Earles of Eſſex. Kennington

B an houſe of the Kings termed Kennington, whereunto the Kings of England in old time were wont to retire themſelues, but now finde wee neither the name nor the rammell thereof. Then, is there Lambith or Lomehith, that is to ſay, a Lomy or clayiſh rode, or hith, famous in former times for the death of * Canutus the Hardie, King of England, who there amid his cups yeelded up his vitall breath. For hee, beeing given wholy to banquetting and feaſting, cauſed roiall dinners foure times every daie, (as Henrie of Huntindon, reporteth) to bee ſerved up for all his court, chooſing rather to have his invited gueſts, to ſend away whole diſhes vntouched, than other commers vnbidden to call for more viands to bee upon his table. But now this place is of the greater name and more frequented by reaſon of the Archbi- Lambith. * Hardy-Cnute.

C ſhop of Canterburie his pallace. For, Baldwine Archbiſhop of Canterburie about the yeare of Chriſt 1183. having made an exchange with the biſhop of Rocheſter, purchaſed a manour in this place wherein hee beganne to build a palace for him ſelfe and his ſucceſſors: which they by little, and little encreaſed. But when they went about to erect a collegiat Church here alſo, good GOD, what poſting was there to Rome with complaints and appeales, from the Monkes of Canterburie, how many fiery thunderbolts, menaces & cenſures were ſent out from the Biſhop of Rome againſt theſe Archbiſhops? For theſe Monkes were in bodily feare, leaſt this would bee their utter vndoing, and a prejudice vnto them in the Elections of the Archbiſhops. Neither were theſe bluſtering ſtormes allaied, untill the ſaid church

D newly begunne was laid levell with the ground. Adjoyning hard to this, is the moſt famous mercate towne and place of trade, in all this ſhire which at this daie they call, The Burrough of Southwarke, in Saxon ſpeech Suðþeꝛke, which is the South worke or building; becauſe it ſtandeth South over againſt London, the Suburbs whereof it may ſeeme in ſome ſort to bee: but ſo large it is and populous, that it giues place to few Cities of England, having beene as it were a corporation by it ſelfe, it had in our fathers daies Baliffes, but in the reigne of King Edward the Sixth it was annexed to the Citie of London, and is at this day taken for a member at it were of it: and therefore, when wee are come to London, wee will ſpeake more at large thereof. Southworke.

E Beneath this Burrough, the Tamis forſaketh Surrie, the Eaſt bound whereof paſſeth in a manner directly downe from hence Southward, neere unto Lagham, which had their Parliamentarie Barons called Saint Iohn de Lagham, in the reigne of Edward the Firſt, whoſe Inheritance came at length by an heire generall to Iohn Leddiard: and ſome-what lower in the verie angle well nere, where it bendeth to Southſex and Kent, ſtands Sterborrow Caſtle, the ſeat in ancient time of Lord Cobham, who of it were called, of Sterborrow: where the iſſue proceeding from the bodies of Iohn Cobham, Lord of Cobham and Cowling, and the daughter of Hugh Nevil, flouriſhed a long time in glorie and dignity. For, Reginald Cobham in King Edward the thirds daies being created Knight of the garter, was Admi- Barons Saint Iohn of Lagham. Sterborow.

F rall of the ſea coaſts, from Tamis mouth Weſt-ward. But Thomas the laſt male of that line wedded the Lady Anne, daughter to Humfrey the Duke of Buckingham, of whom he begat one onely daughter named Anne, married unto Edward Burgh, who derived his pedigree from the Percies, and Earles of Athole: whoſe ſonne Thomas made by King Henrie the Eighth Baron Burgh, left a ſonne behind him named William. And his ſonne Thomas a great favourer of learning, and Lord Governor of Lord Borough or Burgh.

Briell,

Digitized by Google

Briell, Queene Elizabeth made knight of the Garter, and Lord deputy of Ireland, A where hee honorably ended his life, pursuing the rebelles. As touching Dame Æleoner Cobham descended out of this familie, the wife of Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter, whoſe reputation had a flawe, I referre you to the Engliſh Hiſtorie, if you pleaſe.

Earles of Surrie, who alſo are called Earles of Warren.

Now are wee to reckon up the Earles of this ſhire, William Rufus King of England made William de Warrena, who had married his ſiſter, the firſt Earle of Surrey: For in that Charter of his, by which hee founded the Priory of Lewis, thus wee read: Donavi &c. that is, I have given and graunted &c. For the life and health of my Lord King William who brought me into England, & for the health of my Lady Queene Mawd, my wiues mother: and for the life and health of my Lord king William her ſonne, after whoſe comming into England I made this charter, who alſo created me Earle of Surry &c. whoſe ſonne William ſucceeded and married the daughter of Hugh Earle of Vermandois, wherupon his poſteritie (as ſome ſuppoſe) uſed the Armes of Vermandois, vz. Chequy Or and Azure. His ſonne William dying in the Holy-land about the yeare 1148. had iſſue, a daughter onely, who adorned firſt William, King Stephens ſonne, and afterward Hamelin the baſe ſonne of Cefferey Plantagenet Earle of Aniou, both her husbands, with the ſame title. But whereas her former husband died without iſſue, William her ſonne by Hamelin was Earle of Surrie, whoſe poſterity aſſuming unto them the name of Warrens bare the ſame title. This William eſpouſed the C eldeſt daughter, and a coheire of William Marſhall Earle of Pembroch, the widow of Hugh Bigod, who bare unto him Iohn, who ſlew Alan de la Zouch, in preſence of the Iudges of the Realme. This Iohn, of Alice the daughter of Hugh le Brune, halfe ſiſter by the mothers ſide of King Henrie the third, begat William, who died before his father: and hee of Ioan Vere the Earle of Oxfords daughter begat Iohn Poſthumus, borne after his deceaſe, and the laſt Earle of this houſe, who was ſtiled, as I haue ſeene in the circumſcription of his ſeale, Earle of Warren, of Surry and of Strathern in Scotland, Lord of Bromfield and of Yale, and Count-palatine. But hee dying without lawfull iſſue in the twelfth yeare of Edward the thirds reigne, Alice his ſiſter and heire wedded unto Edmund Earle of Arundell, by her marriage D bought this honour of Surrey into the houſe of Arundells. For Richard their ſonne who married in the houſe of Lancaſter (after his father was wickedly beheaded for ſiding with his Soueraigne King Edward the Second, by the malignant envie of the Queene) was both Earle of Arundell and Surrey, and left both Earledomes to Richard his ſonne, who contrari-wiſe loſt his head for ſiding againſt his ſoveraigne king Richard the Second. But, Thomas his ſon, to repaire his fathers diſhonour, loſt his life for his Prince and countrie in France leauing his ſiſters his heires for the lands not entailed, who were married to Thomas Mowbraie Duke of Norfolke &c. to Sir Rowland Lenthall, and Sir William Beauchampe, Lord of Abergeveny. After by the Mowbraies, the title of Surrey came at length to the Howards. E Howbeit, in the meane while after the execution of Richard Earle of Arundel, King Richard the Second beſtowed the title of Duke of Surry vpon Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, which honour hee enjoied not long; For, while hee combined with others, by privie conſpiracies to reſtore the ſame King Richard to his libertie and kingdome, the conſpiracie was not carried ſo ſecretly, but contrarie to his expectation brake forth and came to light: then fled hee, and by the people of Cirenceſtre was intercepted and cutte ſhorter by the head. After him Thomas Beaufort, Chancellour to the King, (if wee give credit to Thomas Walſingham) bare this dignity. For, in the yeare of our Lord (as hee ſaith) 1410. The Lord Thomas Beaufort Earle of Surrey left this world. Now, let Walſingham in this point make F good that which hee writeth: for, in the Kings Records there is no ſuch thing found, but onely this, that Thomas Beaufort about that time was made Lord Chancellour. But certaine it is, and that out of the Recordes of the kingdome, that King Henrie the Sixth, in the nine and twentie yeare of his reigne, created Iohn Mowbray, the ſonne of Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Earle Warren and of Surrie.

Earles of March in France.

And

Digitized by Google

A And Richard ſecond ſonne of King Edward the Fourth having married the heire of Mowbray, receiued all the titles due to the Mawbraies by creation from his father. Afterward King Richard the Third, having diſpatched the ſaid Richard and by impious cruell meanes uſurped the kingdome, that hee might by his benifits oblige unto him the houſe of the Howards, created in one, and the ſame day Iohn Lord Howard, Duke of Norfolke as next coſin and heire to the Mowbraies and his ſonne Thomas, Earle of Surrie: in whoſe of-ſpring this honour hath ever ſince beene reſplendent, and ſo continueth at this day.

B

C This County hath in it Pariſh Churches. 140.

D Cc SVS-

E

F

A

SVSSEX.

NDer Suth-rey toward the South lieth ſtretched out in a great length Suth-ſex, which alſo in times paſt the Regni inhabited, in the Saxon tongue called Suð-ſex, and at this day Suſſex, which is as much to ſay, as the Region of the South Saxons, a word compounded of the ſite thereof Southward, and of the Saxons, who in their Heptarchie placed here the ſecond kingdome. It lieth vpon the Britiſh Ocean all Southward with a ſtreight ſhore (as it were) farre more in length than bredth: Howbeit it hath few harbours, by reaſon that the ſea is dangerous for ſhelues, and therefore rough, and troublous, the ſhore alſo it ſelfe full of rocks, and the South-weſt wind doth tyrannize thereon, caſting up beach infinitely. The ſea coaſt of this countrie, hath greene hils on it mounting to a greater height, called the Downes, which becauſe they ſtand upon a fat chalke or kinde of marle yeeldeth corne abundantly.

B

Downes.

C

The middle tract, garniſhed with medowes, paſtures, corne-fields, and growes, maketh a very louely ſhew. The hithermore and Northren ſide thereof, is ſhaded moſt pleaſantly with woods, like as in times paſt the whole country throughout, which by reaſon of the woods was hardly paſſable. For, the wood Andradſwald, in the Britiſh language Coid Andred, taking the name of Anderida the Citty next, adjoining, tooke up in this quarter, a hundered and twentie miles in length, and thirtie in bredth; memorable for the death of Sigebert King of the Weſt Saxons, who beeing depoſed from his roiall throne, was in this place ſtabbed by a Swineheard, and ſo died. Many prety rivers it hath, but ſuch as ſpringing out of the North ſide of the ſhire forthwith take their courſe to the Ocean, and therefore not able to beare any veſſell of burden. Full of iron mines it is in ſundry places, where for the making and fining whereof, there bee furnaces on every ſide, and a huge deale of wood is yearely ſpent, to which purpoſe divers brookes in many places are brought to runne in one chanell, and ſundry medowes turned into pooles and waters, that they might bee of power ſufficient to driue hammer milles, which beating upon the iron, reſound all over the places adjoyning. And yet the iron here wrought, is not in every place of like goodneſſe, but generally more brittle than is the Spaniſh iron, whether it bee by the nature, or tincture and temper thereof. Howbeit, commodious enough to the iron Maiſters who caſt much great ordinance thereof, and other things to their no ſmall gaine: Now whether it bee as gainefull and profitable to the common-wealth may bee doubted, but the age enſuing will bee better able to tell you. Neither want here glaſſe-houſes, but the Glaſſe there made, by reaſon of the matter or making, I wot not whether, is likewiſe nothing ſo pure and cleare, and therefore uſed of the common ſort onely.

Anderida wood.

Iron.

D

Glaſſes.

E

This whole region throughout, after the civill manner of partition is divided into ſixe parts, which by a peculiar name they call Rapes, to wit, of Chicheſter, Arundel, Brembre, Lewis, Pevenſey and Haſtings, every of which beſide their hundreds, hath a caſtle, river, and forreſt of their owne. But for as much as the limits within which they are bounded bee not ſo well knowne unto mee, I am determined to take my way along the ſhore from Weſt to Eaſt. For, the inner parts beſprinkled with villages, have in manner nothing therein worth relation. In the very confines of Hantſhire and this county, ſtandeth Boſenham, commonly called Boſeham, a place environed round about with woods and the ſea together; where (as Bede ſaith) Dicul the Scotiſh Monke had a verie ſmall Cell, and in it, fiue or ſixe religious men living poorely, in ſervice of the Lord, which many yeeres after was converted into a retyring place of eaſe, for King Harold. Whence hee when upon a time for his recreation

F

Boſcham.

tion

Digitized by Google

A tion, he made out with a little barke into the maine sea, was with a contrary pirrie carried violently into Normandie, and there deteined in hold, until he had by oth assured the Kingdome of England unto William of Normandie, after the death of King Edward the Confessor. Whereby he presently drew upon himselfe his owne ruine and upon England the danger of finall destruction. But, with what a crafty Amphibolie or Aequivocation, that subtill and captious catcher of syllables Goodwin Earle of Kent this Harolds father, caught this place, and how with a wily word-trap, hee deceiued the Archbishop of Canterburie, Walter Mapæus, who lived not many yeares after shall out of his booke entituled Of Courtiers toies tell you in his owne verie words. This Bosebam underneath Chichester, saith hee, *Goodwin saw and had a minde to it: beeing accompained therefore with a great traine of Gentlemen, hee comes smiling and jesting unto the Archbishop of Canterburie, whose towne then it was, My Lord, saith hee, Give you mee * Bosam? The Archbishop mervailing much what he demaunded by that question: I give you, answered, Bosam. Then hee forthwith, with that company of his knights and Souldiours, fell downe, (as hee had before taken order) at his feete, and kissing them with many thankes went backe to Bosebam, kept possession of it as Lord by strong hand, and having the Testimony of his friends and followers, praised in presence of the King the Archbishop as Donor thereof, and so held it peaceably.* Afterwards as wee read in Testa Nevilli (which was an Inquisition of Lands made in King Iohns time) King William, who attained to the conquest of England, gaue this unto William Fitz Aucher and to his heires in fee farme paying out of it yearelie into the Exchequer fortie pounds of silver tried and weighed; and after that William Marescall held it as his inheritance. Chichester in the British tongue named Caercei, in the English Saxon language Cirran-ceaster, in Latine Cicestria, lieth farther within, at the same nooke in a Champion plaine. A Cittie large enough, and walled about, built by Cissa a Saxon the second king of this Province and of him so named. For Cissan-Ceaster is nothing els, but the Cittie of Cissa: whose father Ælla, was the first Saxon that here erected a kingdome: Yet was it before the conquest of small or no name, and knowne onely by a monasterie of Saint Peter and a little Nunnerie.

B

C

D But in the reigne of William the first, as wee read in the Domes-day-booke, there were in this, an hundered Hages, and this Cittie was in the hand of Earle Roger * *and there are in the said * three-score Mansions houses more than had beene before.* It paid fifteene pounds to the king, and ten to the Earle. After this, when during the reigne of the said William the first, a decree was enacted, that Bishops Seas should bee translated out of small townes unto places of greater name and resort, it was graced with the Bishops residence which was before at Selsey, and beganne to flourish: not many yeares after Bishop Raulfe built there a Cathedrall church, which before hee had fully finished it, was sodainly by mishap of a fearce fire burnt downe. Yet by his endeauor and the bounteous liberality of King Henrie the first, it was raised

E up againe, and now, beside a Bishop, it hath also a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chancellor, a Treasurer, two Archdeacons and thirty Prebendaries. And at the same time the verie Cittie it selfe began to flourish, and had growne in deede to a most wealthie estate, but that the haven is hadde and somewhat to farre off, and in that regard not so commodious: which nevertheless the Cittizens goe now in hand to make more convenient by digging of a new chanell. It is walled about in a circular round forme. The Lavant a pretty riveret running hard by it, on the West and South sides. Foure gates it hath opening to the foure quarters of the world: from whence the streets lead directly and crosse themselves in the midst, where the market is kept, and where Bishop Robert Read, erected a faire stone mar-

F ket place, supported with pillers round about. As for the Castle that stood not farre from the North gate, it was in times past the habitation of the Earles of Arundell, who hereupon stiled themselves Earles of Chichester: but afterwards it became conuerted into an house of the Franciscan Friers. All that space which lieth between the West and South gates, is taken up with the Cathedrall Church, the Bishops palace, and the Deanes and Prebendaries houses. All which about King Richard the Earle Goodwin doth æquivocate.

* Alluding happily to Basium, that is a Busse, which was in times past used, in doing homage.

* Of Montgomerie

* Hages or Houses.

Earles of Chechester.

Digitized by Google

First his time were burnt againe. And Seffride the second Bishop of that name re- A edified all anew. The Church it selfe truly is not great, but verie faire and neat, having a spire steeple of stone, rising up passing high, and in the South Crosse-Isle of the Church, of the one side is artificially portraied, and depainted the historie of the Churches foundation, with the Images of the Kings of England: on the other, the Images of all the Bishops, as well of Selsey as of Chichester, at the charges of Robert Shirburne Bishop, who greatly adorned and beautified this Church, and every where for his Empresse, set these Mots CREDITE OPERIBVS, that is, TRVST MEN
ACCORDING TO THEIR DEEDS; and DILEXI DECOREM DOMVS TVAE
DOMINE, that is, I HAVE LOVED (O LORD) THE BEAVTIE OF THY HOVSE. B
Neither hee onely adorned the Lords house, but repaired also the Bishops houses.
But that great high tower which standeth nere unto the west dore of the Church, was built by R. Riman, as the report goeth (when he was forbidden to erect a castle at Aplederham his habitation hard by) of those stones, which for that Castle he had provided afore. Neere the haven of Chichester is W. Witering, where as the monuments of the Church testifie Ælla, the first founder of the Kingdome of Suth-sex arrived.

* In King Henrie the Eight his time.

Selsey. Seales.

Selsey before said, is somewhat lower in the Saxon tongue, Seal-ſey, that is to say, The Isle of Sea-calves, (for these in our language wee call Seales, which alwaies seek to Islands, & to the shore, for to bring forth their yong, but now it is most famous

Here be the best Cockles.

for good cockles, and full Lobsters. A place (as Beda saith) compassed round about C with the Sea, but onely in the West side, where it hath an entrie into it by land, as broad as a slings cast. It was reckoned by Survey taken, to containe fourscore and seven Hides of Land, when Edilwalch King of this Province gave it to Wilfride Bishop of Yorke, whiles hee was in exile: who first preached Christ unto this people, and as he writeth, not only by baptisme saved from thraldome under the divel, two hundred and fiftie bond men, but also by giving freedome, delivered them from the yoke of bondage under man. Afterwards K. Cedwalla, who vanquished Edilwalch, founded here a Minster, and beautified it with an Episcopall See, which by Stigand the two and twentieth Bishop, was translated to Chichester, where it now flourisheth, and doth acknowledge Cedwalla to be the founder. In this Isle remaineth onely the D dead carkasse, as it were, of that antient little citie, wherein those Bishops sat: and the same hidden quite with water at everie full sea, but at a low water, evident, and plaine to be seene.

Slaves.

Then maketh the shore way for a river, which out of Saint Leonards Forest run-Amberley.

neth downe, first by Amberley, where William Read Bishop of Chichester, in the raigne of Edward the third, built a castle for his successours: and so from thence, by Arundell, seated on the hanging of an hill, a place greater in name than deede, and yet is not that name of great antiquitie: for before Ælfreds daies, who bequeathed it by testament to Anthelme his brothers sonne, I have not read it, so much as once named. Unlesse perhaps I should thinke, that Portus Adurni, is corruptly so called, E by transposition of letters, for Portus Arundi. The reason of this name is fetched neither from that fabulous horse of Sir Beavois of Southampton, nor of Cherudum, a promontorie in Denmarke, as Goropius Becanus hath dreamed, but of the valley or dale, which lieth upon the river Arun, in case Arun bee the name of the river, as some have delivered, who thereupon named it in Latine, Aruntina vallis, that is, Arundale. But all the fame it hath, is of the Castle, that flourished under the Saxon Empire, and which (as we read) presently upon the comming in of the Normans Roger Montgomerie repaired, who thereupon was stiled, Earle of Arundell. For, a stately place it is, both by naturall situation, and also by mans hand verie strong.

See the Earles of Shrewsburie.

But his sonne Robert de Belismo, who succeeded his brother Hugh, being by King F Henrie the First proscribed, lost that, and all his other dignitie. For, when he had perfidiously raised warre against the King, he chose this Castle for his surest hold, whiles the warre lasted, and fortified the place with many munitions, but spedde no better than traitours use to doe. For, the Kings forces environing it everie way, at the last wonne it. When as Robert now had forfeited his estate, and was banished, the King

Digitized by Google

A King gaue this castle, and all his Lands besides vnto * Adelice, daughter to Godfrey Barbatus of Louain, Duke of Loraine and Brabant, for her Dowrie; whom he tooke to be his second wife. In whose commendation a certaine English man in that vnlearned age, wrote these not vnlearned verses. * Alice.

Anglorum Regina tuas Adeliza decores
Ipsa refert reparans Musa, stupore rigent.
Quid Diadema tibi, pulcherrima, quid tibi gemma?
Pallet gemma tibi, nec diadema nitet.
Neue tibi vestitus, cultus natura ministrat;
B Non decorant formæ talia, casta, tuæ.
Ornamenta cave, nec quisquam hominis inde
Accipias, illa vacant, himbis dare suis.
Non pudet inuidus de magnis dicere laudes;
Nec pudens Dominam te precor esse meam.

When Muses mine thy beauties rare, (faire Adelita Queene
Of England) readie are to tell, they starke astonied beene.
What hooteth thee so beautifull, gold-crown or precious stone?
Dimmed is the Diademe to thee, the gemme hath beautie none.
Away with trimme and gay attire; nature attireth thee,
C Thy lovely beautie naturall, can neuer better'd be.
All Ornaments be vaine, from them no fauour thou do'st take;
But they from thee their lustre haue, thou doest them light some make.
I shamed not on matters great to set small praises heere,
Bash not, but deigne (I pray) to be my Soueraigne Ladie deere.

She, after the Kings death, matched in marriage with William de * Albiney, who taking part with Maud the Empresse against King Stephen, and defending this Castle against him, was in recompense of his good service, by the saide Maude the Empresse and Ladie of Englishmen, (for this title she vsed) created Earle of Arundell: and her sonne King Henrie the Second gaue the whole Rape of Arundell to D to that William: To hold of him by the seruice of fourescore and foure Knights fees, and one halfe. And to his sonne William, King Richard the first granted, in such words as these, The Castle of Arundell with the whole Honor of Arundell, and the Third peny of the Pleas out of Suffex, whereof he is Earle. And when after the fifth Earle of this surname, the issue male failed, one of the sisters and heires of Hugh the fifth Earle was married to Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan, Lord of Clun, whose great grand sonne Richard, For that he stood seised of the Castle, Honour and Lordship of Arundell in his owne demesne as of Fee, in regard of this his possession of the same Castle, Honour and Seignorie, without any other consideration or Creation to be an Earle, was Earle of Arundell, and the name, state and honor of the Earle of Arundell, &c. Peaceably he enjoied: as appeareth by a definitiue iudgement given in Parliament, in the behalfe of Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan chalenging the Castle and title of Arundell by force of an entaile against Iohn Mowbray, Duke of Norfolke the right Heire, in the neerest degree. Whereby it was gathered, that the name, state and dignitie of Earle, was annexed to the Castle, Honour and Seignorie of Arundell, as it to be seene in the Parliament Rolls of King Henry the Sixth, out of which I haue copied forth these notes word for word. Of these Fitz-Alans Edmund second Earle sonne to Richard married the heire of the Earle of Surry, and was beheaded through the malicious furie, of Queene Isabell not lawfully conuicted, for that hee opposed himselfe in King Edward the Seconds behalfe against her wicked practises. His sonne Richard petitioned in Parliament to be restored to bloud, lands, F and goods, for that his father was put to death not tried by his Peeres according to the lawe and great Charter of England: neuertheless whereas the attaindor of him was confirmed by Parliament, he was forced to amend his petition, and vpon the amendment thereof, he was restored by the Kings mere grace. Richard his sonne, as his grandfather died for his Soueraigne, lost his life for banding against his Soueraigne, King Richard the Second. But Iho. his sonne more honourably ended

* D'aubeney, some write him, de Albineo, and de Albiniaco. Earles of Arundell, and of Sussex. See Earles of Sussex.

Charta antiqua X. m 29.

Parl. 11. H. 6.

229.

4. Edw. 3.

Digitized by Google

See before the Earles of Surrey.

his life serving King Henrie the Fifth valerously in France, and leaving his sisters his A heires generall; Sir Iohn of Arundell Lord Maltravers his next cosin, and heire male obtained of King Henrie the Sixt the Earldome of Arundell, as we even now declared, and also was by the said King for his good service created Duke of Touraine. Of the succeeding Earles I find nothing memorable. Henrie Fitz-Alan the eleuenth and last Earle of that surname liued in our daies, in great honor as you shall see. After whom leauing no issue male Philip Howard his daughters sonne succeeded, who not able to digest wrongs and hard measure offered unto him, by the cunning sleights of some enuious persons, fell into the toile and net pitched for him, and being brought into extreame perill of his life, yeelded up his vitall breath in the B
Tower. But his sonne Thomas a most honorable young man, (in whom a forward spirit and fervent loue of vertue and glorie, most beseeming his nobility, and the same tempered with true courtesie shineth very apparently) recovered his fathers dignities being restored by King Iames, and Parliament authoritie.

Besides the Castle and the Earles, Arundell hath nothing memorable: For, the Colledge built by the Earles, which there flourished, because the revenue or living is alienated and gone, now falleth to decay. Howbeit, in the Church are some monuments of Earles there enterred, but one above the rest right beautifull, of Alabaster, in which lieth in the mids of the Quire Earle Thomas, and Beatrice his wife, the daughter of Iohn King of Portugall. Neither must I overpasse this Inscription so C faire guilt, set up heere in the Honor of Henrie Fitz-Alan the last, Earle of this line, because some there be whom liketh it well.

D

E

CONSECRA-

F

CONSECRATED TO VERTVE, AND HONOVR.

THE MAGNANIMOVS AND VVORTHY KNIGHT VVHOSE PERSONAGE IS HERE SEENE, AND VVHOSE BONES HERE VNDERNEATH LYE ENTERRED, VVAS EARLE OF THIS TERRITORIE: ACCORDING TO HIS HOVSE, AND LINAGE SVRNAMED FITZALAN, LORD MALTRAVERS, CLVN, AND OSVVALDESTRE, HONOVRS: OF THAT MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER, THE AVNCIENTEST COMPANION VVHILES HE LIVED OF. WILLIAM EARLE OF ARVNDEL, THE ONELY SONNE AND SVCCESSOR, COMPARTNER ALSO OF ALL HIS VERTVES: VVHO BEING OF THE PRIVY COVNSEL TO KING HENRIE THE EIGHT, KING EDVVARD THE SIXT, MARIE, AND ELIZABETH, KINGS AND QVEENES OF ENGLAND, VVAS GOVERNOR ALSO OF THE TOVVNE OF CALES: AND VVHAT TIME AS THE SAID KING HENRY BESIEGED BVLLEN VVAS HIGH MARESCHAL OF HIS ARMY, AND AFTER THAT LORD CHAMBERLAIN TO THE KING: ALSO VVHEN EDVVARD HIS SONNE VVAS CROVVNED KING, HE BARE THE OFFICE OF L. MARESCHAL OF THE KINGDOME: AND VNTO HIM LIKE AS BEFORE VNTO HIS FATHER BECAME LORD CHAMBERLAINE. MOREOVER IN THE REIGNE OF QVEENE MARIE DVRING THE TIME OF HER SOLEMNE CORONATION, HE VVAS MADE LORD HIGH CONSTABLE, AFTERVVARD STEVVARD OF HER RQIAL HOVSE, AND PRESIDENT OF THE COVNCEL: EVEN AS TO QVEENE ELIZABETH ALSO, HE VVAS LIKEVVISE LORD HIGH STEVVARD OF HER HOVSHOLD.

THVS THIS MAN, NOBLE BY HIS HIGH PARENTAGE, MORE NOBLE FOR VVEL PERFORMING THE PVBLICKE OFFICES OF STATE, MOST NOBLE, AND RENOVNED BOTH AT HOME, AND ABROAD: FLOVRISHING STIL IN HONOVR, BROKEN VVITH TRAVEL, MVCH VVORNE VVITH YEERES, AFTER HE VVAS COME TO THE LXVIII. OF HIS AGE, AT LONDON THE XXV. DAY OF FEBRVARY, IN THE YEERE OF OVR SALVATION BY CHRIST M.D.LXXIX. GODLY, AND SVVEETLY SLEPT IN THE LORD.

IOHN LVMLEY, BARON OF LVMLEY, HIS MOST LOVING AND AFFECTIONATE *SONNE IN LAVV, EXECVTOR OF HIS LAST VVIL, AND TESTAMENT, NOVV THAT HIS MOST SVVEET FATHER IN LAVV AND VERY GOOD PATRON IS RIGHT HONORABLY, AND SVMPTVOVSLY BVRIED, HATH IN MOST DEVOVT MANNER VVITH ABVNDANT TEARES NOT FOR ANY MEMORIAL, VVHICH HIMSELFE ALREADY BY HIS MANIFOLD VERTVES HATH AETERNIZED, BVT IN REGARD OF HIS MORTAL BODY NOVV BESTOVVED IN HOPE OF AN HAPPY RESVRRECTION, CONSECRATED VNTO HIM, FOR THE LAST DVTY HE COVLD PERFORME, THIS KNIGHTLIKE STATVE, VVITH HIS DEVE ARMORIES.

* As having married his daughter.

As for the river Arun, which ſpringing out of the North part of the Shire runneth heereby, it is encreaſed by many brooks falling into it from all ſides, but the cheefe of them is that which paſſeth beſide Cowdrey, a very goodly houſe of the Viscounts Montacute; which for building oweth much to the late Vicount, & formerly to Sir William Fitz-Williams, Earle of South-hampton. Here by is Midherſt that is Midlewood, which braggeth of the Bohunes Lords therof, who carried for their coat of armes a Croſſe azur in a field Or, and from Ingelricus de Bohun under king Henrie the Firſt, flouriſhed unto king Henrie the ſeauenth his daies, who gaue in marriage marriage the daughter and heire of Iohn Bohun unto Sir David Owen knight, the base A ſonne of Owen Theodor, with a rich inheritance. Theſe Bohuns (to note ſo much by the way for the antiquity of a word now growne out of uſe) were by inheritance for a good while the kings Spigurnells, that is, The Sealers of his writs, which office toge-Spigurnell what it is. ther with Serieancie of the kings chappell, Iohn de Bohun the ſonne of Franco reſig-ned unto king Edward the Firſt, as wee read in an old Charter made, as touching Petworth. that matter. Then this river leaveth about a mile off Petworth which together with one and twenty knights fees William de Albeney Earle of Arundell, beſtowed upon Ioſcelin of Lovaine the Brabander, brother to Queene Adeleza, and the younger ſonne of Godfrey Duke of Brabant, deſcended from the ſtocke of Charles the B Great, what time as hee tooke to wife Agnes the onely daughter and heire of the Percies. Since which time, the poſterity of that Ioſceline, having aſſumed the name

The Percies. See in the end of Northumberland. of Percie, (as I will els where ſhew) held it. A Familie, I aſſure you verie ancient p: 820. and right noble, which deriveth their pedigree from Charles the great more directly, and with a race of Anceſtors leſſe interrupted, than either the Dukes of Loraine Or of Guiſe that ſo highly vaunt themſelues thereupon. Ioſceline aforeſaid, as I have ſeene it in his Donations, uſed this title: Ioſcelin of Lovain, brother to Queene Adeliza, and Caſtellan of Arundell. And here about the Familie of Dautry, Or De alta Dautry. ripa hath beene of right worſhipfull æſteeme, as on the other ſide of the river the name of Goring at Burton, who were acknowledged founders of Hardham Or Hered- C Button. ham a Priory of blacke Canons, a little off. Where this Arun meeteth with an other river of a deeper and bigger ſtreame, which ſpringeth neare Horſeham an in-Horſham. different mercat, which ſome ſuppoſe to have taken name from Horſa the brother of Hengiſt, who were the firſt leaders of the Engliſh Saxons into this iſle of Britaine.
Thus Arun increaſed, with ſundry creekings, by Arundell before mentioned, holdeth on his courſe to the ſea.

Michelgrove. As the ſhoare giveth backe from the mouth of Arun, inwardly is Michel-greue, that is, Great grove, the heire general whereof ſo ſurnamed, was married to *Iohn Shel-
Shelley. ley*, whereby, with the profeſſion of the law, and a marriage with one of the coheires
Offington. of Belknap the familie of Shelley was greatly enriched: Offington is not farre off well D
The familie of the Weſts. knowne by his antient poſſeſſours the Weſts Barons de la Ware. This of the Weſts is a noble and ancient Familie, whoſe ſtate beeing bettered by marriage with the heires
* De Cantelupo. of * Cantlow of Hempſton and Fitz-Reginald Fitz Herbert, was adorned alſo with the Barons de la Ware. title of Baron, by the heire generall of the Lord de la Ware. Hard by, there is a fort compaſſed about with a banke rudely caſt up, wherewith the Inhabitants are per-Cisburie. ſwaded that Cæſar entrenched and fortified his camp: But Ciſsburie the name of the place, doth plainely ſhew and teſtifie, that it was the worke of Ciſſa: who beeing of the Saxons line the ſecond king of this pety kingdome, after his father Aella, accompanied with his brother Cimen, and no ſmall power of the Saxons, at this ſhore arri-Cimenſhore. ved and landed at Cimonſhore, a place ſo called of the ſaid Cimen, which now hath loſt E the name: but that it was neere unto VVittering, the charter of the donation which king Cedwalla made unto the Church of Selſey, moſt evidently prooveth. Another fort likewiſe two miles from Ciſiburie is to bee ſeene, which they uſe to call Chenkburie.

Brood-water. As you goe forward, ſtandeth neere unto the ſea, Broodwater, the Baronie of the Lord Camois. Lords of Camois, who from the time of King Edward the Firſt, flouriſhed unto the Camois. daies of King Henrie the Sixt, what time the inheritance came by heires generall unſee the Regiſter of writs, Judiciall f: 30. to the Lewknors & Radmilds. Out of this familie (a thing neither in that age, nor in ours ever heard of (or exampled before) Sir Iohn Camois the ſon of the Lord Raulph Camois, A wife given and granted to another. of his owne free-will (the verie woords theſe be in effect, exemplified out of the Par- F liament Records) gave and demiſed his owne wife Margaret, daughter and heire of Iohn de Gaideſden unto Sir William Panell Knight, and unto the ſame William gave, granted, releaſed and quit claimed all the goods and chattels, which ſhe hath, or otherwiſe hereafter might have: and alſo whatſoever was in his hands of the foreſaid Margarets goods, and chattels with their appurtenances: ſo that neither he himſelfe, nor any man elſe in his name, might make

See the pleadings at large in my manuſcript. placita Parliam. 30. Edw. primi. fol 2.

v. placa parl: f: 231.
Selden over Hobr: p: 592.

2 Iuſtit: 434.

Digitized by Google

A make claime, or challenge any interest, nor ought for ever, in the foresaid Margaret from hence forth, or in the goods and chattels of the said Margaret: Which is as much, as in one word they said in old time, Vt omnia sua secum haberet, That she should have away with her all that was hers.* By which graunte, when she demanded her dowrie in the Manour of Torpull which had been the possession of Sir Iohn Camois her first husband, there grew a memorable suite and controversie in Law: but wherein she was ouerthrowen and sentence pronounced. That she ought to have no dowrie from thence: vpon a Statute made againe women absenting themselves from their husbands, &c. The forme of a Bill of a kind of Divorcement, called Repudium.

These matters, I assure you, it goes against my stomacke to relate, but yet I see, it B was not for nought that Pope Gregorie long since wrote unto Lanfranck Archbishop of Canterburie, How he herd say, there were some among the Scots that not onely forsooke, but also sold their wives, whereas in England they so gave and demised them.

Some what lower upon the shore appeareth Shoreham, in times past Scope-ham, which by little and litle fell to bee but a village, at this day called Old Shoreham, and gave encrease to another towne of the same name, whereof the greater part also beeing drowned and made even with the sea is no more to bee seene: and the commodiousnesse of the haven by reason of bankes and barres of sand cast up at the rivers mouth quite gone: whereas, in foregoing times it was wont to carrie C ships with full saile as farre as to Brember, which is a good way from the sea. This Brember was a castle sometime of the Breoses: For, king William the first gave it unto William de Breose, from whom those Breoses are descended, who were Lords of Gower and Brecknock: and from them also, both in this County and in Leicestershire, are come the Families of the Shirleys, knights. But now in steed of a Castle, there is nothing but an heape of ruble and ruines. A little from this Castle lieth Stening, a great mercate, and at certaine set daies much frequented, which in Aelfrids will, unlesse I be deceived, is called Steningham, in later times it had a Cell of Blackmonkes wherein was enshrined S. Cudman an obscure Saint, and visited by pilgrimes with oblations. Shoreham.

D That ancient place also, called PORTVS ADVRNI, as it seemeth is scarce three miles from this mouth of the river: where, when the Saxons first troubled our sea with their piracies, the Band called Exploratorum under the Romane Emperours kept their Station; but now it should seeme to be choked, and stopped up with huge heapes of beach gathered together. For, that this was Ederington a prety village, which the said Aelfred granted unto his younger sonne, both the name remaining in part, and also certaine cottages adjoining now called Portslade, that is, The way to the Haven, doe after a sort perswade: to say nothing, how easily they might land heere, the shore being so open and plaine. And for the same cause, our men in the reigne of King Henrie the Eighth, did heere especially wait for the Frenchmens gal- E lies all the while they hovered on our coasts and upon the sudden set one or two cottages on fire at Brightelmsted, which our ancestors the Saxons termed Brihthelmes-tun, the very next road or harbour thereunto. Ederington.

Some few miles from hence, there dischargeth it selfe into the sea a certaine river, that hath no name, arising out of S. Leonards forest nere unto Slaugham, the habitation of the Coverts, who in king Henrie the third his daies flourished in this quarter, with the degree of knight-hood; thence by Cuckfeld to Linfeld, where in former ages was a small Nunnery; and so by Malling some-time a Mannour appertaining to the Archbishops of Canterbury, to Lewis, which peradventure hath his name of pastures called by the English Saxons Leapa. This for frequencie of people F and greatnesse is reputed one of the chiefest townes of the County: Seated it is vpon a rising almost on every side: That it hath beene walled there are no apparent tokens. Southward it hath vnder it as it were a great suburb called South-over, an other Westward, and beyond the river a third Eastward called Cliffe because it is vnder a chalkie cliffe. In the time of the English Saxon government, when King Athelstan made a Law that money should not be coyned but in good townes, hee appointed Slaugham. Lewes.

two

Digitized by Google

two minters, or coyners for this place. In the reigne of king Edward the Confessor it paid sixe pounds and foure shillings * de Gablo et Theloneo. The king had there one hundred twenty seaven Burgars. Their custome and manner was this, If the king minded to send his souldiers to sea, without them: of all them, whose lands soeuer they were was collected twenty shillings, and al those had they that in the ships kept armour. Who selleth an horse within the Burgh giueth to the Prouost one penny, and the buier another. For an oxe or cow one halfe penny, in what place so ever he buieth within the Rape. Hee that sheddeth bloud maketh amends for seauen shillings. Hee that committeth adulterie or a rape, for eight shillings and foure pense, and the woman as much. The King hath the Adulterer, The Archbishop, the woman: when the mint or money is made new: everie minter giveth twentie shillings. Of all these paiments two third partes went to the King, and one third part to the Earle. William de Warren the first Earle of Surrie built here a large castle on the highest ground for most part with flint and chalke. In the bottom of the towne called South-over hee founded to the honour and memorie of Saint Pancrace a Priorie, and stored it with Cluniach Monkes, In regard of the holinesse, religion, and charity which hee found in the Monasterie of Clugni in Burgundie (for these bee the words taken out of the verie originall instrument of the foundation) Whiles going in pilgrimage together with his wife for religion, hee turned in, and lodged there. But this is now turned into a dwelling house of the Earle of Dorset. Howbeit there remaine still in the towne six Churches; amongst which not farre from the Castle there standeth one little one all desolate, and beset with briers and brambles: in the wals whereof are engraven in arched worke certaine rude verses in an old and overworne character: which implie thus much, that one Magnus descended from the bloud roiall of the Danes, who embraced a solitarie life, was there buried: But behold the verses them selves, imperfect though they bee, and gaping as I may so say, with the verie yawning joints of the stones.

*For custome or rent and toll.

Domsday booke.

*Or redeemeth the offence.

*Cluniaco.

Ao. 1078.

The monument of Magnus a Dane.

Which peraduenture should be thus read.

Clauditur hic miles, Danorum regia proles,
Magnus nomen ei, magnæ nota progeniei,
Deponens Magnum, prudentior induit agnum:
Prapete pro vita, fit parvulus Anachorita.

A noble

A A noble Knight,
Sir Magnus hight,
a name of great of-spring,
Is shut up here,
Though borne he were in line of Danish King:
He wiser man,
Puts Agnus on,
and laies downe Magnus quite:
B For swift life this,
Become he is a little Anchorite.

About 347. yeeres since this place became famous for the mortall and bloudie battaile betweene K. Henrie the third, and the Barons: in which, the prosperous beginning of the fight on the kings side, was the overthrow of the kings forces. For, 1263.
whiles prince Edward the kings son, breaking by force through certain of the Barons troups, carelesly pursued the enemies over far, as making sure account of the victory: The battail of Lewes.
the Barons having reenforced themselves, giving a fresh charge, so discomfited, and put to flight the kings armie, that they constrained the king to accept vnequall con-
C ditions of peace, and to deliver his sonne Prince Edward with others into their hands. 232.
From Lewis the river, as it descendeth, so swelleth, that the bottom cannot containe it, and therefore maketh a large mere, and is fed more full with a brooket falling from Laughton, a seat of Pelhams, a family of especiall respect, by Gline that is in the British tongue, the vale, the habitation of Morleyes, whose antiquitie the name doth testifie. And afterward, albeit it gathereth it selfe into a chanell, yet often times it overfloweth the low lands about it to no small detriment. Not farre from the said mere, Furle sheweth it selfe a principall mansion of the Gages, who advanced their estate by the marriage of one of the heires of Saint Clare, Princes favour, and Court Offices.

D The shore next openeth it selfe at Cuckmere, which yet affordeth no commodious haven, though it be fed with a fresh, which insulateth Michelham, where Gilbert de Aquila, founded a Priory for black Chanons. And then at East-bourn the shore ariseth into Others call it, The three Chirles.
so high a Promontory, called of the beach Beachy-points, and Beau-cliffe (for the faire shew being interchangeably compounded with rowes of chalke and flint) that it is esteemed the highest cliffe of all the South coast of England. As hitherto from Arundell, and beyond, the countrey along the coast: for a great breadth, mounteth up into high hilles, called the Downes, which for rich fertilitie giveth place to few Downes.
valleys, and plaines: so now it falleth into such a low levell and marsh, that the people think it hath been over flowed by the sea. They call it Pevensey Marsh, of Pevensey the Pevensey.
E next towne adjoyning, which lieth in the plaine somewhat within the land upon a small river, which often times overlaieth the lands adjacent. In the old English-Saxon Language, it was called, Pefenea, in the Norman speech Pevensell, now commonly, Pemsey: It hath had a meane haven, and a faire large castle, in the ruinous walles whereof, remain great bricks, such as the Britans used, which is some argument of the antiquitie thereof. It belonged in the Conquerours time to Robert Earle of Florentius Wigornienſis, pag.
Moriton, halfe brother by the mothers side to the Conquerour, and then had fiftie and 452.
six Burgesses. After the attainder of his Sonne William Earle of Moriton, it came to King Henrie the First, by Escheat. In the composition betweene Stephen, and King Composition betweene King Stephen, and Henrie of Anjow.
Henrie the Second both nowne, and castle with whatsoever Richard de Aquila, had F of the Honor of Pevensey, which after his name, was called Honor de Aquila, and Barenia de Aquila, or of the Eagle, was assigned to William Sonne to K. Stephen. But he surrendred it with Norwich into King Henrie the Seconds hand, in the yeere 1158, Anjow.
when he restored to him all such Lands as Stephen was seased of before hee usurped Honor de Aquila.
the crowne of England. After some yeeres King Henrie the third, over-favouring Robert de Monte.
forrainers granted the Honor de Aquila (which had fallen to the crowne by Escheat,

for

Digitized by Google

for that Gilbert de Aquila had passed into Normandie, against the Kings good will to Petre Earle of Savoy the Queenes vncle. But he fearing the envie of the English against forrainers relinquished it to the King, and so at length it came to the Dutchy of Lancaster. Inward from Pevensey is seated Herst in a Parke among the woods, which name also it hath of the woody situation: For, the ancient English-men called a wood Hyrſt. This was immediately after the Normans entry into England the seat of certaine noble gentlmen, who of that place were a good while named de Herst, untill William the sonne of Walleran de Herst, tooke unto him the name Monceaux, of the place haply where he was borne, an usuall thing in that age: whereupon that name also was adnexed vnto this place, which ever since was of the Lord, termed Herst Monceaux. From whose Posteritie by heire generall it descended hæreditarily to the Fienes. These Fienes, called likewise Fenis, and Fienles, derive their pedigree from Ingelram de Fienes, who had wedded the heire of Pharamuse of Boloigne, of the house of the Earles of Boloigne in France. About the time of King Edward the Second Sir Iohn Fienes married the heire of Monceaux, his sonne William married one of the heires of the Lord Say, his sonne likewise the heire of Batisford, whose sonne Sir Roger Fienes, married the daughter of Holland, and in the first yeare of King Henrie the Sixt built of bricke the large, faire, vniforme, & convenient house heere Castle-like within a deepe mote. The said King Henrie the Sixt, Accepted, declared and reputed Sir Richard Fienis sonne of the said Sir Roger, to be Baron of Dacre, And the same title, King Edward the fourth chosen Arbitratour and Umpire betweene him & Sir Humfrey Dacre, awarded, & confirmed to the said S. Richard Fienis, and to the heires of his bodie lawfully begotten; for that he had married Ioan the cousin and next heire of Thomas Baron Dacre; and to have præcedence before the L. Dacre of Gilesland heire masle of the familie. Since which time the heires lineally descending from him being enriched by one of the heires of the Lord Fitz-Hugh, have enjoyed the honor of Baron Dacre, untill that very lately Gregory Fienis Lord Dacre sonne to the vnfortunate Thomas Lord Dacre died without issue, whose onely sister and heire Margaret, Sampson Lennard Esquier a man both vertuous and courteous tooke to wife, & by her hath faire issue. In whose behalfe it was published, declared, and adiudged by the Lords Comissioners for Martiall causes, in the second yeere of the raigne of King Iames, with his priuitie, and assent Roiall, That the said Margaret ought to beare, haue, and enioy the name, state, degree, title, style, honor, place, and precedency of the Baronie of Dacre; to have and to hold to her, and the issue of her bodie in as full and ample maner, as any of her ancestors enioied the same. And that her children may, and shall haue, take, and enioy the place, and precedence respectiuely, as the children of her ancestors Barones Dacre haue formerly had, and enoyed.

Herst Monceaux. Herst what it is.

Regist. of the Monasterie of Robertsbridge. The familie of the Fienes. Patent. 37. Henrie 6. An. 14. Ed. 4.

p. 223

p. 729. 730.

Now to returne to the Sea-coast, about three miles from Pevensey is Beckes-hill a place much frequented by Saint Richard Bishop of Chichester, and where he died. Vnder this is Buluer-hith in an open shore, with a roofelesse Church, not so named of a bulles hide which cut into thongs by William the Conquerour, reached to Battaile (as they fable) for it had that name before his comming. But heere he arriued with his whole fleete, landed his armie, and having cast a rampier before his campe, set fire on all his ships, that their onely hope might be in manhood, and their safety in victorie. And so after two daies marched to Hastings then to an hill neere Nenfeld now called Standard hill, because (as they say) he there pitched his Standard, and from thence two miles farther where in a plaine the Kingdome of England was put upon the hazard and chance of a battaile; and the English-Saxon Empire came to a full period and finall end. For there, King Harold in the yeere of our Lord 1066. the day before the Ides of October, albeit his forces were much weakened in a former fight with the Danes, and his soldiers wearied besides with a long journey from beyond Yorke, encountred him in a place named Epiton. When the Normans had sounded the Battaile, first the skirmish continued for a prety while with shot of arrowes from both sides; then, setting foote to foote, as if they fought man to man, they maintained fight a longer time: But when the English men had most valiantly received

See Normans before.

Digitized by Google

A received their first violent on set, the Norman horsmen with full carrier put forward and gave an hoter charge. But seeing they also could not breake the battaile, they retired for the nonce, and yet kept their rankes in good order. The Englishmen supposing them to fly, presently disranged themselues, and in disray preassed hard upon the enemies: but they, all on a sudden bringing backe their companies charged them afresh on every side withall their joint forces thicke united together and so enclosing them round about, drove them backe with great slaughter: who notwithstanding having gotten the higher ground withstood the Normans a long time, untill Harold himselfe was shot through with an arrow and fell downe dead: for then
B straightwaies they turned their backes and betooke themselves every man to flight. The Duke lofty, and hauty with this victorie, and yet not vnmindfull of God the giuer thereof, erected in memoriall of this battaile an Abbay to the glorie of God, and S. Martin, which he called de Bello, or Battaile Abbay, in that very place where Harold after many a wound and stab among the thickest of his enemies gave vp the ghost, that the same might be as it were an everlasting monument of the Normans victorie: and therein he offered his sword, and roiall robe which he ware, the day of his Coronation. These the Monkes kept vntill their suppression, as also a table of the Normans gentry which entred with the Conquerour; but so corruptly in later times, that they inserted thereinto the names of such as were their benefactours,
C and whosoever the favour of fortune or vertue had aduaunced to any eminency in the subsequent ages. About this Abbay there grew afterwards a towne of the same name: or, (that I may use the words of the private Historie of this Abbay) As the Abbay encreased, there were built about the compasse of the same one hundred and fifteene houses of which the towne of Battell was made. Wherein there is a place called by a French word Sangue lac, of the bloud there shed: which by nature of the ground seemeth after raine to wax red. Whence, William Newborough, wrote although untruly, thus: The place, in which there was a very great slaughter of the Englishmen fighting for their country, if peradventure it be wet with any small showre, sweatteth forth very fresh bloud indeede: as if the very evidence thereof did plainly declare that the voice of D so much Christian bloud there shed doth still cry from the earth to the Lord. But to the said Abbay King William the Conquerour granted many and great priviledges. And among other, to use the very words of the Charter. If any theefe, murderer, or felon for feare of death fly and come to this Church, let him have no harme but be dismissed and sent away free from all punishment. Bee it lawfull also for the Abbat of the same Church to deliver from the gallowes any theefe or robber whersoever, if he chance to come by where such execution is in hand.

Henrie the First likewise, (that I may rehersse the words of his Charter) instituted a mercate to be there kept on the Lords day, free from all tol & tallage. But S. Anthonie Broton Lord Vicount Mount-acute, who not long since in that place built a goodly house, obtained of late by authority of parliament, that this mercate should bee held upon another day. And as for the privileges of Sanctuary, in those more hainous & grevious crimes, they are here & every where els by Parliamentary authority quite abolished. For, they perceived well, that the feare of punishment beeing once removed, stout boldnesse, and a will to commit wickednesse grew still to greater head: and that hope of impunity was the greatest motiue of ill-doing. Neither here or in that quarter nere adjoining, saw I any thing worth relation but onely Ashburnham, that gave the name to a familie of as great antiquity as any one in all this tract.

A mercat kept on the Sunday.

Brown.

Ashburnham.

Hastings, which I spake of, called in the English Saxon tongue Hæstinga-ceaster, is situate somewhat higher upon the same shore. Some there bee that ridiculously derive this name from out of our tongue, frō hast or quickenesse, for sooth; because, as Mathew Paris, writeth William Conquerour at Hasting did set up hastily a fortresse of timber. But it may seeme to haue taken this new name of Hastings a Danish Pirate, who where soever he landed, with intent to spoile and raise booties, built often times fortresses, as wee read in Asserius Menevensis, of Beomflote castle built by him in Essex, as also of others at Appledor and Middleton in Kent. The tradition is that the old towne of Hastings is swallowed up by the sea. That which standeth now as I obser-

Hastings.

Digitized by Google

ved is couched betweene a high cliffe sea-ward and as high an hill land-ward, ha- A ving two streates extended in length from North to South, and in each of them a parish church. The haven such as it is beeing fedde but with a poore small rill, is at the South end of the towne, and hath had a great castle upon the hill which over commanded it, but now there are onely ruines thereof, and on the said hill Light-houses to direct sailers in the night time. Here in the reigne of K. Athelstan was a mint-house. Afterward it was accounted the first of the Cinque Ports, Cinque-ports. which with the members belonging to it, namely Seford, Pevensey, Hodeney, Bulverhith, Winchelsey, Rhy &c. was bound to find one and twenty ships for warre at sea.
In what manner and forme (if you desire to know) both this Port and the rest also B were bound to serue the king in his warres at sea, for the immunities that they enioy in most ample manner; haue heere in those verie same words whereby this was in times past recorded in the Kings Exchequer. Hastings with his members ought to finde
21. Edw. 1. at the Kings summons one and twentie ships: And in every shippe there must bee one and twenty tall and able men, well armed and appointed for the Kings service. Yet so, as that summons bee made thereof on the Kings behalfe fortie daies before. And when the fore-said ships and men therein, are come to the place whereunto they were summoned, they shall abide there in the kings service for fifteene daies at their owne proper costs and charges. And if the King shall haue farther neede of their service, after the fifteene daies aboue said, or will haue them to stay there any longer, those ships with the men therein beeing, whiles they C remaine there shalbe in the Kings service, at the kings cost and charges, so long as it shall please the king, to wit, The Maister of every ship shall receiue sixe pence by the day, the Constable six pence a daie, and every one of the rest three pence by the daie. Thus Hastings 3946. flourished long, inhabited with a warlike people and skilfull sailers, well stored with barkes and craies and gained much by fishing, which is plentifull along the shore.
But after that the peere made of timber was at length violently carried away by extreame rage of the sea, it hath decaied, and the fishing lesse used, by the reason of the daungerous landing, for they are enforced to worke their vessels to land by a Capstall or Crane. In which respect for the bettering of the towne, Queene Elizabeth granted a contribution toward the making of a new harbour, which was begunne, but D 1578. the contribution was quickly converted into private purses, and the publicke good neglected. Nevertheless both Court, the Country, and Citty of London is served with much fish from hence.

The whole Rape of Hastings and the Honour was holden by the Earles of Ew, (commonly called de Augi) in Normandie, descended from the base sonne of Richard Ancense s. Earles of w the First Duke of Normandie; untill the daies of Alice the heire of the house, whom in the reigne of Henrie the Third Ralph de Issodun in France tooke to wife, whose posterity lost a faire patrimonie in England, for that, as our Lawiers spake in those daies, they were Ad fidem Regis Francia, that is, under the king of France his allegiance.
* When King Henrie the Third had seazed hir lands into his hands, hee granted the E Rape of Hastings first to Peter Earle of Savoy, then to Prince Edward his sonne, and after upon his surrender to Iohn sonne to the Duke of little Britaine upon certaine exchanges of lands pertaining to the Honour of Richmond which Peter Earle of Savoie had made over for the use of the Prince. Long time after when the Dukes of Britaine had lost there lands in England for adhering to the French King, King Henrie the Fourth gave the Rape of Hastings with the Manours of Crowherst, Burgwash &c. to Sir Iohn Pelham the elder, upon whose loialtie, wisdome and valour he much relied.
Esc. 7. H. 6. Before we depart from Hastings, as it shal not be offensiue I hope, to remember that in the first daies of the Normans, there were in this shire great gentlemen surnamed Hastings Inquisition 5. Edw. 1. and de Hastings, of whom Matthew de Hastings held the Manour of Grenocle in this ser- F vice, that hee should find at this haven an oare, when the kings would crosse over the seas; so now the honorable house of the Hastings that are Earles of Huntingdon enjoy this title of Hastings. For King Edward the Fourth bestowed this title with certaine William Lord Hast-inge. Roialties (as they terme them) upon Sir William Hastings his Chamberlaine. Who is by Cominaus commended, for that having received an yearely pension of Lewis the eleauenth

A eleauenth the French King hee could not for any thing bee brought to giue unto the French king an acquittance of his owne hand writing. I will in no case (saith hee) that my hand writing, be seene amongst the accounts of the French Kings Treasurie. But this man by diving so deepe into the friendship of kings overwhelmed and drowned himselfe quite. For whiles hee spake his minde, and reasoned over franckly at a private consultation, with the Usurper King Richard the Third, all of a sodaine, and unlooked for, had hee was away and without pleading for himselfe, presently made shorter by the head upon the next blocke. Neither is this to bee passed over in silence that King Henrie the Sixth adorned Sir Thomas Hoo, a worthie knight,
B whom hee also chose into the order of the Garter, with the title of Baron Hoo, and Hastings: whose daughters and heires were married to Sir Gefferie Bollen, (from whence by the mothers side Queene ELIZABETH was descended) to Roger Coplie to Iohn Carew, Iohn Devenish. 26 Henr. 6. Baron of Hoo and Hastings.

From thence the shore passing under Farley hill farre seene both by sea, and land whereon standeth a solitarie church full bleakly, and a beacon is hollowed with an in-winding Bay, and upon it standeth Winchelsey which was built in the time of king Edward the First, when a more ancient towne of the same name, in the Saxons tongue called Wincelr-ea, was quite swallowed up with the rough and raging Ocean in the yeare of our Lord 1250. (what time the face of the earth both here
C and also in the coast of Kent neere bordering, became much changed). The situation thereof I will set before your eyes in the verie words of Th. Walsinghams. Situate it is upon a high hill, verie steepe on that side, which either looketh toward the sea, or over looketh the rode where ships lie at anchor. Whence it is that the way leading from that part to the haven goeth not streight forward, least it should by an over sodaine and downe right descent, force those that goe downe to fall headlong, or them that goe uppe to creepe rather with their hands then to walke: but lying side waies it windeth with curving turnes in and out, to one side and the other. At first, it was enclosed with a rampier, after-wards with strong walls and scarce beganne it to flourish, when it was sacked by the French men and Spaniards, and by reason that the sea shrunke backe from it, began
D sodainly (as it were) to fade and loose the beautie: And now onely beareth the countenance of a faire towne, and hath under it in the levell which the sea relinquished a Castle fortified by Henrie the Eighth, and large marshes defended from sea-rages with works verie chargeably. By the decay hereof and the benefit of the sea togither. Rhie opposite unto it and as highly seated beganne to flourish, or rather to reflourish, For that in old time it flourished: and that William of Ipres Earle of Kent fortified it, Ipres Tower now the prison, and the immunities or priviledges that it had in common with the Cinque-ports may sufficiently shew. But by occasion of the Vicinity of Winchelsey or the shrinking backe of the sea, it lay for a good while in former ages unknowne: But when Winchelsey decaied and King Edward the Third walled it
E where the cliffes defended it not, it beganne to breath againe and reviue: and in our fathers daies, the sea to make amends aboundantly for the harmes it had done raised with an unusuall tempest, so rushed in, and insinuated it selfe in forme of a bay that it made a verie commodious haven, which another tempest also in our daies did not a little helpe. Since which time it greatly reflourished with inhabitants, buildings, fishing and navigation: and at this daie there is an usuall passage from hence into Normandie; yet now it beginneth to complaine that the sea abandoneth it (such is the variable, and interchangeable course of that element) and in part imputeth it, that the river Rother is not contained in his chanell, and so looseth his force to carrie away the sandes and beach which the sea doth inbeate into the F haven. Notwithstanding it hath many fishing vessells and serveth London, and the Court with varietie of sea-fish.

Winchelsey.

Camber-castle.

*

Rhie.

*

Now whether it have the name of Rine a Norman word which signifieth a strond or Banke, I can not easily say. But seeing that in Records it is verie often called in Latine Ripa, and they who bring fish from hence bee termed Ripiers, I encline rather this way, and would encline more, if the Frenchmen used this word for a stroud or

Digitized by Google

shore, as Plinius doth, Ripa. These two townes, (neither may it seeme impertinent to note it) belonged to the Abbay of Fescampe in Normandie. But when King Henrie the Third perceived that religious men intermedled secretly in matters of state, he gaue them in exchange for these two, Chiltenham and Sclover two Manours in Glocester-shire, and other lands; adding for the reason, that the Abbot and Monkes might not lawfullie fight with temporall armes against the enemies of the Crowne. A

The River Rother. Barons Burgh-ersh.

Into this haven the River Rother, or Rither sheddeth it selfe, which issuing foorth at Ritheram fieldes (for so the Englishmen in antient times called that towne, which wee doe Rotherfield) passeth by Burgwash, in old time Burgh-ersh, which had Lords so surnamed thereof: among whom was that Sir Bartholomew Burgwash, a mightie man in his time, who being approoved in most weightie embassages, and warres in Aquitaine, for his wisdome, and valour deserved, to be created a Baron of the Realme, to be admitted into the Order of the Garter, at the verie first institution even among the Founders thereof, and to bee made Constable of Dover Castle, and Warden of the Cinque-ports. And his sonne carrying the same fore-name not degenerating from his father, lived in high honour and estimation; but hee left behind him one daughter, and no more issue, married into the house of Le Despenser; of which there remaineth still a goodly of-spring of Noble personages. Echingham next adjoyning, had also a Baron, named William de Echingham, in the time of king Edward the Second, whose ancestours were the hereditarie Seneschals of this Rape. And their inheritance in the end, by the heires females name to the Barons of Windsor, and to the Tirwhits. Then the Rother dividing his water into three chanels, passeth under Roberts bridge, where Alured de S. Martin, in king Henrie the seconds daies founded a Monasterie: and so running beside Bodiam, a Castle belonging to the ancient Familie of the Lewknors, built by the Dalegrigs, here falleth (as I sayd) into the Ocean. Now have I passed along the Sea coast of Sussex. And as for the midland part of the shire, I have nothing more to relate thereof, unlesse I should recount the woods, and forests, lying out faire in length and breadth, which are a remnant of the vast wood, Anderida. Among which, to begin at the West, those of greatest note are these, The forest of Arundell, Saint Leonards forest, word forest, and not farre off East Gren-sted anciently a parcell of the Barony of Eagle, and made a Mercat by king Henrie the seventh. Ashdowne forrest, under which standeth Buckhurst the habitation of the antient house of the Sackviles, out of which race Queene Elizabeth in our daies advanced Thomas Sackvile her allie by the Bollens, a wise Gentleman to be Baron of Buckhurst, took him into her privie Counsell, admitted him into the most honorable Order of the Garter, and made him Lord Treasurer of England: whom also of late, K. Iames created Earle of Dorset. Waterdown forest, where I saw Eridge, a lodge of the Lord Abergavenny, and by it craggie rocks rising up so thick, as though sporting nature had there purposed a sea. Here-by in the verie confines of Kent, is Gromebridge an habitation of the Wallers, whose house there was built by Charles duke of Orleance, father to K. Lewis the 12. of France, when he being taken prisoner in the battaile at Agincourt, by Richard Waller of this place, was here a long time detained prisoner. B C D E

Baron Echingham.

Roberts Bridge, or Rotherbridge Bodham.

Baron Buckhurst.

As touching the Earles; Sussex had five of the line of Albiney, who were likewise called Earles of Arundell; but had the third penie of Sussex, as Earles then had. The first of them was William D'Albiney, the sonne of William, Butler to king Henrie the first, and Lord of Buckenham in Norfolk: who gave for his armes Gueules, a Lion rampant, Or: and was called one while Earle of Arundell, and another while Earle of Chichester, for that in those places he kept his chiefe residence. This man, of Adeliz the daughter of Godfrey * Barbatus Duke of Loraine, and of Brabant, Queeen Dowager, or Widdow of K. Henry the First begat William the second Earle of Sussex, & of Arundell, father to William the third Earle: unto whom Mabile the sister, and one of the heires of the last Raulph Earle of Chester, bare William the fourth Earle, and Hugh the fifth, who both died without issue, and also foure daughters married unto Sir Robert Tatesball, Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan, Sir Roger de Somery, and Sir Robert F

Earles of Sussex.

See Earles of Arundell.

* With the beard.

de

Digitized by Google

A de Mount-hault. After this, the title of Arundell budded forth againe, as I ſaid before, in the Fitz-Alans: but that of Suſſex lay hidden, and loſt unto this our age: which hath ſeen five Ratcliffes, deſcended of the moſt Noble houſe of the Fitz-walters, (that derived their pedigree from the Clares) bearing that honour, to wit, Robert created Earle of Suſſex by King Henrie the Eight, who wedded Elizabeth daughter of Henrie Stafford Duke of Buckingham, of whom he begat Henrie the ſecond Earle: 21. Henric. 8.
unto whom Elizabeth the daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Thomas: who being Lord Chamberlaine to Queen Elizabeth, died without iſſue, a moſt worthy and honourable perſonage, in whoſe mind were ſeated jointly both po-
B liticke wiſedome, and martiall proweſſe, as England and Ireland acknowledged. Him ſucceeded Sir Henrie his brother, and after him Robert his onely ſonne, now in his flower.

This Province containeth Pariſhes 312.

C

THus far of Suſſex, which together with Suth-rey, was the habitation of the Regni, in the time of the Britans, and afterwards the kingdom of the South-Saxons, called in the Saxon tongue, ſuð-ſeaxan-pic, which in the two and thirty yere after the Saxons comming, was begun by Ælla, who, The Kingdome of the South-Saxons.
D as Beda writeth, Firſt among the kings of the Engliſh nation ruled all their Southern Provinces, which are ſevered by the River Humber, and the limits adjoyning thereto. The firſt Chriſtian King was Edilwalch, baptized in the preſence of Wulpher King of Mercia, his Godfather, and he in ſigne of adoption gave unto him two Provinces, namely, the Iſle of Wight, and the Province of the Meanvari: But in the 306. yeere after the beginning of this Kingdome, when Aldinius the laſt King was ſlaine by Ina King of Weſt-Saxons, it came wholly under the Dominion of the Weſt-Saxons.
E

F

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A

B

CANTIVM.

C Now am I come to Kent, which Countrey although master WILLIAM LAMBARD, a man right well endued with excellent learning, and as godly vertues, hath so lively depainted out in a full volume, that his painfull felicitie in that kind hath left litle, or nothing for others, yet according to the project of this worke which I have taken in hand, I will runne it ouer also: and least any man should thinke, that as the comicall Poet saith, I deale by way of close pilfering, I willingly acknowledge him, (and deserve he doth no lesse) to have been my foundation, and fountaine both of all (well-neere) that I shall say.

D Time as yet hath not bereft this Region of the antient name, but as it was called CANTIVM by Cæsar, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Ptolomee, and others, so that Saxons named it, as Ninnius witnesseth, Cantwaralandtho, that is, The countrey of the people inhabiting Cantium, and wee Kent. This name master Lambard deriveth from Caine, which among the Britans, a greene Bough, because in old time it was shadowed with woods. But if it may Bee lawfull for mee to put in my conjecture, whereas Britaine here runneth out with a mighty nooke, or corner into the East, and I have observed, that such a kind of nook in Scotland, is called, Cantir; Again, that the inhabitants of another Angle in that part of the Iland, are by Ptolomee, termed Cantæ, as also that the Cangani in Wales, were possessed of another corner, (to say nothing of the Cantabri, who likewise dwelt in an angle among the Celtiberians, who as they came from one originall, so likewise they were of the same language with our Britans) I would guesse, that the name was given by reason of the forme and situation, and so much the rather, both for that our Frenchmen have used Canton for a Corner, and that (as it is probable) from the old Language of the Gauls: for it comes not from the Germane or Latine tongue, which together with that old tongue, be the mothers of this latter French tongue; and also because this Country by all the old Geographers is called Angulus. For it looketh full upon France with a huge Angle, compassed with the æstuarie of Tamis, and with the Ocean sea, saving, that Westward it hath Surrey, and southward Sussex to confine upon it.

E

F

Carion, corruptly read in Diodorus Siculus.

Hereof commeth Canton in Heraldrie, for a corner; and the Helvetians countreys, were by the French called Cantons.

KENT.

Digitized by Google

KENT.

THe Region which we call Kent, extendeth it selfe, in length from West to East fifty miles, & from South to North 26. For situation, it is not uniforme as being more plaine toward the West, and full of shady woods; but higher Eastward, by reason of hils, mounting up with easie ascents. The Inhabitants distinguish it as it lieth South-east-ward from the Tamis, into three plots or portions, they call them steps or degrees; the upper wherof, lying upon Tamis, they say is healthfull, but not so wealthy: the middle they account both healthfull, and plentifull: the lower they hold to be wealthy, but not healthy: as which for a great part thereof is verie moist, yet it bringeth forth ranke grasse in great plentie. Howbeit everie where almost it is full of meadowes, pastures, and cornfields: abounding wonderfully in apple-trees, and cherrie-trees also, which being brought out of Pontus into Italie, in the 608. yeere after the foundation of Rome, and in the 120. yeere after, translated from thence into Britaine, prosper heere exceeding well, and take up many plots of land: the trees being planted after a direct maner one against another by square, most pleasant to behold. It hath villages and townes standing exceeding thicke, and well peopled, safe rodes, and sure harbours for ships, with some veines of iron and marle: but the aire is somewhat thicke, and somewhere foggie, by reason of vapours arising out of the waters. At a word, the revenues of the Inhabitants are greater both by the fertilitie of the soile, and also by the neighbourhood of a great citie, of a great river, and the maine sea. The same commendation of civilitie and courtesie which Cæsar in old time gave the inhabitants, is yet of right due unto them: that I may not speake of their warlike prowesse, whereas a certaine Monke hath written, How the Kentishmen so farre excelled, that when our armies are readie to joyne battaile, they of all Englishmen, are worthily placed in the Front, as being reputed the most valiant and resolute souldiours. Which, Iohn of Salisburie, verifieth also in his Polycraticon. For good desert (saith hee) of that notable valour, which Kent shewed so puissantly, and patiently against the Danes, it retaineth still unto these daies in all battailes the honour of the first and fore ward, yea, and of the first conflict with the enemie. In praise of whom William of Malmesbury hath likewise written thus, The country people and towne-dwellers of Kent, above all other Englishmen retaine still the resent of their ancient worthinesse. And as they are more forward, and readier to give honour, and entertainment to others, so they be more slow to take revenge upon others.

Rumney Marsh.

Plin. lib. 15. ca. 25. Cherries were brought over into Britaine about the yeere of our Lord. 48.

Prowesse of Kentishmen.

Iulius Cæsar.

Cæsar (to speake briefly by way of Preface, before I come to describe the particular places) when he first attempted the conquest of our Iland; arrived at this countrey; but being by the Kentish Britans kept from landing, obtained the shore not without a fierce encounter. When he made afterward his second voiage hither, here likewise hee landed his armie: and the Britans with their horsemen and wagons encountred them couragiously, but being soone by the Romanes repulsed, they withdrew themselves into the woods. After this they skirmished sharply with the Romane Cavallery in their march, yet so, as the Romans had every way the upper hand. Also, within a while after, they charged the Romans againe, and most resolutely brake through the mids of them, and having slaine Laberius Durus, Marshall of the field retired safe: and the morrow after set upon the Foragers, and victualers of the campe, &c. which I have briefly related before out of Cæsars owne Commentaries. At which time, Cyngetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, & Segonax were great commanders of Kent (whom he, bicause he would be thought to have vanquished Kings, termeth Kings) whereas indeed they were but Lords of the countrey, or Noble men of the better marke.

See Romans in Britaine. Page 34.

After the Romane Empire was heere established, it was counted under the jurisdiction of the President of Britannia Prima. But the Sea coast which they termed

LITTVS-

Digitized by Google

A LITTVS SAXONICVM, that is, The Saxon shore, like as the opposite shore vnto it, from the River Rhene to Xantoigne in France, had a ruler over it from Diocletians time, whom Marcellinus calleth, Tractus maritimi Comitem, that is, The Count, or Lieftenant of the Maritime tract: the booke of Notices, stileth him: The honorable, Earle or Liefte- The Count or Comes of nant of the Saxon shore along Britaine, whose office was with garisons set upon the the Saxon shore in places conuenient, to represse the depredations, and robberies of Barbarians, coast.
but of Saxons especially, who grieuously infested Britaine. And he was vnder the dispose of the Right Honorable Generall of the Footemen, whom they called Præsentalis, who besides the garisons lying at the Havens, assigned vnto him for the defense
B thereof at all assaies, Victores Iuniores Britannicianos Primanos Iuniores, and Secundanos Seniores, (these are the names of certaine bands or Companies) this he had for The L. Warden or Keeper of the his vnder officers to it, Principem ex officio Magistri præsentaliũ a parte pẽditum, Numerarios duos, Commentariensem, Cornicularium, Adjutorem, Subadjuvam, Regerendarium, Cinque ports Exceptores singulares, &c. Neither doubt I, but that our Ancestors imitated this custome of the Romanes, when they placed over this coast a Gouernour or Portreve, whom now they vse to call Warden of the Cinque Ports, because as the Comes or Earle of the Saxon shore aforesaid was gouernour of nine ports, so he is of fiue.

But when the Romanes were departed quite out of Britaine Vortigern, who bare soueraine rule in the greatest part of Britaine, placed over Kent a Guorong, that is to
C say, a Vice Roy, or Freedman vnder him, and vnwitting to him, he forthwith freely granted this region, as Ninnius and William of Malmesburie write, vnto Hengist the Saxon, for his daughter Rowens sake: vpon whom he was exceedingly enamoured. Hence it came, that the first Saxon Kingdome erected in Britaine in the yeere of our Lord 456, was called by them Cant-papapic, that is, The Kingdome of the Kentish men, which after three hundred and twenty yeeres, when Baldred their last King was subdued, fell to be vnder the Dominion of the West Saxons, to whom it continued subject vntill the Normans Conquest: For then, if we may beleeve Thomas Spot the Monke, (for none of the more antient Writers have recorded it) the Yeomanrie of Kent at Swanes-comb (a village this is where (they say) Suene the Dane sometime pit-
D ched his campe) carrying before them in their hands every one a great greene bough representing a farre of a moving wood, yeelded themselves vnto William the Conquerour vpon this condition that they might retaine their antient customes vnviolated, and especially that which they call Gavelkind that is Give all kinne, by which they are not so bound by Copyhold, customarie tenures, or Tenant-right, as in other parts of England, but in maner euery man is a free-holder, and hath some part of his owne to liue vpon. For lands of this nature are equally diuided among the male children, or if there be no sonnes, among the daughters. By vertue of this also, they are at full age and enter vpon their inheritance when they come to be fifteene yeres old: and lawfull it is for them to alienate and make it over to any one, either by gift or by E sale, without the Lords consent. By this likewise, the sonne though their parents were condemned for felony, or murther, succeede them nevertheiesse in such kind of Lands &c. which I leaue to Lawyers. So that, it is truly though not purely writtẽ in Latine in an old book thus: The County of Kent avoucheth, that this County ought by right to be free from such kind of grievance: for it saith, that this County was never conquered, as the residue of England was, but by concluding of a peace subjected themselves to the dominion of the Conquerour, retaining to themselves all their liberties, immunities, and customes, which they had and used before time. After this, William the Conquerour, that hee might more firmely assure to himselfe Kent, which is the very key of England, placed a Counstable over Dover Castle, and according to the antient order of the Fo-
F manes made him also Lord Warden of the Cinque ports. And these be they, Hastings, Dover, Hith, Rumney and Sandwich, vnto which, Winchelsey, and Rie are joined as principall ports, and other small townes as Members. Which because they are bound to serve in the warres by sea, enjoy many great immunities: as who are free from payment of Subsidies, and from Wardship of their children as touching the bodie, neither are they sued in any court, but within their owne townes; and of the inhabitants therein,

Digitized by Google

therin, such as they call Barons, at the Coronation of Kings and Queenes support the A Canapies over them, yea and have a table by themselves that day spred and furnished on the Kings right hand, &c. And the Lord Warden himselfe, who is alwaies one of the nobilitie of most approved trust, hath within his Iurisdiction the authority of a Chauncellour and Admirall in very many cases, and enjoieth other rights besides. But now returne we to the places.

The Northside of this Country, Tamis the soueraigne of all Rivers in Britaine runneth hard by, as I haue said before, which having held on his course past Surrey, forthwith being with a winding reach almost retired into himselfe, doth there admit int his chanell into the first limit of this shire Rauensburn a small water, and of B Rauensbourn.
An old great Campe.
short course, which riseth in Keston heath hard vnder the pitching of an ancient campe, strange for the height of double rampiers, and depth of double ditches, of all that I haue seene: doubtlesse the worke of many Labouring hands. Of what capacitie it was I could not discouer for that the greatest part thereof is now seuerall, and ouergrowen with a thicket, but verily great it was, as may be gathered by that which is apparent. We may probably coniecture that it was a Romane Campe, but I might seeme to rove, if I should thinke it that Campe which Iulius Caesar pitched, when the Britans gaue him the last battaile with their whole forces, and then hauing bad successe retired themselves; and gave him leave to march to the Tamis side. And yet certes Keston the name of the place seemeth to retaine a parcell of Ke- C sars name for so the Britanes called him, and not Caesar, as we doe. As for the other small intrenchment not farre of by W. Wickham, it was cast in fresh memorie when old Sir Christopher Heydon a man then of great command in these parts, trained the country people. This water having passed by Bromeley a mansion house of the Bishops of Rochester, when it hath gathered strength, the depth of his ford giveth Depe-ford.
name to Depe-ford: a most famous Ship-docke, where the Kings ships are built, and such as be decaied, repaired: there also is a goodly Store-house & a Colledge (as it were) or incorporation ordained for the use of the navie. The place was sometime called West-Greenwich, & at the conquest of England fell to Gislebert Mamignot for his share, whose Grand-child Walkelin, defended Dover Castle against King Stephen, and D 332 left behind him one onely daughter living, who when her brother was dead, by her Magnignot.
marriage brought a rich inheritance called the Honor of Mamignot into the familie of the Saies.

From hence the Tamis goeth to Green-wich, that is, the Green Creeke, for the Green-wich.
creeke of a river in the old Englisn tongue was called Wic, a place in times past famous for the Danish Fleet that lay there often at Rode, and for the Danes crueltie shewed unto Ealpheg Archbishop of Canterbury, whom in the yeere of our Lord a thousand and twelve, they cruelly executed with most exquisite torments. Whose death together with the cause thereof Ditmarus Mersepurgius, who about the same time lived, hath thus in the eight booke of his Chronicles described. I understood E (saith he) by the relation of Sewald, a pitifull deede, and therefore memorable: namely,
The same that Danes.
*That the perfidious crew of Northman soldiours under Thurkil as yet their Capitaine, tooke that excellent prelate, Archbishop of the Citie of Canterburie named Ealpheg with the rest, and them after their wicked maner emprisoned and bound, yea and put him to endure famine and unspeakeable paines. This good man moued with humane frailty promiseth unto them a summe of money, and for the obtaining thereof did set downe a time betweene, that if in this space he could not by some acceptable ransome escape this momentany death, he might yet in the meane while purge himselfe with many a grone, to be offered as a lively sacrifice unto the Lord. But when all the time and space appointed were come & gone, this greedy gulfe of Pirats called forth the seruant of the Lord, & in threatning wise demands this tribute promised unto them F to be speedily and out of hand paid. Then he, as a meeke Lambe, Heere am I, quoth he ready to undergoe euen for the loue of Christ whatsoeuer yee presume now to doe against me, that I may deserue to become an example of his seruants. And nothing am I troubled at this day. And whereas I seeme unto you a lier, it is not mine owne will but great neede and poverty that hath done it. This body of mine, which in this exile I haue loued ouermuch, I present

Digitized by Google

A as culpable unto you, and I know it is in your power to doe with it, what yee intend: but my ſinfull ſoule that regardeth not you, I humbly commend to the Creatour of all things. As he was thus ſpeaking, the whole rable of theſe prophane wretches hemmed him round about and getteth together divers and ſundry weapons to kill him. Which when their leader Thurkill ſaw a farre off, he came quickly running and crying, Do not ſo in any wiſe I beſeech you: and heere, with my whole heart I deliver unto you all my gold and ſilver and whatſoever I have heere, or can by any meanes come by, ſave my ſhip onely, that yee would not ſinne againſt the Lords annointed. But this unbridled anger of his mates, harder than yron and flint was nothing mollified with ſo gentle words and faire language of his, but became pacified by ſhed-

B ding his innocent blood, which preſently they altogether confounded and bleanded with Ox-heads, ſtones as thicke as haile and billets hurled at him. And to the memorie of this Saint Ealpheg is the Pariſh Church heere conſecrated. But now is the place of very great name, by reaſon of the Kings houſe, which Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter built and named Placence; which alſo King Henry the Seventh moſt ſumptuouſly enlarged: who adjoined thereto a little houſe of obſervant Friers, and finiſhed that towre famous in Spaniſh fables, which the ſaid Duke of Gloceſter begun, on an high hill, from whence there is a moſt faire, and pleaſant proſpect open to the river winding in an out, and almoſt redoubling it ſelfe, the greene meddowes and marſhes vnderlying, the Citie of London, and the Countrie round about. Which being now enlarged and beau- Placence.

C tified by the L. Henrie Howard Earle of Northampton, Lord Privie Seale, &c. cannot but acknowledge him a well deſerving benefactor. But the greateſt ornament by farre that graced this Green-wich, was our late Queene Elizabeth, who heere moſt happily borne to ſee the light by the reſplendent brightneſſe of her roiall vertue enlightned all England. But as touching Green wich haue heere theſe verſes of Leland the Antiquarian Poet:

Ecce vt iam niteat locus petitus
Tanquam ſydereæ domus cathedræ.
Quæ faſtigia picta? quæ feneſtræ?
D Quæ turres vel ad aſtra ſe efferentes?
Quæ porro viridaria, ac perennes
Fontes? Flora ſinum occupat venuſta Fundens delicias nitentis horti.
Rerum commodus æſtimator ille,
Ripæ qui varijs modis amænæ,
Nomen contulit eleganter aptum.

How glittereth now this place of great requeſt,
Like to the ſeat of heavenly welkin hie?
With gallant tops, with windowes of the beſt.
E What towres that reach even to the ſtarry skie:
What Orchards greene, what ſprings ay-running by.
Faire Flora heere that in this creeke doth dwell,
Beſtowes on it the flowres of garden gay;
To judge no doubt of things he knew ful well,
Who gave this banke thus pleaſant every way,
So fit a name, as did the thing bewray.

Nothing els have I heere to note (but that, for I would not have the remembrance of well deſerving benefactors to miſcarrie) William Lambard a godly good Gentleman built an Almeſhouſe here for the ſuſtentation of poore perſons which

F hee named The Colledge of Queene Elizabeths poore people, and as the prieng aduerſaries of our religion then obſerved, was the firſt Proteſtant that built and Hoſpitall. At the backe of this, as ye turne out ſcarce three miles off, ſtandeth Eltham, a retyring place likewiſe of the kings, but vnholſomly by reaſon of the moote. Antony Beke Biſhop of Durham, and Patriarch of Ieruſalem built this in a maner new, and gave unto Queene Eleanor wife to King Edward the firſt, after hee had craftily Eltham.

Digitized by Google

The Booke of Durrham.

ly conveied unto him selfe the inheritance of the Vescyes, unto whom this place before belonged. For that Bishop, whom the last Baron of Vescy had made his feofie for trust, of all his inheritance to the use of William Vescy his little base sonne, dealt not so faithfully, as hee should with this orphane and ward of his, but dispoiled him of Alnwick Castle, this, and other faire lands. A

The Breach. 1527. Riesnes.

Beneath Greenwich, the Tamis having broken downe his bankes, hath by his irruption surrounded and overwhelmed many acres of land. For the inning whereof diverse have as it were strugled with the waters now many yeares; and yet with great workes, and charges cannot over master the violence of the tides, which the Chanons of Lielnes adioyning keept sound and sweet land in their times. This Abbay was founded 1179. by Lord Richard Lucie chiefe Iustice of England, and by him dedicated to God and the memorie of Thomas of Canterburie, whom hee so admired for his pietie, while other condemned him for pervicacie against his Prince, as hee became here a devoted Chanon to him. Heere in the marshes groweth plentifully, the herbe Cochlearia, called by our Countrie men Scurvi-grasse, which some Physicians would haue to bee the same which Plinie calleth Brittannica, by which name I have alreadie made mention thereof: but heare what Plinie saith. In Germany, when as Germanicus Cæsar had remooved his campe forward beyond Rhene, in the maritime tract there was one fountaine and no more, of fresh water, whereof if a man dranke, within two yeares his teeth would fall out of his head and the ioynts in his knees become loose and feeble. Those diseases the Physicians tearmed Stomacace and Sceletyrbe. For remedie hereof, there was found an herbe called Brittannica, holsome not onely for the sinewes and maladies of the mouth but also against the Squincie and stinging of serpents &c. They of * Frisia, what way our camp lay, shewed it unto our souldiours. And I mervaile what should be the cause of that name, unlesse peradventure they that confine upon the Ocean, dedicated the name thereof to Britaine, as lying so nere unto it. But that most learned Hadrian Iunius in his booke named Nomenclator, bringeth another reason of the name whom you may have recourse unto if you please: For, this word Britannica hath here diverted me a side from my course. B C D

Scurvy-grass. 1527 The herbe Britannica.

*Friseland.

* See afterward in the British Isles, concerning the Arrenat or Armory of the Britains.

From thence the Tamis beeing conteined within his bankes meeteth with the river Darent, which falling downe out of Suthrey runneth with a soft streame not farre from Seven-oke (so called as men say of seaven exceeding great Okes now cut down) which commendeth Sir William Sevenok an Alderman of London, who beeing a foundling and brought up here; and therefore so named, built here in gratefull remembrance an Hospitall and a schoole. On the East side of it standeth Knoll so called for that it is seated upon an hill, which Thomas Bourchier Archbishop of Canterburie purchasing of Sir William Fienes, Lord Say and Zeale, adorned with a faire house: and now lately Thomas Earle of Dorset Lord Treasurer hath fourbished and beautified the old worke with new chargeable additaments. Darent then passeth by Ottanpopo, now Otford, a place famous in former ages for an overthrow and slaughter of the Danes which happened there in the yeare 1016. and lately by reason of the Kings house, which William Wartham Archbishop of Canterburie built, for himselfe and his successours so sumptuously, that for to avoide envie, Cranmer who next succeeded him was constreined to exchange it with King Henrie the Eighth. Somewhat lower hard by Darent standeth Lullingston, where there was sometime a Castle the seat of a family of the same name, but now of Sir Percival Harte, descended from one of the coheires of the Lord Bray. Then Darent giveth name unto Darentford, commonly Dartford a great mercat towne well frequented, and well watered, where king Edward the Third built a Nunnery, which King Henrie the Eighth converted into a house for himselfe and his successours: Here the riveret Crey, anciently called Crecan intermingleth it selfe which Darent, when in his short course he hath imparted his name to fiue townlets which hee watereth as, Saint Marie Crey, Pauls Crey, Yotes-Crey, North Crey, And Crey-ford, in former ages Crecanford, where Hengest the Saxon the eighth yeare after his arrivall, ioyned battaile with the Brittans, and after hee had slaine their captaines, brought them under with so great a slaugh-

* Sevenoke.

Knoll.

Otford.

Dartford:

E F

Paulscrey anciently Saulcrie: Dud. grant by K. Edw. 6. to Thomas Roberts for 155li. 2s. 2d. ob. q. yearly rent. Pat. 1 Edw. 6. p. 2. m. 20. Yotes Crey, Dud. grant 4 Nov. 5 Eliz. p. a copy whereof I have, being by me taken by the original Book of the Bill.

A slaughter, that afterwards hee never stood in feare of them, but established his kingdome quietly in Kent.

From the river Darent or Dart unto the mouth of Medwey, the Tamis seeth nothing aboue him but little townes pleasantly seated, which to passe over in silence were no preiudice either of their fame or any thing els. Yet amongst them is Swanſ-combe (of which I haue heretofore spoken) of honorable memorie among the Kentish men, for obteining their the continuance of their ancient franchises, afterward it was well knowne by the Montcheuſies, men of great Nobility the owners thereof who had there Barony here-about. And by it Graueſ-end so called (as Maister Lambert is my authour) as the Gereueſ-end; that is, the limit of the Gereue or Reue. A towne as well knowne as any other in England, for the usuall B passage by water betweene it and London, since the Abbat of Grace by the tower of London, to which it appertained, obtained of King Richard the Second that the inhabitants of it and Milton onely, should transport passengers from thence to London. King Henrie the Eighth when he fortified the sea coast, raised two Platformes or Block-houses here, and two other opposite on Essex side. Beyond Graueſ-end is Shorn held anciently by Sir Roger Northwood by service to carry with ot her the kings tennants a white ensigne fortie daies at his owne charges when the king warred in Scotland. Somewhat more within the land, lieth Cobham, the habitation for a long time of the Barons of Cobham; of whom Iohn Cobham the last of that name, founded C a Colledge here and a castle at Cowling: who left one onely daughter wife to Sir Iohn de la Pole knight: Shee likewise bare but one daughter, though married in her time to many husbands. But by Sir Reginald Braibrooke onely had shee issue. As for her husband Sir Iohn Old Caſtle, whiles hee endeuoured to bring in innouation in religion, was both hanged, and burnt. Ioane her onely daughter by Sir Reginald Braybrooke, was wedded unto Thomas Broke of Somersetshire, from whom six Lord Cobhams haue lineally descended, and flourished in honorable reputation untill our time. From Graueſ-end a little country called Ho, lying as a demy Island between the riuers Tamis and Medway stretcheth it selfe into the East, and is for situation but D unholsome. At the entry hereof is Cowling Castle built by Iohn Lord Cobham in a mooriſh ground, and Cliffe a good bigge towne, so called of a cliffe upon which it standeth. But whether it bee that Clines at Ho, so famous in the tender age and infancie of our English church, by reason of a Synode there holden I dare not as others doe, affirme: considering, that in regard of the site it is a place inconvenient for such an assemble; and besides that Clives at Hoo seemeth to haue beene within the Kingdome of the Mercians. As for the riuer Medweg, now called Medway, and in the Britiſh tongue, (unlesse I misse of the truth), Vaga, whereunto afterward was added Med, hath his spring head in the wood Anderida which is tearmed the Weald, that is a Woodland country; and taketh up the South-part of this region farre and E wide. At first, whiles it carrieth but a slender streame it receiueth the Eden by Penſhurſt the seat anciently (as it seemeth by the name) of Sir Stephen de Penherſt who also was called de Penſheſter a famous Warden of the Cinque-ports; but now the house of the Sidneies who deriue their race from William de Sidney Chamberlaine to king Henrie the second: out of which came Sir Henrie Sidney that renowned Lord deputy of Ireland, who of the daughter of Iohn Dudley Duke of Northumberland, and Earle of Warwick, begat Philip and Robert. This Robert, Iames our soueraigne King, made right honorable, first by the title of Baron Sidney of Penſherſt and afterwards, of Viscount Liſle. But Sir Philip, whom I cannot passe over in silence, beeing the glorious F starre of this familie, a liuely paterne of vertue, and the louely ioy of all the learned sort, fighting valerouslie with the enemy before Zutphen in Gelderland died manfully. This is that Sidney, whom, as Gods will was he should be therefore borne into the world, even to shew unto our age a sample of ancient vertues: so his good pleasure was before any man looked for it to call for him againe, and take him out of the world as beeing more worthy of heaven then earth. Thus wee may see, Perfect vertue so dainly vaniſheth out of ſight, and the beſt men continue not long.

Swane-scomb that is K. Swanes Campe.

Graueſ-end.

Inquiſ. 35. E. 3.

Barones of Cobham.

Clive at Ho.

Medwey.

Weald.

Penſherſt.

Sidney.

Viscount Liſle

See in Berkeshire.

Philip Sidney.

Digitized by Google

Then the river Medway, branching it ſelfe into five ſtreamlets, is joyned with as many ſtone bridges, and thereof giveth the name of Tunbridge to the towne there ſituat, as the towne of Bridges. This about King William Rufus his time Richard ſonne of Count Gilbert, Grandchild to Godfrey Earle of Ewe, & Lord of Briony obtained in requitall for Briony in Normandie, when there had bin long debate about Briony. This Richard, (as William Gemeticenſis writeth) in recompence for the ſame caſtle received in England the towne of Tunbridge for it. And the report goeth, that the Lowy of Briony was meaſured round about with a line, & with the ſame line brought into England, he received ſo much ground meaſured out at Tunbridge.* Shortly after, he built here a faire large caſtle fenſed with the river, a deepe ditch, and ſtrong walles; and albeit it is now ruinous and the Keepe attired with Ivie, yet it manifeſtly ſheweth what it was. His poſteritie, who were Earles of Gloceſter, and ſurnamed De Clare, (for that they were Lords of Clare in Suffolke) built here a priorie for Chanons of Saint Auguſtines order, founded the pariſh Church which was impropriated to the Knights of Saint Iohn of Hieruſalem, and compounded about the tenure of the Mannour, for which there had beene long ſuit, to hold it of the Archbiſhop of Canterburie by Knights fee, and to be their high Stewards at their inthroniſations. From theſe Clares Earles of Gloceſter, it came by an heire generall to Sir Hugh Audley Earle of Gloceſter, and by his onely daughter to the Earles of Stafford, who were afterward Dukes of Buckingham, & from them by attainder to the Crowne. It hath in latter ages been beholden to Sir Andrew Iude of London for a faire free-Schoole, and to Iohn Wilford for a cauſey toward London. Three miles directly South from hence in the very limit of Suſſex, and neere Frant, I ſaw in a white-ſandy ground divers vaſtie, craggie ſtones of ſtrange formes, whereof two of the greateſt ſtand ſo cloſe together, and yet ſevered with ſo ſtraight a line, as you would thinke they had been ſawed aſunder, and Nature when ſhe reared theſe, might ſeeme ſportingly to have thought of a Sea. But to returne to the River.

Tunbridge.

* The Lowy of Tunbridg.

Whet-ſtones.

From Tunbridge, Medway paſſeth by Haudelo, from whence came that Iohn Haudelo, who happily marrying the heire of the Lord Burnell, had iſſue by her a ſonne, who was called Nicholas, ſummoned to Parliament among the Barons by the name of Burnell. Then Medway increaſed with another water, called Twiſt, which twiſteth about and inſulateth a large plot of good ground, runneth on not farre from Mereworth, where ſtands a faire Caſtle like houſe, which from the Earles of Arundell came unto the Nevils Lords of Abergevennie, and Le Deſpencer: whoſe heire in the right line, is Marie, Ladie Fane, unto whom, and her heires King Iames in the firſt Parlament that he held, reſtored, gave and granted &c. the name, ſtile, title, honour, and dignitie of Baroneſſe le Deſpencer: and that her heires ſucceſſively ſhould be Barons le Deſpencer for ever. Now by this time Medway having received a riveret, that looſeth it ſelfe under ground, and riſeth againe at Looſe, ſerving thirteene fulling-miles, haſteneth to Maidſtone, which ſeeing the Saxons called it Medwegſton, & Weopeagertun, I beleeve verily it is the ſame VAGNIACAE, which Antonine the Emperor mentioneth, and Ninnius in his Catalogue of cities, calleth corruptly, Caer Megwad, for, Medwag. Neither verily doth the account of diſtance diſagree; From Noviomagus one way, and Durobrovis another, whereof I ſhall treat anone. Under the latter Emperours, as is to be ſeene in Peutegerus his table lately ſet out by M. Velſerus, it is named MADVS. Thus as yeeres by little and little turne about, ſo names likewiſe by little and little become changed. A large faire, and ſweet towne this is, and populous: for the faire ſtone bridge, it hath been beholding to the Archbiſhops of Canterbury. Among whom to grace this place at the confluence of the waters, Boniface of Savoy, built a a ſmall College, Iohn Vfford raiſed a palace for himſelfe and ſucceſſors, which Simon Iſlip encreaſed, and between them, which it ſtandeth in plight, William Courtney erected a faire Collegiat Church, in which he ſo great a Prelate, and ſo high-borne, lieth lowly entombed. One of the two common Gaoles or priſons of the whole County is here appointed. And it hath been endowed with ſundrie priviledges, by King Edward the ſixt, incorporated by the name of Major and jurates, all which in Mereworth.

Vaginacæ. p. 635.

Madus.

ſhort

Digitized by Google

A short time they lost by favouring rebels. But Q. Elizabeth amply restored them, and their Major, whereas anciently they had a Portgreve for their head Magistrate. This I note, because this [Greve] is an antient Saxon word, and as yet among the Germans signifieth, a Ruler, as Markgrave, Reingrave, Landtgrave, &c.

Here, a little beneath Maidstone Eastward, a prety riveret joineth with Medway, springing first at Lenebam: which towne by probable conjecture is the verie same that Antonine the Emperor calleth DVROLENVM, written amisse in some copies, DVROLEVVM. For Durolenum in the British language, is as much to say as The water Lenum. And besides the remaines of the name, the distance also from DVROVENVM, and B DVROBROVIS proveth this to be Durolenum: to say nothing of the situation herof, nere unto that high rode way of the Romans, which in old time (as Higden of Chester doth write) led from Dover through the mids of Kent. Lenham.

Hard by, at Bocton Malherb hath dwelt a long time the family of the Wottons, out of which in our remembrance flourished both Nicholas Wotton, Doct. of the lawes, who being of the privy counsell to K. Henry the Eight, K. Edward the sixth, Q. Marie, and Q. Elizabeth, sent in embassage nine times to forrain Princes, and thrise chosen a Commissioner about peace between the English, French, and Scotish; lived a goodly time, and ran a long race in this life with great commendation of piety and wisdome: and also Sir Edward Wotton, whom for his approved wisdome in waightie affaires, Q. Eli- C zabeth made Controller of her house, and K. Iames created Baron Wotton of Merley. Here under is Vlcomb anciētly a mansion of the family De sancto Leodegario, corruptly called Sentleger & Sellenger, & Motinden, where Sir R. Rockesly descended frō Kriol, and Crevecur built a house, who held lands at Seaton by serjeantie to be Vantrarius Regis, when the K. goeth into Gascoin, donec perussus fuerit puri solutarum pretij 4. d. which as they that understand Law Latin (for I do not) translate that he should be, the Kings fore-foot-man, until he had worne out a paire of shooes, prized 4. d. Neither hath this river any other memorable thing nere to it, but Leeds Castle, built by the noble Crevequers, who in ancient charters are named de Crevequer, & De crepito corde: afterwards it was the unfortunat seat of Bartholomew L. Baalsmer, who perfidiously fortified it D against K. EDVVARD the second, who had freely given it him, and after that payed the due price, of his disloialtie upon the gallowes. The whole matter you may read here if you list out of a briefe historie penned by Thomas de la More, a gentleman that lived at the same time, and which of late I did publish in print. In the yeere 1321. Quene Isabel came to the Castle of Leeds, about the feast of Saint Michael, minding there to lodge all night, but was not permitted to enter in. The King offended hereat, as taking it to be done in contempt of him, call'd certaine of the neighbor inhabitants out of Essex and London, and commanded them to lay siege unto the Castle. Now, there held the Castle at that time Bartholomew de Baalsmer, who having left there in his wife and sonnes was gone himselfe with the rest of the Barons to overthrow the Hughs de Spencer. Meare while, when E they that were enclosed within despaired of their lives, the Barons with their associats came as far as Kingston, and by the mediation of the Bishops of Canterburie and London, together with the Earle of Pembroch, requested that the King would remove his siege, promising to deliver up the Castle, into the Kings hand after the next Parliament. But the King considering well, that the besieged could not long hold out, nor make resistance, being highly displeased & angred at their contumacy, would not give eare to the Barons petitions. And whē they had turned their journey another way, hee afterward forced the Castle with no small trouble and labor about it: and when he had hanged all the rest that he found therin, he sent the wife and sons of Bartholemew aforesaid to the Tower of London. Thus Medway having received this riveret from Leeds, fetching about through good grounds runneth by Al- F lington somtime a castle, now lesse than a castellet, where Sir T. Wiat the elder, a worthy learned knight, reedified a fair house now decaied, whose son Sir Thomas enriched by an heire of Sir T. Haut, proposing to himself great hopes upon fair pretenses pitifully overthrew himself & his state. Hence commeth Medway to Ailsford in the old English Saxon Eaglesford, which H. of Huntingdon, calleth Elstre, Ninnius Episford: who hath written, that it was named in the British tongue Saissnag-haibail of the Saxons there vanquished, Boston Malherb.

Baron Wotton.

Fin. Mich. 11. E. 2.

Leeds castle.

The family of Crevequer.

1321.

Ailesford.

Digitized by Google

vanquished, like as others in the verie same sense termed it Anglesford. For, Guortemere the Britany, Guortigerns sonne, did heere set upon Hingist and the English Saxons, whom being distraied and not able to abide a second charge, he put all to flight: so as they had beene utterly defaited for ever, but that Hengist skill-full and provident to prevent, and divert danger, withdrew him selfe into the Isle of Tenet, until that invincible vigour and heat of the Britans was allaied and fresh supplies came to his succour out of Germanie. In this battaile were slaine the generalls of both sides, Catigern the Britane, and Horsa the Saxon: of whome the one, buried at Horsted not farre from hence, gaue name to the place: and Catigern honored with a stately and solemne funerall is thought to have beene enterred neere unto Ailesford where under the side of a hill I saw foure huge, rude, hard stones erected, two for the sides, one transversall in the mideſt betweene them, and the hugest of all piled and laied over them in manner of the British monument which is called Stone-heng but not so artificially with mortis and tenents. Verily the unskilfull common people terme it at this day, of the same Catigern, Keiths or Kits Coty house. In Ailesford it selfe, for the religious house of the Carmelites founded by Richard Lord Grey of Codnor in the time of King Henrie the Third, is now seene a faire habitation of Sir William Siddey a learned knight painefully, and expensfully studious of the common good of his countrie as both his endowed house for the poore, and the bridge heere with the common voice doe plentifully testifie. Neither is Boxley neere adjoyning to bee passed over insilence, where William de Ipres, in Flaunders, Earle of Kent founded an Abbay in the yeare of our Lord 1145. and translated thither the Monkes, from Clarevalle in Burgundie. Medway having wound himselfe higher, from the East receiveth a brooke springing neare Wrotham or Wirtham, so named for plentie of wortes: where the Archbishops had a place vntill Simon Islep pulled it downe; leaveth Malling which grew to bee a towne after Gundulph Bishop of Rochester had there founded an Abbay of Nunnes, and watereth Leibourn which hath a Castle sometime the seate of a family thereof surnamed, out of which Sir Roger Leibourn was a great agent in the Barons warres, and William was a Parlametary Baron in the time of King Edward the First. Nare neighbor to Leibourn is Birling, now the habitation of the Lord Abergeneny, in times past parcell of the Baronie of and from the Maminots, then of the Saies, whose inheritance at length by heires generall came to the families of Clinton, Fienes, and Aulton. Upō the banke of Medway Eastward somewhat higher, after it hath passed by Halling where Hamo Heath Bishop of Rochester built an house for his successors, there standeth an ancient Citie; which Antonine calleth DVRO-BRVS, DVRO-BRIVAE and in another place more truely DVRO-PROVÆ and DVRO-BROVÆ: Bede DVRO-BREVIS: and in the declining state of the Romane Empire processe of time contracted his name so, that it came to be named ROIBIS, and so by addition of Ceaſtep, which comming of the latin word Castrum, betokend among our ancestors a city or Castle, was called hroueceaſtep, and now with vs more short Rochester, and in Latin Roffa, of one Rhuffus as Bede guesseth: but it seemeth unto mee to reteine in it somewhat still of that old name Durobrevis. Neither is there cause why any man should doubt of the name, seeing that by the account of journeies, or distance betweene places and Bedes authority, it is named expresly in the Charter of the foundation of the Cathedral church, there DVROBROVIS: yet thus much I wold advertise the reader, that in the printed bookes of Bede it is red Daruerum, whereas in the manuscript copies it is termed DVROBROVIS: seated it is in a botome, fortified on the one side with a marsh, the river, and weake walles, and as William of Malmesbury saith pent within too streight a rowme: whereupon, in time past it was counted a Castle rather than a Citie. For, Bede calleth it Castellum Cantuariorum, that is, the Kentishmens Castle. But now it stretcheth forth with large suburbs on the West, East, and South sides. It hath passed through no few dangers and mischances. In the yeere of Christ 676. it was overthrowen and laid along by King Aetheldred the Mercian: and many a time afterward sacked by the Danes. Aethelbert King of Horsted.

Catigern his Sepulchre.

Boxley.

Wrotham.

Malling.

Leibourn.

Baron Leibourn.

Birling.

Baron Say.

Durobrevis.

In an ancient table set forth by Welser.

Roibis.

Ceaſter what it is.

Rochester.

Kent

Digitized by Google

A Kent erected there a sumpteous Church, which also he made more famous with the dignitie of a Bishopricke, ordaining Iustus to be the first Bishop of that Sie. But when it fell to decay for very age, Bishop Gundulph a Norman about the yeere 1080. reedified it, and thrusting out the Priests brought in Monkes in their rowmes: and when they were cast out, a Deane, six Prebendaries an Scholars were substituted in their places. Neere unto the Church there standeth over the river an old Castle fortified both by art, and situation: Which, as the report goeth Odo Bishop of Bayeux and Earle of Kent built: But it was, no doubt, King William the first that built it: For, in Domesday booke we read thus, The Bishop of Rouecester holdeth in Elesford,
B for exchange of the land on which the Castle is seated. Yet, certaine it is, that Bishop Odo when his hope depended of a doubtfull change of the State, held this against King William Rufus: At which time there passed proclamation through England, that whosoeuer would not be reputed a Niding, should repaire to recouer Rochester Castle. * Whereupon the youth fearing that name, as most reprochfull and opprobrious in that age, swarmed thither in such numbers, that Odo was enforced to yeeld the place, lose his dignitie, and abiure the realme. But concerning the reedification of this Castle about this time, listen what the * Text of Rocester saith, when King William the Niding. William of Malmesbury.

Textus Roffensis. An antient Manuscript booke of that church.

C second would not confirme the gift of Lanfranck as touching the Manner of Heuenham in the County of Buckingham, made unto Rochester church, unlesse Lanfranck and Gundolph Bishop of Rochester would giue unto the king an hundred pound of deniers; At last by the intercession of Sir Robert Fitz-Hamon and Henrie Earle of Warwick, the king granted it thus farre forth in lieu for the money which hee demaunded for grant of the Manour, that Bishop Gundulph, because he was verie skilful and well experienced in architecture and masonrie should build for the king at his owne proper charges a Castle of stone. In the end, when as the Bishops were hardly brought to giue their consent unto it before the king, Bishop Gundulph built up the Castle full and whole at his owne cost. And a little after, king Henrie the First granted unto the Church of Canterbury and to the Archbishops, the keeping thereof, and the Constableship to hold euer after, (as Florentius of Worcester saith) yea and licence withall, to build in the same a towne for themselues. Since which time it was belaied with D one or two great sieges, but then especially, when the Barons with their Al'armes made all England to shake, and Simon Montford Earle of Leicester assaulted it most fiercely, though in vaine, and cut downe the wooden bridge, which was after repaired: But in the time of King Richard the Second Sir Robert Knowles by warlike prowes raised from low estate to high reputation, and great riches, built a verie goodly stone bridge of arch-worke with money levied out of French spoiles. At the end of the said bridge, Sir Iohn Cobham who much furthered the worke, erected a chapell (for our elders built no notable bridge without a chapell) upon which besides armes of Saints, are seene the armes of the King & his three vncles then living. And long after Archbishop Warham coped a great part of the said bridge with iron bars. Vnder
E this, Medway swelling with a violent and swift streame stingleth and breaketh through roaring & loud; but forthwith running more still & calme becommeth a road at Gillingham and Chetham for a most roiall and warlike nauie of strong and serviceable ships, and the same most readie alwaies at a short warning: which, our late gracious Ladie Queene Elizabeth, with exceeding great cost built for the safegard of her subiects and terror of her enemies, and for the defense thereof raised a castelet at Vpnore upon the river side.

* The French called him Canol.

Chatham.

The Kings Navy.

Now Medway growne more full and carring a greater bredth, with his curling waues right goodly and pleasant to behold, runneth along by the fruitfull fields, until that being diuided by meeting with the Iland Sheppey, (which we supposed to be F Ptolomeis Toliatis) maketh his issue into the Æstuarie or Frith of Tamis at two mouths. Of which twaine, the Westerne is called West-Swale: the Easterne, that seemeth to haue severed Sheppie from the firme land, is named East Swale: but by Bede, termed Gentleand and Tenlet. This Isle, of the sheepe, whereof it feedeth mightie great flockes, being called by our auncestours Sheppey, that is, The Isle of Sheep, passing plentifull in corne, but scarce of woods conteineth twentie one miles in compasse. Upon Toliatis an Isle.

Shepey. Insulet.

Digitized by Google

the North shore it had a little Monasterie, (now they call it Minster) built by Sexburga wife of Ercombert the King of Kent, in the yeere 710. Under which, a certaine Brabander of late beganne to trie by the furnace out of stones found upon the shore, both Brimstone and Coperas. It hath Westward in the Front thereof a very fine and strong Castle, which King Edward the third built, as himselfe writeth, Pleasant for site, to the terrour of his enemies, and solace of his people: unto which he adjoined a Burgh, and in the Honor of Philip the Queene his wife called it Queene-borough, as one would say, The Queenes Burgh. The Constable whereof at this day, is Sir Edward Hoby, who hath polished his excellent wit with learned studies. Eastward, is Shurland seated, which belonged in late times to the Cheineies, and now to Sir Philip Herbert second sonne to Henrie Earle of Pembroch, whom King Iames in one and the same day created Baron Herbert of Shurland, and Earle of Mont-Gomeric.

Queene Borough.

This Isle appertaineth to the Hundred of Middleton, so named of Middleton the towne, now Milton. This was some time a towne of the Kings aboade, and of greatter name by farre than at this day, although, Hasting the Danish pirate for to annoy it, fortified a Castle hard by in the yeere 893. Neere adjoining heereto Sittingburn a towne furnished with Innes sheweth it selfe with his new Maior and corporation: the remaines also of Tong Castle, which as some write, was so called for that Hengist built it by a measure of thongs cut out of a beasts hide, when Vuertigern gave him so much land to fortifie vpon, as he could incompasse with a beasts hide out into thongs. Since the conquest it was the seat of Guncelline of Badilsmer, of noble parentage, whose sonne Bartholomew begat Guncelline: and he by the Inheretrie of Raulph Fitz-Barnard Lord of Kings-Downe was father to that seditious Sir Bartholomew Lord Badilsmer of whom I spake: he againe of Margaret Clare begat Sir Giles Lord Badilsmer that died without issue; also Margerie, wife to William Roos of Hamlake; Mawde the wife of Iohn Vere Earle of Oxford; Elizabeth espoused to William Bohun Earle of Northampon, and afterward to Edmund Mortimer; and Margaret whom Sir Iohn Tiptoft wedded: from whom descended a goodly offspring and faire race of great nobilitie.

Then saw I Tenham not commended for health, but the parent as it were of all the choise fruit gardens, and Orchards of Kent, and the most large and delightsome of them all, planted in the time of King Henrie the Eight by Rich. Harris his fruterer, to the publique good. For thirty Parishes thereabout, are replenished with Cherie-gardens, & Orchards beautifully disposed in direct lines. Amongst these is Feuersham very commodiously situate. For, the most plentifull part of this country lieth round about it, and it hath a creeke fit for bringing in and carrying forth commodities; whereby at this day it flourisheth amongst all the neighbour townes. It seemeth also in former times to have flourished, considering that King Aethelstane assembled hether an assembly the Sages of his Kingdome, and made lawes heere in the yeere of our redemption 903.

Tenham.

Chery gardens.

Feuersham.

King Stephen also he that usurped the Kingdome of England, founded an Abbay heere, for the Monkes of Clugny; In which, himselfe, Mawde his wife, and Eustach his sonne were entombed. Nigh thereto, like as else where through this Countie, are found pits of great deapth, which being narrow in the mouth and very spatious beneath have their certaine distinct rowmes or chambers (as it were) with their severall supporting pillers of chalke. Concerning these there are divers opinions. I for my part, cannot tell what to thinke of them unlesse they were those pits, out of which the Britans in old time digged forth chalke or white marle to dung their grounds withall, as Plinie writeth. For, they saund pits, saith he, An hundred foote deepe, streight at the mouth, but of great capacity within: like unto these very same of which we now speake.

And verily, no where else are they found but in a chalkie and marly soile. Unlesse a man would thinke, that our English-Saxons digged such caves & holes to the same use and purpose, as the Germans did, of whom they were descended. For, they were

A were wont as Tacitus writeth, to make holes and caues vnder the ground, and those to charge aloft with great heapes of dung, as harbours of refuge for Winter, and garners of receit for corne; because by such like places they mitigate the rigour of cold wether: and if at any time the enemy commeth, he wasteth onely the open ground: but as for those things that lie hidden and buried vnder the earth, they are either vnknowen, or in this respect doe disapoint the enimies, for that they are to be sought for. Pits made in Kent.

From aboue Feuersham, the shoare runneth on, plentifull of shel-fish, but especially oisters, (whereof there are many pits, or stewes) as far as Reculuer, and farther. Reculver. Reculbium.

B This Reculuer, is a place of ancient memory, named in the old English-saxon Reaculf, but in elder times REGVLBIVM. For so it is named, in the Romane Office booke Notitia Prouinciarum; which recordeth that the captain of the primier band of the Vetasians laie heere in garrison vnder the Lieuetenant of the Saxon-shoare: (for so was the sea coast a-long this tract called) who had the command then of nine Ports, as the L. Warden now hath of fiue Ports. And verily the Romane Emperours coines digged up there give testimony to this antiquity of the place: In it Aethelbert King of Kent when he had made a grant of Canterbury to Augustine the Monke, built himselfe a Palace, and Bassa an English-Saxon beautified it with a Monastery, out of which Brightwald the Eighth Archbishop of Canterbury was elected. Of this Monastery, or Minster it was named Raculf-Minster, what time as Edred brother to King Edward the Elder gaue it to Christ-church in Canterbury. Howbeit, at this day it is nothing else but an uplandish country towne, and if it be of any name, it hath it for the salt sauory Oisters there dredged, and for that Minster, the steeples whereof shooting vp their lofty spires stand the Mariners in good stead, as markes, whereby they avoid certaine sands and shelues in the mouth of the Tamis. For, as he * verifieth in his Philippeis.

C

* Hadrianus Iunius.

Cernit oloriferum Tamisim sua Doridi amara.
Flumina miscentem——

D It now beholds swann-breading Tamis, where he doth mix his streame
With brackish sea—— Stour riuer.

Now are we come to the Isle Tanet, which the riuer Stour, by Bede named Wantsum, seuereth from the firme land by a small chanell running betweene, which riuer made of two diuers riuerets in the woodland country called the Weald, so soone as it goeth in one entire streame, visiteth Ashford and Wye, two prety Mercat towns well knowen: Either of them had sometimes their seuerall Colledges of Priests: the one built by Iohn Kemp Archbishop of Canterbury, who was there borne: the other to wit of Ashford, by Sir R. Fogge knight. Wye also had a speciall fountaine, into which God infused a wonderfull gift and vertue at the instant praier of Eustace a Norman Abbot, if we may beleeue Roger of Houeden, whom I would advise you to haue recourse vnto if you take delight in such like miracles. (As how the blinde by drinking thereof recouered sight, the dumbe their speech, the deafe their hearing, the lame their limmes. And how a woman possessed with the deuill, sipping thereof vomited two toades which immediatly were first transformed into huge blacke dogs, and againe into asses; and much more no lesse strange than ridiculous; which some in that age as easily beleeued, as others falsly forged. Thence the Stour leauing East-well the inhabitation of the family of the Finches, worshipfull of it selfe, and by descent from Philip Belknap, and Peoplesham, goeth on to Chilham, or, as others call it Iulham, where are the ruines of an old Castle, which one Fulbert of Douer is reported to haue built; whose issue male soone failed; and ended in a daughter inheritrice, whom Richard the base sonne of King Iohn tooke to wife, and had with her this Castle and the lands thereto belonging: Of her he begat two daughters; namely Lora the wife of William Marmion, and Isabell wife first to David of Strathbolgi Earle of Athole in Scotland, afterward to Sir Alexander Baliol who was called Page 4157. Afford. Wie. Chilham. Fulbert of Dover.

E F

called to Parliament by the name of Lord of Chilham: and mother to that Iohn Earle A 1306. of Athole, who being condemned oftentimes for treason was hanged at the last upon a gibbet fifty foot high (as the King commanded because he might be so much the more conspicuous in mens eies, as he was of higher and noblet birth) and being cut downe halfe aliue, had his head smitten off, and the truncke of his body throwen into the fire, a very cruell kinde of punishment and seldome seene among vs. And after his goods were confiscat, King Edward the first bounteously bestowed this castle
* Fel.borough. together with * Felebergh Hundred upon Sir Bartholomew Baalsmer; who likewise quickly lost the same, for his treason, as I have before related. There is a constant
As we call Iuliana, Gilian. report among the inhabitants, that Iulius Cæsar in his second voiage against the Britans B encamped at this Chilham, and that thereof it was called * Iulham, that is, Iulius his Mansion: and if I be not deceiued, they haue the truth on their side. For heere about it was when at his second remove, he in his march staied upon the intelligence that his ships were sore weather-beaten, and thereupon returned and left his army encamped tenne daies while he rigged and repaired the decaies of his Nauy. And in his march from hence was encountered sharply by the Britans, and lost with many o-
Laberius Durus a Tribune. ther Laberius Durus a Marshall of the field. A little beneath this towne there is a prety hillocke to be seene apparelled in a fresh suit of greene sord, where men say, many yeeres agoe one Iullaber was enterred, whom some dreame to haue beene a Giant, others, a Witch. But I conceiuing an opinion that some antiquity lieth hidden under that name, doe almost perswade my selfe, that the foresaid Laberius was heere buried, and so that the said hillocke became named Iul-laber. C

Fiue miles from hence the river Stoure dividing his Chanell, runneth swiftly by Durovernum. * Welch. DVROVERNVM the chiefe Cittie of this Countie and giveth it his name. For Durwhern in the * British tongue signifieth a swift river: Ptolome calleth it in steed of Durovernum, DARVERNVM, Bede and others DOROBERNIA, the English Saxans Cant-paja-by pig, that is, The Kentishmens cittie: Ninnius and the Britans Caer
Canterbury. Kent, that is, the Cittie of Kent, wee, Canterbury, and the later writers in Latine Cantuaria. A right antient citie this is, and famous, no doubt in the Romans time: not ouer great (as William of Malmesbury said, 400. years since) nor verie small: much renowned both for the situation, and exceeding fertility of the soile adioining, as also for the walles whole and undecaied enclosing it round about, by reason likewise of the rivers watering it, and commodiousnesse of woods there about; besides the vicinty of the sea, yeelding store of fish to serue it. Whiles the Saxons Heptarchie flourished, it was the head cittie of Augustine the Apostle of the Englishmen. the kingdome of Kent and the kings seat; untill such time as king Ethelbert passed a grant of it together with the roialty therof unto Augustine the Apostle as they called him, and consecrated Archbishop of the English Nation; who established heere his habitation for him selfe and his successours. And albeit the Metropolitan dignity, together with the honour of the Pall (that is an Episcopall vestiment that was comming pall— v. 4 Iustit. 339. v. pth 4. 704. over the shoulders, made of a sheepe skin, in memoriall of him that sought the stray sheepe, and having found the same laid it upon his shoulders; wrought and Pall what it is. embrodered with crosses, first laied upon Saint Peters coffin or shrine) was ordeined by Saint Gregorie the Great then Pope, to bee at London; yet for the honour of Augustine it was translated hither. For, Kenulph King of the Mercians thus writeth Anno. 7093. into Pope Leo. Because Augustine of blessed Memorie, the minister of Gods word into the English Nation, and who most gloriously gouerned the Churches of English Saxonie, departed this life in the Cittie of Canterburie, and his bodie was there buried in the Minster of Saint Peter Prince of the Apostles, the which Laurence his successours consecrated, it hath pleased all the wise men of our nation, that the Metropolitane honour should bee conferred upon that Cittie where his bodie was entombed, who engraffed in these parts the veritie of Christian faith. But whether the Archbishops See and Metropolitan dignity were heere ordeined by authority of the wise men of our nation (that is to say) the States of the Parliament, (to speake according to our time) or by Augustine him selfe whiles hee lived, as others would haue it: the Bishops of Rome, who euer followed established the same so, as they decreed; That it should serue and stand vnremoued from thence

was

A was an abominable act punishable with Curse and hell-fire. Since which time, it is incredible, how much it hath flourished, in regard both of the Archipiscopal dignity, and also of that schoole of the better kind of literature which Theodore the seaventh archbishop erected there. And albeit it was sore shaken with the Danish wars, and consumed for a great part thereof sundrie times by casualtie of fire, yet rose it up alwaies againe more beautifull and glorious then before.

After the Normans entrie into this land when King William Rufus, as it was recorded in the Register of Saint Augustines Abbay, *Had given the City of Canterbury wholie in * fe simple unto the Bishops, which before time they had held at the Kings courtesey*
B onelie, it begun not onelie to get heart againe, what through the fame of the religious pietie of godly men there, and what through the bounty of the Bishops, and especially of Simon Sudbury, who rebuilt up the walls new; but grew also as it were upon a sodaine to such a state, that for beauty of private dwelling houses it equalled all the cities of Britaine, but for the magnificent and sumpteous building of religious places and the number of them, it surpassed even those that were most famous. Among which, two especially surmounted all; Christs-church and Saint Augustines, both of them repleniſhed with monkes of the order of Saint Benet. And as for Christ-church, it raiseth it selfe aloft neare the heart of the Citie, with so great a maiestie and statelinesse, that it striketh a sensible impression of religion into their
C mindes that behold it a farre off. This church built in old time, as Bede saith, by the faithfull and beleeving Romanes; the same Augustine of whom I spake, got into his hands, consecrated it to Christ, and assigned it to bee the seat for his successors: wherein 73. Archbishops in a continued traine of succession have now set. Of whom Lanfranke, and William Corboyl brought the upper part of the Church, and they that succeeded, the nethermore, (where as that the more antient worke had beene consumed with fire) to that statelinesse which now we see not without exceeding great charges, which a devout perswasion in former times willingly disbursed. For, a number of high, of low, and of meane degree flocked hither in pilgrimage with very great and rich oblations to visit the tombe of Thomas Becket the Archbishop:
D who being slaine in this Church by Courtiers, for that in maintaining of the Ecclesiasticall liberties, he had stubburnly opposed himselfe against the King, was matriculated a holy Martire by the Bishop of Rome, and worshipped as a Saint, and his shrine so looden with great offrings, that the meanest part of it, was of pure gold, So bright, so shining and glittering, as Erasmus (who saw it (saith, was every corner, with rare and exceeding big pretious stons: yea and the Church all round about did abound with more than princelike riches: and as though Christs name to whom it was dedicated, had beene quite forgotten, it came to be called Saint Thomas Church. Neither was it for any thing else so famous, as for his memoriall and sepulture, although it may justly vaunt of many famous mens tombs and monuments: especially, that of Edward sur-E named The Blacke Prince of Wales, a most worthy and renowned Knight for warlicke prowesse, and the very wonder of his age: also of Henrie the Fourth, a most puissant King of England. But Henrie the Eight scattered this welth heaped up together in so many ages, and dispersed those Monkes: in lieu of whom were placed in this Christs-Church, a Dean, an Archdeacon, Prebendaries twelve, and Six Preachers who in places adjoining round about should teach and preach the word of God. The other Church that alwaies mightily strove with this for superiority, stood by the Cities side Eastward, knowen by the name of Saint Austines: which Augustine himselfe and King Ethelbert at his exhortation, founded and dedicated to Saint Peter and Paule: that it might be the Sepulture place, both for the Kings of Kent and also for F the Archbishops; (For, as yet it was not lawfull to bury within Cities) and endowed it with infinite richesse, granting unto the Abbat a mint house-with priviledge to coine money. And now, at this day, notwithstanding the greatest part thereof is buried under his owne ruins, and the rest was converted to the Kings house, yet it sheweth manifestly to the beholders how great a thing it was, Augustine himselfe was entered in the porch of the same, with this Epitaph, as witnesseth Thomas Spot.

Inclytus

Digitized by Google

Inclytus Anglorum præsul pius, & decus altum,
Hic Augustinus requiescit corpore sanctus.

The bodie of Saint Augustine doth heere enterred lie:
A prelate great, deuout also, and Englands honor hie.

But, as Bede reporteth, who rather is to be credited, this was the more ancient Inscription of his tombe.

HIC REQVIESCIT DOMINVS AVGVSTINVS DOROVERNENSIS ARCHIEPISCOPVS PRIMVS, QVI OLIM HVC A BEATO GREGORIO ROMANAE VRBIS PONTIFICE DIRECTVS, ET A DEO OPERATIONE MIRACVLORVM SVFFVLTVS, ET ETHELBERTHVM REGEM AC GENTEM ILLIVS AB IDOLORVM CVLTV AD FIDEM CHRISTI PERDVXIT, ET COMPLETIS IN PACE DIEBVS OFFICII SVI DEFVNCTVS EST SEPTIMO KALENDAS IVNIAS, EODEM REGE REGNANTE.

HERE RESTETH DAN. AVGVSTINE, THE FIRST ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBVRY: VVHO BEING IN TIMES PAST DIRECTED HITHER FROM BLESSED GREGORIE THE BISHOP OF ROME, AND THROVGH THE VVORKING OF MIRACLES SVPPORTED BY GOD, BOTH BROVGHT KING ETHELBERT AND HIS PEOPLE FROM IDOLATRY TO THE FAITH OF CRIST, AND ALSO AFTER THE DAIES OF HIS FVNCTION ACCOMPLISHED IN PEACE, DIED THE SEAVENTH DAY BEFORE THE KALENDS OF IVNE, IN THE SAME KINGS REIGNE.

Together with him in the same porch were buried six Archbishops next succeeding, and in memoriall of these seuen namely, Austen, Laurence, Mellitus, Iustus, Honorius, Deus-dedit, and Theodosius, were these verses (such as they are) engraven there in marble:

SEPTEM SVNT ANGLIS PRIMATES ET PROTOPATRES, SEPTEM RECTORES, SEPTEM COELOQVE TRIONES;
SEPTEM CISTERNAE VITAE, SEPTEMQVE LVCERNAE; ET SEPTEM PALMAE REGNI, SEPTEMQVE CORONAE, SEPTEM SVNT STELLAE, QVAS HAEC TENET ARCA CELLAE.

Seven Patriachs of England, Primates seven:
Seven Rectors, and seven Labourers in heaven.
Seven Cesternes pure of life, seven Lamps of light
Seven Palmes, and of this realme seven Crownes full bright, Seven Starres, are heere bestow'd in vault below.

I may not forget another Church neere unto this, built as Bede saith, by the Romans and consecrated to Saint Martin, wherein, before Austens comming, Bertha wife to King Ethelbert, descended from the bloud Roiall of France was wont to frequent diuine Christian seruice. Concerning the Castle on the South side of the Citie, the Bulwarks whereof now are decaied, it maketh no shew of any great antiquity, and there is no memorable thing therof come to my knowledge, but only that it was built by the Normans: as touching the dignity of the See of Canterburie, which in times past carried a great State, I will say nothing but this, that, as in former ages, during the Romane Hierarchie, the Archbishops of Canterbury were Primates of all Britaine, Legates to the Pope, and as Vrbane the second said, The Patriarches, as it were, of another world: so when the Popes authority was abrogated, a decree passed in the Synode. Anno, 15[illegible]4, that laying a side the said title, they should be stiled Primates and Metropolitanes of all England. Which dignity the right reverend Father in Christ D. Iohn Whitgift lately held, who deuoutly consecrated both his whole life to God, & all his painfull labours to the Church, and in the yeere 1604. slept in the Lord a Prelate

A late much missed of all good men: After whom succeeded Doctor Richard Bancroft, a man of singular courage and counsaile, in establishing and supporting the state Ecclesiasticall. For the Latitude of Canterbury, the Pole Arctick is elevated aboue the Horizon there fifty one degrees and sixteene minutes, and the Longitude is reckoned to bee foure and twenty degrees, and fifty one minutes.

Stour by this time having gathered his waters all into one streame runneth beside Hackington, where Dame Lora Countesse of Leicester, a most honorable Ladie in those daies, having abandoned all wordly pleasures, sequestred her self from the world deuoutly, to serue God wholy. Afore which time Balsin Archbishop of Canterbury begunne a church there in the honour of Saint Stephen, and
B Thomas of Canterbury. But beeing inhabited by the Bishop of Rome his authority, for feare the same might preiudice the Monkes of Canterburie, hee gaue ouer the workes, Howbeit ever since, the name remained and the place is called Saint Stephens: of which Sir Roger Manwood knight L. cheife Baron of the Exchequer, a man of exquisite knowledge in our common lawes, (unto whom for his bounteous liberallity the poore inhabitants are much beholden) was of late time a right great ornament: and even so is his son at this day Sir Peter Manwood knight of the Bath, whom I cannot but mention when as hee is a fauorer of vertue, and learning. From thence Stour passeth by Fordich (called the little Burough of Forewich in King William the Coquerours booke) a place of note for excellent good trouts; & so in former
C time to Stoure-mouth; which it hath now forsaken a mile, and more; yet left and bequethed his name to it. But now by Stoure mouth runneth a brooke which issuing out of Saint Eadburghs well at Liming (where the daughter to King Ethelbert first of our nation tooke the veile) while it seeketh the sea, seeth Elham a mercat towne of which I haue read nothing, but that the Mannour was the inheritance of Iulian Leibourn a Ladie of great honour in her time, who was mother of Laurence Hastings first Earle of Penbroke of that surname, & after wife to William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon. Then it holdeth his course by diverse villages, which therof receiue the addition of Bourn, as Bishops-bourn, Hawles-bourn, Patricks-bourn, and Beakes-bourn. This D bourne is that river Stoure as Cæsar calleth it (as I haue obserued trauailing lately in these parts) which Cæsar came vnto, when he had marched by night almost twelue Italian miles from the sea-coast, and where hee had the first encounter, in his second expedition into Britaine; with the Britans, whome hee draue into the woods, where they had a place fortified both by nature, and mens labour, with a number of trees hewen downe and plashed to fore-close the entries, But yet the Romans forced an entrie, draue them out, and there about encamped. The place of campe as I heare, is neare Hardes, a place of ancient Gentlemen of that surname, descended from Esten graue, Herengod, and the Fitz-Bernards.)

Below Stoure-mouth, Stoure dividing his streame taketh two seuerall waies, and I leaving that name is called In-lade and Wantsume, making the Isle of Tenet on the West and South side: for on all other sides it is washed with the maine Sea. This Iland Solinus named ATHANATON, and in other copies THANATON: the Britans Iuis Ruhin, as witnesseth Asserius: happily, for Rhutupin, of Rhutupinæ a Citie adjoining. The English Saxons called it Tanet, and Tanetland, and we Tenet. All the Isle standeth upon a whitish maile, ful of goodly corne fields, and being a right fertile soile, carrieth in length eight miles, and foure in Bredth: reckoned in old time to containe 600. * Families: in steede whereof, it is corruply read in Bede Millarium Sexcentarum, for, Familiarum Sexcentarum. But whereas Solinus writeth that there is not a snake creeping in this Isle, and that the mould or earth carried from hence killeth snakes, it
F is now proued to bee vntrue. That Etymologie therefore derived ἀπὸ θανάτου, that is, from the death of snakes, falleth quite to the ground. Here the English Saxons landed first: here by the permission of Guortigern they first seated them selves: here was their place of refuge; and here Guortimor the Britan made a great slaughter of them: when, at Lapis Tituli, (for so is that place named in Nennius which we now call Stouar almost in the same sense, and haven certeinely it was) hee put them to flight Hackington.

Saint Stephens.

Fordich.

The first English Name.

Elham.

Inq. 2. E. 3.

Hardes.

* Hides in English. An hides as it is thought consisteth of an hundred acres, called it latine in old time, Familia, Mansa and Manens. Lapis tituli.

Digitized by Google

flight and forced them with all the ſpeed they might to take their Pinnaces. A

In which place alſo, he gaue commandement, ſaith hee, that him ſelfe ſhould be buried to repreſſe thereby, as hee thought, the furious outrages of the Engliſh Saxons: in like ſort as Scipio Africanus did, who commanded that his tombe ſhould bee
Now Eſſet. ſo ſet, as that it might looke toward Africa: ſuppoſing that his verie tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. Here alſo at Wipped fleet, (ſo called of Wipped the Saxon there ſlaine) Hengeſt diſcomfited the Britans and put them to flight, after he had ſore tired them with ſundry conflicts. S. Auſtin our Apoſtle (as they call him) many yeares after landed in this Iſle, unto whoſe bleſſing the credulous Clergie aſcribed the plentifull fertility of the country: and the Monke Gotceline cried out in this maner: B

596. O the Land of Tenet, happy by reaſon of her fertility, but moſt happy for receiuing and entertaining ſo many Diuine in-commers bringing God with them, or rather ſo many heauenly citizens. Egbert the third King of the Kentiſh-men to pacifie dame Domneua a deuout Lady, whom before time he had exceeding much wronged, granted heere a faire peece of land, wherein ſhe erected a Monaſtery for 70. veiled virgins: the prioreſſe whereof was Mildred, for her holineſſe canonized a Saint, and the Kings of Kent beſtowed many faire poſſeſſions upon it, but Withred eſpecially, who (that I may note the antiquity and maner of liuery of Seiſin in that age out of the very forme of his owne Donation) For the full complement of his confirmation thereof, laied upon the holy altar a turfe of that ground which he gaue at Humantun. Heere afterward ſundry C

1217. times arrived the Danes who piteouſly empoueriſhed this Iland by robbings and pillages, and alſo polluted this Monaſtery of Domneua with all kinde of cruelty, that it flouriſhed not againe before the Normans gouernment. Heere alſo landed Lewis of France, who called in by the tumultuous Barons of England againſt King Iohn, publiſhed by their inſtigation a pretended right to the Crowne of England. For that whereas King Iohn for his notorious treaſon againſt King Richard his brother abſent in the Holy-land, was by his Peeres lawfully condemned, and therefore after the death of King Richard the right of the Crowne was deuolued to the Queene of Caſtile ſiſter to the ſaid King Richard; and that ſhee and her heires had conueied ouer their right to the ſaid Lewis, and his wife her daughter: Alſo that King Iohn had D forfeited his Kindome both by the murther of his Nephew Arthur, whereof he was found guilty by his Peeres in France, and alſo by ſubiecting his Kingdoms which were alwaies, free to the Pope, as much as in him lay, contrary to his oath at his Coronation, and that without the conſent of the Peeres of the realme, &c. Which I leaue to Hiſtorians, with the ſucceſſe of his expedition, leaſt I might ſeeme to digreſſe extraordinarily.

Neither muſt I paſſe over heere in ſilence, that which maketh for the ſingular praiſe of the inhabitants of Tenet, thoſe eſpecially which dwell by the roads or harboroughs of Margat, Ramſgate and Brodſtear. For, they are paſſing induſtrious, and E as if they were Amphibij, that is, both land creatures, and ſea-creatures, get their liuing both by ſea and land, as one would ſay with both theſe elements: they be Fiſher-men and Plough-men: as well Husband-men as Mariners: and they that hold the plough-taile in earing the ground, the ſame hold the helme in ſteering the ſhip. According to the ſeaſon of the yeare, they knit nets, they fiſh for Cods, Herrings, Mackarels, &c. they ſaile, and carry foorth Merchandiſe. The ſame againe dung and mannure their grounds, Plough, Sow, harrow, reape their Corne and they inne it. Men moſt ready and well appointed both for ſea and land: and thus goe they round and keepe a circle in theſe their labours. Furthermore whereas that otherwhiles there happen ſhipwrackes heere, (for there lie full againſt the ſhore thoſe dangerous flats, ſhallowes, ſhelves, and ſands, ſo much feared of Sailers, which they uſe to call, The Goodwin ſands, The Brakes, The four-foots, The whitdick &c.) theſe men are wont to be-Rhutupia. ſtir themſelues luſtily in recouering both ſhips, men, and Marchandiſe endangered.
Portus Trutulenſis. At the mouth of Wantſum Southward, (which men thinke hath changed his chanell) ouer againſt the Iſle ſtood a City, which Ptolome calleth RHVTVPIAE, Tacitus, PORTVS TRVTVLENSIS, for Rhutupenſis, if Beatus Rhenanus coniectureth truely:

Digitized by Google

A tnely: Antonine, RHITVPIS PORTVS, Ammianus Marcellinus, RHVTVPIAE STATIO, that is, the Road of Rhutupiæ, Orosius, THE HAVEN and City of Rhutubus: the old English-Saxons as Beda witnesseth, Reptacester, others Ruptimuth, Alfred of Beuerly nameth it Richberge: we at this day, Richborow: Thus hath time sported in varying of one and the same name. Whence this name should arise, it is not for certaine knowen. But seeing the places neere unto it, as Sandwich and Sandiby haue their denomination of Sand: I considering also, that Rhyd Tusith in the British-tongue betokeneth a sandy foord, I would willingly if I durst, derive it from thence. This City seemed to haue beene seated on the descent of an hill, the Castle there
B stood overlooking from an higher place the Ocean which is now so farre excluded by reason of sandy residence inbealched with the tides, that it comes hardly within a mile of it. Right famous and of great name was this City while the Romans ruled here. From hence was the usual passing out of Britan to France & the Neatherlands, at it the Roman fleets arriued, here it was that Lupicinus sent by Constantius* the Emperour into Britaine for to represse the rodes and invasions of Scots and Picts both, landed the Heruli, and Batauians, and Mæsian regiments. Heere also Theodosius the father of Theodosius the Emperour, to whom as Symmachus witnesseth, the Senate decreed for pacifying Britan armed Statues on horse-backe, arrived with his Herculij, Iouij Victores & Fidentes, for these were names of Roman regiments. Afterwards when
C the Saxon Pirates impeached entercourse of merchants and infested our coasts with continual piracies, the Second Legion Augusta, which being remooved by the Emperour Claudius out of Germany had remained many yeares in Garizon at Isca Silurum* in Wales, was translated hither, and had a Provest of their owne heere under the great Lieutenant and Count of the Saxon shore. Which Provostship happily, that Clemens Maximus bare, who being heere in Britan by the soldiers saluted Emperour, slew Gratian, the lawfull Emperour; and was afterwards himselfe slaine by Theodosius at Aquileia: For, this Maximus it was whom Ausonius in the verses of Aquileia, called the Rhutupine roober.

*Caer Leon.

Clemens Maximus.

Maximus armigeri quondam sub nomine lixæ.
D Fœlix quæ tanti spectatrix læta triumphi,
Fudisti Ausonio Rhutupinum Marte latronem.

*See how these verses are englished in pag. 82.

The same Poet also in his Poem Parentalia, preserved the memory of Flauius Sanctus another President or Governour of Rhutupiæ, concerning whom thus hee wrote.

Militiam nullo qui turbine sedulus egit,
Præside lætatus quo Rhutupinus ager.
His marshial service who discharg'd with care without all stur,
And Rutupin reioyce in him, while there he gouerned.

Ausonius likewise in a lamentable funerall verse, setteth forth the praise of Claudi-
E us Contentus his Uncle, who being overtaken with death left behind him unto strangers a mighty stock of money which hee had put out to usury among the Britaines and encreased by interest; and was here also enterred.

There bee that under the name of Rhutupine would haue all Britans to be vnderstood.

Et patruos Elegia meos reminiscere cantus,
Contentum, tellus quem Rhutupina tegit.
My dolefull Muse now call to minde the songs of Unkle mine,
Contentus, who enterred lies within mould Rhutupine.

This Rhutupiæ flourished also after the comming in of the English Saxons. For, writers record, that it was the Roiall Palace of Ethelbert King of Kent; and Bede gaue it the name of a City. But ever since, it beganne to decay: neither is the name of it
F read in any place afterward, as farre as I know, but in Alfred of Beverley, who hath put downe in writing, that Alcher with a powre of Kentish-men at this towne, then called Richberge, foiled and defaited the Danes encombered with the spoiles they had before gotten.

Now hath time razed out all the footings and tractes thereof, and to teach vs that Cities as well as men have their fatall periods, it is a verie field at this daie, wherein when the corne is come uppe a man may see the draughts of streetes crossing one another: (For, whersoever the streetes went, there the corne is thinne) which the common people terme Saint Augustins Crosse. And there remaine onelie certaine walles of a Castle of rough flinte, and long Britan brickes in forme of a quadrant, and the same cemented with lime, and a most stiffe binding sand, mightily strengthened by tract of time, so that the cement is as hard as the stone. Over the entrie whereof is fixed a head of a personage engraven in stone, some say it was Queene Berthas head, but I take it to bee a Romane worke. A man would deeme this to haue beene the Citadell or keepe of the City, it stands on such a height over-looking the low grounds in Tenet, which the Ocean by little and little shrinking away hath now left. Moreover, the plot whereon the Citie stood, being now plowghed up, doth oftentimes discover peeces of Romane coines as well gold silver, evident tokens of the antiquity thereof: and a little beneath shee sheweth a daughter of hers, which the Englisn Saxons of sand called Sondpic, and wee, Sandwich. This beeing one of the Cinque-ports, as they terme them, is on the North and West side, fortified with walles and on other parts fensed with a rampier, river and ditch. The haven by reason of sand choaking it, and a great shippe of burden belonging to Pope Paule the Fourth, which was accidentalie sunke in the verie chanell thereof, is not deepe enough to beare any tall vesells.

Digitized by Google

Sandwich.

In auncient times it sundrie times felt the furious forces of the Danes, afterward King Canutus the Dane when hee had gained the Crowne of England, bestowed it upon Christs-Church in Canterburie with the roialtie of the water on each side, so farre forth as a shippe beeing a floate, a man might cast a Danish hatchet out of the vessell to the banke. In the Normane raigne it was reckoned one of the Cinque ports, and to finde fiue shippes. In the yeare 1217. Lewis of France of whom wee spake lately, burned it. King Edward the first for a time placed heere the staple, and King Edward the Third by exchange reunited it to the Crowne. About which time there flourished heere a familie surnamed De Sandwico, which had matched with one of the heire of Creue-cur, and Daurenches, Lord of Folkestone, and deserved well of this place. In the time of King Henrie the Sixth it was burned by the French. In our daies Sir Roger Manwood chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, natiue of this place, built, and endowed heere a free-schoole, and the Netherlanders haue bettered the towne by making, and trading of Baies, Saies and other commodities.

Escaetria. 23. E. 3. p. 2.

Beneath Rhutupiæ, Ptolomee placeth the Promontorie CANTIVM as the utmost cape of this Angle, which in some copies is corruptly written NVCANTIVM and ACANTIVM: Diodorus as corruptly calleth it CARION, and we at this day the Foreland of Kent. Now all these shores on every side, are of this Rhutupiæ by the Poets termed Rhutupinæ littora. Hence it is, that Iuvenall satyrically inveighing against Curtius Montanus a dainty and delicious glutton, speaking of oysters carried from this shore to Rome, hath these verses.

Cantium the Promontory.

The Foreland.

— nulli major fuit vsus edendi
Tempestate meâ, Circais nata forent, an Lucrinum ad saxum, Rhutupinóue adita fundo
Ostrea, callebat primo deprendere morsu.

None in my time had more use of his tooth,
Whence oisters came, where they were bred, full well
He knew: at Circeie cape, at Lucrine rock, for sooth,
Or Rhutup * coast, at first bit he could tell.

* British sea:

And Lucan the Poet.

Aut vagatùm Thetis, Rhutupináque littora feruent.

Or when unconstant waving sea, and British shores doe * rage.

* Or boyle.

From this Fore-land aforesaid, the shore runneth on Southward for certaine miles together, indented with a continued raunge of many hilles mounting up. But when

Digitized by Google

A when it is come as farre as Sandon (that it to say the Downe of Sand), and to Deale, and Walmer three Neighbour Castles, which King Henrie the Eighth within the remembrance of our Fathers built, it setleth low, and in a flat and open plaine lieth full against the sea. At this Deale, or Dole: as Ninnius calleth it (and that truelie in mine opinion): For, our Britans at this daie doe so terme a plaine lying low and open upon sea or river) the constant report goes that Iulius Cæsar did arrive: and Ninnius avoucheth as much, who in barbarous Latine wrote thus, Cæsar ad Dole bellum pugnavit, that is, At Dole Cæsar fought a battaile. A Table likewise set uppe in Dover Castle confirmeth the same: yea and Cæsar him selfe ve-
B rifieth it: who reporteth that hee landed upon an open and plaine shore, and that the Britans welcomed and received him with a hote and daungerous encounter. Whereupon, our Country man Leland in his Swans song

Iacet at Dela novas celebris arces, Notus Cæsareis locus trophæis.
Deale famed much, vants of new turrets hie,
A place well knowne by Cæsars victorie.

Sandon. Deale. where Cæsar arrived.

For hee, (give mee leaue I pray you to digresse a while out of my course) having, (as Pomponius Sabinus reporteth out of Seneca) wonne all that was to bee gotten by sea and land, cast his eye to the Ocean, and as if the Romane world
C would not suffice him, bethought him selfe upon another world: and with a fleete of a thousand saile (for so writeth Athenæus out of Cotas, either to bee revenged of the Britans who ayded the Gaules, (as Strabo saith); or in hope of British pearles, as Suetonius reporteth: or inflamed with an ambitious desire of glorie, as others doe record, in the yeare before Christs nativitie fiftie foure, and once againe in the yeare ensuing, entred into Britan: having before hand sounded the havens by his espialles, as Suetonius, and himselfe doth testifie; and not, as Roger Bachon fableth, by setting certaine looking glasses upon the coast of Gaule, and by Art perspectiue, which by reflexion multiplieth hidden formes. What hee exploited heere, himselfe hath at large delivered in his Commentaries; and I likewise before haue summarily abridged out of him, and the writings of Suetonius concerning Scæva,
D whose valourous service during the civill warre was notablie seene aboue others at Dyrrachium: and whom our Poet Ioseph of Excester in his Antiocheis, and namelie in these his verses touching Britan, reported (I know not how truely) to haue beene a Britan borne.

Cæsars entry into Britanny.

In his booke de Arte et Natura.

Hinc et Scæva satus, pars non obscura tumultus
Civilis, MAGNVM solus qui mole solutâ
Obsedit, melior q; steterit pro Cæsare murus.
Here borne also was Scæva, he that bare no little sway
In all these civill broiles; the Fort that stood full in his way
E Alone hee brake, Pompey besieged, was Cæsars strongest stay.

But what were the exploites of Cæsar in this our country, learne you may of himselfe, and out of that which hath before beene written. For, neither as yet, haue I met with that old father a Britan, whom Marcus Aper, as wee read in Quintilian, saw in this Island; who avowed that hee was present at the battaile, in which they assaied to keepe Cæsar from landing, when hee came to warre upon them: neither is it any part of my meaning now to write an Historie, but a Topographie.

See page 34. 35. &c.

Upon this shore, lie out with a long traine certaine heapes in manner of bankes or rampiers, which some imagine that the winde swept up togither. But I suppose them to haue beene a fense and countermure, or rather the Ship-camp, which Cæsar
F raised with tenne daies and as many nights labour, to haile up thereto his sea-beatten and shaken Nauie, and to defend it, both against tempests and also the Britans, who in vaine did assaile it.

Castra naualia. Cæsars ship-camp.

For, I understand by relation of the dwellers thereby, that this rampier is called Romes-worke; as if it were A worke of the Romanes. And so much the rather beleeue I, that Cæsar arrived heere, because hee writeth, that seaven miles from hence, (for, so wee reade in the auncient bookes, corrected by Flavius Constantinus a man of Consul degree) the sea is kept in and compassed with such streight mountains that from the higher places a dart may be flung to the very shore: verily as soone as we are past Deale, a mighty ridge of steepe high Cliffs, Cicero termeth them moles magnificas, that is, Stately cliffes bringing forth Sampier in great plenty, runneth for seaven miles or there about, as far as to Dover: where it openeth it selfe: and of that nature is the place, that, right as Cæsar writeth, betweene two hills it letteth in and encloseth the sea. Within this partition and seperation of the Clyffes lieth DVBRIS, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth, the Saxons name it Dofpa, and wee Dover. This name was given unto it, as Darell out of Eadmer writeth, because the place was shut uppe and hard to come unto. For, when as, (saith hee) in ancient times the sea there harborous, spred it selfe upon urgent necessity to make it a more commodious haven, they kept it in with more streight bounds. Howbeit, William Lambard, with more probability fetched the reason of this name from the word Dufyrrha, which in the British language betokeneth a place steepe and upright.

Digitized by Google

Dubris. Dover. Darell.

The towne which is seated betweene high clyffs (whereas some-time the haven was, when the sea more insinuated it selfe, as wee collect by the anchors and ship planks that are digged there up) is more famous for the commodiousnesse of the haven, (such as it is) and for readie passage into France, than for any elegancie, or great trade. For it is a place of passage of all other most haunted, and it was provided in old time by a speciall Statute, that no man going forth of the realme in pilgrimage, should els where embark and take sea: more-over it is reckoned one of the Cinque-ports, and in times past it was charged to furnish and set out one and twenty ships unto the warres, in the same maner and forme as Hastings did, whereof I haue already spoken. Toward the sea (now somewhat excluded by Beach) it was fenced with a wall; whereof some part as yet standeth. It had a faire church consecrated unto Sant Martin, founded by Whitred King of Kent, an house also of the Knights-Templers, which now are quite gone, and nothing to bee seene of them: It yeeldeth like-wise a seat for the Archbishop of Canterburies Saffragans, who when the Archbishop is busied in weightier affaires, manageth for him matters that pertaine to Orders onelie, and not to the Episcopall iurisdiction. From the toppe of a rough and craggie cliffe which mounteth up to a wonderfull height, where it looketh downe to the sea, a most stately castle like unto a pretie Citie fortified right stronglie with bul-warkes and many a Tower, over looketh and threatneth after a sort the sea vnder it: Mathew of Paris calleth it the Key and Locke, The Barre and Sparre of England. The common sort of people dreameth, that it was built by Iulius Cæsar, and verilie I suppose by the British Bricks in the Chappell there, that it was built by the Romans, who used such in their great buildings. What time as the Romane Empire declined, they placed heere a band or companie of the Tungricanes, who are accounted among the Aides-Palatine: out of whose armourie and munition happilie were those bigge arrowes, which the Castellanes doe now shew for wonders, and were wont to bee discharged then and manie yeares after, before the invention of great Ordinance, out of engines called Balista like huge crosse-bowes bent by force of two or foure men.

In Suffex. 4. 3. 8.

Suffragane to the Archbishop of Canterburie.

A band of the Tungricanes.

From the entrance of the English Saxons into this land, unto the expiration of their Kingdome, no where could I as yet reade so much as one bare worde of this Castle or the Towne; save onelie in certaine by-notes out of a Table, that was heere hanged uppon a wall; which reported that Cæsar, having arrived at Deale, and discomfited the Britans at Barandowne, which is a plaine adjoyning, fitte for horse fight and meete to embattaile an armie in, beganne the Castle of Dover; and that Arviragus afterward fortified it against the Romans, and stopped up the haven. Also, that after him King Arthur and his knights, vanquished I wot not what rebells heere. Howbeit a little before the Normans comming in, it was reputed the onelie defense and strength of England: and for that cause William Duke

of

Digitized by Google

A of Normandie, bound Harold by an oath to deliver up into his hands this Caſtle together with the well, what time as he aſpired to the Kingdome: and after hee had ſetled his eſtate and affaires at London, thought it good before all other things to fortifie this peece and to aſſigne faire lands in Kent unto Gentlemen to be held in Caſtle-gard, with this condition to be in readineſſe with certaine numbers of men for defenſe of the ſame: which ſervice notwithſtanding at this day is redeemed with a yeerely paiment of money. For, when Sir Hubert de Burgh was Conſtable of this Caſtle, (to uſe the words of an old writer) he weighing with himſelfe that it was not ſafe for the Caſtle to have every moneth new warders for the Caſtle-gard, procured by the aſſent of B the King and all that held of that Caſtle, that every one ſhould ſend for the ward of one moneth tenne ſhillings: and that therewith certaine men elect and ſworne, as well horſe as foote, ſhould be waged, for to gard the Caſtle. It is written, that Philip ſurnamed Auguſtus King of France, when Lewis his ſonne, went about to gaine the Crowne of England, had wonne certaine Cities and Forts, and could not get this, being manfully defended by the ſaid Sir Hubert de Burgh: ſaid thus. Verily my ſonne hath not one foote of land in England, vntill he be Maiſter of Dover Caſtle: as being in very deed the ſtrongeſt hold of all England and moſt commodious for the French. Upon the other cliffe which ſtandeth over againſt it, and beareth up his head, in maner, even with it, are extant the remaines of a very auntient building. One, I know not upon what rea- C ſon induced, ſaid it was Ceſars Altar. But Iohn Twin of Canterbury a learned old man, who in his youth ſaw a great part thereof ſtanding whole and entier, aſſured me, that it had beene a Watch-towre to give night light & direction to ſhips. Like as there ſtood another oppoſite unto it at Bologne in France, erected there by the Romanes, and long after reedified by Charles the Great (as Regino witneſſeth, in whom Pharum, for Pharum, is falſly read, which at this day the French terme Tour de Order, and the Engliſh, The old man of Bullen. Under this cliffe, Henrie the Eighth, in our fathers daies with exceeding labour and 63000. pounds charges, by pitching huge poſts faſt within the very ſea, and the ſame bound together with yron worke, and heaping thereupon a deale of timber and ſtones, brought up a mighty Pile, which we D call, The Peere, wherein the ſhips might more ſafely ride. But the furious violence of the raging Ocean ſoone overcame the laudable endeauour of that puiſſant Prince, & ſo the frame of this worke beaten continually upon with the waves, became diſioined. For the repaire whereof, Queene Elizabeth laid out a great ſumme of money, and the Autority of Parliament impoſed upon every Engliſh ſhip that carry forth or bring in merchandiſe a certaine toll vpon Tonneage for certaine yeares.

Caſtlegard changed.

This Sea coaſt of Britaine is ſeperated from the Continent of Europe by a frete or ſtreight, where, as ſome ſuppoſe the Seas brake in & made way between the lands. Solinus calleth it Fretum Gallicum, Tacitus, and Ammianus Marcellinus, Fretum Oceani, and Oceanum Fretalem, Gratius the Poet:

E Freta Morinum dubio refluenti ponto.

The narrow Seas on Bollen-coaſt that keepe uncertaine tides.

They of the Netherlands call it Dehofden, of the two Heads or promontories: we the Narrow-ſea, and The ſtrait of Calais, as the Frenchmen, Pas de Callau. For, this is the place as ſaith a Poet of our time.

The ſtreight of Calais or narrow ſea.

——geminiquà ianua ponti
Faucibus anguſtis, latèque frementibus vndis
Gallorum Anglorumque vetat concurrere terras.
Where current of two ſeas
In gullet ſtreight, wherein throughout, their billowes rage and fret
F Keepes France and England ſo a part, as though they neuer met.

The narrow ſea, as Marcellinus truly writeth, ſwelleth at every tide with terrible high flouds, and againe at the ebbe, becometh as flat as a plaine field: if it be not raiſed with winds, & counter-ſeas between & too riſings of the moone it floweth twiſe & ebbeth as oft. For, as the Moone aſcendeth toward the Meridian, and is ſet againe under the Horizon in the iuſt oppoſite point, the Ocean heere ſwelleth mightily and the huge billowes ruſh upon the ſhores with ſo great a noiſe that the Poet might well ſay, Rhutupináq; littora feruent. And Rhutup ſhore, doth boile & billow & D. Paulinus, where he ſpeaketh of the County of Bulloigne, which he termeth the vtmoſt skirt of the world, not without cauſe uſed theſe words, Oceanum barbaris fluctibus frementem, that is, The Ocean raging and roring with barbarous billowes. A

Digitized by Google

Whether Britannie were in time paſt joined unto France.

Heere might ariſe a queſtion beſeeming a learned man that hath wit and time at will, whether, where this narrow ſea runneth between France and Britaine now, there was a narrow banke or necke of land that in times paſt conioined theſe regions, and afterwards being broken either by the generall deluge, or by ruſhing in of the waves, or elſe by occaſion of ſome earthquak, did let in the waters to make a through paſſage. Verily, as no man makes doubt that the face of the whole earth hath beene altered, partly by the ſaid deluge, and partly by long continuance of time and other cauſes: as alſo that Ilands by earthquakes, or the ſhrinking backe of waters were layd and joined unto firme lands: ſo, moſt certainly it appeereth by authors of beſt credite, that Ilands by reaſon of earthquake and the breaking in of waters were ſevered, diſioined, and rent from the Continent. Whereupon Pythagoras in Ovid ſaith thus: B

Vidi ego quod quondam fuerat ſolidiſſima tellus,
Eſſe fretum; vidi factas ex æquore terras.

My ſelfe haue ſeene maine ground ſometime turnd into ſea and ſand, C
And ſeene I haue againe the Sea, became maine ſetled land.

Strabo gathering of things to come by thoſe that are paſt, concluded that ſuch Iſthmi neckes, or narrow bankes of land, both have beene, and ſhall be wrought and pierced through. You ſee, ſaith Seneca, whole regions violently removed from their places, and now to lie beyond the Sea, which lay before bounding vpon it and hard by. You ſee, there is ſeparation made both of Countries and nations, when as ſome part of nature is provoked of it ſelfe: or when the mighty wind beateth ſtrongly upon ſome ſea: the force whereof, as in generall, is wonderfull. For, although it rage but in part, yet it is of the vniuerſall power that it ſo rageth. Thus hath the ſea rent Spaine from the Continent of Africke: Thus by Deucalions flud ſo much ſpoken of by the greateſt Poets, was Sicilie cut D from Italie. And heereupon Virgil wrote thus,

Hæc loca vi quondam, & vaſta conuulſa ruina
(Tantum æui longinqua valet mutare vetuſtas)
Diſſiluiſſe ferunt, cùm protinùs vtraque tellus
Vna foret, venit medio vi pontus & undis,
Heſperium Siculo latus abſcidit, arua q; & urbes
Littore diductas anguſto interluit æſtu.

Theſe lands whilom by violence of bretch and ruins great,
(Such change makes time, and what is it that long time doth not eate?)
A ſunder fell (men ſay) where as they both in one did growe, E
The Seas brake in by force, and through the mids did overthrow Both townes and grounds. And Italie forthwith from Sicilie ſide, Did cut, and them with in-let ſtreight doth ſtill part and devide.

Plinie ſheweth likewiſe of Iſles, that Cypres was rent from Syria, Eubæa, from Boeotia, Besbicus, from Bythynia, being parts before of the maine land: But none of the old writers was ever able to avouch, that Britaine was ſo ſevered from the Maine: onely thoſe verſes of Virgil and Claudian before cited by me in the very firſt entrance into this worke, together with the conjecture of Servius Honoratus doe inſinuate ſo much. And yet, Dominicus Marius Niger, and Maſter John Twin a right learned man, and whoſoever he was that wreſted theſe verſes made of Scilia, unto Britaine, are of this F opinion:

——Britannia quondam
Gallorum pars vna fuit, ſed pontus & æſtus.
Mutauere ſitum, rupit confinia Nereus
Victor: & abſciſſos interluit æquore montes.

Some

Digitized by Google

A ——Some time was Britannie
A part of France. But ſwelling tides on hie
Have changed the ſite: and Nereus he, as Conqueror hath tome
The confines quite, and runs betweene the cliffs a ſunder worne.

Conſidering therefore, that in this matter there is no aſſured ground upon certaine authority; the learned, by laying and comparing the like examples in ſuch narrow Seas as this, for ſearching out of the truth; propoſe theſe and ſuch like points duly to be weighed and conſidered.

First, whether the nature of the ſoile in both ſhores be the ſame; which verily
B is found heere to be even ſo: For the ſhore of either ſide, where the diſtance betweene is narroweſt, riſeth up with lofty cliffes, of the ſame matter, as it were, and colour, ſo as they may ſeeme to have beene riven a ſunder.

Secondly, How great the bredth is of the ſea or ſtreight. Certes, the ſtreights heere is not much broader, than either the ſtreight of Gibraltar, or of Sicilie: to wit, twenty foure miles over: ſo as at the firſt ſight, one would imagine that theſe lands were ſeuered by the billowes of the raging counter-ſeas. For that the land ſunke downeward by earth-quakes, I hardly dare thinke, ſeeing that this our Northren climate of the world is ſeldome ſhaken with earth-quakes, and thoſe when they happen, be never great.

C Thirdly, How deepe the ſtreight is. As the Streight of Sicilie is ſounded in depth 80. paces, ſo this of ours exceedeth not 25. fatham, whereas the ſea on both ſides of it is much deeper.

Fourthly, Of what nature the ground is in the bothoms, ſtony, ſandy, beachy, or elſe oaſy, and muddy. And whether there be beds or ſhelves of ſand lying ſcattered in the ſaid narrow ſea? I haue learned of Sailers that there lieth but *one banke, and the ſame in the very mid-chanell, which at a low water is ſcarce 3. fatham deepe, But within halfe a league to the South-ward it is 27. fatham deepe, and to the North-ward 25.

*Frowen ſhoale.

Laſtly, Whether any place in either of the two ſhores taketh name in the ancient D language, of a breach, a plucking away, diviſion, ſeparation or ſuch like? as Rhegium which ſtandeth upon the Sicilian Streight, is named of the Greeke word Ῥήγνυμι that is, to breake, becauſe in that place, by the violent force of waues Sicilie was broken off from Italie. But thinking, as I doe, heereof, I can meet with none, unleſſe one would ſuppoſe that Vitſan upon the French ſhore, had the name from Gwith, which in the *Brittiſh tongue betokeneth a diuiſion or ſeperation.

*Welch.

They that would haue Britain to have been the very continent of Gaule after that uniuerſall deluge, argue from the wolues, whereof there were many among vs in old time, like as at this day in Scotland and Ireland.

How, ſay they, could there be any of them in Ilands conſidering that all beaſts and E liuing creatures periſhed which were not in the Arke? unleſſe a long time after, the earth had beene paſſable throughout, and no Iſles at all. This queſtion buſied Saint Auguſtine, but unto it he anſwereth thus; Wolues and other beaſts may be thought to haue ſwome over the ſea unto Ilands, yet onely to neare Adioyning ilands, (as ſtags yeerely for their releeſe and food ſwim out of Italy into Sicily). But ſome Iſles there be ſo far remote from maine lands, that it is to be thought no beaſt could ſwim over. If it ſhould be ſaid, men caught them and ſo brought them over with them, it carrieth ſome credit, that this might well haue beene for the delight they had in hunting. Although it cannot be denied but by the commandement or permiſſion of God euen by the worke of Angels they might haue beene tranſported. But if ſo be they ſprung out of the earth according to their firſt
F originall, when as God ſaid, Let the earth bring foorth a liuing ſoule, then it appeareth much more euidently, that all kinde of liuing creatures were in the Arke, not ſo much for the encreaſe and reparation of them, as to *figure out ſundry Nations for the ſacrament of the church, in caſe the earth, brought foorth many creatures in thoſe Ilands, whereto they can not paſſe. Thus Philoſophizeth he. Neither is any man able upon this argument to pronounce any thing more ſufficiently and exquiſitely. For me, it may ſuffice, that I have propounded

De Ciuitate Dei lib. 16. c. 7.

*As a type of the Gentiles calling.

Digitized by Google

propounded thereof, let the Reader thorowly waigh and examine it. And he that is able in this point to see deepest what is most true, verily I will report him a man right skilfull and deepely quick-sighted. A

Morini. On the other side in the Firme-land, inhabited the MORINI, so called in the ancient Gaules tongue, as it were Maritimi, sive Maris accolæ, men dwelling upon the Sea-coast, or hard by the sea. Their country is now tearmed Conte de Guines, and Conte de Bolonois, and had in old time two places of very great name, to wit GESSORIACVM, and ITIVM, * whence, as Cæsar hath recorded, there was the best and most commodious passing out of Gaule or France into Britain, and most authours thinke it was that towne which now they call Callais. But that famous and learned man Hospitalius, Chancellour of France, a very skilfull Antiquary, avoucheth, that Callais is no ancient towne, but was only a smal village, such as the French-men terme Burgades, untill that Philip Earle of Bolen, walled it about, not very many yeares before the English won it. Neither is it red in any place, that men tooke shipping there for Britain, before those times. I thinke therefore that Itium is to be sought some where else: that is to say, below, at Vitlan, neere unto Backnesse, which we call Whitsan, the word sounding not much unlike to Itium. For, that all men crossed ouer out of this Iland thither, and embarked there to saile hither, we observed out of our owne histories: in so much as certaine lands were held in Coperland neere Douer by service to hold the Kings head betweene Dover and Whit-sand when soeuer he crossed the Sea there, And Lewis the younger French King when he came in devout pilgrimage to visit Thomas of Canterbury, besought that saint by way of most humble intercession, that no passinger might miscarry by shhipwarcke betweene Vitsan and Douer; as who would say, that at the same time, that was the vsuall passage to & fro: neither in truth, is this narrow sea else where more streightned: although it is to be supposed, that they who saile betweene, in passing ouer did not respect the neerer way and shorter cut in sailing, but the commodiousnesse of the hauens in the one shoare, and the other. For even so, albeit the sea be narrowest, betweene Blackneesse in France, and the Nesse in England, yet now the ordinary passing is between Dover and Callais: as in former ages, before that Vitsan haven was dammed up, the passage was betweene it and Dover: and before that time, betweene Rhutupiæ and Gessoriacum: From whence Claudius the Emperour and the other captaines, whom I haue spoken of, sailed over into Britaine. This GESSORIACVM, Pliny seemeth to call, Portum Morinorum Britannicum, peradventure for the passage from thence into Britan Ptolomie, in whom it hath crept into the place of Itium, nameth it Gessoriacum Navale, in which signification also our Welsh-Britans commonly tearme it Bowling-long, that is, Bolloine the ship road. B C D

*That is from Itium Portus.

The shortest passage between France and Britan.

Gessoriacum.

For that Gessoriacum was the very same Sea-coast towne, which Ammianus calleth BONONIA, the Frenchmen Bolongne, the Low-country men Beunen, and we Bolen, I dare be bold to aver and maintaine against Hector Boethius, and Turnebus: grounding my assertion both upon the authority of Beatus Rhenanus, who saw an ancient military Map, wherein was written Gessoriacum quod nunc Bononia, that is, Gessoriacum, now called Bolen: and also upon Itinerarie computation, or account of the miles, which answereth just to the distance that Antonine the Emperour hath put downe betweene Ambiani and Gessoriacum. But, that which may serve in steed of all proofes. E

Tabula Peutegeriana, now set forth by M. Welser. Bononia Gallie.

The rablement of Pyrates seruing vnder Carausius, which the Panegirick Oration, pronounced unto Constantins the Emperour, reported to have beene inclosed and shut up within the walles of Gessoriacum and there suppriſed: an other Oration unto Constantius Maximus his sonne, relateth to haue beene vanquished at Bononia: so that Bononia, that is, Bolen, and Gessoriacum must needes be one and the selfe same place: and it may seeme, that the more ancient name was worne out much about that time. For it is not to be surmised, that so grave authors unto the great Princes erred in the setting downe and naming of this place, the memorie thereof being then so fresh, and that victorie so glorious. But, what have I to doe with France? F

Pag. 272. in Basil edition and pag. 251.

Heereby

A Verely, I have the more willingly ripped up the memorie of these matters, for that the prowesse and valour of our Ancestours shewed it selfe often in this coast; as who wonne and wrested both Calais and Bolen from the French. And as for Bolen, they rendred it backe againe at the humble request of the French King after eight yeres, for a summe of money agreed upon. But Callais they held 212. yeere in despite and malgree of the French. Now returne we to Britaine with full sailes in a fauourable tide.

From (Dover, leaving the litle Abbay of Bradsole dedicated to S. Radigund whereof Hugh the first Abbot was founder) there runneth for fiue miles in length a con-
B tinued cheine of chalky cliffes standing in a row, hanging iointly one to another, as far as to Folkstone: which was a flourishing place in times past, as may appeare by the peeces of Romane coine and Britaine brickes daily there found: but under what name, it is uncertaine. Probable it is, that it was one of those towres or holds which in the reigne of Theodosius the younger, the Romans placed for to keep off the Saxons, as Gildas saith, At certaine distances along the shore, in the South part of Britaine.

Famous it was and much frequented by the English Saxons, for religion sake, by reason of a Monasterie that Eanswide daughter to Eadbald King of Kent consecrated there unto Nunnes: But now it is a small village, and the greatest part thereof the Sea hath, as it were, pared away. Howbeit, it was the Baronie of the Familie de Abrincis
C or Aurenches: From whom it came to Sir Hamon Crevequer, and by his daughter to Sir Iohn of Sandwich, whose grand child Iulian by his sonne Iohn, brought the same as her dowry to Iohn Segrave.

From thence, as the shore turneth a front South West-ward Sandgate Castle, built by King Henry the Eighth defendeth the coast, and vpon a Castle hill thereby are seene reliques of an auncient Castle, More inward is Saltwood a Castle of the Bishops of Canterbury which William Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury enlarged. And neere unto it is Osten-hanger, where Sir Edward Baneret a father of many faire bastards, and amongst them of Thomas Lord Poinings Lieftenant of Bollen, began L. Poinings by King Henrie the D to build a stately house but left it vnperfect when death had bereft him of his onely lawfull child which he had by his lawfull wife the daughter of Sir I. Scot his neighbour at Scots-Haul: where the familie of Scots hath lived in worshipfull estimation a long time as descended from Pashely, & Seriean by Pimpe. But to returne to the sea-coast: neere to Sandgat, Hith is situated, one of the Cinque ports, whereof it assumed Hith.
that name, which in the English Saxons tongue signifieth an haven or harbour: although hardly it maintaineth that name now, by reason of sands and the Sea withdrawing it selfe from it. And yet it is not long since it first made any shew, and that by the decay and fall of Westhyth, a neighbour-towne Westward, and which was sometime a Port, untill the Sea in our great grandfathers daies retired from it. So are Sea-townes subiect to the vncertaine vicissitude of the Sea.

E This Hith, like as West-Hith also, had their beginning from ruine of Lime standing hard by, which in times past was a most famous Port towne, untill the sands that the Sea casteth up, had choked and stopped the haven. Both, Antonine and the booke of Notices called it PORTVS LEMANIS, Ptolomee λιμὴν which being in Greeke a significative word, the Copiantes, or Copiers out of old bookes, because they would seeme to supply the defect, wrot it καινος λιμὴν and the Latin Interpreters following them translated it Novus portus, that is, New-port, or New haven: whereas, the proper name of the place was Limen or Leman, like as at this day Lime. Heere the Captaine over a company or band of Turnacenses, kept his station under the Count or F Lieftenant of the Saxon shore. And a Port way paved with stone, called Stonystreet, reacheth from hence toward Canterburie, which one would easily judge to have beene a worke of the Romans, like as the Castle adjoining hard unto it, now named Stutfall, which in the side and descent of a prety hill, tooke up about ten acres of ground in compasse: and the reliques of the wall remaine still of British bricke and flint so close laid and couched together with a kind of strong morter made of lime, sand and pibles, that as yet time hath not given it the check: and now, although it be

Digitized by Google

be not an haven towne, yet it retaineth ſtill no ſmall ſhew of the ancient dignity it had: For heere the Warden of the Cinque Ports at a place called Shipway uſeth to take his ſolemne oath, when he firſt entereth into his office, and heere, upon certaine ſet daies, the cuſtome was to decide cauſes betweene the inhabitants of the ſaid Ports. A

Some haue thought, that in this place a great riuer diſcharged it ſelfe into the ſea, for that one or two writers haue made mention of the riuer Leman, and the mouth of Leman, at which the Danes Fleet in the yeere of our ſalvation 892. arrived. But I ſuppoſe they are deceiued in the deſcription of the place, both becauſe there is no riuer heere, but a very ſmall one, which ſtreight waies being of no reckoning at all vaniſheth: as alſo, for that the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, a compendious authour, and of good approoued credit, writeth, that the ſaid fleet arrived at the Haven Leman, and ſaith not a word of the riuer. Unleſſe a man would thinke, (with whom I dare not accord) that the river Rother, which intermingleth it ſelfe with the Ocean under Rhieine, ran downe this way, and changed his courſe by litle & little, when that champian plane called Rumney Marſh, grew unto the firme land. B

Rumney Marſh. For, this Marſh-country, (which from Lime containeth 14. miles in length, and 8. in bredth, and reckoneth two townes, nineteene pariſhes, and 44200. acres or there about, by reaſon of ranke greene graſſe moſt convenient for the graſing and feeding of beaſts), hath beene by little and little laied unto the land by the benefit of the ſea. Whereupon I may well and truely tearme it the Seas-gift, like as Herodotus called Ægypt, the gift of the riuer Nilus, and a very * learned man tearmed the paſtures of Holland, the gifts of the North-wind and the river Rhene. For, the ſea to make amends yeelded that againe in this place (which it ſwallowed up elſewhere in this coaſt) either by retyring backe, or by laying oze thereto from time to time: as ſome places which in the remembrance of our grandfathers, lay cloſe unto the ſea ſhore, are now diſioyned a mile or two from the ſea. How fruitfull the ſoile is, what a number of heards of cattell it feedeth, that are ſent hither from the furtheſt parts of Wales, and England to be fatted; what art and cunning is uſed in making of bankes to fence it, againſt the violent riſings of the ſea, one would hardly beleeve, that hath not ſeene it. And that it might be the better ordered, certaine lawes of Sewers were made in the time of King Henry the third. And King Edward the foorth ordeined, that it ſhould be a Corporation, conſiſting of a Bailive, Iurates, and the Communalty. In the Saxons time the inhabitants heereof were called Mepſc-pape, that is, * Marſhmen: and verily the ſignification of that name accordeth paſſing well with the nature of the place. Neither can I underſtand and conceive that ancient writer Aethelward, when he reporteth, That Cinulph King of the Mercians waſted Kent, and the country which is call'd Merſc-warum. And in another place, That Herbyth a Captaine was by the Danes beheaded in a place named Merſc warum, if he meant not this very Marſh-country. Rumney, or Romeney, and in former time Romenal, which ſome conieCture by the name to haue beene the Romans worke, is the principall towne of this Marſh, and one of the Cinque-ports, whereof Old Romeney and Lid are accounted members, which ioinctly were charged with the ſetting foorth of fiue ſhips of warre, in that maner and forme, as I haue before ſaid. It is ſeated upon an hill of gravell and ſand, and had on the Weſt ſide an haven of good receit and commodious withall, for moſt of the windes; before the ſea with-drew it ſelfe from it. The inhabitants, as we read in King William the Conquerours booke, *were in regard of their ſea ſervice, quite and quiet from all cuſtome, beſide for * Robbery, peace-breach and Foriſtell.* And in thoſe daies it flouriſhed with the beſt; For it was devided into twelue wards, it had alſo fiue Pariſh-churches, it had a Priorie, and an Hoſpitall for ſicke perſons: But in the reigne of Edward the firſt, when the ſea raging with the violence of windes overflowed this tract, and made pitifull waſt of people, of cattell and of houſes in every place, as hauing quite drowned Promhil a prety towne well frequented: it made the Rother alſo forſake his old chanel, which heere before time emptied himſelfe into the ſea, and ſtopped his mouth, opening a new and neerer way for him to paſſe into the ſea by Rhie: So as by little and little C D E F

Rumney Marſh.

*Petrus Nannius.

*Viri paluſtres

795.

Rumney.

344. 318.

Domeſ-day. Booke.

*The penalties for theſe offenſes.

1287.

Digitized by Google

A little he forsooke this towne. Which euer since hath decreased and lost much of the former frequency, and ancient dignity.

Beneath this, the land tending more East-ward maketh a Promontory, (we call it the Nesse, as it were a nose) before which lieth a dangerous flat in the sea, and upon which standeth Lid a towne well inhabited: whereunto the inhabitants of Promhill after that inundation aforesaid betooke themselues. And in the very vtmost point of this Promontory which the people call Denge-nesse, where there is nothing but beach and pible stones, Holme-trees grow plentifully with their sharp prickey leaues alwaies greene, in maner of an vnderwood, for a mile and more. Among the said beach B neere vnto Stonland is to be seene an heape of greater stones, which the neighbour inhabitants call Saint Crispins, and Crispinians tombe, whom they report to haue beene cast vpon this shore by ship-wracke and from hence called into the glorious companie of Saints. From thence the shore retyring it selfe is directly carried into the West, bringing foorth peason among the beach, which grow vp naturally like clusters of grapes a number together, and in tast little differ from our field peason, and so runneth on as farre as to the Rother-Mouth, by which for some space Kent is deuided from Sussex.

Lid.

Denge-Nesse

*Hulver or Holy-trees

Lucas.

pa. 466.

The course of this riuer on Sussex side we haue in part briefely spoken of before. On Kent side it hath Newenden, which I almost perswade my selfe was that haven so C long sought for, and which the booke Notitia Prouinciarũ called ANDERIDA, the old Britains Caer Andred, and the Saxons Anpeopjrcea; ver: first, because the inhabitants by a continued tradition constantly affirme it was a most ancient towne and Hauen whereof they shew the plot; then, for that it is situate by the wood Andredswald, that tooke the name of it; lastly, because the English-Saxons seeme to haue tearmed it Brittenden, that is, The Britans Vale, (as they called also Segontium an ancient towne of the Britans of which we spake before): whence the whole Hundred adioyning is named Selbrittenden. The Romans for to defend this coast against the Saxon rouers, placed heere the band of the Abulci with their Captaine: Afterward being taken by the English-Saxons it decaied quite. For, Hengest being fully deter-D mined to rid all the Britans out of Kent, and thinking it would much availe him to encrease his troupes and bands with greater forces of his owne nation, called foorth Aella out of Germany with a strong power of English-Saxons, and while he gaue the assault vnto this Anderida violently, the Britans out of the wood hard by, where they laie in ambushments, enchafed him so, that at length after many losses on both sides giuen and taken, when he had parted his army and both discomfited and put to flight the Britans in the wood, and also at the same time forced the towne by assaults; his barbarous hart was so enflamed with desire of reuenge, that he put the inhabitants to the sword and rased the towne euen to the ground. The place lying thus desolate, was shewed, (as Henry of Huntingdon saith,) to those that passed by many ages after. E Vntill the Friers Carmelites newly come out from Mount Carmell in the Holiland, who sought for such solitary places, built them heere a little Priory in the time of King Edward the first, at the charges of Sir Thomas Albuger Knight: and so streight waies there rose vp a village, which in regard of the old towne ouerthrowen, began to be called Newenden, that is, The New towne in the vale. I saw nothing there now, but a mean village with a poore church, & a wodden bridge to no great purpose for a ferry is in most vse, since that the riuer Rother, not containing himself in his chanell hath ouerlaied, and is like to endanger & surround the leuell of rich lands therby. Whereupon the inhabitants of Rhie complaine, that their hauen is not scoured by the streame of Rother as heeretofore, and the owners heere suffer great losse: which F their neighbours in Oxney doe feare, if it were remedied, would fall vpon them. This is a riuer-isle ten miles about, encompassed with the riuer Rother diuiding his streames, and now brackish; hauing his name either of mire, which our ancestours called Hox, or of Oxen, which it feedeth plentifuly with ranke grasse. Opposite to this is Apledore, where a confused rable of Danish and Norman Pirates, which vnder the conduct of one Hasting had fore annoied the French coasts, loden with booties landed,

Anderida. Andredceaster.

Oxney.

Apledore.

Digitized by Google

landed, and built a Caſtle: whom notwithſtanding King Aelfred by his valour enforced to accept conditions of peace. A Vpland hence, and from Newenden I ſaw (which I ſhould haue beforeremembred) Cranbroke and Tenterden good clothing townes, Siſingherſt a faire houſe of the familie of Bakers aduanced by Sir Iohn Baker not long ſince Chauncellour of the Exchequer, and his marriage with a daughter and heire of Dingley, Bengebury an habitation of the ancient familie of Colpepper, and neere adioining Homſted a manſion of the Guildfords, an old familie, but moſt eminent ſince S. Iohn Guildford was Controuler of the houſe to king Edward the Fourth. For his ſonne and heire S. Richard Guildford was by king Henry the ſeuenth made knight of the Garter. Of his ſonnes againe B Sir Edward Guildford was Marſhall of Callais, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Maſter of the Ordinance, father to Iane Dutches of Northumberland, wife to Sir I. Dudley Duke of Northumberland, mother to the late Earles of Warwick, and Leiceſter, and Sir Henrie was choſen Knight of the Garter by King Henrie the Eight, and had his Armes enobled with a Canton of Granado by Ferdinand King of Spaine for his worthy ſeruice in that Kingdome when it was recouered from the Moores, and Edward, liued in great eſteeme at home. To be briefe from the ſaid Sir Iohn are iſſued by females immediatly the Darells of Cale-hill, Gages, Brownes of Beechworth, Walſinghams, Cromers, Iſaacs, and Iſeleies, families of prime and principall note in theſe parts. But now I digreſſe and therefore craue pardon. C Siſinherſt. Bengebury. Homſteed. Guilford.

Clothing. In the pariſhes heere-about the commendable trade of clothing was firſt ſet vp and freſhly practiſed, euer ſince King Edward the Third his daies, who by propoſing rewards, and granting many immunities, trained Flemings into England in the tenth yeere of his reigne to teach our men that skill of Draperie, or weaving and making wollen cloth, which is iuſtly counted at this day one of the Staies that ſupport our common Weale. Thus much of Kent, which (to conclude ſummarily) hath this part laſt ſpoken of for Draperie, the Iſle of Tenet and the Eaſt parts for the Granarie, the Weald for the wood, Rumney Marſh for the meddow-plot, the North downs toward the Tamis for the Conny-garthe, Tenham and there about for an Orchard, and D Head-Corne for the brood and poultrey of fat, big, and commended capons.

Kentiſh capons.

Earles of Kent. As for the Earles, omitting the Engliſh Saxons Godwin, and Leofwin his brother, and others, who were Earles not by deſcent and inheritance, but by office. Odo halfe brother by the mothers ſide to King William the Conquerour, and Biſhop of Baieux, was the firſt Earle of Kent, of the Norman bloud: a man, by nature of a bad diſpoſition and buſie head, bent alwaies to ſow ſedition and to trouble the State. Whereupon he was committed to priſon by a ſubtile diſtinction, as Earle of Kent, and not Biſhop of Baieux in regard of his holie orders; and afterward for a moſt dangerous rebellion which he had raiſed, he was by his nephew King William Rufus deprived of his places of dignity, loſt all his goods in England and abiured the Realme. Afterwards, King Stephen who as an intruder reaped the reuenewes and commodities of the Crowne of England, that hee might bind by benefits martiall men to him, he aduanced William of Ipres a fleming to that honor: who being, as Fitz-Stephen calleth him, Violentus Cantij incubator, that is, the violent ouer preſſor of Kent, was forced by King Henrie the ſecond to depart, ſheading many teares and ſo became a monke, Henrie likewiſe the ſonne of King Henrie the ſecond, whom his father had crowned King, rebelling againſt his father, gaue in like reſpect the title of Kent vnto Philip Earle of Flanders. But this Philip was Earle of Kent in title onely and by promiſe. For, as Gervaſe of Canterburie writeth, Philip Earle of Flanders vndertooke to the vttermoſt of his power for to aide the young King, doing him homage and binding himſelfe with an oth: vnto whom the ſaid King promiſed in reward of his ſeruice the reuenewes of a thouſand pounds, together with all Kent: alſo the Caſtle of Rocheſter and the Caſtle of Dover. Not many yeeres after, Hubert de Burgh, having done notable good ſeruice vnto the State, receiued as it were, by due deſert the ſame honor at the hands of King Henrie the Third: who alſo made him chiefe Iuſtice of England. This Hubert was a man who vnfainedly loued his Countrie, & amidſt the ſtormes of frowning E F

A ning Fortune performed all duties to the utmoſt that his Country could require of a right good patriot. Yet at length he fell in diſgrace, and was diſpoiled of his dignities: whereby this title ſlept and lay as dead untill the time of King Edward the Second. Who beſtowed it upon his younger brother Edmund of Woodſtocke, who being Tutor of his nephew Edward the Third, falling into the tempeſt of falſe, iniurious, and malignant envie was beheaded, for that he never diſſembled his naturall brotherly affection toward his brother depoſed, and went about when hee was (God wot) murdered before (not knowing ſo much) to enlarge him out of priſon; perſwaded thereunto by ſuch as covertly practiſed his deſtruction. Hee had two ſonnes An. 15. E. 2.

B Edmund, and Iohn, who were reſtored by Parliament to bloud and land ſhortly after. And with all, it was enacted that no Peere of the land, or other that procured the death of the ſaid Earle ſhould bee empeached therefore, than Mortimer Earle of March, Sir Simon Beresford, Iohn Matrauers, Baious, and Iohn Deveroil. So theſe his two ſonnes ſucceeded in order, and when they were both dead without iſſue, their ſiſter Ioane, who ſurviued them, (for her louely beauty called The Faire maide of Kent) brought this honour unto the houſe of the Hollands. For Sir Thomas Holland her husband was ſtiled Earle of Kent, and ſhee after married by diſpenſation to the Black Prince bare to him King Richard the Second. Her ſonne Sir Thomas Holland ſucceeded in that honorable title, who died in the twentith yeare of King Richard the Se-

C cond. Him againe there ſucceeded his two ſonnes Thomas and Edmund. Thomas who alſo was created Duke of Surry, and forthwith for complotting a conſpiracy againſt King Henrie the Fourth loſt his head, leaving no child: Edmund his brother being Lord High Admirall of England, was wounded at the aſſault of Saint Brieu in little Britan, and died thereof in the yeare of Salvation 1408. leaving likewiſe no iſſue. Now when this dignity was exſpired, in this family of the Hollands, their glaſſe beeing runne out, and the Patrimony parted among Edmunds ſiſters; King Edward the Fourth honoured with the title of the Earldom of Kent, Firſt Sir William, Nevill Lord Fauconberg: and after his death, Edmund Lord Grey of Ruthin, Haſtings and Weiſford, who had to ſucceed him George his ſonne. Hee of Anne Wideuile his Saint Brieu.

D firſt wife begat Richard Earle of Kent, who having waſted his inheritance ended therewith his daies iſſueleſſe, 1523. But the ſaid George by his ſecond wife Katherine, daughter to William Herbert Earle of Pembrocke, was father of Sir Henrie Grey of Wreſt knight, whoſe grand-ſonne Reginald, by his ſonne Henrie, Queene Elizabeth in the yeare 1571. advanced to the Earledom of Kent. And after his deceaſe without iſſue, his brother Henrie ſucceeded, a right honorable perſonage and endued with the ornaments of true nobility.

E

This province hath pariſhes. 398.

F

Digitized by Google

DOBVNI.

HItherto wee haue poasted ouer all those Countries that lie betweene the British Ocean of the one side, and the Severne sea and river Tamis on the other. Now according to the order which wee haue begunne, let vs survey the rest throughout: and passing over the said river returne to the head of Tamis and the salt water of Severne; and there view the DOBVNI, who in auncient times inhabited those parts which now are termed Glocester-shire and Oxford-shire. This their name, I verily suppose came of Duffen a British word, becausse the places where they planted themselues, were for the most part low and lying under the hils, whereupon the name became common to them all: and verily from such a kind of site, Bathieia in Troas, Catabathmos in Africk, and Deep-Dale in Britiane tooke their names. I am the more easily induced to beleeue this becausse I see, that Dio in the verie same signification hath named certaine people, BODVNNI if the letters bee not misplaced. For, BODO or BODVN, (as Plinie saith) in the anncient French tongue, (which I haue proued before was the same that the British language,) betokeneth Deepe. Hence was it, that the Citie Bodincomagus, as hee writeth, became so called, for that it stood where the river *Po was deepest: hence had the people Bodiontij that name, who inhabited a deepe vale by the Lake of Lozanne, and Geneva, now called Val de Fontenay, to say nothing of Bodotria the deepest Frith in all Britiane. Concerning these Bodunj, I haue found in all my reading no matter of great antiquitie, save onelie that A. Plautius sent as Proprætor by Claudius into Britan, received part of them upon their submission into his protection, to wit, those that were under Cattuellani, (for they held the region bordering upon them) and as Dio hath recorded, about the fortie and foure yeere after Christ was borne, placed a garrison over them.

Duffen in the British tongue signifieth low, deep, or flat.

Bodo what it signifieth in British and French.

* Padus.

But when the English Saxons reigned in Britiane, and the name of Dobuni was worne out, some of these, as also the people dwelling round about them, were by a new English Saxons name called Wiccij: but whereupon, I dare scarse venture to guesse, without craving leaue of the Reader. Yet, if Wic in the Saxons pa 393.

tongue

tongue ſoundeth as much as the* creeke, or reach of a river, and the Vignones, a nation in Germanie are ſo called, becauſe they dwell neere unto the creekes or baies of the Sea and of rivers, (for ſo doth Beatus Rhenanus conſtantlie affirme) it will bee no abſurditie, if I derive our Wiccii from thence, who inhabited round about the mouth of Severne, which is verie full of ſuch Coves and ſmall creekes and reaches. * Or Cove. Wiccii.

()

Digitized by Google

GLOCESTER-SHIRE.

Locesterſhire, in the Saxon tongue Gleaceſtep-ſcyre, which was the chiefe ſeat of the Dobuni, on the weſt-ſide butteth upon Mon month-ſhire & Hereford-ſhire, on the North upon Worceſter-ſhire, on the eaſt upon Warwick-ſhire, Oxford-ſhire and Barck-ſhire, and on the South upon Wilt-ſhire and Somerſet-ſhire both. A pleaſant countrie and a fruitfull; ſtretching out in length, from North-East unto Southweſt. The part that lieth more East-ward, riſing up in height with hils and wolds is called Cotteſwold: the midle part lieth downe low to a moſt fertile plaine, and is watered with Severne that noble river, which doth infuſe life, as it were, into the ſoile. That part which bendeth more Weſt-ward on the further ſide of Severn, is all over be ſpread with woods. But what meaned I to buſie my ſelfe heerein? William of Malmesbury will eaſe mee of this labour, who fully giues high commendations to this country. Haue therefore what he writeth in his booke of Biſhop; The country (ſaith hee) is called of the principall Citie. The vale of Glocester: the ground throughout yeeldeth plenty of corne, and bringeth forth abundance of fruits: the one through the naturall goodneſſe onelie of the ground, the other through diligent manuring and tillage; in ſo much, as it would prouoke the laziest bodie that is, to take paines, ſeeing that it anſwereth back againe with the encreaſe of an hundered fold, that which is ſowne. Heere may you ſee the high waies and common lanes clad with apple-trees and peare-trees, not ſet nor graffed by the indaſtrie of mans hand, but growing naturally of their owne accord. The ground of it ſelfe is enclined to beare fruits, and thoſe both in taſt and beautie farre exceeding others: whereof ſome will laſt a whole yeare and not wither and rivell: ſo that they are ſerviceable vntill new come againe for ſupplie. There is no countrie in all England ſo thicke ſet Vines and wine. as this prouince with Vine-yards, ſo plentifull in encreaſe, and ſo pleaſant in taſte. The verie wines thereof made, affect not their mouthes that drinke of them with any vnpleaſing tartneſſe, as beeing little inferiour in ſweeteneſſe and odoure to the French wines. The houſes in it are almoſt innumerable, the Churches paſſing fayre, and the townes ſtanding verie thicke. But that which addeth vnto all theſe good guifts a ſpeciall glorie is the river Severne, than which there is not any one in this land, for Severn. channell broader, for ſtreame ſwifter, for fiſh better ſtored. There is in it a daicly rage and furie of the waters, which I know not whether I may call a gulfe or whirlpoole of waues, and the ſame raiſing vp the ſands from the bothom winding and driving the ſame vpon heapes, commeth with a forcible violence, and reacheth no farther than to the bridge. Sometimes alſo it overfloweth the bankes, and when it hath roved about a great waie, it retireth backe as a conquerour of the land. Vnhappie is that veſſell which it taketh full vpon the ſide. The watermen well ware hereof when they ſee that Higra comming, (for ſo they call it in Engliſh), turne the veſſell Higra. affront vpon it, and ſo cutting through the mideſt of it, check and avoide the violence thereof.

But that which hee ſaith of the hundered fold increaſe and yeeld of the ground, doth not hold true. Neither for all that, would I thinke with theſe whining and ſloathfull husbandmen, whom Columella taketh up for it, that the ſoile is now wearied and become barrain with too much fruitfulneſſe and over free bearing in former ages. Howbeit hereby; if I ſhould ſay nothing of other things, it is to bee ſeene, that wee haue no cauſe to wonder, why many places in this countrie and elſewhere in England are called Vine-yards, ſeeing it hath affoorded wine; and ſurelie it may ſeeme to proceede rather of the Inhabitantes idleneſſe than any diſtemperature and indiſpoſition of the ayre, that it yeeldeth none at this day. But why in ſome places within this Countrie, as wee reade in our A ſtatutes, by a priuate cuſtome which now is become of ſtrong validitie as a law, the goods and lands of condemned perſons fall into the Kings hands for a yeare onely and a daie, and after that terme expired (contrarie to the cuſtome of all England beſide) returne to the next heires, let law-ſtudents and ſtateſmen looke to that: for no part it is of my purpoſe to ſearch thereinto. Now I will take a ſuperficiall ſurvey (ſuch as I can) of thoſe three parts whereof I ſpake orderly one after another.

Forreſt of Deane. The part, that lieth more Weſt beyond Severne, (which the Silures in old time B poſſeſſed) along the river Vaga or Wye, that parteth England and Wales, was wholy beſpred with thicke tall woods: we call it at this day, Deane-forreſt: The Latine writers ſome name it of the Danes Danica Sylua the Danes wood, others with Girald, the Wood of Danubia. But I would thinke, if it had not this name of Dean a little towne adioy-Arden. ning, that by ſhort cutting the word, it was called Deane, for Arden. Which tearme both Gauls and Britans in ancient times may ſeeme to haue vſed for a wood, conſidering that two mighty great woods, the one in that part of Gaule called Gallia Belgica, and the other among us in Warwick-ſhire, are by one and the ſelfe ſame name tear-med Arden. For, this was a wonderfull thicke forreſt, and in former ages ſo darke and terrible, by reaſon of crooked and winding waies, as alſo the griſly ſhade therein, that it made the inhabitants more fierce, and boulder to commit robberies. For in C the reigne of Henry the ſixt they ſo infeſted all Severne ſide with robbing and ſpoi-ling, that there were lawes made by authority of the Parliament, for to reſtraine Iron. them. But ſince that rich Mines of Iron were heere found out, thoſe thicke woods began to wax thin by little and little. In this Forreſt, vpon the foreſaid river ſtood Tidenham and Wollaſton, two townes of good antiquity, which Walter and Rice the brethren of Giſlebert Lord of Clare wreſted out of the Welſh-mens hands, about the Lidney. yeere 1160. As alſo Lidney is adioyning to them, where Sir William Winter, Vice-ad-mirall of England, a renowned Knight for ſea-ſervices (as his brother Arthur ſlaine in Orkeney-Iſles) built a faire houſe. But the moſt ancient towne of all others is Abone. ABONA or AVONE, mentioned by Antonine the Emperour in Iourney-booke, which D Aueton. having not loſt that name altogether, is at this day called Aueton: a ſmall towne indeed, but ſtanding vpon Severne, iuſt nine miles, as he writeth, from VENTAS I-LVRVM, or Caer-went.

And ſeeing that Avon in the Brittiſh tongue importeth A Riuer, it ſhall be no ſtrange thing, if we thinke it ſo called of the river: for in the very ſame ſignification, (that I may ommit the reſt) we haue Waterton, Bourne, and Riverton: as the Latines had Aquinum and Fluentium. And I ſuppoſe the rather, that it tooke name of the river, becauſe people were wont at this place to ferry over the river, whereupon the Traiectus. towne ſtanding over againſt it is by Antonine called TRAIECTVS, that is, a paſſage or ferry: but without doubt, the number in that place ſet downe, is corrupted. For E he maketh it nine miles betweene TRAIECTVS and ABONE, whereas the river is ſcarce three miles broad. It may ſeeme then to have bin vtterly decaied, or turned rather into a village, either when as paſſengers beganne to ferrie over below, or when Athelſtane thruſt out the Welſh Britans from hence. For, hee was the firſt that draue them, as William of Malmesburie witneſſeth, beyond the river Wye. And where as before his time, Severne was the bound, betweene the Engliſh and Welſhmen, hee appointed Wye to bee the limit confining them both: Whence our Nechame writeth thus.

Inde vagos vaga Cambrenſes, hinc reſpicit Anglos.

To Wales on this ſide, looketh Wie, F
On that againe, our England he doth eye.

S. Breulais. Not farre from Wye amongſt blind Bywaies beſet with thicke plumps of trees, ap-peareth Breulis Caſtle more than halfe fallen downe, remarkable for the death of Ma- bel youngeſt ſonne of Miles, Earle of Hereford. For there, his greedy deviſes, bloudy cruelty, and covetouſneſſe readie to pray upon other mens eſtates (for which vices hee

Digitized by Google

A hee is much blamed in Writers) were overtaken with a iust revenge from heaven. For, as Girald hath written, being entertained guest-wise by Sir Walter Clifford in this Castle, when the house was all on a light fire, hee was killed with a stone that from the top of an high Turret fell upon his head and brained him.

Neither haue I any thing else to be recounted in this wood-country beside Newnham a pretty mercate, and Westbury therby a seate of the Bainhams of ancient descent: But that Herbert who had wedded the sister of the said Mahel Earle of Hereford, in her right was called Lord of Deane from whom that Noble house of the Herberts fetcheth their pedigree, out of which familie came the Lords of Blanleveney, and of late daies, B the Herberts Earles of Huntingdon and Pembroch, with others. From hence also, if we may beleeve David Powell in his historie of Wales, was descended Antonie Fitz-Herbert, whose great learning & industrie in the wisedome of our law, both the iudiciall Court of Pleas, wherein he sat Iustice a long time, and also those exact bookes of our common law by him exquisitely penned and published, doe sufficiently witnesse. But other haue drawen his descent, and that more truly, if I haue insight therein, from the race of the Fitz-Herberts Knights in Derbyshire.

Severn. Tewksbury.

The river Severn, called by the Britains HABREN, after it hath run a long course with a chanell somewhat narrow, no sooner entereth into this shire, but entertaineth the river Avon, and another brooke comming from the East. Betwixt which, is seated Mustard. C Tewkesbury, in the Saxon tongue Theocsburie, by others Theoci Curia, taking the name from one Theocus who there did lead an Eremites life. It is a great and faire towne, having three bridges to passe over, standing vpon three rivers, famous for making of Woollen-cloath, and the best mustard, which for the quicke heat that it hath, biteth most and perceth deepest: but most famous in times past by reason of an ancient Monastery which Dodo a man of great power in Mercia founded in the yeere 715. where before time he kept his royall court, as is testified by this inscription which there remained long after.

HANC AVLAM REGIAM DODO DVX CONSECRARI
D FECIT IN ECCLESIAM.

THIS ROIAL PALACE DUKE DODO CAUSED TO BE CONSECRATED FOR A CHVRCH.

And Odo his brother endowed the same, which being by continuance of time, and the fury of enemies ruinated, Robert FITZ-HAIMON the Norman, Lord of Corboile and Thorigny in Normandie reedified translating monks from Cranborn in Dorsetshire hither upon a devout mind verily and a religeous, that he might make some amends to the Church, for the losse that the Church of Bricux in Normandie had sustained: E which K. Henry the first for to free him from his enemies had set on fire & burned, and afterwards repenting that which he had done, built againe. It cannot, (writeth William of Malmesbury) be easily reported, how highly Robert Fitz-hamon exalted this Monastery, wherin the beauty of the buildings ravished the eies, and the charity of the Monks allured the hearts of such folke as vsed to come thither. Within this both himselfe & his successours Earles of Gloucester were buried: who had a Castle of their owne called Holmes hard by, which now is almost vanished out of sight. Neither is this towne lesse memorable for that battaile, whereby the house of Lancaster received a mortall wound: as wherein very many of their side in the yeere, 1471. were slaine, more taken prisoners and diverse beheaded, their power so weakened and their hopes abated, especi- F ally because young Prince Edward the onely sonne of King Henrie the Sixt, a very child, was there put to death and in most shamefull and vilanous maner his braines dashed out, as that never after they came vnto the field against King Edward the Fourth. In which respect, John Leland wrote of this towne in this wise:

Ampla foro, & partis spoliis præclara, Theoci
Curia, Sabrinæ quà se committit Avona

Fulget;

Digitized by Google

Fulget; nobilium ſacriſq; recondit in antris
Multorum cineres, quondam inclyta corpora belle. A

Where Av'n and Severn meete in one, there ſtands a goodly towne.
For mercat great and pillage rich there wonne, of much renowne, Hight Tewksburie: where noble men entombed many are,
Now gone to mould, who ſometimes were redoubted Knights in warre.

From thence we come to Deorhirſt, which Bede ſpeaketh of, ſituate ſomewhat low upon the banke of Severn, wherby it hath great loſſes many times, when he overfloweth his bounds. It had in it ſometimes a little Monaſterie, which being by the Danes overthrowen flouriſhed againe at length under Edward the Confeſſor; who, as we read in his Teſtament, aſſigned The religious place at Deorhirſt and the government thereof to Saint Denis neere unto Paris. Yet, a little while after, as William of Malmeſbury ſaith, It was but a vaine and void repreſentation of antiquitie. Over againſt it lieth a place halfe incompaſſed in with Severne, called in the Saxon tongue Olenæg, and Alney, now the Eight, that is, The Iland: Famous, the reaſon of this occurrence, that when both the Engliſhmen and the Danes were much weakened with continuall encounters, to make a finall diſpatch at once of all quarels, the Fortune and deſtinie of both nations was committed to Edmund King of the Engliſh, and to Canutus King of the Danes, who in this Iland by a ſingle combat tried it out, unto whether of them the right of this Realme ſhould belong. But, after they had fought and given over on e- B C nen hand, a peace was concluded, and the kingdome devided betweene them. But when ſtreight upon it Edmund was diſpatched out of the way not without ſuſpicion of poiſon, Canutus ſeized into his owne hands all England.

From Deorhirſt Severne runneth downe by Haesfeild which King Henrie the Third gaue to Rich. Pauncefote, whoſe ſucceſſors built a faire houſe heere, and whoſe predeceſſours vvere poſſeſſed of faire lands in this Countrie before, and in the Conquerours time in Wilſhire making many reaches winding in and out, and forthwith diuiding himſelfe to make a river Iland moſt rich and beautifull in greene meddowes, he paſſeth along by the head Citie of this Shire, vvhich Antonine the Emperour called CLEVVM and GLEVVM, the Britans terme Caer Glovie, the Engliſh Saxons Gleaceſtep, we Gloceſter, the Vulgar ſort of Latiniſts Glovernia, others Claudioceſtria, of the Emperour Claudius, as they imagine: who, forſooth, ſhould give it this name, vvhen he had beſtovved heere his daughter Geniſſa in marriage upon Arviragus the Britan. Touching vvhom, Iuvenall writeth thus, D Pauncefote, or Pauncevolt. Placita 15. Edw. 1.

Regem aliquem capies, vel de temone Britanno Excidet Arviragus.

Some King (ſure) thou ſhalt priſoner take in chace of battaile heat,
Or elſe Arviragus ſhall looſe his Britiſh royall ſeat.

As though hee had begat any other daughters of his three vviues beſides Claudia, Antonia and Octavia; or as if Arviragus had beene knowen in that age, vvhoſe name E vvas never heard of before Domitians time and ſcarſe then. But, let them goe, that ſeeke to build antiquity upon a frame grounded on lies: Rather yet vvould I give my voice and accord vvith Ninnius, vvho vvriteth, That it tooke the name from Glovius, the great grandfathers father of King Vortigern; but that long before it, Antonine had named it Glevum (vvhich, both the Diſtance from Corinium and the name alſo may prove.) But as the Saxon name Gleaveceſter came from Glevum, ſo Glevum proportionably from the Britiſh, Caer Glow vvhich I ſuppoſe ſprong from the vvord Glow, that in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth Faire and Goodly: ſo that Caer Glow may be as much to ſay, as a faire Citie: In vvhich ſignification alſo, the Greekes had their Callipolis: Callidromos, Calliſtratia: the Engliſhmen their Brightſtow, and Shirley, and in this very Countie Faireford, Fair-ley, &c. F

This Citie vvas built by the Romanes, and ſet, as it were, upon the necke of the Silures to yoake them And there alſo was a Colonie planted to people it, vvhich they called COLONIA GLEVVM. For I have ſeene a fragment of antique ſtone in the vvalles of Bath neere unto the North-gate, with this Inſcription.

*DEC

A

*DEC COLONIÆ GLEV
VIXIT ANN. LXXXVI.

*Decurio.

It lieth ſtretched out in length over Severn: on that ſide where it is not watered
B with the river, it hath in ſome places a very ſtrong wall for defenſe. A proper and fine Citie I aſſure you it is, both for number of Churches and for the buildings. On the South part there was a lofty Caſtle of ſquare Aſhler ſtone which now, for the moſt part, is nothing but a ruine. It was built in King William the firſt his time, and ſixteene houſes there about, as we read in the booke of Englands Survey, were plucked downe for the rearing of this Caſtle. About which, Roger the ſonne of Miles, Conſtable of Gloceſter went to law with King Henry the ſecond: and his brother Walter loſt all the right and intereſt he had in this City and Caſtle, as Robert de Mont hath written. Ceaulin King of the Weſt Saxons, was the firſt, that about the yeere of our redemption 570. by force and armes wreſted Gloceſter out of the Britans hands. After C this, the Mercians won it, under whom it flouriſhed in great honour, and Oſricke King of Northumberland by permiſſion of Etheldred the Mercian, founded there a very great and ſtately Monaſtery for Nunnes, over whom Kineburg, Eadburg and Eve Queenes of the Mercians were Prioreſſes ſucceſſively one after another. Edelfled alſo that moſt noble Ladie of the Mercians, adorned this City with a Church, wherein ſhe herſelfe was buried, and not long after, when the Danes had ſpoiled and waſted the whole country, thoſe ſacred Virgins were throwen out, and The Danes (as Aethelward that 878. ancient authour writeth) with many a ſtroak pitched poore cotages in the citie of Gleuceſter. At which time, when thoſe more ancient Churches were ſubverted, Alfred Archbiſhop of Yorke, and Biſhop of Worceſter erected another for Monkes which is now
D the chiefe Church in the Citie, and hath a Deane and ſix Prebendaries. But the ſame in theſe late præcedent ages was newly beautified. For, John Hanley and Thomas Farley two Abbots added unto it the Chappel of the bleſſed Virgin Mary: N. Morwent raiſed from the very foundation the forefront, which is an excellent peece of worke: G. Horton an Abbot, adioyned to it the croſſe North-part; Abbat Trowceſter a moſt daintie and fine Cloiſter, and Abbot Sebrok an exceeding high faire ſteeple. As for the South ſide, it was alſo repaired with the peoples offerings at the Sepulcher of the vnhappy King Edward the ſecond, who lieth heere enterred under a monument of Alabaſter: and not far from him another Prince as vnfortunate as he, Robert Curt-hoſe, the eldeſt ſonne of King William the Conquerour Duke of Normandy within a woodden
E painted tombe in the mideſt of the quire, who was bereft of the Kingdome of Engand for that he was borne before his father was King, depriued of his two ſonnes the * Robert Curt-hoſe.
one by ſtrange death in the New-forreſt, the other diſpoiled of the Earledome of Flanders his inheritance, and ſlaine; he himſelfe diſpoſſeſſed of the Dukedome of Normandie by his brother King Henry the firſt, his eies plucked out, and keept cloſe priſoner 26. yeares with all contumelious indignities vntill through extreame anguiſh he ended his life. Aboue the quire, in an arch of this church, there is a wall built in forme of a ſemicircle full of corners, with ſuch an artificiall deviſe, that if a man ſpeake with never ſo low a voice at the one part thereof, and another lay his eare to the other being a good way diſtant, he may moſt eaſily heere euery ſillable. In the reigne of William F the Conquerour and before, it may ſeeme that the chiefeſt trade of the Citizens was to make Iron. For as we finde in the Survey booke of England*, the Kings demanded * Doomeſday-booke.
in maner no other tribute than certaine Icres of Iron, and Iron barres, for the uſe of the * Sextarios.
Kings Navy, and ſome few quarts of hony*. After the comming in of the Normans, it ſuffered divers calamities: by the hands of Edward, King Henry the third his ſonne; whiles England was all on a ſmoake and cumbuſtion by the Barons warre, it was ſpoiled;

Digitized by Google

led; and afterward by casualty of fire almost wholy consumed to ashes; but now cherished with continuance of long peace it flourisheth againe as fresh as euer it was, and by laying unto it two Hundreds, it is made a County, & called the County of the city of Gloceſter. Also within the memory of our fathers, King Henry the Eighth augmented the state thereof with an Episcopall See, with which dignity in old time it had beene highly endowed, as Geffery of Monmouth avoucheth, and I will not derogate ought from the credit of his assertion, considering that among the Prelates of Britaine the Bishop Cluvienſis is reckoned, which name derived from Clevum or Glow, doth after a sort confirme and strengthen my conjecture, that this is that Clevum, whereof Antonine maketh mention. A B

Severne, having now left Gloceſter behind it and gathered his waters unto one streame againe windeth it selfe by Elmore a Mansion house of the Giſes ancient by their owne lineall discent, being in elder times owners of Aſſely-Giſe neere Brickhill: and from the Beauchampes of Holt, Who acknowledge Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent (whom I lately mentioned) beneficious to them, and testifie the same by their Armories. Lower vpon the same side Stroud a prety riuer slideth into Severn out of Coteswold by Stroud a Mercat towne sometimes better peopled with Clothiars, and not farre from Minching-Hampton which anciently had a Nunnery, or belonged to Nunnes whom our ancestors named Minchings.

Elmore.

Minching.

Now Severn waxing broader and deeper by reason of the alternative flowing and ebbing of the sea, riseth and swelleth in maner of a rough and troublous sea indeed, and so with many windings and turnings in and out speedeth him unto the Ocean. But nothing offereth it selfe unto his sight, (to count of) as he passeth along, but Cam-bridge a little country towne: where it receiveth Cam a small riueret: Over the bridge whereof, when the Danes with rich ſpoiles paſſed (as Aethelward writeth) in battail-ray, the Weſt-Saxons and the Mercians receiv'd them with an hote battaile in Woodnesfield, where three of their Petie Kings were ſlaine, namely, Heaſden, Cinvil* and Ingvar. C

Cam-bridge.

* In ranke or in a rew.

On the same shore not much beneath, standeth Barkely, in the Saxon-tongue Beopkenlau, of great name for a most strong Castle, a Major, who is the head Magistrate, and especially for the Lords thereof descended from Robert-Fitz-Harding to whom King Henry the second gave this place, and Barkely Heaines. Out of this house are branched many Knights and Gentlemen of signall note, and in the reigne of King Henry the seuenth flourished William Lord Barkely, who was honoured by King Edward the fourth with the stile of Vicont Barkley, by King Richard the third with the honour of Earle of Nottingham (in regard of his mother daughter of Thomas Moubray Duke of Norfolke, and Earle of Nottingham) and by King Henry the Seuenth with the office of Marshall of England, and dignity of Marquis Barkley. But for that he died issuelesse these his titles died together with him. If you be willing to know by what a crafty fetch Goodwin Earle of Kent, a man most deeply pregnant in deviſing how to do injury, got the possession of this place, you may read these few lines out of Wal. Mapaus, who flourished 400. yeares agoe: and worth the reading, (beleeve me) they are. Barkley neere unto Severn is a towne of 500. *pounds revenew. In it there was a Nunnery, and the Abbeſſe over theſe Nunnes was a Noble woman and a beautifull. Earle Goodwin by a cunning and ſubtill wit, deſiring not herſelfe, but hers, as he paſſed by that way, left with her a Nephew of his, a very proper and beautifull young Gentleman (pretending that he was ſickly) until he returned backe. Him he had given this leſſon, that he ſhould keepe his bed and in no wiſe ſeeme to be recovered untill he had got both her and as many of the Nunnes as he could with childe as they came to viſit him. * And to the end that the young man might obtaine their favour and his owne full purpoſe, when they viſited him, the Earle gaue unto him prety rings and fine girdles to beſtow for favours vpon them, and thereby to deceive them. He therfore being gladly & willingly entred into this courſe of libidinous pleaſure (for that the way downe to hell is eaſie) was ſoone taught his leſſons, and wiſely plaieth the foole in that, which ſeemed wiſe in his owne conceit. With him were reſtant all thoſe things that the fooliſh virgins could wiſh for, beauty, deinty delicates, riches, faire ſpeech; and careſull* D E F

Barkley. See Briſtow In Somerſetſhire.

Goodwin from diſtent fetch.

* De honeſtis, amiſſas.

he

A he was how to ſingle them alone. The Devill therefore thruſt out Pallas, brought in Venus, and made the Church of our Saviour and his Saints, an accurſed temple of all Idols; and the Shrine, a very ſtewes, and ſo of pure Lambs, he made them foule ſhe wolves, and of pure virgins, filthy harlots. Now when as many of their bellies bare out big and round, this youth being by this time over wearied with conqueſt of pleaſure, getteth him gone, and forthwith bringeth home again unto his Lord & Maiſter, a victorious Enſignes, worthy to haue the reward of iniquity: and to ſpeake plaine, relateth what was done. No ſooner heard he this, but he hieth him to the King: enformeth him how the Lady Abbeſſe of Barkely and her Nuns were great with child, and commonly proſtitute to every one that would: ſendeth ſpeciall

B meſſengers of purpoſe for enquiery heereof, proueth all that he had ſaid. He beggeth Berkley of the King his Lord after the Nuns were thruſt out, & obtained it at his hands: and he left it to his wife Gueda: but becauſe ſhe her ſelfe (ſo ſaith Doomeſday booke,) would eate nothing that came out of this Manour, for that the Nunnery was deſtroied, he purchaſed for her Vdeceſter, that thereof ſhe might liue, ſo long as ſhe made her abode at Berkley. Thus we ſee, a good and honeſt minde abhorreth whatſoever is evill gotten.

How K. Edward the Second being depoſed from his Kingdome through the crafty complotting and practiſe of his wife, was made away in the Caſtle heere, by the wicked ſubtilty of Adam Biſhop of Hereford, who wrote unto his keepers theſe few words without points betweene them: Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt: K. Edward the ſecond murdred.

C that by reaſon of their diverſe ſenſe and conſtruction, both they might commit the murder, and he alſo cleanly excuſe himſelfe, I had rather you ſhould ſeeke in Hiſtorians, than looke for at my hands.

Beneath this Barkley, the little river Avon cloſely entreth into the Sea, at the head whereof ſcarſe eight miles from the water ſide, upon the hils neere Alderley a ſmall towne, there are found certaine ſtones reſembling Coccles or Periwinckles and Oyſters: which, whether they have beene ſometimes living creatures, or the gameſome ſports of Nature, I leave it to Philoſophers (that hunt after natures works.) But Fracaſterius the principall Philoſopher in this our age; maketh no doubt, but that they were living creatures engendred in the Sea, and by waters brought to the

D mountaines. For, he affirmeth, that mountaines were caſt up by the Sea, with the driving at firſt of ſand into heaps & hillocks: alſo that the ſea flowed there where now hilles doe riſe aloft: and that as the ſaid Sea retired the hilles alſo were diſcouered. But this is out of my race.

Wilkes of ſtone or Shell-fiſh ſtonified.

Shell-fiſh ſtonified.

Traiectvs, that is, The ferry, whereof Antenine the Emperour maketh mention over againſt Abone, where they were wont to paſſe over Severn ſalt water by boate, was in times paſt as I gueſſe by the name, at Oldbury, which is by interpretation, The Old Burgh: like as we doe ferry, in theſe daies at Auſt, a little towne ſomewhat lower. This in antient times was called Auſt-clive: for, a great craggy cliffe it is in deed, mounting up a great height. And verily, memorable is the thing which

E that Mapæus whom I ſpake of writeth to have beene done in this place. Edward the elder, ſaith he, Lay at Auſtclive, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Betheſley: now when Leolin would not come downe to parley, nor croſſe Severn, Edward paſſed over to Leolin; whom when Leolin ſaw and knew who he was, he caſt of his rich robbe (for he had prepared himſelfe to ſit in judgement) entred the water breſt-high, and claſping the boat with an embrace, ſaid, Moſt wiſe and ſage King, thy humility hath overcome my inſolencie, and thy wiſdome triumphed over my folly: Come, get upon my necke which I have (foole as I am) lift'd up againſt thee, and ſo ſhalt thou enter into that land, which thy benigne mildneſſe hath made thine owne this day: and after he had taken him upon his ſhoulders, he would needs have him ſit upon his roabe aforeſaid, and ſo putting his owne hands jointly into his, did

F him homage. Upon the ſame ſhore alſo is ſituate Thornbury, where are to be ſeene the foundations brought up aboue ground of a ſumpteous and ſtately houſe which Edward the laſt Duke of Buckingham, was in hand to build, in the yeere of our Lord, (as the engraving doth purport) 1511. when he had taken downe an ancient houſe which Hugh Audeley E. of Glocester had formerly built ſeven miles from hence, Avon ſheading it ſelfe into Severn running croſſe before it, maketh a diviſion betweene Glocester-

ſterſhire

Digitized by Google

ſterſhire & Somerſetſhire, and not farre from the banke therof, Pucle-Church appeareth, being in times paſt a towne or Manour of the Kings called Pucle-Kerkes, wherein Edmund King of England, whiles he interpoſed himſelfe betweene his Sewer, and one Leone a moſt vilanous wretch, for to part and end certaine quarels betweene them was thruſt through the body, and ſo loſt his life. A

The Bradſtones.

Nere bordering upon this place are theſe townes; Winterburne, which had for their Lords the Bradſtons, amongſt whom S. Thomas was ſummoned amongſt the Barons in the time of King Edward the Third. From whom the Vicounts Montacute, the Barons of Wentworth &c. fetch their deſcent: Acton, which gaue name to the houſe of the Actons, Knights: whoſe heire, being married unto Nicolas Points Knight in K. Edward the ſecond his daies, left the ſame to their oſpring: Derham a little towne, in the Saxons tongue Deopham, where Ceaulin the Saxon ſlew three Princes or chiefe Lords of the Britans, Commeail, Condidan and Fariemeiol, with others, whom hee likewiſe put to the ſword and diſpoſſeſſed the Britans of that countrie for ever. B

Deorham. Martinus.

There remaine yet in that place huge rampiers and trenches as fortifications of their campes, and other moſt apparent monuments here and there of ſo great a war. This was the chiefe ſeat of the Barony of * Iames de novo Mercato, who begat three daughters, wedded to Nicholas de Moelis, Iohn de Beteraux, and Ralph Ruſſell: one of whoſe poſterity, enriched by matching with the heire of the ancient family of Gorges, aſſumed unto them the name of Gorges. But from Ralph Ruſsell the heire this Deorham deſcended to the familie of Denis. Aboue theſe is Sodbury knowne by the familie of Valſh, and neighbours thereunto are Wike-ware the ancient ſeat of the familie De-la-ware, Wotton under Edge, which yet remembreth the ſlaughter of Sir Thomas Talbot Vicount Liſle heere ſlaine in the time of King Edward the Fourth in an encounter with the Lord Barkley, about poſſeſſions, ſince which time haue continued ſuites betweene their poſterity vntill now, lately they were finally compounded. More Northward I had ſight of Dureſley reputed the auncienteſt habitation of the Barkleyes, hereupon ſtiled Barkleis of Dureſley, who built here a Caſtle now more than ruinous, & were accounted founders of the Abbay of Kingſ-wood thereby for Ciſtertian Monkes, derived from Tintern whom Maud the Empreſſe greatly enriched. The males of this houſe failed in the time of King Richard the Second, & the heire generall was married to Cantelow. Within one mile of this, where the river Cam lately ſpoken of, ſpringeth, is Vleigh, a ſeat alſo of the Barkelis diſcended from the Barons Barkely, ſtiled of Vleigh, & Stole Giffard, who were found coheires to I. Baron Boutetort, deſcended from the Baron Zouch of Ricards Caſtles, alias Mortimer, and the Someries Lords of Dudley. Beverſton Caſtle not farre of Eaſtward appertained alſo to the name of Barkleies, but in former times to the Gourneis, and Ab-Adam a Baron in the time of King Edward the Firſt. C D

* De-la-ware. Wotton under Edge. Vicount Liſle.

Dureſley.

Inq. 6. R. 2. Vleigh.

Eſcaetria. 8. H 4. Beverſton Caſtle.

p: 231.

Hitherto haue wee curſarily paſſed over the principall places in this Shire ſituate beyond & upon Severn, and not far from his banke: Now proceed we forward to the Eaſt part, which I ſaid riſeth up with hilles, to wit, Cotteſwold, which of woulds, and Cotes, that is hils and Sheepfolds tooke that name. For, mountaines and hils without woods, the Engliſhmen in old time termed Woulds: whence it is that an Old Gloſſary interpreteth Alpes Italiæ, The Woulds of Italie. In theſe Woulds there feed in great numbers, flockes of ſheepe long necked and ſquare of bulke and bone, by reaſon (as it is commonly thought) of the weally and hilly ſituation of their paſturage: whoſe wool being moſt fine and ſoft is had in paſſing great account among all nations. Under the ſide of theſe hils, and among them are to bee ſeene, as it were, in a row neighbouring together, theſe places following, of more antiquity than the reſt, beginning at the North-eaſt end of them. E F

Cotſwold. Would what it is in Engliſh.

Campden.

Campden, commonly Camden, a mereat towne well peopled and of good reſort, where, as Iohn Caſtoreus writeth, all the Kings of Saxon bloud aſſembled in the yeare of Salvation 689. and conſulted in common about making war upon the Britans. In William the Conquerours time this, Weſton and Biſelay were in the poſſeſſion of Hugh Earle of Cheſter; and from his poſterity came at laſt by Nicolaa de Albeniaco an inheritirce Inqui. 2. Edward. 1.

Digitized by Google

A tice to the ancient Earles of Arundel unto Roger de Somery. Nere unto it ſtandeth the ſaid Weſton, a place now to be remembred in regard of a faire houſe, which maketh a goodly ſhew a farre off, built by Ralph Sheldon for him and his poſterity.

Hales in late time a moſt flourißhing Abbay built by Richard Earle of Cornwall and king of Romanes, who vvas there buried with his wife Sanchia daughter to the Earle of Province: and deſerving commendation for breading up of Alexander of Hales a great Clerke and ſo deepely learned aboue all others in that ſubtile and deepe Diuinitie of the Schoole men, as hee carried avvay the ſurname of Doctor Irrefragabilis, that is, the Doctor vngain-ſaid, as hee that could not bee gain-ſaid. Hales. Alexander of Hales, hee flouriſhed. 1230. Doctori vngain-ſaid.

B Sudley, in times paſt Sudlergh, a verie faire caſtle, the ſeat not long ſince of Sir Thomas Seimor Baron Seimor of Sudley, and Admirall of England, attainted in the time of king Edvvard the Sixth; and aftervvard of Sir Iohn Bruges whome Queene Marie created Baron Chandos of Sudley; becauſe he derived his pedegree from the antient family of Chandos; out of vvhich there flouriſhed in the reigne of Edvvard the Third Sir Iohn Chandos a famous Baneret Vicount of Saint Saviours, L. of Coumont, and Kerkitou in France, a martial man, & for military proweſſe every way moſt renovvned. But in old time certaine noblemen here dvvelt, and of it had their addition de Sudley, deſcended of a right ancient Engliſh race, to wit from Gorda K. Aetheldreds daughter, whoſe ſon Ralphe Medantinus Earle of Hereford begat Harold L. of Sudley, whoſe progeny flou- Sudley. Barons of Chan. See Baneretz before. Barons of Sudley.

C riſhed here a long time, until for default of iſſue male, the daughter & heire matched in marriage with Sir William Butler of the Family of Wem, and brought him a ſon named Thomas: and he begat Ralph; Lord Treaſurer of England, created by king Hentie the Sixth Baron of Sudley, with a fee of 200. marks yearely, vvho repaired this caſtle and enlarged it with nevv buildings: His ſiſters and coheires were married unto the houſes of Northbury & Belknape: and by their poſterity the poſſeſſions in ſhort time vvere devided into ſundry families. Toddington alſo is next adioining hereunto, where the Tracies gentlemen of a right worſhipful and ancient houſe flouriſhed a long time, who long ſince found the Barons of Sudley very bounteous unto them. But how in the firſt variance about religion, William Tracie Lord of this place was proceeded 20. H. 6. Eſcaetria 13. Edw. 4. Todington. Tracies.

D againſt and puniſhed after his death by digging up his corps and burning it openly, for ſome few words put downe in his laſt vvill and teſtament, which ſavoured (as thoſe times judged) of hereſie: as alſo how another William de Tracy long before, embrued his hands in the bloudy murder of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Eccleſiaſticall hiſtoriographers haue vvritten at large, and it is no part of my purpoſe to relate ſuch like matters. There is heere likewiſe Winchelcomb a great towne and vvell inhabited, wherein Kenulph the Mercian King erected an Abbay, and on the ſame daie that hee hallowed and dedicated it, hee freed and ſent home Edbricht a King of Kent, whom he had kept before his priſoner. A man would hardly beleeue how much haunted and frequented this Abbay was long ſince, for the reliques of Winchelcombe.

E king Kenelme a child ſeaven yeares old, whom his owne ſiſter to get the inheritance unto her ſelfe, ſecretly made avvay, and our forefathers regiſtred in the ranke of holy Martyrs. The Territorie adioining hereto in times paſt was reckoned a County by it ſelfe or a Sherif-dom: For, wee read in an old manuſcript, ſometime belonging to the Church of Worceſter, in this wiſe Edric ſurnamed Streona, that is, The getter, or gainer, who firſt under King Aetheldred, and afterwards for a good while under Cnute or Canut governed the whole Kingdome of England, and ruled as Vice Roy, adiorned the Sherif-dome of Winchelcombe which was then an entier thing by it ſelfe unto the ſhire of Gloceſter. Thence I found nothing memorable, but neare the fountaine of Churn river, Coberley, a ſeat of a ſtem of Barkeleies ſo often named even from the Conqueſt, Sherif-dom. Coberley.

F which matched with an heire of Chandos, and ſo came hereditarily to the Bruges progenitors to the Lords Chandos. Then by Bird-lip-hil, whereby wee aſcended unto this high Cotſwold out of the vale, lieth Brimsfield, which had for the L. thereof the Giffords in times paſt, unto whō in right of mariage there came a goodly inheritance frō the Cliffords, & ſtreight waies by the femal heires, the ſame fel to the Lords le Strange of Blackmer, to Audleies & divers others. Thus much of the places among the Vvoulds. Cliffords Barons.

Digitized by Google

But under the said Woulds I haue seene that notable Roman high-way by a well A Fosse way. knowne name called the Fosse, which out of Warwick-shire commeth downe first by Lemington, (where it may seeme there was a Station of the Romanes by the peeces of Romane coine ploughed there often times out of the ground: some of which Edward Palmer a curious and diligent Antiquarie, whose auncestors flourished here a long time, hath of his courtesie imparted unto mee) then, by Stow on the Cirencester. Would, where by reason of that high site, the Winds blow cold: and North-Leach bearing the name of a riveret running hard by it: and then to Circencester, which the river Corinus, now Churn rising among the Woulds neare Corberley, verie commodious for Milles, passeth by into the South, and so giveth it his name. This was a B
Corinium. City of as great antiquity as any other, called by Ptolomee CORINIVM, by Antonine the Emperour, DVROCORNOVIVM, thatis, The water Cornovium, just fifteene miles from Glevum or Gloucester, as hee noteth. The Britans named it Caer Cori, and Caer Ceri; the English Saxon Cypen-ceaptep, we in these daies Circester, and Cirester. The ruinate wals do plainely shew that it was verie large; for, by report they tooke up two miles in compasse: That it was a famous place, the Romane coines, the cherkerworke pavements, and the engraven marble stones that now and then are there digged up, (which, have beene broken and to no small prejudice of Antiquitie) doe evidentlie testifie: *P*s also the Port Consular waies of the Romanes,
A Romane port-way. that heere did crosse one another, whereof that which led to GLEVVM or Gloucester, C is yet extant with his high ridge evident to bee seene as farre as to Birdlip hil, and if a man looke well upon it, seemes to haue beene paved with stone. The British Chronicles record, that this City was burnt being set on fire by sparrowes, through a stratageme devised by one Gurmund, I wot not what Tyrant of Africk, whereupon Giraldus calleth it Passerum urbem, that is, the Sparrowes City: and out of those Chronicles Necham writeth thus,

Vrbs vires experta tuas Gurmunde per annos
Septem——
This City felt for seaven yeares space,
Thy forces Gurmund——— D

Who this Gurmund was I know not. The Inhabitants shew a mount beneath the City which they report Gurmund did cast up, and yet they call it Grismunds toure. Marianus an Historian of good antiquity and credite, reporteth, that Ceaulin king of the West Saxons dispossessed the Britans of it, what time hee had discomfited and put to flight their forces at Dorham, and brought Glocester to his subjection. Many yeares after this, it was subject to the West-Saxons: for, wee reade, that Penda the Mercian was deseited by Cinegilse King of the West Saxons, when hee besieged it with a mightie armie. Howbeit, at length both it, and the whole territorie and countrie came under subjection of the Mercians, and so continued untill the English Monarchie. Under which it susteined much sorrow and grievous calamity E
* by the Danes: and peradventure at the hand of Gurmon that Dane, whom the Historiographers cal both Guthrus and Gurmundus. So that it may seeme he was that Gurmund which they so much speake of. For certes when he raged, about the yeare 879. a rablement of Danes rousted here one whole yeare. Now scarce the fourth part within the wals is inhabited: the remaines beside are pasture grounds and the ruines of an Abbay, built (as the report goeth) at first by the Saxons, and newly repaired afterwards by King Henrie the First for Black Chanons, wherein, I heard say, that many *Samond. of the family of the Barons de Sancto Amando* were buried. But the castle that it had, was by a warrant from the King, overthrowne in the first yeare of Henrie the Third his reigne. The townesmen raise the chiefe gaine by the trade of clo- F thing, and they make great reports of the singular bounty of king Richard the First towards them, who endowed the Abbay with lands: and (as they say themselues) made them rulers of the seaven Hundreds adjoyning, to hold the same iurisdiction in fee farme: by vertue whereof, they should haue the hearing & determining of causes, and take unto themselues the fines, perquisites, amercements, and other profites growing

A growing out of the trialls of ſuch cauſes. Moreover king Henry the Fourth graunted unto them certaine priviledges in conſideration of their good and valiant ſervice performed againſt Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, late Duke of Surrey, Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, late Duke of Exceſter, Iohn Montacute Earle of Salisburie, Thomas de Spenſer Earle of Gloceſter, and others, who beeing by him diſpoiled of their honors, and maligning his vſurpation, conſpired to take away his life, and heere, by the townes men intercepted, were ſome of them ſlaine outright, and others beheaded.

The river Churne when it hath left Circeſter behind him, ſix miles* neare to Dounamvery an ancient ſeate of the Hungerfords, ioyneth with Iſis. For, ISIS, commonly B called Ouſe, that it might bee by originall of Gloceſter-ſhire, hath his head there, and with liuely ſprings flovveth out of the South border of this ſhire nere unto Torleton an upland village, not farre from that famous Port-way, called the Foſſe. This is that Iſis which afterwards enterteineth Tame, and by a compound word is called Tamiſis, Soveraigne as it were of all the Britain rivers in Britaine: of which a man may well and truely ſay as ancient writers did of Euphrates in the Eaſt-part of the world: that it doth both Sovv and Water the beſt part of Britan. The poeticall deſcription of vvhoſe Source or firſt head, I haue here put dovvne out of a Poem entituled The Marriage of Tame and Iſis, vvhich vvhether you admit or omit, it skilleth but little.

*Iſis, afterwards Tamiſis.

C Lanigeras quà lata greges Coſſwaldia paſcit,
Creſcit & in colles faciles, viſura Dobunos,
Haud procul à Foſſa longo ſpelunca receſſu
Cernitur, abrupti ſurgente crepidine cliui:
Cuius inauratis reſplendent limina tophis,
Atria tegit ebur, tectúmque Gagate Britanno
Emicat, alterno ſolidantur pumice poſtes.
Materiam ſed vincit opus, cedúntque labori
Artifici tophus, pumex, ebur, atque Gagates.
Pingitur hinc vitrei moderatrix Cynthia regni
D Paſſibus obliquis voluentia ſydera luſtrans:
Oceano tellus coniuncta marita marito
Illinc celatur, fraternaque flumina Ganges, Nilus, * Amazonius, tractúſq; binominis Iſtri,
Vicini & Rheni: ſed & his intermicat auro
Vellere Phrixæo diues, redimita ſpicis
Clara triumphatis erecta BRITANNIA Gallis, &c.
Vndoſo hîc ſolio reſidet regnator aquarum
ISIS, fluminea qui maieſtate verendus
Cæruleo gremio reſupinat prodigus vrnam,
E Intonſos crines vluis & arundine cinctus,
Cornua cana liquent, fluitantia lumina lymphis
Diſpergunt lacrim, propexa in pectore barba
Tota madet, toto diſtillant corpore guttæ:
Et ſalientis aquæ prorumpunt vndique venæ.
Piſciculi liquidis penetralibus vndiq; ludunt,
Plurimus & cygnus niueis argentius alis
Peruolitat circum &c.

* Foſſe way.

* Tanais, now Tana or Don.

Where Cotſwald ſpred abroad doth lie and feed faire flocks of ſheepe,
And Dobunes for to ſee in downes ariſeth nothing ſteepe,
F Within a nouke along, not much the Foſſe and it betweene, Iuſt at the riſing of a banke upright, a Cave is ſeene,
Whereof the entrie gliſtereth with ſoft ſtones richly guilt
The Hant is ſeel'd with Ivory, the rouſe aloft Ibuilt
Of Geat the beſt that Britan yeelds: The pillers verie ſtrong,
With Pumiſh laid each other courſe are raiſ'd all along.

Digitized by Google

The ſtuffe full faire, yet Art doth it ſurpaſſe; and to the feate
Of Artiſan, giue place the gould, ſtones, Yvry, and Geat.
Heere panted is the Moon that ruls the ſea like Cryſtall glaſſe,
As ſhe through roulling Signes aboue with traverſe courſe doth paſſe,
And there againe enchac'd are both land and Ocean wide,
Conjoin'd as man and wife in one, with rivers great beſide,
Like-bretheren all, as Ganges rich, ſtrange Nilus, Tanais
Yea and the courſe of Iſter large, which * double named is,
Of Rheue alſo a neighbour ſtreame. And here bedight in gold,
Among them glitt'reth Britannie with riches manifold
Of goulden fleece; a Coronet of wheat-ears ſhee doth weare,
And for her triumph over France, her head aloft doth reare, &c.
In waving Throne here ſits the king of waters all and ſome ISIS, who in that Majeſtie which rivers doth become,
All rev'rend, from his watchet lap pour's forth his ſtreame amaine
With weed and reed his haires tuckt up that grow both long and plaine,
His hoary hornes diſtilling runne, with water ſtand his eies,
And ſhoot from them a luſtre farre: his kembed beard likewiſe,
Downe to the breſt wet-through doth reach: his body drops againe
All over, and on every ſide breaks out ſome water veine.
In ſecret watriſh room's within the little fiſhes plaie,
And many a ſilver Swan beſides, his white wings doth diſplay,
And flutter round about. &c.

*Iſter and Danubius.

Earles of Gloceſter.

As touching the Earles of Gloceſter; ſome there be, who haue thruſt upon vs one William Fitz-Euſtace, for the firſt Earle: who this was, I haue not yet found, and I verily beleeue hee is yet unborne. But that which I haue found, I will not conceale from the reader. About the comming in of the Normans, wee reade that one Bithrick an Engliſh Saxon was Lord of Gloceſter, whom Maud wife to William Conquerour, upon a ſecret rankor and hatred conceived againſt him for his contempt of her beautie (for, Bithrick had before time refuſed to marrie her) troubled and moleſted moſt maliciouſlie. And when ſhee had at length caſt him in priſon, Robert Fitz-Haimon L. of Corboil in Normandie, was by the king endowed with his poſſeſſions, who in a battaile having receiued a wound with the puſh of a pike upon the temples of his head, hid his wits crackt therewith, and ſurvived a good while after, as a man beſtraught and madde. His daughter Mabil, whom others name Sibill, Robert the baſe ſonne of king Henrie the Firſt by the interceſſion of his father, obtained for his wife, but not before hee had made him Earle of Gloceſter. This is hee who is called commonly by writers the Conſul of Gloceſter. A man of an hautie valerous minde and undanted heart, as any one in that age; and who beeing never deiected with any adverſitie, wanne great praiſe for his fidelity and worthie exploits in the behalfe of his ſiſter Maud the Empreſſe againſt Stephen then uſurping the crowne of England. This honorable title left hee unto his ſonne William, who deiected with comfortleſſe griefe when death had deprived him of his onelie ſonne and heire, aſſured his eſtate with his youngeſt daughter to Iohn ſonne to king Henrie the Second, with certaine proviſoes for his other daughters. Yet his three daughters brought this Earledome into as many families. For Iohn when hee had obtained the kingdome repudiated her upon pretenſes, as well that ſhe was barren, as that they were within prohibited degrees of conſanguinity: and reſerving the Caſtle of Briſtow to himſelfe, after ſome time, paſſed over his repudiated wife with the Honor of Gloceſter, to Geffrey Mandevil ſonne of Geffrey Fitz-Peter, Earle of Eſſex for 20000. markes, who thus over-marrying himſelfe was greatly impoveriſhed, and wounded in Tournament died ſoone after iſſueleſſe: and ſhe being remaried to Hubert of Burgh died immediatlie. Then king Iohn upon an exchange granted the Earldome of Gloceſter to Almary Earle of Eureux, ſon to the eldeſt daughter of the foreſaid E. William, who enioied it a ſhort time dying alſo without iſſue. So by Amice

The Hiſtorie of Tewkeſburie Abbay.

Fitz-Haimon William of Malmesbury.

Regiſter of Keinſham Abbay, and Tewkesbury.

Pat. 15. Ioan. R. 4.

the

A the second daughter of the fore-named Earle William married to Richard de Clare Earle of Hertford, this Earledome descended to Gilbert her sonne, who was stiled Earle of Gloceſter and Hertford, and mightily enriched his house by mariyng one of the heires of William Marſhall Earle of Penbroch. Earles of Gloceſter and Hertford.

His sonne and succeſſour Richard in the begining of the Barons warres againſt King Henry the Third ended his life, leaving Gilbert his sonne to succeed him, who powerfully and prudently swaied much in the said wars, as he inclined to them or the King. He obnoxious to King Edward the first, surrendred his lands unto him, and received them againe by marying Ioane the Kings daughter (surnamed of Acres in the Holy-
B land becauſe shee was there borne) to his second wife, who bare vnto him Gilbert Clare laſt Earle of Gloceſter of this surname, slaine in the flower of his youth in Scotland at the battaile of Sterling the 6. yeare of King Edward the Second. Howbeit while this Gilbert the third was in minority, Sir Ralfe de Mont-hermer who by a secret contract had eſpouſed his mother the Kings daughter (for which he incurred the Kings high diſpleaſure, and a short impriſonment) but after reconciled was summoned to Parlaments by the name of Earle of Gloceſter and Hertford. But when Gilbert was out of his minority, he was summoned amongſt the Barons by the name of Sir Raulfe de Mont-hermer, as long as he lived, which I note more willingly for the rarenesof the example. After the death of Gilbert the third without children Sir Hugh Le De-Spenſer
C (commonly named Spenſer) the yonger, was by writers called Earle of Gloceſter, becauſe he had married the eldeſt ſiſter of the said Gilbert the third. But after that he was by the Queene and Nobles of the Realme hanged, for hatred they bare to King Edward the 2., whoſe minion he was; Sir Huge Audely, who had matched in mariage with the second ſiſter, through favour of King Edward the Third, received this honour. After his death King Richard the Second erected this Earledome into a Dukedome, and so it had three Dukes and one Earle betweene: and unto them all it prooved Equus Seianus, that is, Fatall to give them their fall. Thomas of Woodſtocke youngeſt sonne to King Edward the Third, was the firſt Duke of Gloceſter advanced to that high honour by the said King Richard the Second, and shortly after by him
D ſubverted. For when he buſily plotted great matters, the King tooke order that he ſhould be conveied ſecretly in all haſt to Calis, where with a featherbed caſt upon him he was ſmouthered: having before under his owne hand confeſſed (as it ſtands upon Record in the Parliament Rols) that he by vertue of a Patent which he had wreſted from the King, tooke upon him the Kings regall authoritie, that he came armed into the Kings preſence, reviled him, conſulted with learned men about renouncing his allegiance, and deviſed to depoſe the King: for which being now dead he was by authority of Paliament attainted and condemned of high treaſon. When hee was thus diſpatched, the ſame King conferred the title of Earle of Gloceſter upon Thomas Le De-Spenſer in the right of his great Grand-mother; who within a while
E after ſped no better than his great Grand-father Sir Hugh. For by King Henry the fourth he was violently diſplaced, ſhamefully degraded, and at Briſtow by the peoples fury beheaded. After ſome yeares King Henry the Fifth created his brother Humfrey, the Second Duke of Gloceſter who ſtiled himſelfe the firſt yeare of King Henry the Sixth, as I haue ſeene in an Inſtrument of his. Humfrey by the grace of God, ſonne, brother, and uncle to Kings, Duke of Gloceſter, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zeland, and Penbrooke; Lord of Frieſland, Great Chamberlaine of the Kingdome of England, Protector and Defender of the ſame Kingdome, and Church of England. A man that had right well deſerued of the common welth and of learning, but through the fraudulent practiſe and malignant envy of the Queene brought to his end at Saint Edmonds Bury. The third
F and laſt Duke was Richard brother to King Edward the fourth who afterwards having moſt wickedly murdred his Nephews, uſurped the Kingdome, by the name of King Richard the third; and after two yeares loſt both it and his life in a pitched field, finding by experience that power gotten by wicked meanes is never long laſting.

Concerning this laſt Duke of Gloceſter, and his firſt entrie to the Crowne, giue me leave for a while to play the part of an Hiſtoriographer, which I will ſpeedily give Richard the third King of England.

Digitized by Google

giue ouer againe as not well able to act it. When this Richard Duke of Glocester being now proclaimed Protector of the Kingdome had vnder his command his tender two nephewes, Edward the Fifth King of England, and Richard Duke of Yorke, hee retriuing after the Kingdome for himselfe, by profuse liberalitie and bounty to very many, by passing great gratuitie tempered with singular affabilitie, by deepe wisdome, by ministring iustice indifferently, and by close deuises, wonne wholly to him all mens harts, but the Lawyers especially to serue his turne. So shortly he effected that in the name of all the States of the Realme, there should be exhibited vnto him a supplication, wherein they most earnestly besought him, for the publike Weale of the Kingdome, to take vpon him the Crowne, to vphold his Countrey, and the common-weale now shrinking and downe falling, not to suffer it to runne headlong into vtter desolation; by reason that both lawes of nature, and the authority of positiue lawes, and the laudable customes and liberties of England, wherein euery Englishman is an inheritor, were subverted and trampled vnder foote through ciuill wars, rapines, murthers, extortions, oppressions, and all sorts of miserie. But especially euer since that King Edward the Fourth, his brother, bewitched by sorcerie and amorous potions fell in fancie with Dame Elizabeth Grete widdow, whom he married without the assent of his Nobles, without solemne publication of Banes, secretly in a profane place, and not in the face of the Church, contrary to the law of Gods-Church and commendable custome of the Church of England: and which was worse, having before time by a præcontract espoused Dame Aeleanor Butler, daughter to the old Earle of Shrewsburie: whereby most sure and certaine it was, that the foresaid matrimonie was vnlawfull and therewith the children of them begotten illegitimate, and so vnable to inherite or claime the Crowne. Moreover considering that George Duke of Clarence the second brother of King Edward the Fourth, was by authoritie of Parliament conuicted and attainted of high treason, thereupon his children disabled and debarred from all right succession; euident it was to every man, that Richard himselfe remained the sole and vndoubted heire to the Crowne. Of whom they assured themselues, that being borne in England hee would seriously prouide for the good of England, neither could they make any doubt of his birth, parentage, and Filiation; whose wisdome also, whose iustice, princely courage, warlicke exploits most valiantly atchiued in the defence of the State, and whose roiall birth and bloud, (as who was descended from the bloud roiall of the three most renowned Kingdomes of England, France, and Spaine) they knew assuredly. Wherefore having throughly weighed these and such like motiues, they willingly and withall hearty affection tendring the welfare of the land, by that their petition and one generall accord of them all elected him for their King, and with prayers and teares lying prostrate before him, humbly craued and besought his gratious fauour to accept and take upon him the kingdomes of England, France, and Ireland, appertaining to him by right of inheritance, and now presented to him by their free and lawfull election; and so for verie pitty and naturall zeale to reach forth vnto his Countrey now forlorne his helping hand, that after so great and grieuous stormes the sonne of grace might shine upon them to the comfort of all true harted English men: This supplication being tendred priuately to himselfe, before that he entred vpon the Kingdome, was presented also afterwards vnto him in the publicke assembly of all the States of the Realme, and there allowed, and so by their authoritie enacted and published, with a number of words (as the maner is) heaped vp together, that according to the law of God, the law of Nature, the lawes of England and most laudable custome, Richard was and is by lawfull election, inauguration, and Coronation the vndoubted King of England &c. and that the Kingdomes of England, France, and Ireland appertained rightfully to him and the heires of his body lawfully begotten. And to vse the very words as they stand penned in the originall Record. By the authoritie of the Parliament it was pronounced, decreed and declared that all, and singular the contents in the foresaid Bill were true and vndoubted; and the Lord the King with the assent of the three States of the Kingdome, by the foresaid authoritie pronounceth, decreeth, and declareth the same, for true and vndoubted

She was married first to R. Butler L. of Sudley.

v. Bacon—H7—f. 13 24. in engl. of H7 1474 6.

A vndoubted. Theſe things haue I laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Rowle, that yee may vnderſtand, both what and how great matters, the power of a Prince, the outward ſhew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, penſiue feare, deſire of change, and goodly pretenſes, are able to effect in that moſt wiſe aſ-ſembly of all the States of a Kingdome, euen againſt all law and right. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to haue been a Soueraigne had he not bin a Soveraigne as Galba was reputed; who when he was a Soveraigne, deceaued all mens expectation: but moſt worthy indeed of Soueraignitie, had he not (being tranſported with ambition (which blaſteth all good parts) by lewd practiſes, and miſcheiuous
B meanes made foule way thereunto. For that by the common conſent of all that are wiſe, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes.

Now remembring my ſelfe to be a Chorographer I will returne to my owne part, and leaue theſe matters vnto our Hiſtoriographers, when God ſhall ſend them.

C

In this Countie there are Pariſhes 280.

D

OXFORD-

E

F

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

OXFORD-SHIRE.

OXford-ſhire, in the Saxon tongue Oxenpopopcſcyne which, as we ſaid, belonged alſo to the Dobuni, on the Weſt ſide joyneth upon Glocester-ſhire, on the South, which way it runneth out fartheſt in bredth, is diſſevered from Barkſhire by the river Iſis or Tamis: Eaſtward, it bordereth upon Buckingham-ſhire: and Northward where it endeth pointed, in maner of a cone, or Pine-apple, hath North-hampton-ſhire, of one ſide & Warwick-ſhire on the other ſide, confining with it. It is a fertile country and plentifull: wherin the plaines are garniſhed with Corne-fieldes and meddowes, the hilles beſet with woods, ſtored in every place not onely with corne and fruites, but alſo with all kinde of game for hound, or hauke; and well watered with fiſhfull rivers. For Isis, or Ovse which afterwards comes to be named Tamis maketh a long courſe and runneth under the South-ſide; Cherwell alſo a prety river well ſtored with fiſh, after it hath for a time parted North-hampton-ſhire, and Oxford-ſhire paſſeth gently with a ſtill ſtreame thorow the middeſt of the country, and diuideth it, as it were, into two parts. And Tamis with his waters comforteth and giveth hart to the Eaſt-part, untill both of them together with many other riverets and brookes running into them be lodged in Iſis.

This Iſis when it hath paſſed a ſmall part of Wil-ſhire, no ſooner is entred into Oxford ſhire but, preſently being kept in and reſtrained with Rodcot bridge, paſſeth by Eablac, where Sir R. Vere that moſt puiſſant Earle of Oxford, Marqueſſe of Dublin & Duke of Ireland, who as he ſtood in moſt high favour and authority with king Richard the Second, ſo he was as much envied of the Nobles, taught us (as one ſaid) that no power is alwaies powerfull. Who being there diſcomfited in a skirmiſh by the Nobles and conſtrained to take the river and ſwim over, found the Cataſtrophe of his fortune and ſubverſion of his ſtate: For, immediatly he fled his country and died diſtreſſed in exile. Of whom the Poet in his Mariage of Tame and Iſis, made theſe verſes.

Rodcot bridge.

Eablac.

1387.

——Hic Verus notiſſimus apro,
Dum dare terga negat virtus, & tendere contrà
Non ſinit inuictæ rectrix prudentia mentis;
Vndique dum reſonat repetitis ictibus umbo,
Tinnitúque ſtrepit circum ſua tempora caſſis,
Se dedit in fluuium, fluuius lætatus & illo
Hoſpite, ſuſcepit ſalvum, ſalvum que remiſit.

Heere VERE, well knowen by badge of ſauage Boore,
While man-hood ſhames to yeeld, yet ſtrive againe
Stout heart may not, reſtraind by wiſdomes lore;
Whiles ſhield reſounds by doubled blowes a maine,
And helmet rings about his eares; is faine
The ſtreame to take: The river glad therefore,
His gueſt tooke ſafe, and ſet him ſafe on ſhore.

Wild bore the badge of the Veres.

Iſis from thence over flowing many times the flat and low grounds, is firſt encreaſed vvith the brooke Windruſh, vvhich ſpringing out of Cotteſwold, hath ſtanding upon the banke-ſide Burford, in the Saxon tongue Beoppopo, where Cuthred King of the Weſt-Saxons at that time by of curteſie the Mercians, when he could endure no longer the moſt grievous exactions of Aethelbald the Mercian, who began to oppreſſe his people and ſucke their bloud, came into the field againſt him, and put him to flight: having won his Banner, vvherein, by report of authors, there vvas a golden dragon depainted. Then paſſeth it by Minſter Lovell, the habitation in times paſt of the Burford.

Barons Lovell.

Digitized by Google

*Lovell. the great Barons Lovels of Tishmerch, vvho being descended from * Lupellus a Noble man of Normandy flourished for many ages, and augmented their estate by rich mariages with the daughters & heires of Richmerch, with the heires of the Lords Holland, D'eyncourt, and the Vicont Beaumont. But their line expired in Fraunces Vicont Lowell, Lord Chamberlaine to King Richard the Third, (attainted by King Henry the Seventh and slaine in the battaile at Stoke in the quarrell of Lambert that counterfeit Prince) whose sister Fridiswid was Grandmother to Henry the first Lord Norris. A

Whitney. Hence Windrush holding on his course watereth Whitney an ancient towne, and before the Normans daies belonging to the Bishops of Winchester: to which adjoineth

Arsic. Coges, the chiefe place of the Barony of Arsic, the lords whereof branched out of the family of the Earles of Oxford are utterly extinguished many yeeres agoe. Neere unto this the Forrest of Wuchwood beareth a great breadth and in time past spred farre wider. For King Richard the Third disforested the great territory of Witchwood betweene Woodstocke & Brighstow: which Edward the fourth made to be a forrest, as John Rosse of Warwick witnesseth. Isis having received Windrush passeth downe to Einsham B

Einsham. in the Saxon tongue Elnepham, a Manour in times past of the Kings, seated among most pleasant Meadowes, which Cuthwulfe the Saxon was the first that tooke from the Britans whom he had heereabout vanquished, and long after Aethelmar a Noble man beautified it with an Abby: The which, Aethelred King of England in the yeere of salvation 1005. confirmed to the Benedictine Monkes, and in his confirmation signed the priveledge of the liberty thereof, (I speake out of the very originall grant as it was written) with the signe of the sacred Crosse: but now is turned into a private dwelling house and acknowledgeth the Earle of Derby Lord thereof. Beneath this, Euenlode a C litle river arising likewise out of Cotteswald speedeth him into Isis; which riveret in the very border of the Shire passeth by an ancient monument standing not far from his banke, to wit, certaine huge stones placed in a round circle (the common people Rolle-Richstones. usually call them Rolle-rich stones, and dreameth that they were sometimes men, by a wonderfull Metamorphosis turned into hard stones). The draught of them, such as it is, portraied long since, heere I represent unto your view. For, without all forme and shape they be, unæquall and by long continuance of time much impaired. The D highest of them all, which without the circle looketh into the earth, they vse to call The King, because he should haue beene King of England (forsooth) if he had once seene Long Compton, a little towne so called lying beneath, and which a man, if he go some few paces forward, may see: other fiue standing at the other side, touching as it were, one another, they imagine to haue beene Knights mounted on horsebacke; and the rest the army. But lo the foresaid Portraiture.

E

F

These

These would I verily thinke to have beene the monument of some victorie, and A haply, erected by Rollo the Dane, who afterwards conquered Normandie. For, what time as he with his Danes and Normans troubled England with deprædations, we read that the Danes joined battaile with the English thereby, at Hoche Norton, and afterwards fought a second time at Scier stane in Huiccia, which also I would deeme to be that Mere-stone standing hard by for a land Marke, and parting foure shires:
For, so much doth that Saxon word Scier-stane most plainly import. Certainly in an Exchequer booke the towne adiacent is called Rollen-drich, where as it is there specified, Turstan le Dispenser held land by Serieanty of the Kings dispensarie, that is to be the Kings Steward. As for that Hoch-Norton, which I spake of before, for the rus-B ticall behaviour of the inhabitants in the age afore going it grew to be a proverbe, when folke would say of one rudely demeaning himselfe & unmanerly after an Hog-gish kind, that he was borne at Hocknorton. This place, for no one thing was more famous in old time, than fort he wofull slaughter of the English men in a foughten field against the Danes, under the reigne of King Edward the Elder. Afterwards, it became the seat of the Baronie of the D'Oilies an honorable and ancient familie of the Norman race; of whom the first that came into England was Robert D'Oily, who for his good and valiant service, received of William Conquerour this towne and many faire possessions, whereof hee gave certaine to his sworne brother Roger Iuerie, C which were called the Baronie of Saint Valerie. But when the said Robert departed this life without issue male, his brother Niele succeeded him therein: whose sonne Robert the second was founder of Osney Abbay. But at length the daughter and heire generall of this house D'Oyly, was married to Henrie Earle of Warwick: and she bare unto him Thomas Earle of Warwicke, who died without issue in the reigne of Henry the Third: and Margaret, who deceased likewise without children, albeit she had two husbands, Iohn Marescall, and Iohn de Plessetis, both of them Earles of Warwicke.
But then, (that I may speake in the very words of the Charter of the Grant) King Henrie the Third, graunted Hoch-Norton and Cudlington unto Iohn de Plessetis, which were in times past the possessions of Henrie D' Oily, and which after the decease of Margaret, wife D somtime to the foresaid Iohn Earle of Warwick, fell into the Kings hand as an Eschaet of Normans lands: To have and to hold, untill the lands of England & Normandie were common.
Howbeit out of this ancient and famous stocke there remaineth at this day a familie of D' Oilyes in this shire. Evenlode passeth by no memorable thing else, but La Brüer, now Bruern sometime an Abbay of white Monks, & after hee hath runne a good long course taketh to him a brooke, neere unto which standeth Woodstocke, in the English Saxon language ꝑuꝑtoc, that is, a woody place, where King Etheldred in times past held an assembly of the states of the Kingdome and enacted lawes. Heere is one of the Kings houses full of State and magnificence, built by King Henrie the first, who adjoined also thereunto a very large park compassed round about with a stone wall, E which, Iohn Rosse writeth to haue beene the first parke in England, although we read once or twise even in Doomesday booke, these words, Parcus silvestris best iarum in other places. In which sense old Varro vseth the word Parcus, which some thinke to be but a new word. But since that, Parkes are growen to such a number that there be more of them in England, than are to be found in all Christendome beside; so much were our ancestours ravished with an extraordinarie delight of hunting. Our Historians report, that King Henrie the second being enamoured upon Rosamund Clifford, a Damosell so faire, so comely, and well favoured without comparison, that her beautie did put all other women out of the Princes minde, in so much as now she was termed Rosa mundi, that is, The Rose of the world; and for to hide her out of the F sight of his Iealous Iuno the Queene, he built a Labyrinth in this house, with many inexplicable windings, backward and forward: Which notwithstanding is no where to be seene at this day. The towne it selfe, having nothing in it at all to shewe, glori-eth yet in this, that Geffrey Chaucer our English Homer was there bred and brought up. Of whom and of our English Poets I may truly avouch that, which that learned Italian said of Homer and the Greeke Poets,

Geffrey Chaucer.

Hic

Digitized by Google

Hic ille est cuius de gurgite sacro Combibit arcanos vatum omnis turba furores. A

This is the man whose sacred streame hath served all the crew
Of Poets, thence they dranke their fill, thence they their furies drew.

For, hee surpassing all others without question in wit, and leaving our smattering Poet-asters by many degrees behind him:

iam monte potitus,
Ridet anhelantem dura ad fastigia turbam.

When once himselfe the steepe hill top had woone,
At all the sort of them he laught anone
To see how they the pitch thereof to gaine B
Puffing and blowing doe clamber vp in vaine.

Isis having now entertained Evenlode, divideth his chanell and severing it selfe maketh many and those most delectable Ilands, neere which stood Godstow a little Nunnerie, which Dame Ida a rich widdow built; and King Iohn both repaired and also endowed with yeerely revenews, that these holy Virgins might relieue with their praier (for by this time had that perswasion possessed all mens minds) the soules of King Henrie the second his father, and of Rosamund: For, there was she buried with this Epitaph in Rhyme,

Hac iacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosamunda, C
Non redolet, sed olet, quæ redolere solet.

Rose of the world, not rose the fresh pure floure
Within this tombe hath taken up her boure:
She senteth now and nothing sweet doth smell,
Which earst was wont to savour passing well.

* (We read that Hugh the B. of Lincolne Dioceſan of this place comming hither caused her bones to be removed out of the Church as vnworthy of Christian buriall for her vnchast life. Neuertheless the holy sisters there translated them againe into the Church, and layed them vp in a perfumed leather bagge; enclosed in lead as was D found in her tombe at the dissolution of the house; and they erected a crosse there whereby the passengers were put in minde with two riming verses to serve God, and pray for her. But I remember them not.)

* Neither doth the Owse or Isis as yet gather himselfe into one streame, when hee meeteth with Cherwell, which out of Northamptonshire, runneth almost through the mids of this Countrie. This river first watereth Banburie sometime Banesbyrig, a faire large town, at which Kinric the West Saxon King in old time put to flight the Britans in a memorable battaile fighting manfully for their lives, state, & all they had: and in this later foregoing age, not farre of Richard Nevill Earle of Warwicke siding with the house of Lancaster gaue such an overthrowe to those of Yorke, that forthwith al- E so he tooke King Edward the Fourth now forlorne and hopelesse. Now the fame of this towne is for zeale, cheese, and cakes, and hath a Castle for shew, which Alexander Bishop of Lincolne, (for to the Sea of Lincolne it belongeth) first built, who having a minde to dwell stately rather than quietly, brought upon himselfe many adversities by his huge buildings. About this towne, (that I may observe so much by the way) peeces of the Romane Emperours coine found, (as also elsewhere in the field neere adjoining) make somewhat to proue the antiquitie of the place.

Neere to Banburie is Hanwell, where the familie of Cope hath flourished many yeeres in great and good esteeme. And neere it againe is Broughton the habitation of S. Richard Fienes, or Fenis: unto whom and to the heires of his bodie, the most F mighty Prince King Iames, in the first yeere of his reigne, Recognized and confirmed the name, stile, title, degree, dignitie and honour of the Baron Say and Sele: as who lineally descended from Sir Iames Fienes Baron Say and Sele, and Lord high Treasurer of England who was cruelly beheaded by a rable of rebelles in the time of King Henry the Sixt.

Cherwell

Digitized by Google

A Cherwel carrying his ſtreame along from Banbury ſeeth nothing but pleaſant fields paſſing well husbanded, and as plentifull medowes. Amongſt which ſtand Heiford Warin ſo denominated VVarin Fitz-Gerold Lord thereof, Heyford Purcell likewiſe ſo named of the Purcels; or de Porcellis ancient gentlemen the old owners, Blechindon * an ancient poſſeſſion of the ancient familie Le Pever, and Iſlip in elder time Ghiſtlipe Iſlip. the natall place of that King Edward (whom for his religious pietie and continencie our anceſtours, and the Popes vouchſafed the name of Saint Edward the Confeſſor) as he himſelfe witneſſeth in the originall-Charter, whereby he granted this place to the Church of Weſtminſter.

B Here there runneth a riveret from the Eaſt in to Cherwell, which paſſeth by Burceſter, Burceſter. in the Engliſh Saxons tongue Bupenceaſtep, and Bennacaſtep, a little towne carrying an ancient name, but wherein I haue obſerved no matter of antiquity, ſaue that Gilbert Baſſet and Egelina Courteney his wife, built heere a religious houſe in honour of Saint Eadburga, in the time of king Henrie the Second, and that not long ſince the Barons Le Strange of Knocking were Lords of the place. But Weſtward, there lie ſome few remaines of a decaied and forlorne ancient ſtation, Alcheſter, Ald cheſter. they call it, happily as one would ſay Aldcheſter that is, an old towne, by which, a port way from Wallengford, as the neighbour inhabitants thinke, led to Banbury, and the ſame they called Akemanſtreet way: the tract whereof for certaine miles together Bath ſometime called C is yet moſt plainely to be ſeene in the plaine of Otmore, which oftentimes is ſtrangely overſpread with winter waters. Cherwell thus increaſed paſſeth Southward neare Akemanceſter. to Hedindon, which King Iohn gave to Sir Thomas Baſſet for his Barony. Hedindon. *

But where Cherwell is confluent with Iſis, and pleaſant Eights or Iſlets lye diſperſed by the ſundry diſſeverings of waters; there the moſt famous Vniuerſitie of Oxford. Oxford, called in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue Oxenford, ſheweth it ſelfe aloft in a champion plaine. OXFORD, I ſay, our moſt noble Athens, The Muſes-ſeate, and one of Englands ſtaies; nay The Sun, the Eye, and the Soule thereof, the very Source and moſt cleere D ſpring of good literature and wiſdome: From whence, religion, civility and learning are ſpred moſt plenteouſlie into all parts of the Realme. A faire and goodlie Citie, whether a man reſpect the ſeemely beautie of private houſes or the ſtatelie magnificence of publicke buildings, together with the wholeſome ſite or pleaſant proſpect thereof. For, the hils beſet with vvoods doe ſo environ the plaine, that as on the one ſide they exclude the peſtilent Southwinde, and the tempeſtuous Weſt winde on the other, ſo they let in the cleering Eaſtern-winde onely, and the Northeaſt winde with all, which free from all corruption: Whence it came to paſſe that of this ſituation it vvas, as vvriters record in ancient times, called Belloſitum. Some are of opinion, that it hath beene named Caer Vortigern and Caer Vember in the Britiſh language, and that I wot not what Vortigerns and Memprices built it. But what ever it was in the Britans time, the Engliſh Saxons called it Oxenford, and altogether in the ſame ſignification that the Grecians terme their Boſphori, and E the Germans their Ochen-furt upon Odera, to wit, of the fourd of Oxen: in which ſenſe it is named of our Britans in Wales at this daie Rhyd-ychen: And yet Leland grounding upon a probable conjecture, deriveth the name from the river Ouſe called in Latin Iſis, and ſuppoſeth that it hath beene named Ouſford conſidering that the river Eights or Iſlands which Iſis ſcattereth hereabout, be called Ouſney.

Sage antiquity, as wee reade in our Chronicles, conſecrated this City even in the Britiſh age unto the Muſes: whom from Greek-lad (which is a ſmall towne at this daie in Wiltſhire) they tranſlated hither as unto a more fruitfull plant-F plot. For thus writeth Alexander Necham, The skill of Civill law Italie chalengeth to it ſelfe: but heavenlie writ or holie ſcripture, the liberall ſciences alſo doe proove, that the City of Paris is to bee preferred before all others. Moreover according to the Propheſie of Merline, wiſdome and learning flouriſhed at Oxford, which in due time was to paſſe over into the parts of Ireland. But when during the Engliſh Saxons age next enſuing, there was nothing but continuall waſting and raſing of Lib. 2. de Natur. rerum.

Digitized by Google

Frideswide. townes and Cities, according to the sway and current of those daies it susteined A in part the common calamity of that time, and for a great while was frequented onlie for the reliques of Frideswide, who for the chastity and integrity of her life was canonized a Saint, upon this occasion especially, for that by a solemne vow shee had wholy devoted her selfe unto the service of God; and Prince Algar whiles hee came a wooing unto her, was miraculouslie, as writers say, stricken blinde. This Frideswide, (as wee reade in William of Malmesburie) triumphing for her virginity, erected heere a Monasterie, into which when certaine Danes adjudged to die in King Etheldreds time fledde for refuge as to a sanctuarie, they were all burned with the buildings, (such was the unsatiable anger of the Englishmen against them). But soone af- B ter, when the King repented this act, the sanctuary was clensed, the monasterie reedifi-ed, the old lands restored, new possessions added, and at length the place was given by Roger Bishop of Salisburie unto a Chanon excellently well learned who there presen- ted unto God many such Chanons who should liue regularlie in their order. But leaving these matters, let vs returne unto the Universitie. When the tempesteous Danish stormes were meetelie well blowne over, Aelfred that most devout and Godly king recalled the long banished Muses unto their owne sacred Chancelles and built three Colledges: one for Grammarians, a second for Philosophers, and a third for Divines. But this you may more plainely understand out of these words in olde Annales of the new Abbey of Winchester. In the yeare of Christs C incarnation 806. and in the second yeare of Saint Grimbald his comming into England, was the Vniversitie of Oxford begunne. The First Regents in the same and readers in the Divinitie schoole were Saint Neoth an Abbat, and besides a worthie teacher in Divinitie, and holie Grymbald a right excellent professor of the most sweete written word of holie scripture. But in Grammar and Rhetoricke, the regent was Asserius a Monke, in the skill of Literature passing well learned. In Logicke, Musicke and Arithmeticke, the Reader was Iohn a Monke of the Church of * Saint Davids:
In Geometrie and Astronomie reade Iohn a Monke also and companion of Saint Grimbald, a man of a passing quicke witte, and right learned every way: at which Lectures was present that most glorious and invincible King Aelfred, whose memoriall in D every mans mouth shalbe as sweet as hony.

*Menevensis.

But presently after, as wee reade in a verie good manuiscript copie of the said Asserius, who at the same time professed learning heere, There arose a most daungerous and pernicious dissention at Oxford, betweene Grimbald and these great clerkes whome hee brought thither with him of the one side, and those olde schoole-men whom hee there found, on the other side: who upon his comming refused altogether to embrace the rules, orders and formes of reading prescribed and begunne by him. For three yeares space the variance and discord betweene them was not great, howbeit there lurked a secret hatred festered and festered among them, which brake out afterwards in most grievous and bitter manner, and was most evident. For the appea- E sing whereof, that most invincible King Ælfred beeing by a message and complaint from Grimbald certified of that discord, went to Oxford to determine and end this contro- uersie: Where also himselfe in person tooke exceeding great paines in giving audience to the quarells and complaints of both sides. Now the maine substance of all the contention stood upon this point. Those old schoolemen hotely avouched, that before Grimbalds comming to Oxford learning generallie flourished there, although the schollers and students were fewer then in numberthan in former times, by reason that the most of them through the crueltie and tyrannie of Painims were expelled. Moreover they proved and declared and that by the undoubted testimonie of old Chronicles, that the orders and ordinances of that place were made and established by certaine Godlie and learned F men, as namelie Gildas of holie memorie, Melkin, Ninnius, Kentigern and others, who all of them studied and followed their bookes there, untill they were aged persons, managing and governing all things there in happy peace and concord: also, that Saint German came to Oxford and abode there halfe a yeare, what time as hee travailed through Britaine, with a purpose to preach against the Pelagian heresies: who wonderous

Digitized by Google

A wonderous well allowed of their former orders and ordinances. This Noble King with incredible and unexampled humility heard both partes most diligentlie, exhorting them in earnest wise, (enterlaicing godly and wholsome admonitions) to keepe mutuall societie and concord one with another. And so the King departed with this minde, hoping they would all of both sides obey his counsell and embrace his orders. But Grymbald taking this unkindlie and to the heart, forthwith went his waies to Winchester Abbay newlie founded by Aelfred: Shortlie after hee caused his owne toumbe to bee translated to Wintchester, wherein hee purposed after hee had runne his race in this life, that his bones should bee bestowed, in an arched vault made under the chancell of Saint Peters Church in Oxford: Which Church verily the same Grymbald had built from B the verie foundation out of the ground, with stone most curiouslie wrought and polished.

Within some yeares after this new revived felicitie, there ensued diverse disturbances from the Danes, and afterward followed one or two calamities. For, the Danes in the reigne of Etheldred by way of robbery made foule worke and havock there: and streight after, Harald surnamed Light foote raged against it with such barbarous cruelty, for that some of his followers were slaine there in a fray, that there followed thereupon a most heauie banishment of the students, and the Universitie, (a sorrowfull spectacle) lay, as it were, halfe dead and past all recovery, untill the daies of king William the Conquerour. Whom some write falsly to haue wonne it by assault: but C Oxonia written amisse in the Copies, for Exonia, that is, Excester deceived them. And that it was at that time a place of studies and students, may bee understood out of these words of Ingulph, who in that age flourished. I. Ingulph (saith hee) *beeing first placed in Westminster, and afterwards sent to the studie of Oxford, when as in learning of Aristotle I had profited aboue my fellowes of the same time &c. For those schooles of learning which wee call Academies or Universities, that age termed Studia, that is, Studies, as I will shew anon. But, at this verie time, it was so empoverished, that whereas within the wall and without, (I speake out of William the Conquerour his Domesday booke) there were about seaven hundred and fifty houses, D besides foure and twenty mansions upon the wals, fiue hundered of them were not able to pay their subsidie or imposition. And to use the verie words of that booke, *This City paide pro Theloneo et Gablo, and for other customes by the yeare to the King twentie pounds and sixe quarts of honie: and unto Earle Algar tenne pounds. About this time, Robert D'oily a Noble man of Normandie (of whom I haue before spoken) when hee had received at the hands of William the Conquerour in reward of his service in the warres, large possessions in this shire, built a spatious castle in the West side of the City with deepe ditches, rampiers, an high raised mount, and therein a parish Church to Saint George, unto which when as the parishioners could not haue accesse, by reason that king Stephen most streightly besieged Maude the E Empresse within this castle, Saint Thomas Chapell in the streete hard by was built. Hee also, as it is thought, fortified the whole City with new walles, which by little and little time doth force, and, as it were, embreach with his assault. Robert likewise, Nephew unto him by his brother Neale, and Chamberlaine to king Henrie the First, founded Ousney or Osney, a most stately Abbay, as the ruines doe yet shew, amidest the divided waters, not farre from the castle: perswaded thereto by Edith his wife, (the daughter of Forne) who before time had beene one of king Henrie the First his sweet hearts and lig-bies.

Studia, Schooles or Vniversities.

Cooks Hist. p. 142. § 213.

*Toll and Tribute.

1074.

Register of Osney Abbay.

Osney.

1129.

About those times, as wee reade in the Chronicle of the said Osney Abbay, F Robert Puleni beganne to reade in Oxford the holie scriptures, in England now growne out of request: Who afterwards, when as by his Doctrine the English and Frenchmen both had much profited; was called by Pope Lucius the second and promoted to bee Chancellour of the Church of Rome. To the same effect also writeth John Rosse of Warwick. By the procurement of King Henrie the First, the Divinity lecture which had discontinued a long time in Oxford, beganne againe to flourish, and there hee built a Pallace, which King Edward the second at length converted into a Covent of Carmelits.

Digitized by Google

Richard Cuer de Lyon,

But long before this time, in this Palace was borne into the world that Lion-harted knight, Richard the First King of England; commonly called Ceeur de Lion, a Prince of a most hautie minde and full of resolution, borne for the weale of Christendom, the honour of England, and the terrour of Infidels. Upon whose death a Poet in that age of no meane conceit verified thus, for that his remaines were interred in diverse places,

Viscera Carceolum, Corpus Fons servat Ebrardi,
Et cor Rhothomagum, Magne Richarde, tuum:
In tria dividitur unus, qui, plus fuit uno,
Nec superest uno gloria tanta viro.

Hic Richarde jaces, sed mors si cederet armis
Victa timore tui, cederet ipsa tuis.

Thy Bowels keep's Carceolum, thy corps Font Everard:
And Roan thy valiant Lions heart, O noble great Richard Thus one three fold divided is, for more he was then one,
And for that one, so great he was, such glory is in none.

Here li'st thou Richard, but if death to force of armes could yeeld,
For feare of thee he would to thee haue given, and lost the field.

Thus after the City was refreshed againe with these buildings, many beganne to flock hither as it were to a mart of learning and vertue: and by the industrious means especially, of that Robert Pulein, a man borne to promote the common wealth of learning, who refused no paines, but laboured al that he could to set open again those well springs of good literature which had beene stopped up, through the favour especially of King Henry the First, king Henry the Second, and king Richard his sonne, of whom I spake ere while. And these endevours of Pulein sped so well and tooke so good effect, that in the reigne of king Iohn, there were here three thousand Students; who all at once every one changed their habitation to Reding and partly to Cambridge, because the Citizens seemed to wrong and abuse over-much these students and professours of learning: but after this tumult was appeased, they returned within a short time. Then and in the age presently ensuing, as God provided this City for good learning, so hee raised up a number of verie good Princes and Prelats to the good thereof, who for the adorning and maintenance of learning extended their liberality in the highest degree. For, when king Henrie the Third had by way of pilgrimage visited Saint Frideswide, (a thing before time thought to bee an hainous offense in a Prince for the dishonour offered to her by Algar a Prince) and so remooved that superstitious feare, wherewith some superstitious priests had for a time frighted Princes from once comming to Oxford: and had assembled here a verie great Parliament for the composing of certaine controversies betweene him and the Barons, hee confirmed the priviledges granted by the former kings, and conferred also some other himselfe. So that by this time there was so great store of learned men, that diverse most skilfull in Divinity as well as in Humanitie, were in great numbers spread from thence both into the Church and Commonwealth: and Mathew Paris, in plaine termes called The Vniversitie of Oxford, The Second schoole of the Church, nay, rather a Ground-worke of the Church, next after Paris. For, with the name of Universitie the Bishoppes of Rome had before time honoured Oxford, which title at that time by their Decrees they vouchsafed to none but unto that of Paris, this of Oxford, unto Bononia in Italie and Salomanca in Spaine. And in the Councell of Vienna, it was ordained that there should bee erected schooles for the Hebrew, Greeke Arabick and Chaldæan tongues, in these Studies of Paris, Oxford, Bononie and * Salamanca, as the most famous of all others, to the end that the knowledge of those tongues might by effectuall instruction bee throughly learned. And, that Catholick men having sufficient knowledge in those tongues should bee chosen, twaine skilfull in every of those tongues. For those who Clementinarum Quinto.

A who were to be professours in Oxford The same Councell ordeined, That the Prelats of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, the Monasteries also the Chapters, the Covents, the Colledges exempt, and not exempt, and Persons of Churches should provide competent stipends.

Out of these words may be observed, both that Oxford was the chiefe place of studies in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, & also that those Schooles which we now adaies doe call Academies and Universities, were aptly in old time named Studies: as S. Hierom tearmed the Schooles of Gaul, Studia Florentissima, that is, most flourishing Studies. And as for the name of Vniuersity, it was taken up about the time of King Henry the Third, for a Publike schoole, and if I be not deceived in mine owne B obseruations, it was then in vse not for the place but for the very body and society of Students, as we read in bookes of that age, Vniuersitas Magistrorum Oxonia, Vniuersitas Magistrorum Cantabrigiæ, that is, The Vniuersitie of Maisters of Oxford &c. But happilie this may seeme beside my text.

Studia. Ad Rusticum Monachum.

Vniuersitas.

Now by this time, good and bountifull Patrons began to furnish the City within, and the Suburbs without with most stately Colledges, Hauls, and Schooles, and to endow them also with large revenewes: for the greatest part of the Vniuersitie was before time in the suburbs without the North-gate. In the reigne of King Henry the Third, John Balliol of Barnards Castle in the Bishopricke of Durham who died in C the yeare 1269. the father of Ball.ol King of Scots, founded Balliol Colledge and so named it: and streight after Walter Merton Bishop of Rochester, translated the College which he had built in Surrey to Oxford, in the yeere 1274. enriched it with lands and possessions, naming it The house of Scholers of Merton, but now it is called Merton Colledge. And these two were the first endowed Colledges for Students in Christendome. William Archdeacon of Durrham repaired and enlarged with new building that worke of K. Aelfred, which now they call, Vniversitie College. At which time, the Students; for that they entertained somewhat coursely Otto the Popes Legate, or horsleach rather, sent out to sucke the English Clergies bloud, were excomunicat and withall indignities shamefully handled. And in those daies, as Armachanus writeth, there were counted heere thirty thousand Students. Under King Edward the D Second, Walter Stapledon Bishop of Exceter founded Exceter Colledge and Hart Hall, and the King himselfe in imitation of him built the Colledge commonly called Oriall, and S. Mary Haull. At which time a convert Iew read an Hebrew lecture heere, unto whom for a stipend every one of the Clergy of Oxford for every marke of his ecclesiasticall living, contributed a penny. Afterward Queene Philip wife to K. Edward the third, built Queenes Colledge, and Simon Islip, Archbishop of Canterbury, Canterbury Colledge.

Colleges.

The booke of Melros.

The first indowed Colleg for Scholers.

1318. Register of Hide-Abby.

The Students then, having the world at will and all things falling out to their hearts desire, became insolent, and being devided into factions, under the names of Northren I and Southren men, strucke up the Alarum to intestine and unreasonable tumults among themselues. Whereupon the Northren faction went their waies to Stanford and began there to set up schooles. But some few yeares after, when Gods fauour shining more lightsomly had scattered away the clouds of contention, they returned from Stanford recalled by Proclamation directed to the High-shiriffe of Lincolneshire vpon penalty to forfeit their bookes and the Kings displeasure. And then it was ordeined that no Oxford man should professe at Stanford, to any prejudice or hinderance of Oxford. Shortly after William Wickham Bishop of Wincheſter founded a magnificent Colledge, which they call New-Colledge: into which out of another Colledge of his at Wincheſter the best wits are yeerely transplanted. And hee about the same F by the tract of the Citty vvall built a faire high wall embatled and turrited. Also Richard Angervill Bishop of Durham, surnamed Philobiblos, that is, Love booke, furnished a Library for the publike vse of Students. His Successour Thomas Hatfield, laied the foundation of Durham Colledge, for Durham Monkes, and Richard Fleming Bishop of Lincolne, founded likewise Lincolne Colledge. Also at the same time the Monkes of the order of Saint Bennet, by a Chapter held among them, laide their monies together and encreaſed Glouceſter Hall: built before by I. Lord Gifford of Brimsfield for A Monkes of Glouceſter, wherein one or two Monkes out of every Covent of Benedictine Monkes were maintained at ſtudy, who afterwards ſhould profeſſe good letters in their Abbaies, vnto which Glouceſter Hal, Nicholas Wadham of Merifeld in the county of Somerſet, hath aſſigned a faire portion of lands and mony for the propagation of religion and learning, which I note incidently by way of congratulation to our age, that there are yet ſome who graciouſly reſpect the aduancement of good learning.

Digitized by Google

Hide Abbay. Locus Regalis. About that time not to ſpeake of Canons of Saint Frideſwide, and Oſney, or the Ciſter- tian Monkes of Reilow, there were erected fower faire Frieries and other religious houſes, there flouriſhed alſo many profound learned men. In the age enſuing, B when Henry the fifth reigned, Heny Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury built two and thoſe very faire Colledges, the one dedicated to the memory of All Soules, and the other to Saint Bernard. And there paſſed not many yeeres betweene, when Wil- lian Wainfl t Biſhop of Wincheſter founded Mary Magdalen College: for building rare, and excellent: for ſite commodious, and for walkes paſſing pleaſant. And at the very ſame time was built the Diuinity Schoole, ſo fine a peece of worke & elegant that this of Xeuxis may juſty be ingraven upon it: Inviſurum facilius aliquem quam imitaturum:
that is, Sooner wil one enuy me, then ſet ſuch another by me. And Humfrey that good Duke of Glocester, a ſingular Patron, and a reſpectiue louer of learning, encreaſed the Library over it with an hundred twenty nine moſt ſelect Manuſcript bookes, which at his C great charges he procured out of Italy. But ſuch was the priuate avarice of ſome in the giddy time of King Edward the Sxit, that they for ſmall gaine envied the uſe thereof to poſterity. Yet now againe (God bleſſe and proſper it) Sir Thomas Bodly a Sir Thomas Bodley. right worſhipfull Knight and a moſt worthy Nource-ſonne of this Vniuerſity furni-ſheth richly in the ſame place a new Library with the beſt bookes of exquiſite choiſe from all parts, with great charges and ſtudious care neuer ſufficiently commended.
Whereby the Uniuerſity may once againe haue a publike Store-houſe of knowledge and learning, and himſelfe deſerveth the glory that may flouriſh freſhly in the memory of all eternity. And whereas by an ancient cuſtome of the wiſeſt men, thoſe were wont to be dedicated within ſuch Libraries in gold, ſilver, or braſſe, by whoſe care D they were erected; and whoſe immortall ſoules in them doe ſpeake: to the end that Time might not haue power and preuaile againſt men of worth, and the deſires of mortall men might be ſatisfied who doe all long to know what their perſons and pre-ſence were. The Earle of Dorſet late Chamberlaine of this Vniuerſity (that he might alſo leaue ſome memoriall of himſelfe) hath in the very place dedicated unto Sir Tho- mas Bodley ſo paſſing will deſerving of the learned Common-wealth, his repreſenta-tion with this inſcription:

THOMAS SACKVILLVS DORSETTIÆ CO- E
MES, SVMMVS ANGLIÆ THESAVRARI-VS, ET HVIVS ACADEMIÆ CANCEL-LARIVS
THOMÆ BODLEIO EQVITI AVRA-TO, QVI BIBLIOTHECAM HANC
INSITVIT, HONORIS CAVSSA PIE
POSVIT.

That is,

THOMAS SACKVIL EARLE OF DORSET, LORD F HIGH TREASVRER OF ENGLAND, AND CHANCELOVR OF THIS VNIVERSITIE,
VNTO SIR THOMAS BODLEY KNIGHT, VVHO INSTITVTED, THIS LIBRARIE OF A PIVS MIND ERECTED THIS MONV-MENT TO DOE HIM HONOVR.

In

Digitized by Google

A In the reigne of Henrie the Seuenth, for the better aduancement of learning, William Smith Bishop of Lincolne built new out of the ground Brasen nose College, (which that good & godly old man Master Alexander Nowell Deane of Saint Pawles in London lately augmented with reuenewes) and Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester erected likewise that which is named Corpus Christi College: and Thomas Wolsey Cardinall of Yorke following their example, beganne another (where the Monasterie of Frideswide stood) the most stately and faireſt of them all for Professors and 200. Students, which Henrie the Eighth, joining unto it Canterburie College assigned to a Deane, Præbends and Students, endowed it with livings and named it Christs-Church.
B And the same most puissant Prince, with money disbursed out of his owne Treasury, ordained, both for the dignitie of the Citie a Bishop, and for the ornament and aduancement of the Vniuersitie, publicke Professours. Likewise within our remembrance, for the furtherance of learning with new and fresh benefits, Sir Thomas Pope Knight reared a new Durrham College: and Sir Thomas White Knight Citizen and Alderman of London raised Bernard College, both which lay buried in the rubbish, they reedified them, repaired them with new buildings, enriched them with faire lands and gave them new names: For the one of them they dedicated to Saint John Baptist, and that other to the holy and sacred Trinitie. Queene Marie also built the common schooles. And now of late Hugh Price Doctor of the Lawes, hath be-
C gunne a new College (with good speede and happy successe as I wish) to the honour of Iesus. With these Colleges which are in number 16. (and eight Haulls besides) all faire, and decently built, richly endowed and furnished with good libraries, Oxford at this day so flourisheth, that it farre surmounteth all other Universities of Christendome. And for Living Libraries, (for so may I well and truly with Eunapius terme great Scholers and learned men) for the discipline and teaching of the best arts, and for the politicke government of this their republicke of Literature, it may giue place to none. But to what end is all this? Oxford needeth no mans commendation: the excellencie thereof doth so much exceede, and (if I may use Plinies word) superfluit, D that is, Surmounteth. Let this suffice to say of Oxford as Pomponius Mela did of Athens, Clarior est quã ut indicari egeat, that is, More glorious it is of it selfe, than that it needeth to be out shewed. But haue heere for an upshot and farewell, the beginning of Oxford storie out of the Proctors booke. By the joint testimonie of most Chronicles, many places in divers coasts and climats of the world we read to haue flourished at sundry times in the Studies of divers sciences; But the Vniversity of Oxford is found to be for foundation more ancient; for plurality of scienees more generall, in profession of the Catholicke truth more constant, and in multiplicity of priviledges more excellent, than all other Schooles that are knowen among the Latines, that is, The Methematicians of this Vniversitie haue observed, that this their Citie is from the Fortunate Ilands 22. degrees, and the Arcticke or E North pole elevated 51. degrees, and 50. Scruples high. And thus much briefely of my deare nourse-mother Oxford.)

But when a little beneath Oxford Isis and Cherwell haue consociated their waters together within one chanell, Isis then entier of himselfe and with a swifter current runneth Southward, to find Tame whom so long he had sought for. And gone he is not forward many miles, but behold Tame streaming out of Buckinghamshire, meeteth with him: who is no sooner entred into this shire, but hee giveth name to Tame a mercate towne situate very pleasantly among rivers. For, Tame passeth hard by the Northside, and two riverets shedding themselves into it compasse the same, the one on the East, and the other on the West. Alexander that liberall Bishop of Lin-
F colne, Lord of the place, when his prodigall humour in sumptuous building of Castles was of every body privily misliked, to wash out that staine (as Newbrigensis saith) built a little Abbay neere unto the towne: and many yeeres after the Quatremans, who in the age foregoing were men of great reputation in these parts, founded an Hospitall for the sustentation of poore people. But both of these are now decaied and quite gone: and in steede thereof Sir Iohn Williams Knight, whom Queene Marie Baron Williams of Tame.

Digitized by Google

Baron William of Tame.

rie aduanced to the dignitie of a Baron, by the title of Lord William of Tame erected a very faire Schoole, and a ſmall Hoſpitall. But this title ſoone determined when he left but daughters married into the families of Norris and Wenman.

From hence Tame runneth downe neere unto Ricot, a goodly houſe, which in times paſt belonged to thoſe Quatremans: whoſe ſtocke failing to bring forth Males, it was deuolved at length after many ſailes and alienations paſſed by the Foulers and Herons, unto the ſaid Lord Williams; and ſo by his daughter fell to Sir Henrie, Lord Norris, whom Queene Elizabeth made Baron Norris of Ricot, a man of good marke in regard of his noble birth & parentage: for he deſcended from the Lovells, who were neere allied by kinred unto the greateſt houſes in England: but moſt renowned for that right valiant and warlike progenie of his, as the Netherlands, Portugall, little Bretagne, and Ireland can witneſſe. At the length, Tame by Haſeley, where ſometimes the name of Barentines flouriſhed as at Cholgrave commeth to Dorcheſter by Bede termed Civitas Dorcinia: by Leland Hydropolis, a name deviſed by his owne conceit, yet fit enough, conſidering that Dour in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth water. That this towne was in old time inhabited by Romanes, their coined peeces of money oftentimes turned up doe imply: and our Chronicles record, that it was for a long time much frequented by reaſon of a Biſhops See, which Birinus the Apoſtle of the Weſt-Saxons appointed to be there. For when he had baptiſed Cinigiſſe a petie King of the Weſt-Saxons, unto whom Oſwald King of Northumberland was God-father, both theſe Kings, as ſaith Bede, gave this Citie unto the ſame Biſhop to make therein his Epiſcopall reſidencie. This Birinus, as we may read alſo in Bede, was wonderfully in thoſe daies admired, for a deepe conceiued opinion of his holineſſe: whereupon an ancient Poet who penned his life in verſe, wrote thus of him, Dorcheſter.

Dignior attolli quàm ſit Tyrinthius heros,
Quàm ſit Alexander Macedo; Tyrinthius hoſtes
Vicit, Alexander mundum, Birinus vtrunque.
Nec tantùm vicit mundum, Birinus, & hoſtem,
Sed ſeſe bello vincens, & victus eodem.

More worthy for to be extold than Hercules for might Or that great King of Macedon, who Alexander hight:
For Hercules ſubdued his foes; and Alexander he Wonne all the world by force of armes: But our Birinus, ſee,
Did vanquiſh both: nor conquerd he onely the world and ſo
But in one fight ſubdu'd himſelfe, and was ſubdued alſo.

After 460. yeeres, Remigius Biſhop of this place leaſt the name of Biſhop ſhould looſe credit in ſo ſmall a city (a thing forbidden in the Canons) in the reigne of William the firſt tranſlated his ſeat to Lincolne. At which time this city of Dorcheſter (as Malmesbury ſaith who then flouriſhed) was but ſlender and of ſmall reſort, yet the majeſty of the Churches was great, whether you reſpected either the old building, or the new diligence and care emploied thereupon. Ever ſince it began by little and little to decay: and of late by turning London high way from thence, it hath decreaſed ſo, as that of a citie it is ſcarſe able now to maintaine the name of a towne, and all that it is able to doe, is to ſhew in the fields adjoyning ruines onely and rubbiſh, as expreſſe tokens of what bigneſſe it hath beene. A little beneath this towne Tame and Iſis meeting in one ſtreame become hand-faſt (as it were) and joyned in Wedlocke: and as in waters, ſo in name, they are coupled, as Ior and Dan in the holy Land, Dor and Dan in France, whence come Iordan and Dordan. For ever after this, the river by a compound word is called, Tamiſis, that is, Tamis. Hee ſeemeth firſt to have obſerved this, who wrot the book entituled Eulogium Hiſtoriarum. Now as touching this marriage of Iſis with Tame haue heere certaine verſes taken out of a Poem bearing that Title, which you may read or leaue unread at your pleaſure:

Tame and Iſis meete.

Hic veſtit Zephyrus florentes gramine ripas,
FLORA QVE nectareis redimit caput ISIDIS herbis,

Seligit

A
Seligit ambrosios pulcherrima GRATIA flores,
Contexit geminas CONCORDIA lata corollas,
Extollitque suas tædas Hymenæus in altum.
Naiades ædificant thalamum & thorum & profundo
Stamine gemmato textum, pictisque columnis
Vndique fulgentem. Qualem nec Lydia Regi
Extruxit Pelopi, nec tu Cleopatra marito.
Illic manubias cumulant, quas Brutus Achiuis,
Quas Brennus Græcis, rigidus Gurmandus Hibernis,
B Bunduica Romanis, claris Arthurius Anglis
Eripuit, quicquid Scotis victricibus armis Abstulit Edwardus, virtus & Britannica Gallis.
Hauserat interea sperati coniugis ignes
TAMA Catechlaunûm delabens montibus, illa
Impatiens nescire thorum, nupturaque gressus
Accelerat, longique dies sibi stare videntur,
Ambitiosa suum donec præponere nomen
Possit amatori. Quid non mortalia cogit
Ambitio? notamque suo iam nomine * villam
C Linquit, Norrisijs geminans saluete, valete,
Cernitur & tandem Dorcestria prisca petiti
Augurium latura thori, nunc TAMA resurgit
Nexa comam spicis, trabea succincta virenti,
Auroræ superans digitos, valtumque Dionæ,
Pestanæ non labra rosæ, non lumina gemmæ,
Lilia non æquant crines, non colla pruinæ,
Vtque fluit crines madidos in tergara pellit,
Reddit & vndanti legem formamq; capillo,
En subitò frontem placidis è fluctibus ISIS
D Effert, & totis radios spargentia campis
Aurea stillanti resplendent lumina vultu,
Iungit & optatæ nunc oscula plurima TAMÆ,
Mutuáq; explicitis innectunt colla lacertis,
Oscula mille sonant, connexu brachia pallent,
Labra ligant animos: tandem descenditur vnà
In thalamum, quo iuncta FIDE CONCORDIA sancta, Splendida conceptis sancit connubia verbis.
Vndiq; multifori strepitat nunc tibia buxi,
Fluticolæ Nymphæ, Dryades, Satyriq; petulci
E In numeros circum luuant, ducunt q; choreas
Dum pede concutiunt alterno gramina lati,
Permulcent volucres syluas modulamine passim,
Certatimq; sonat lætum reparabilis ECHO.
Omnia nunc rident, campi lætantur, AMORES
Frænatis plaudunt anibus per inania vecti:
Personat & cythara quicquid videre priores
Pronuba victura lauro velata BRITÔNA
Hæc canit vt toto diducta BRITANNIA mundo Cùm victor rupes diuulserit æquore Nereus,
F Et cur Neptuni lapidosa grandine natum
Albionem vicit nostras delatus in oras
Hercules illimes libatus Thamisis vndas,
Quas huc aduenies aras sacrauit Vlysses,
Vtq; Corinæo Brutus comitatus Achate
Occiduos adijt tractus, vt Cæsar anhelus

* Tame.

Territa

Digitized by Google

Territa quæsitis ostendit terga Britannis, &c.

And after a few other verses:

Dixerat, vnito consurgit & vnus amore
Latior exultans nunc nomine TAMISIS vno,
Oceanúmque patrem quærens iactantior vndas Promouet.

Heere Zephyrus with fresh green grasse
The Banks above doth spread,
Faire Flora with ay-liuing herbs
Flora. Adourneth ISIS head,
Most louely GRACE selecteth forth
Sweet floures that never dy
And gladsome CONCORD plats thereof
Two guirlands skilfully.
With'all God HYMENÆVS lifts
His torches up on hie.
A Bride-chamber the NAIADES
Beneath of rare device
And Bed do rear, ywov'n with warp
Beset with stones of price.
All shining eke with pillers tall, and wrought full curiously
The like did neither Lydie for King Pelops ædify
Nor thou, Queene Cleopatra, for Thine husband Antony.
There lay they foorth and make no spare,
Those spoiles that whilom Brut
From Achiues tooke; what riches great
From Græcians Brennus stout,
And from fierce Irish, Gurmund wonn,
What either Bundwic Queen,
From Romans gat, or Arthur from Our English, there are seene
What euer from the Scots by force
Of fight our Edward King,
Or valiant English from the French
By armes away did bring.
Meane while, down Catechlanian hils TAME gliding, kindled had
The fire of loue in hope of ISE
Her husband wondrous glad.
Impatient now of all delay
She hastneth him to wed,
And thinks the daies belong untill
They meet in marriag-bed.
Untill I say, ambitious she,
May now before her loue
Her own name set: see whereunto
Ambition minds doth moue!
And now by this shee leav's the *town
*Tame. That knowen is by her name
All haile, fare-well redoubling to
The Nerrif's by the same.
Old Dorchester at length she sees

Which

A Which was to give presage,
And lucky Augury of this Long wished marriage.
Up riseth Tame then, who crowned
Her locks with eares of corn
Full well to knit, with kirtle green
Her waste eke to adorn:
The lightsom raies of morning bright
She now doth far excell,
B Dione faire in countenance
Looks not by halfe so well.
Her lips the Pestane Rose surpasse,
Her eies, gemmes of great cost,
Her haire the Lilies fresh and white,
Her necke the hoary frost.
And as shee runnes, her haire all wet
She doth behind her cast,
Which waing thus she kembeth slick
And layeth even at last.
C Lo, Isis sodainly out of
The Waves so mild doth shew,
His lovely face, his eies withall
Glitter with golden hew,
As they from dropping visage send Their beames the fields throughout,
Whiles one anothers neck with armes displai'ed they clip about,
Full sweetly he doth Tama kisse whom he hath wish'd so long,
D A thousand kisses twixt them twain
Do now resound among.
With clasping close their armes wax pale,
Their lips their harts linke fast,
To nuptiall chamber thus they both Ioinctly descend at last:
Where CONCORD with religious FAITH
Together both ymet,
Knit up the knot of wedlock sure
E With words in forme yset.
And now the pipes of thyrled box
On every side resound;
The water Nymphes, the Dryades
The wanton Satyrs round
About the place disport and dance
The measures cunningly,
Whiles on the grasse they foote it fine,
In rounds as merily.
The Birds heerewith in every wood
F Melodiously doe sing,
And ECHO her redoubled notes
In myrth strives foorth to ring.
All things, now laugh, the fields rejoice
The CVPIDS as they fly,
Amid the aire on bridled birds
Clap hands right pleasantly

BRITONA, hand-fast-maker ſhee,
All clad in Laurell green,
Play's on the harp what ever acts
Our aunceſtours haue ſeene.
Shee ſinges how BRITANNY from all
The world deuided was,
When Nereus with victorious Sea
Through cloven rocks did paſſe:
And why it was that Hercules
When he arriued heere,
Upon our coaſt, and taſted once
The mudleſſe TAMIS cleere,
Did Neptun's ſonne hight Albion
Vanquiſh in bloudy fight
And with an haile-like ſtorme of ſtones
Kild him in field out right.
And when Vlyſſes hither came,
What Altars ſacred were
By him? How Brute with Corinæe
His truſty friend and fere,
Went foorth into the Weſtern parts
And how that Cæſar, he
When he had ſought and found, turn'd back
With feare, from Britan ſirce.

And after ſome few verſes interpoſed.

This ſaid, then Tame and Iſis both
In loue and name both one,
Hight Tamiſis, more joy's therein,
And haſtning to be gone
Ariſeth up and leaping out,
With haſtfull hot deſire,
Aduanceth forth his ſtreame, and ſeeks
The Ocean main his ſire.

Benſon. From Dorcheſter, Tamis goeth to Benſon, in old time Benſingſton, which Marian calleth Villam Regiam, that is, The Kings towne, and reporteth, That Ceaulin tooke it from the Britans in the yeere of our Lord, 572. and that the Weſt-Saxons kept the poſſeſſion of it 200. yeeres after. For, then Offa the King of Mercians, thinking it would be for his commoditie and honor both, that they ſhould haue nothing on this ſide the river, wonne it, and ſubjected it to him. But at this day it goeth for a village onely, and hath a houſe of the Kings hard by, ſometime a faire place, but now running exceedingly to ruine, as being not very wholſome by reaſon of the foggy aire & miſts Ewelme. ariſing from a ſtanding water adjoining. This houſe of certaine Elmes called Ewelme, but commonly New-Elme, was built by William de la pole Duke of Suffolke, who hauing taken to wife Alice the onely daughter of Thomas Chaucer, had by her faire lands heereabout as elſewhere: and beſide this houſe, he erected alſo a faire Church, wherein the ſaid Alice lieth buried, & a proper hoſpitall: But Iohn Earle of Lincolne his Grand child, who by King Richard the Third had beene declard heire apparent to the Crowne overthrew in ſome ſort the happie eſtate of this familie. For whiles he plotted and projected ſeditiouſly to rebell againſt King Henry the ſeuenth he was attainted and ſlaine in the battaile at Stoke, and Edmund his brother being for like cauſe attainted, the poſſeſſions became Crown-land. Then King Henrie the Eighth made this houſe an Honour, by laying unto it certaine Manours, and Wallingford among others, which before had along time belonged unto the Dukes of Cornewall.

The

A The Tamis from hence having fetched a great compaſſe about windeth in manner backe againe into himſelfe, encloſing within it the Hundred of Henley, mounting high with hilles, and beſet with thicke woods, which ſome doe thinke the ANCALITES that yeelded them ſelues unto Cæſars protection, did inhabite. Here is Bix-brond and Stonor ancient poſſeſſions of the families of Stonores who ſince the time of king Edward the Third when Sir Iohn Stonore was chieffe Iuſtice in the Common-pleas, flouriſhed with great alliance, and faire revenues untill they were tranſferred by an heire general to Sir Adrian Forteſcue unhappily attainted, whoſe daughter, heire to her mother was married to the firſt Baron Wentwooth. Next neighbour hereunto is Puſ-hull which the familie of D'oily held by yeelding yeerely to the B king a table cloath of three ſhillings price, or three ſhillings for all ſervice. Vnder this Southward ſtandeth Greies Rotherfield, a houſe which in times paſt Walter Grey the Archbiſhop of Yorke gave freely unto VVilliam Grey his Nephew, the inheritance whereof by the Baron of D'Eincourt was devolved upon the Lovels. Now, it is the dwelling houſe of Sir VVilliam Knolles, Treaſurer of the kings houſe, whom Iames our king for his faithfull ſervice performed unto Queene Elizabeth, and to bee performed unto himſelfe, advanced to the honorable title of Baron Knolles of Rotherfield. Nere unto it, Henley upon Tamis, in old time called Hanleganz ſheweth it ſelfe in the verie confines of the ſhires. The inhabitants whereof bee for the moſt part C watermen, who make their chiefeſt gaine by carrying downe in their barges wood and corne to London: neither can it make report of any greater antiquity than that in times paſt the Molinies were Lords thereof, from whom by the Hungerfords who procured unto the towne of king Henrie the Sixth the libertie of holding two faires, it came by right of inheritance unto the honorable houſe of the Haſtings. And where now the Tamis hath a wooden bridge over it, they ſay in times paſt there ſtood one of ſtone arched. But whether this bridge were here, that Dio writeth the Romans paſſed over when they purſued the Britans along this tract, who below had ſwom over the river, hard it is for a man to ſay. From Henley, the Chiltern-hils hold on with a continued ridge running Northward, and divide this country from Buck- D inghamſhire: at the foote whereof ſtand many ſmall townes: among which theſe two are of greateſt note, Watlington a little mercate towne belonging ſometime to Robert D' Oily: and Shirburne a prety Caſtle of the Quatremans in times paſt, but now the habitation of the Chamberlans, deſcended out of the houſe of the Earles of Tankervill, who having beene long agoe Chamberlains of Normandie, their poſterity relinguiſhing that old name of Tankervills, became ſurnamed Chamberlans, of the office vvhich their anceſtours bare.

Ancalites.

Stonor.

Puſ hull Naper. Fin. Mich. 10. R. 2.

Grey of Rotherfield.

Baron Knolles.

Henley.

Xiphilinus.

Shirburne.

To omitte Edgar Algar, & other Engliſh Saxons, officiall Earles of Oxford; Since af- Earles of ter the Conqueſt, the title of the Earldom of Oxford hath flouriſhed a long time in the Oxford. familie of Vere, which derive their deſcent from the Earles of Guines, and that ſur- E name from Vere a towne in Zeland. They received the beginning of their greatneſſe and honour here in England from king Henrie the Firſt, who advaunced Aubrey de Vere for his ſingular wiſdome with ſundry favours and benefits, as namely with the Chamberlainſhip of England, and Portgreueſhip of the City of London. To his ſon Aubrey, Henrie the Second (before he was eſtabliſhed king, and vvhen he vſed onely this ſtile, Henrie Sonne to King Henrics daughter, right heire of England and Normandie) reſtored firſt the Chamberlan-ſhip, which hee had loſt in the civill broiles, and then offered unto him which of the titles hee himſelfe would choſe, of theſe foure Earledomes: Dorſet, VVilſhire, Barkſhire, and Oxfordſhire; that hee might divert him from Stephen then vſurping the kingdome, and aſſure him to himſelfe. And in the end F both Maude the Empreſſe, and Henry alſo her ſonne being novv come to the crowne by their ſeverall Charters created him Earle of Oxford. Among thoſe that deſcended from him, (not to recount every one in their courſe and order) theſe were they that purchaſed greateſt fame and honour: Robert de Vere, who being in very high favour with King Richard the Second was honoured with theſe new and ſtrange dignities not heard of before, namely, Marqueſſe of Dublin, & Duke of Ireland: of which,

Digitized by Google

as one ſaid, he left nothing at all to him ſelfe, but to his tombe titles, and to the world matter of talke. For, ſhortly after through the ſpiteful envie of the Nobles as-much againſt the K. as againſt him, he was diſpoiled of his eſtate, and ended his daies miſerably in exile. Iohn the ~~First~~ of that name ſo truſty and true to the houſe of Lancaſter, that both he and his ſonne and heire Aubrey loſt their heads therefore together in the Firſt yeare of king Edward the Fourth. Iohn his ſecond ſonne a right skilful, and expert martiall man nevertheleſſe was moſt firme & faithfull to the ſaid houſe of Lancaſter, fought in ſundry battailes againſt king Edward the Fourth, defended and made good for a while Saint Michaels Mount, & was an eſpecial aſſiſtant unto Henrie the Seaventh in attaining to the kingdome. Another Iohn likewiſe, in the reigne of Henrie the Eighth, a man in all parts of his life ſo ſyncere, ſo religious, and ſo full of goodneſſe, that he gained the ſurname of the Good Earle. Hee was great grandfather of Henrie that is now Earle, and the Eighteenth of this race in lineall diſcent, and alſo grandfather of Sir Francis and Sir Horatio Vere, brethren who by their ſingular knowledge in military affaires, and exploits moſt valiantly, and fortunatly atchieved in the Low countries, have added exceeding much honour and glorie to themſelues, and to the ancient Nobility of their familie.

This countie conteineth pariſh churches. 280.

CAT-

Digitized by Google

CATTIEVCHLANI.

VPon the Dobuni Eastward there confined the people, which Ptolomee calleth according to the diversity of copies, CATTIEVCHLANI; CATTIDVDANI; CATHICLVDANI, and Dio CATTVELLANI. Which of these might bee the truest name, I can not easily say. Yet give mee leaue I pray you in this place to cast forth my conjecture (although it is an abortiue) concerning this point. I haue beene of opinion, that these were in old time called CASSII, that of this Cassij their Prince was named Cassiuellaunus or Cassibelinus: (for so wee finde it diversly written). Also, that of Cassiuellaunus name, this very people were by the Græcians termed Cattuellani, Cathuellani and Cattieuchlani. For, among the Nations of Britaine, Cæsar Cassij. reckoneth the CASSII; who, that they were seated in these parts it is most certaine: and of whose name a prety portion of this tract is at this daie called Caishow. And seeing that Cassiuellaunus ruled this country as it appeareth by Cæsar, and in the said name of his this denomination of Cassij doth most plainely bewraie it selfe; it may seeme probable enough that Cassiuellaunus, was so named, as one would saie, The Prince of the Cassij. And unlesse it were so, why should Dio name this Cassiuellaunus, Suellan, for Vellan, and Ninnius Belin. the Britan, call him, not Cassibellinus, but Bellinus; as though that Bellinus were the proper name either of the man, or of his dignitie? Neither let it seeme strange, that Princes in old time tooke names of their owne nations. The Catti in Germanie had their Cattimarus, the Teutons their Teutomarus and Teutobochus, the Daci their Decebalus, and the Goths their Gottiso. And what should let, but that our Cassij might haue their Cassibelinus? Considering that Belinus hath beene an usuall name in this Island: and some haue thought; that Cunobelinus who reigned amongst the Iceni, was so called, as one would say, the Belinus of the Iceni. From this Cassiuellaunus therefore, if the Greeke writers haue not wrested these names Cattuellani and Cattieuchlani &c. I confesse that in this matter mine eye-sight faileth me altogither, & I see plainely nothing,

But whence this people should come to bee named, Cassij, I know not, unlesse happily it were of their martiall prowesse. For, Servius Honoratus writeth, that the ancient Gaules who spake the same language that Britans did, called hardy and valiant men, Gessos: Whence Ninnius interpreteth Cethilou (a British word,) word,) The ſeed of warriours. Now, that theſe excelled in warlick proweſſe it is maneſeſt: for, before Cæſars comming, they had warred continually with their neighbours, they had reduced part of the DOBVNI under their ſubjection; the Britans had choſen their Prince, Generall over all their forces in the warre againſt Cæſar, and they had enlarged their Empire and name farre abroad every way: For, all thoſe generally were knowne by the name of Caſsij, or Cattieuchlani who now take up three ſhires or counties, to wit, Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire and Hertfordſhire. Of whom I am now to ſpeake in order, and that briefly, becauſe I have not much to ſay of any of them.

Digitized by Google

A

B

C

BVC-

D

E

A

BVCKINGHAM-SHIRE.

Hereas Buckinghamſhire is giuen to bring forth Beech trees plentifully which the Engliſh-Saxons in elder times called Bucken, it may ſeeme coniecturally that Buckingham the chiefe towne, and ſo the whole ſhire tooke the name from Beech trees. For, there is a Country in Germanie bearing Beech trees, named Buchonia: & with vs, a towne B in Norfolke called Buckenham, fruitfull of Beech, as I haue beene informed. This ſhire carrying but a ſmall bredth, runneth forth in length from the Tamis Northward. On the Southſide it looketh into Barkſhire, ſeuered from it by the river Tamis: on the Weſt, Oxfordſhire; from the North it hath Northamptonſhire, and from the Eaſt firſt Bedfordſhire, then Hertfordſhire, and afterward Middleſex. The Countrie generally is of a rich plentifull ſoile, and paſſing full of inhabitants, who chiefely employ themſelues in grazing of cattaile. It is deuided into two parts, whereof the one bending into the South and Eaſt, and riſing into hilles, they call Chilterne, in the Engliſh-Saxon C tongue Clyꝛepn: the other lying under it Northward is named the Vale.

Chiltern got that name according to the very nature of the ſoile of Chalkie marle, which the ancient Engliſh men termed Cylt or Chilt. For, all of it mounteth aloft with whitiſh hilles, ſtanding upon a mixt earth of clay and chalke clad with groues and woods, wherein is much Beech, and it was altogether unpaſſable in times paſt by reaſon of trees, untill that Leofſtane Abbot of Saint Albans did cut them downe, becauſe they yeelded a place of refuge for theeues. In it, where the Tamis glideth at the foote of thoſe hilles with a winding courſe, ſtandeth Marlow, a prety towne of no meane credite, taking name of the ſaid chalke commonly termed Marle: which being ſpred upon corne ground eaten out of heart with long tillage doth quicken the D ſame againe, ſo as that after one yeeres reſt it never lieth fallow, but yeeldeth againe vnto the husband man his ſeed in plentifully meaſure.

Chiltern.

Marlow.

Neere vnto this, a rill ſheaddeth it ſelfe in the Tamis, making way through low places, and where it turneth hath a towne vpon it called High Wickham or Wicombe rather, which happily thereof tooke the name, conſidering that the German Saxons terme any winding reach of river and ſea, a Wick, and Combe a low Valle. And very many places we meete withall in England named in that reſpect. This towne for largeneſſe and faire building is equall to the greateſt townes in this ſhire, and in that it hath a Major for the Head-Magiſtrate worthily to be preferred before the reſt. About the time of the Normans comming in, Wigod of Wallengford was Lord both of E the Burgh of Wicomb, and alſo of the Villa forinſeca (I ſpeake according to the record of the ancient Inquiſition) that is, The out Hamlet or Bery. After whoſe death King Henrie the Firſt laid it vnto the Crowne. But King Iohn at the length, deuided the ſaid Out Berry betweene Robert de Vi-pount and Alane Baſſet. North off Wicomb mounteth up a loft the higheſt place of this region, and thereof it retaineth ſtill the Britiſh name Pen. For the head or eminent top of a thing is with them called Pen: and hence it is that the Pennine Alpes, the Apennine and many mountaines among vs tooke their names. Neere vnto this Wickham or Wicomb is Bradenham ſeated in a very commodious & wholſome place, which now is become the principall habitation of the Barons of Windeſor: (concerning whom I haue alreadie ſpoken in Bark- F ſhire) euer ſince that in the memorie of our fathers William Lord Windſor ſeated himſelfe heere, whoſe father S. Andrew deſcended from the old ſtemme of ancient Barons King Henrie the Eighth dignified with the honor of Baron Windeſor.

Wickham.

Tamis hauing entertained the ſaid Rill commeth downe with a rolling ſtreame by Aeton famous for a College, the nource garden (as it were) or plant plot of good letters, which that moſt vertuous and godly Prince K. Henrie the ſixt, as I haue already

See in Barkſhire.

Digitized by Google

said, first founded. And some few miles forward the river Cole entreth into Tamis, A which running heere betweene Buckinghamshire and Middlesex giveth name unto the towne Colbroke: which was that PONTES, whereof Antonine the Emperour maketh mention, as the distance on both sides from Wallingford and London doth witnesse: Neither is there any other place else in the way that leadeth from Wallingford to London to which the name of Pontes, that is, Bridges, might be more fitly applied. For, this Cole is heere parted into foure chanels over, which stand as many Bridges for the commodity of passengers; whereof that it tooke this name, the very signification of the word doth plainly shew, like as Gephyræ a towne in Boætia, and Pontes another in France, where the Countie of Ponthieu, our Tunbrig, and others are so B called, of Bridges. This Countie of Ponthieu (to note so much by the way) descended to the Kings of England in the right of Aeleanor the wife of King Edward the First, who by her mothers right was sole and entier heire of the same. Cole by these severall partitions of his streames compasseth in certaine pleasant Ilands, into which the Danes fled in the yeere of our Lord 894. when Aelfred preassed hard upon them, and there by the benefite of the place defended themselves, untill the English for want of provisions were forced to breake up siege and leaue them. At this divorce and division of the waters Eure or Euer a little towne sheweth it selfe, which when King Richard the first had given unto Sir Robert Fitz-Roger, Lord of Clavering, his younger sonnes of this place assumed their surname, to wit, Hugh, from C whom the Barons of Eure; and Robert from whom the familie of Eure in Axolme is sprung and spred. Farther within land, are these places, which I may not passe over, Burnham better knowen by the Hodengs, Huntercombs, and Scadamores, who were Lords thereof and of Beacons-field, successiuely by inheritance, than by it selfe. Stoke Pogeis, so called of the Lords thereof in old time named de Pigeis, and from them hereditarily devolved upon the Hastings: of whose race Edward Baron Hastings of Loughborrow founded heere an Hospitall for poore people, making himselfe one of their societie, and his nephew by the brother Henrie Earle of Huntingdon built a very faire house: and Fernham, the very same, if I be not deceived, which was cal D led Fernham Roiall: and which in times past, the Barons Furnivall held by service of finding their Soveraigne Lord the King upon the day of his Coronation a glove for his right hand, and to support the Kings right arme the same day all the while he holdeth the regall verge or Scepter in his hand. From the Furnivalls it came by the daughter of Thomas Nevill, unto the Talbots Earles of Shrewsbury, who although by exchange they surrendred up this Manour unto King Henry the Eight, yet they reserved this honorable office still to them and their heires for ever.

This Cole carrieth downe with him another riveret also, which somewhat aboue from the West sheddeth it selfe into it: upon it we saw first Missenden, where stood a religious house that acknowledged the D'Oilies their founders and certaine Gentle- E men surnamed De Missenden their especiall benefactours vpon a vow for escaping a ship-wracke. And then in the Vale Amersham, in the Saxon tongue Agmundesham which vaunted it selfe not for faire buildings nor multitude of inhabitants, but for their late Lord Francis Russell Earle of Bedford, who being the expresse pateme of true piety and nobleneſse lived most deerely beloved of all good men. But the principall seat of the Earles of Bedford is called Cheineis, standing more East-ward, where both Iohn the first Earle out of this family, and that noble Francis his sonne lie entombed together. Unto which adjoineth on the one side Latimers, (so named of the Lords thereof, I meane those more ancient Barons Latimer) before time called Islehamsted, where Sir Edwin Sands Knight, who tooke to wife the onely daughter of F the Baron Sands, dwelt, while he liued in a very faire house, and on the other Chesham Bois, where, and at Druiton Beauchamp the family of Cheneis hath anciently flourished.

Colbroke. Pontes.

I. Rosse. Amersham.

Cheneys.

Latimers.

From hence I passed scarse three miles Northward, but I came to the ridge of Chilturne-hils, which devideth the whole region a crosse from the South-west to the North-east, passing by many villages and small townes, among which that of greatest note

A note is Hamden, which gave name to an ancient and well spred family in these parts. In the very East corner of these hils Ashridge a retiring house sometime of the Kings standeth vpon an ascent; where Edmund Earle of Cornewall sonne to Richard King of the Romans founded a religious house for a new order of religious men in those daies, called * Bon-Hommes by him first brought into England: Who professed the rule of S. Augustine, and were according to the maner of the maner of the Eremitans clad in skie coloured garments. From this ridge or edge of the hils, there is a large prospect every way downe into the Vaile beneath, which I said was the other part of the shire. This almost throughout is a plaine champion, standing likewise upon a B clay-soile, stiffe, tough, and fruitfull; with pasture medowes most plentifull of grasse and fodder; feeding innumerable flockes of sheepe, whose soft and passing fine fleeces are in request even as farre as to the Turkish nations in Asia. But it is all naked and bare of woods, unlesse it be on the West side, where among others is Bernewood whose forresters surnamed de Borstall were famous in former times. About this forrest the yeere after Christs nativity 914. the Danes furiously raged: and then happily it was, that the ancient Burgh was destroied, whose antiquity Romane coined peeces of mony there found doe testifie; which afterwards became the roiall house of King Edward the Confessor: But now it is a Country Village, and in stead of Buri-Hill, they call it short, Brill. In this Vale although it be exceeding full of townes and villages, C yet very few of them are memorable, and those either upon the river Tame or Vsa, that is, Use not farre from Tame, which watereth the South part of the Vaile. Vpon the rising of a prety hill standeth a faire Mercat towne well occupied, and compassed about with many most pleasant greene medowes and pastures, commonly called Ailesbury, of which, the whole Vaile is tearmed the Vale of Ailesbury. The English-Saxons called it Aeglesburge, when Cuthwulf the Saxon won it in the yeere of our Lord 572. For the Brittish name, whereby it was knowen before, in continuance of time is utterly lost. Famous it hath beene in times past especially for Edithes sake there fostered, who having obteined of her father Frewald this towne for her dowry, foorthwith by perswasion of the religious people bad the world and her husband farewell, D and taking herselfe to the Veile for opinion of holinesse and devotion in that most pregnant and fruitfull age of Saints, became wonderfully renowned, euen as far as to working of myracles, together with her sister Eadburg: of whose name there is a little towne among the hils as yet called Eadburton. In the time of King William the Conqueror it was a Mannour of the Kings: and certaine yard-lands were heere given by the King, with this condition, that the possessor or holder thereof (marke yee nice and dainty ones) should finde litter for the Kings bed when the King came thither. In the raigne of Edward the first, certaine Gentle men named de Ailesbury, who bare for their armes Azure, a Crosse Argent were by report (but I know not how truely) the Lords thereof; Certaine it is, they were in those daies men of the better sort and of E great good note, and such as by marriage with the daughter and heire of the Cathaignes (who were in times past Lords of Meddleton Cathaignes) came to a faire and goodly inheritance, which at last by heires generall came to the * Chaworths, the Staffords of Grafton &c. But now, the greatest name and reputation that it hath is by grazing & feeding of cattaile; very much beholden also it is unto Iustice Baldwin, who not onely adorned it with publike ædifices, but also made a passing faire causey to it (where the way was very deepe and cumbersome) for three miles or there about in length.

Asheridge.

Good-men.

The Vale.

Brill.

Or Isa.

Ailesbury.

*De Cadurcis.

Quarendon.

Heere round about in every side flocks of sheep pasture most plenteously in mighty numbers, loden with fleeces, to the great gaine and commodity of their Masters es- F pecially at Querendon, a Lordship belonging to Sir Henry Lee an honourable Knight of the order of the Garter, Eythorp, which sometime was the Dinhams and now the Dormers Knights, also Winchindon appertaining likewise to the family of the Godwins Knights, &c.

Lower we meet with nothing memorable upon Tame, vnlesse Chiardesley be (as many thinke it is) the place which was called in the Saxon-tongue Cerdick-slega, of Cerdie

Digitized by Google

Cerdic the Saxon, who fought a very sharpe and bloudy battaile there with the Britans. Neere unto it standeth Credendon, now Crendon, which was the Capitall house belonging to the Honour of Giffard, for so were those lands termed which fell unto Walter Giffard at the Conquest of England, whose sonne the second Earle of Buckingham and Ermingard his wife, built the Abbay of Noteley thereby in the yeere 1112. But his cousen Hugh de Balebec, from whom by the females the Earles of Oxford are descended, held of him no small possessions in these parts. And the ruines of Bolebec Castle are seene hard by within the Parish of Whitchurch. Neere unto which is Aseot, the principall Mansion house of the Dormers from whence descended the Dutches of Feria in Spaine, and others of noble note.

Crendon.

Notesly.

Vicounts Bolebec.

A

B

Usa or Ouse, in times past Isa, and the second Isis, which with a soft and still streame passeth through the North part of this Province arising in Northampton-shire, and presently from his head, when being yet but small he closely entereth into this shire, runneth beside Bittlesden, which Robert de Mapertshall Lord of the place gave vnto Osbert de Clinton Chamberlaine to King Henry the first a powerfull Courtier, that he might not be punished as a fellon for stealing away one of the Kings hounds. But he restored it unto him againe with a cousen of his in marriage: yet lost he the same in the hot broile of the civill war under King Stephen; and Ernald Bois by way of a benefite and curtesie received it at the hands of Robert Earle of Leicester: And hee in the yeere of Christ 1127. founded there a little Monastery for the Cistertien Monks. Then Ouse saluteth Buckingham the Shire towne, which, as Martan saith, King Edward the * elder in the yeere of our Lord 915. fortified with a rampire and sconces on both bankes, against the invasions and assaults of the Danes. Yet was it of no great name, as it may seeme, in the first age of the Normans, seeing that in the reigne of King Edward the Confessour, (as we read in William Conquerors Domesday booke) it discharged it selfe for one Hide and no more, and had but six and twenty Burgeses. As for the Towne it is seated vpon a low ground, but the river Ouse, very commodious for Mils encircleth it about save onely on the North side. The Castle standing in the middest raised upon an hill cast up, whereof no reliques in maner are now to be seene, devideth the towne as it were in twaine. The greater part of the towne beareth North, wherein standeth the Towne-house, the other toward the South is the lesse, wherein is the Church, and that of no great antiquity: but in it was the Shrine of S. Rumald a child, who being borne in Kings-Sutton a Village thereby was canonized by our forefathers for a child-Saint, and much famed with many myracles.

Bittlesden. The Register of the Abbay.

De Bosco.

* Before the Conquest.

C

D

From hence Ouse hasteneth faire and softly into the North, and more Eastward from the river, neere unto the woods, yee have a sight of Whaddon, the habitation in times past of the Giffords, who were by inheritance keepers of Whaddon Chase under the Earle of Ulster: and from whom it came to the Pigots, who passed it away by saile and alienation. There standeth now an house of the warlicke familie of the Greys, Barons of Wilton, who held the Mannour neere adioining named Acton, by Serieantie of keeping one Gerfalcon of their Soueraigne Lord the King. Whereupon that familie of the Greys hath for their Badge or Cognisance a falcon Seiant vpon a glove.

Whaddon.

Barons Grey of Wilton.

E

Not farre from hence is Thornton an habitation of the Tirelles, and Saulden, where is a faire and louely house built by Sir John Forteseue a right honorable Knight and deeply learned withall, who for his wisdome was Chancellor of the Exchequer and Duchie of Lancaster, and of the privie Counsell to Queene Elizabeth, and King James. On the other side of the river and not farre from the banke stand neighbourlike, Stow a house of the familie of Temple, Leckhamsted an habitation of the Greenwaies, Lillinstone likewise the seat of the ancient familie De-Hairell, commonly called Dairell; and Luffeld, where in times past was founded a Monasterie by Robert Earle of Leicester: but by reason that the Monkes were all consumed with the plague, the house was utterly left desolate. Somewhat higher on the South side of the river upon the very banke; standeth Stony-Stratford, a towne of all the rest most frequented, named so of Stones, The Street way, & a Fourd: For, the houses are built of a certaine rough stone which is digged forth in great abundance at Caversham hard by,

F

and

Digitized by Google

A and it ſtandeth upon the publicke Street commonly called Watling ſtreet, which was a Militarie high way made by the Romanes, and is evidently to be ſeene yet beyond the towne with the banke or cauſey thereof, and hath a fourd but now nothing ſhallow, and hardly paſſable. The towne is of good bigneſſe, and ſheweth two Churches, and in the mids a Croſſe, though it be none of the faireſt, erected in memoriall of Queene Aeleonor of Spaine, wife to Edward the Firſt with the Armes of England, Caſtile and Leon &c. alſo of the Earldome of Ponthieu, whereof ſhe was heire: And where ſometimes there had beene a Fourd, the river Ouſe hath a ſtone bridge over it, which keepeth in the river that was wont, when it ſwelled with winter flouds, to B break out & overflow the fields with great violence. But upon the banke of the other ſide which riſeth ſomewhat higher the towne ſometime ſtood, as the inhabitants themſelues report. And there hard by, is Paſham, a place ſo called of paſſing over the river, ſo that it may ſeeme in times paſt to haue beene that paſſage, which King Edward the Elder kept againſt the Danes, whiles he fortified Torcester: But this paſſage or Ferrey became quite forlet after that the Bridge was built at Stony-Stratford. Now, if I ſhould gueſſe that LACTORODVM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth ſtood heere; beſide the ſituation upon the Militarie High way of the Romanes, and the diſtance from other places, the ſignification alſo of the old name LACTORODVM fetched out of the Britiſh language, maketh for me & favoureth my conjecture. Lactorodum.
C Which name accordeth paſſing well with this new Engliſh name. For, both names in both languages were impoſed of Stone, and Fourd. From hence Ouſe runneth hard by Wolverton anciently Wulwerington the ſeat of an ancient familie ſo ſurnamed: whoſe lands are named in Records, The Baronie of Wulwerington, from whom it came to the houſe of the Longvilles of ancient deſcent in theſe parts: and by Newport Painell. which tooke that name of Sir Fulcod Painell the Lord thereof, and was from him devolved to the Barons Someries of Dudley, who heere had their Caſtle. Then, by Terringham, (which gave both name and habitation to a worſhipfull houſe and of great antiquity) it goeth to Oulney a meetly good mercate towne. This farre and a little further reacheth the County of Buckingham by Vſe the limit and bound ther-
D of. Leach in the Britiſh toung ſignifieth ſtones, Rid and Ryd a Fourd. Wolverton. Newport. Paynell.

The firſt Earle of Buckingham, ſo farre as hitherto I could obſerue, was Walter ſurnamed Giffard, ſonne to Osbern de Bolebec, a man of great name and reputation among the Normans: Who in a Charter of King Henrie the Firſt is cited among the witneſſes thereto by the name of Earle of Buckingham. After him followed his ſonne bearing the ſame name, who in the booke of Abbindon Abbay is called Earle Walter the yonger, and died iſſueleſſe in the yeere 1164. Afterward in the reigne of Henrie the ſecond, that famous Richard Strangbow Earle of Pembroch called Conquerour of Ireland, who derived his deſcent from the ſiſter and heir of Walter Giffard the ſecond in certaine publicke inſtruments bare this title. Then for a long time
E after lay this title as it were out of uſe and quite loſt, untill that in the yeere 1377. King Richard the Second conferred this honor upon his Unkle Thomas of Woodſtock, of whom I have already ſpoken among the Dukes of Gloceſter. Of this Thomas his daughter married unto Edmund Earle of Stafford was borne Humfrey Earle of Stafford, created Duke of Buckingham, with an invidious precedence before all Dukes of England by King Henrie the Sixt, in whoſe quarrell he ſpent his life, fighting moſt valiantly in the battaile at Northampton. After him ſucceeded his grandchild Henrie, by his ſonne Humfrey, who made way for King Richard the Third the vſurper unto the Kingdome, and ſtreightwaies practiſed to depoſe him: for that he would not reſtore unto him the inheritance of the Bohuns by hereditarie right be-
F longing unto him: but hee being intercepted loſt his head for it: and found (but all too late) that Tyrants very often hew downe the ſtaires and ſteps whereby they aſcended: His ſonne Edward being reſtored againe through ſpeciall favour of King Henrie the ſeuenth, by the wicked ſlights and practiſes of Cardinall Wolſey fell into diſgrace with K. Henrie the Eighth, & being condemned of high treaſon, for that among Earles of Buckingham.

Digitized by Google

among other matters he had consulted with a wizard about succession of the Crown, was beheaded, a noble man exceeding much missed and lamented of good men. Which when the Emperour Charles the fifth heard, he said, as (it is written in his life) That a butchers dogge had devoured the faireſt back in all England: alluding to the name Buckingham, and the said Cardinall who was a Butchers sonne. Ever since which time the splendour of this most noble familie hath so decaied and faided, that there remaineth to their posterity the bare title onely of Barons of Stafford, whereas they were stiled before, Dukes of Buckingham, Earles of Stafford, Hereford, Northampton, and Perch; Lords of Brecknock, Kimbalton, and Tanbridge.

A

B

C

There are reckoned in this small shire Parishes 185.

D

BEDFORD-

E

F

Digitized by Google

BEDFORD-SHIRE.

BEDFORD-SHIRE is one of the three Counties, which we ſaid the Cattieuchlani inhabited: On the Eaſt-ſide and the South it joineth to Cambridge-ſhire and Hertford-ſhire, on the Weſt to Buckingham-ſhire, and on the North to Northampton-ſhire and Huntingdon-ſhire, and by the river OVSE croſſing over it is divided into two parts. The North-ſide thereof is the more fruitfull of the twaine and more wooddy: the other toward the South, which is the greater, ſtandeth upon a leaner ſoile but not altogether unfertile. For it yeeldeth foorth abundantly, full, white and bigge barley. In the mids it is ſomewhat thicke of woods, but Eaſtward more drie ground and bare of wood.

Ouſe, where it entereth into this ſhire, firſt viſiteth Turvy the Lord Mordants houſe, who are beholden to King Henry the Eighth for their Barony: For he created Iohn Mordant a wiſe and prudent man, who had wedded the daughter and one of the coheires of H. Vere of Addington, Baron Mordant; then runneth it by Harwood a Village, in old time called Hareleſwood, where Sampſon, ſurnamed Fortis founded a Nunnery, and where in the yeere of our redemption 1399. a little before thoſe troubles and civill broiles wherewith England along time was rent in peeces, this river ſtood ſtill, and by reaſon that the waters gave backe on both ſides, men might paſſe on foot within the very chanell for three miles together, not without wondering of all that ſaw it, who tooke it as a plaine preſage of the diuiſion enſuing. Afterward it paſſeth by Odill or Woodhill, ſometimes Wahull, which had his Lords ſurnamed alſo De Wahul men of ancient Nobility (whoſe Barony conſiſted of xxx. knights fees in diverſe countries) & had here their caſtle, which is now hereditarily deſcended to Sir R. Chetwood Knight; as the inheritance of the Chetwoods came formerly to the Wahuls. From hence Ouſe no leſſe full of crooked crankes and windings, than Meander it ſelfe, goeth by Bletneſho, commonly called Bletſo, the reſidence in times paſt of the Pateſhuls, after of the Beauchamps, and now of the honourable family of S. Iohn, which long ſince by their valour attained unto very large and goodly poſſeſſions in Glamorganſhire, and in our daies through the favour of Q. Elizabeth of happy memory, unto the dignity of Barons when ſhe created Sir Oliver the ſecond Baron of her creation, L. S. Iohn of Bletneſho unto whom it came by Margaret Beauchamp an inheritrice wedded firſt to Sir Oliver S. Iohn, from whom theſe Barons deriue their pedigree, and ſecondly to Iohn Duke of Somerſet, unto whom ſhe bare the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, a Lady moſt vertuous and alwaies to be remembred with praiſes; from whoſe loines the late Kings and Queenes of England are deſcended.

Barons Mordant.

See Hypodigma pag. 153.

The waters deuided.

Wahull.

Bletſho.

Barons S. Iohn de Bletneſho.

From hence Ouſe haſteth by Brumham a ſeat of the Dives of very ancient parentage in theſe parts to Bedford, in the Saxon-tongue Bedanford, the principall towne, and whereof the Shire alſo taketh name: and cutteth it ſo through the mideſt, that it might ſeeme to be two ſeverall townes but that a ſtone bridge ioineth them together. A towne to be commended more for the pleaſant ſituation and ancienty thereof, then for beauty or largeneſſe, although a man may tell fiue Churches in it. That it was Antonines LACTODORVM, I dare not as others doe, affirme: conſidering that it ſtandeth not upon the Romans Military road way, which is the moſt certaine marke to finde out the ſtation and Manſions mentioned by Antonine: neither are there heere any peeces of Romane money ever digged up, as far as I can learne. I haue read that in the Brittiſh tongue it was named Liſwidur or Letidur: but it may ſeeme to haue been tranſlated ſo out of the Engliſh name. For Lettuy in the Britiſh language ſignifieth Common Innes, and ſo Letidur, Innes upon a river: like Bedford in Engliſh, Beds or Innes at a fourd. Cuthwulf the Saxon, about the yeere of our ſalvation,

Bedford.

*Places to giue entertainment by the way unto travellers, Bayting and lodging places.

Digitized by Google

vation, 572. beneath this towne ſo vanquiſhed the Britans in an open picht field, A that then preſently upon it, finding themſelves over matched, yeelded up many townes into his hands. Neither ſhould it ſeeme that the Saxons neglected it: For Offa the moſt puiſſant King of the Mercians chooſe heere (as we read in Florilegus) for himſelfe a place of ſepulture; whoſe tombe the river Ouſe ſwelling upon a time and carrying a more violent and ſwifter ſtreame than ordinary in a floud ſwouped cleane away. Afterwards alſo when it was raſed downe and lay along by occaſion of
* Before the Conqueſt. the Daniſh deprædations, *K. Edward the Elder repaired it, and laid unto it upon the South-ſide of the river a prety townlet, which in that age, as we finde in the beſt copy of Hoveden, was called Mikſgat. In the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, as B we read in that booke which King William the Conqueror cauſed to be written when he tooke the ſurvey of England. It defended it ſelfe for halfe an Hundred in wars expeditions, and ſhipping. The land belonging to this towne was neuer hided. After this it ſuffered far more grieuous calamities under the Normans: For when * Pain de Beauchamp the third Baron of Bedford had built heere a Caſtle, there aroſe not any ſtorm
* Paganus. of civill war but it thundred upon it ſo long as it ſtood. Stephen, when with breatch of his oath he intercepted to himſelfe the Kingdome of England, firſt forced this Caſtle, and with very great ſlaughter of men won it: afterwards when the Barons had taken armes againſt King Iohn, William de Beauchamp Lord therof, and one of the Captaines of their ſide, ſurrendred it unto their hands: But a yere or two after, Falco de Breaut laid C ſiege thereto, and forthwith the Barons yeelded, and the King in free gift beſtowed it upon him. Yet the unthankefull man raiſed up a world of war againe upon King Henry the third: He pulled downe Churches to ſtrengthen this Caſtle, and exceedingly damnified the territory adjoyning, untill the King beſieged it; and when after threeſcore daies he had quelled the ſtubborne ſtomackes of theſe rebels, brought this neſt and nourſe of ſedition into his owne hands.

It will not be, I hope, diſtaſtfull to the reader, if I ſet downe heere the maner of aſſaulting this Caſtle out of a writer who then lived, and ſaw it: to the end we may underſtand with what deviſes and engines that age (as wittie well neere as ours to worke men miſchiefe) uſed in their ſeages of townes. On the East-ſide D (ſaith hee) there was planted one Petrarie and two Mangonells which daily played upon the Towre, and on the Weſt ſide two Mangonells which battered the old towne: alſo one Mangonell on the South part, and another on the North, which made two breaches and entries in the next walles. Beſides theſe there were two frames or engines of timber made by Carpenters, erected higher above the top of the Tower and Caſtle for Shootters in brakes, & for diſcoverers. There were moreover there many frames wherein ſhootters out of Braks & ſlingers were ſet in await: Furthermore there was a frame or engin there, called the Cat, Cattus. under which the pioners and underminers had their ingreſſe and egreſſe, whiles they digged under the walles of Towre and Caſtle. Now, was this Caſtle taken by foure aſſaults. In the firſt was the Barbican wonne: in the ſecond, the out Ballie. At the third, fell the wall E downe neere the old Towre by the meanes of the Miners, where, by the helpe of a chinke or breach with great daunger they became poſſeſſed of the inner Ballie: At the fourth, the Miners put fire under the Towre, ſo that the ſmoke brake forth, and the Towre was rent aſunder in ſo much as the clifts and breaches appeared wide, and then the enimies yeelded themſelves. Of theſe Mangonells, Patraries, Trabucks, Bricols, Eſpringolds, and of that which our anceſtors termed the Warwolfe, by which before that Gunnes were deviſed, they diſcharged volies of mighty huge ſtones, with great violence: and ſo brake through ſtrong walles, much might heere be ſaid, were they not beſide my purpoſe. But my author proceedeth thus: Falco remained excommunicate untill he reſtored unto F the King the Caſtle of Plumpton and Stoke-Curcy, with his plate of gold and ſilver both, and ſuch monie as that hee had: and from thence was led to London. Meane while the Sheriffe had commandement to demoliſh and raſe the towre and out Ballie. As for the inward Ballie, when the Bulwarks were caſt downe, and both trench and rampier laid levill with the ground, it remained unto William Beauchamp for to dwell in: The ſtones were granted unto the Chanons of Newenham and Chaldwell, and of Saint Pauls Church in Bedford.

Digitized by Google

A Bedford. Neither yet for all this is there any thing here more worth the seeing, than the remaines of this castle on the East side of the towne, hanging over the river.

On both sides of Bedford stood two prety & verie faire religious houses, Helenstow now Eustow on the South part, consecrated by Iudith wife to Waltheof Earle of Huntingdon unto Helena Great Constantines mother, and to sacred virgins: on the East, Newenham, which Roise the wife of * Paine de Beauchamp translated thither from Saint Paules within Bedford. * Pagani.

Ouse is not gone farre from hence, but hee seeth the tokens of a decaied castle at Eaton, which was another seat of the familie de Beauchamp, and bids Bedfordshire B farewell hard by Bisſemed, where Hugh de Beauchamp, and Roger his brother founded a little monasterie for the Chanons of Saint Austines order, as appeareth by the Popes Bull. These stand on the farther side of Ouse which yet before from the South is augmented with a nameleſſe * brooke, at whose confluents is to bee seene Temesford, well knowne by reason of the Danes standing campe, and the castle there, which they then built, when they vvintering in campe, lay sore upon this countrie, and threvv downe the Britans Fort (as it is thought) The place whereof, now called Chesterfield and Sandie, sheweth oftentimes peeces of Roman coine, as expresse tokens of the antiquity thereof: Neither doe some doubt by the verie situation, but that this was that SALENAE, which Ptolomee ascribeth to the Catti- C euchlani, if Salndy bee the name, as divers haue avouched unto mee. Heere I overpasse Potton a little mercat towne, because I finde nothing of it, but that Iohn Kinaston gaue it and the lands adjoining freelie unto Thomas Earle of Lancaster. Neither haue I reason to make many words of such places as bee situate upon this Brooke, to wit, Chicksand, where Paine de Beauchamp built a little monasterie. Shelford a mercat, Warden more inward where was a house of Cistertian monkes, and was mother to the Abbaies of Saulterey, Sibton and Tiltbey, Biglswarde much spoken of and frequented for the horse Faire there, and the stone bridge. From whence Stratton is not farre the mansion place in times past of the Barons Latimer, afterward of the Enderbeis, and from them hereditarily until our time of the Pigotts.

* Some call it Ivell.

Acton.

Salenæ seemeth to be that which Antonius called Sullomaca.

Potton.

Chicksand.

Stratton.

D Five miles from the head of this brooke in the verie hart and midest well neere of the shire, standeth Ampthil upon an hil, a parcell of the Barony of Kainho heeretofore and lately a stately house, reseembling a castle, and environed with Parks, built by Sir Iohn Cornwale Baron Fanhop, in the reigne of Henry the Sixth with the spoiles wonne from the French; whose goods, as I haue read, when Edward the Fourth had confiscated for taking part with the familie of Lancaster, and indited him, or this house rather, as Fanhop himselfe saith, of high treason; forthwith it was granted unto Edmund Grey Lord of Ruthin, and afterwards Earle of Kent: whose grand-child Richard passed both it and Ruthin over to king Henrie the Seaventh, and he annexed the same unto the kings Sacred Patrimonie, as the Civilians terme E it, or as our Lawiers use to say, unto the Crowne, and shortly after with the lands appertaining it was made the Honour of Ampthil. From hence more Northward lieth Haughton Conqueſt, so called of a worshipfull and ancient familie, which a long time dwelt therein: Westward is Woburn: where now is a free schoole founded by Francis Earle of Bedford: and where sometime flourished a notable monasterie built by Henrie de Bolebit for Cistertians, who himselfe entred into their order: Under which, at Aspley Gowiz, there is a kinde of earth, men say, that turneth wood into stones: and for proofe and testimony thereof, I haue heard say, there was a wooden ladder to be seene in that monastery, that having lien a good while covered all over in that earth, was digged forth againe al stone. More into the East, Tuddington shew- F eth a faire house, goodly to bee seene, which Sir Henry Cheiney made by Queene Elizabeth Baron Cheney of Tudington built, and shortly after died Sans-issue, where also in old time Paulin Pever a Courtier, and Sewer to K. Henry the Third (as Mathew Paris witnesseth) built a strong house with the Haul, chappel, chambers, and other houses of stone, and the same covered with lead, with orchards also and parkes to it, in such sort, as it caused the beholders to wonder thereat.

Ampthil or Amethull.

Haughton Conqueſt. Woburn.

Earth turning wood into stone.

Digitized by Google

v. supra 375.

Wee were not gone forward farre from hence but wee came to Hockley in the Hole, ſo named of the miry way in winter time verie troubleſome to travelers: (For the old Engliſhmen our progenitors called deepe myre Hock, and Hocks.) So paſſing along fields ſmelling ſweet in Sommer of the beſt beanes, which with their redolent ſavour doe dull the quick ſent of hounds and ſpaniels not with out fuming and chafing of hunters; we mounted up by a whitiſh chalkey hill into the Chiltern, and ſtreightwaies were at Dunſtable.

Dunſtable.

This towne ſeated in a chalky ground, well inhabited, and full of Innes, hath foure ſtreetes anſwering to the foure quarters of the world: in every one of which (notwithſtanding the ſoile bee moſt drie by nature) there is a large pond of ſtanding water, for the publicke uſe of the inhabitants. And albeit they bee fed onely by raine water, yet they never faile nor become drie. As for ſpring-veines there are none to bee found unleſſe they ſinke welles or pits foure and twenty cubits deepe. In the mideſt of the towne is a Croſſe or Columne rather to bee ſeene with the Armes of England, Caſtle and Ponthieu engraven thereon, adorned alſo with Statues and Images, which king Edward the Firſt erected as hee did ſome others in memoriall of Aeleonor his wife all the way as hee conveied her corps out of Lincoln-ſhire with funerall pompe to Weſtminſter. That this Dunſtable was the verie ſame Station which the Emperour Antonine in his Itinerarie calleth MAGIONINIVM, MAGIOVINIVM and MAGINTVM no man needs to make doubt, or to ſeeke it elſe where. For, beſides that it is ſituat upon the Romanes high way, there are peeces of the Roman Emperors monies found other whiles in the fields adjoining round about by the ſwine-heards, which as yet they terme, Madning mony: and within a little of the verie deſcent of the Chiltern hils there is a militarie modell raiſed up round with a rampier and ditch, ſuch as Strabo writeth the Britans townes were, conteining nine acres of ground, which the people uſe to call Madning-boure & Madin-boure: in which verie name with a little change MAGINTVM moſt plainly ſheweth it ſelfe. But when the ſaid MAGINTVM, by the iniurie of warre or time was decaied, king Henry the Firſt here reedified a towne, built a roiall houſe at Kings-bury, and planted a Colonie to repreſſe the boldneſſe of theeues that here beſet the waies & lay in wait, as the private hiſtorie of the Priory, that himſelfe founded for the ornament of this his Colonie, doth evidently beare witneſſe. But heare the verie words out of that private Hiſtorie, although they ſavour of the Barbariſme of that age. *Note that the plot of ground where the two high waies Watling and Ikening meete, was firſt by Henrie the elder king of England * cleered, to keepe under and bridle the wickedneſſe of a certaine moſt notorious theefe named* Dun, and his companions, and of that Dun the ſaid place was named Dunſtable. The King our Lord built there the burgh of Dunſtable, and made for him ſelfe a roiall Manour, or houſe neere under that place. The King had in the ſame towne both Faire and mercat. Afterwards, hee founded a Church, and by authoritie of Pope Eugenius the Third, placed therein Regular Chanons: and feoffed the ſaid Religious Chanons in the whole Burgh by his Charter, and beſtowed upon them verie many liberties.

Magiovinium.

* Sartabatur. Or clenſed by ſtocking up.

supra 64.

As for Leighton Buzzard on the one ſide of Dunſtable, and Luton on the other neither haue I reade, nor ſeene any thing memorable in them, vnleſſe I ſhould ſay that at Luton I ſaw a faire church but the Quier then rooſeleſſe, and overgrowen with weedes; and adioining to it an elegant chappell founded by I. Lord Wenlock, and well maintained by the familie of Rotheram planted here by Thomas Rotheram Archbiſhop of Yorke, and Chauncellour of England in the time of King Edward the Fourth.

Dukes, Earles and Barons of Bedford. Franciſcus Alovertus.

As touching the Lords, Dukes, and Earles of Bedford. Firſt, there were Barons of Bedford out of the familie of Beauchamp: who by right of inheritance vvere Almners to the Kings of England upon their Coronation day. Whoſe inheritance being by femals parted among the Mowbraies, Wakes, Fitz-Ottes &c. King Edward the Third created Engelrame de Coucy Earle of Sueſons in France, ſonne to Engelrame Lord of Coucy, and his vvife daughter to the Duke of Auſtria, the firſt Earle of Bedford,

Digitized by Google

Bedford, giving unto him his daughter in marriage. Afterwards King Henrie the
A Fifth advaunced Bedford to the title of a Dukedome: and it had three Dukes: the first was Iohn, the third ſonne of king Henrie the Fourth, who moſt valiantly vanquiſhed the French men in ſea fight at the mouth of * Seyne, and afterwards (being Regent of France) ſlaine in a battaile on land, before Vernoil, who was buried in Roan, and together with him all the Engliſhmens good fortune in France. At which time he was Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Alaunſon and Anjou, Earle of Maine, Richmond and Kendall, and Conſtable of England. For ſo was his ſtile. Whoſe monument when Charles the Eighth King of France came to ſee, and a noble man ſtanding by adviſed him to raſe it, Nay anſwered he, let him reſt in peace now beeing dead, of whom
B in warre whiles hee lived all France had dread. The ſecond Duke of Bedford was George Nevill a verie child, ſonne to Iohn Marqueſſe Mont-acute, both whom king Edward the Fourth ſo ſoone as hee had raiſed them to that tipe of honours, threw downe againe, and that by authority of the Parliament; the father, for his perfidious diſloyaltie in revolting from him; the ſonne, in diſlike of his father: Howbeit there was a colourable pretenſe made, that his eſtate was to weake for to maintaine the port and dignity of a Duke: and becauſe great men of high place if they bee not welthy withall, are alwaies grievous and iniurious. The third was Iaſper of Hatfield, Earle of Pembroch, honoured with that title by his Nephew king Henry the Seauenth, for that he was both his vnckle, and had delivered out him of extreame
C dangers: who being aged and a bachelar, departed this life, ſome ten yeares after his creation.

* Sequana.

But within the remembrance of our fathers it fell backe againe to the title of an Earldome: what time as king Edward the Sixth created Iohn Lord Ruſſell Earle of Bedford: after whom ſucceeded his ſonne Francis, a man ſo religious and of ſuch a noble courteous nature, that I can never ſpeake ought ſo highly in his commendation, but his vertue will farre ſurpaſſe the ſame. He left to ſucceed him Edward his Nephew by his ſonne Sir Francis Ruſſell, who was ſlaine a daie or two before his father departed this life by Scotiſhmen in a tumult upon a True-day in the midle
D marches. 1585.

This ſmall province hath pariſhes. 116.

E

F

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

HERTFORD-SHIRE.

HERTFORD-SHIRE, which I ſaid was the third of thoſe that belonged to the Cattieuchlani, lieth on the Eaſt and partly on the South ſide of Bedfordſhire: The Weſt-ſide is encloſed with Bedfordſhire and Buckinghamſhire: the South with Middleſex, the Eaſt with Eſſex, and the North with Cambridge-ſhire. A ritch country in corne fields, paſtures, medowes, woods, groues, and cleere riverets. And for ancient townes it may contend with the neighbours even for the beſt: For, there is ſcarſely another ſhire in all England that can ſhew more good townes in ſo ſmall a compaſſe.

In the verie limit thereof Northward, where it boundeth upon Cambridgeſhire, ſtandeth Roiſton, a towne well knowne, but of no antiquity: as beeing riſen ſince the Normans daies. For one Dame Roiſe, a woman in that age of right great name *whom ſome thinke to haue beene Counteſſe of Norfolke, erected there about a Croſſe in the high way, (which was thought in that age a pious worke to put paſſengers in minde of Chriſts paſſion) whereupon this place was for many yeares called Roiſes-Croſſe, untill that Euſtach de Marc adjoined thereto a little Monaſtery in the honour of Thomas of Canterbury: for then, were Innes built, and by little and little it grew to be a towne, which in ſtead of Roiſes Croſſe was called Roiſton, that is, Roiſes towne: unto which king Richard the Firſt granted a Faire at certaine ſet times and a mercat; Now, it is very famous and paſſing much frequented for malt: For, it is almoſt incredible, how many buyers and ſellers of corne, how many Badgers, yea and corne-mongers or regraters flocke hither weekely every mercat daie, and what a number of horſes loden doe then fill the high waies on everie ſide.

Roiſton. Chronicles of Dunſtable. *Others ſay ſhee was the wife of Richard de Clare.

Over Roiſton Southward is mounted Tharfield among the high hils, an antient habitation of the familie of Berners, deſcended from Hugh de Berners, unto whom in recompenſe of his valiant ſervice in the Normans conqueſt, king William the Conquerour granted faire lands in Everſdon within the county of Cambridge. And in ſo great worſhip and reputation flouriſhed his poſterity, that Sir Iohn Bourchier, who married the right heire at common law of that familie, beeing promoted by king Edward the Fourth to the honour of a Baron, tooke his addition thereof and was ſtiled Baron Bourchier of Berners, and uſually Lord Berners.

Tharfield. Berners.

Upon this confineth Nucelles, belonging in times paſt to the houſe of the Rocheſters or Roffes: but all the repute and glorie that it hath aroſe from the inhabitants thereof afterwards, namely the Barons of Scales deſcended out of Norfolke, but yet the heires of Roffe. For King Edward the Firſt gaue unto Sir Robert de Scales in regard of his valourous ſervice in the Scotiſh warres, certaine lands to the value in thoſe daies of three hundered markes by the yeare, and called him among the Barons to the Parliament. Their Eſchocheon Gules with ſixe eſcallops argent is ſeene in many places. They flouriſhed unto king Edward the Fourth his daies, at what time the onlie daughter and heire of this familie was wedded unto Sir Anthonie Widevile Earle Rivers; whom beeing advanced by his owne glorious proweſſe and the kings marriage with his ſiſter, the malicious hatred and envie of his enemies moſt vilanouſlie over wrought, and brought to utter deſtruction. For, King Richard the Third beheaded him, innocent man as hee was. And, when as ſhe died without iſſue, the inheritance was parted in king Henrie the Seavenths time betweene Iohn Earle of Oxford, who by the Howards, and Sir William Tindale knight, who by the Bigods of Felbridge, were found next couſens and coheires. The Manour of Barkway hereby appertained alſo to thoſe Lords Scales, a well knowne throughfare. Beyond which is Barley that imparted ſurname to the ancient, and well allied familie of the Barleies; and on this ſide Aneſtie, which was not long ſince the inheritance

Nucelles. The familie of Roffes.

Barons de Scales.

Aneſtie.

Digitized by Google

inheritance of the house of Yorke, and in elder times the Castle there was a nest of rebels, wherefore Nicolas of Anesty Lord thereof, was expresly commanded by King Henry the Third to demolish so much of it as was raised since the Barons wars against his father King Iohn. But now time hath wholy raised it all. A cl. 2. H. 3. m. 11.

Aſhwell. To returne, though disorderly, East-ward is Aſhwell, as one would say, The well or fountaine among the Aſhes: a Country towne of good bigneſſe and full of houſes, situate on a low ground in the very North edge of the shire; where there is a source of springs bubling out of a stony banke overshadowed on every side with tall ashes, from whence there floweth at certaine vaines continually running such store of water, that forthwith being gathered within bankes it carrieth a streame able to driue a Mill and all of a sudden, as it were, groweth to a good big river. Of these wels and ashes together, as most certaine it is that the English-Saxons impoſed this new name Aſhwell: so I have beene sometime of this opinion, that the ancient Britans, who, as Gildas witnesseth, heaped divine honours upon hils, rivers, fountaines, and groves, from the very same thing and in the same sense called it Magiouinium, and that it was the same which Antonine named MAGIONINIVM. But time hath now discovered a more certaine truth, neither am I ashamed to change mine opinion in this point, seeing I take no pleasure at all in mine owne errour. And yet to prove the ancientnesse of this towne the large quadrant adjoining, enclosed with a trench and rampire maketh much, which by the Roman peeces of coin digged up there oftentimes, sheweth whose worke it was, and in that * booke, wherein aboue 500. yeares since King William the Conquerour tooke the review and account of all the townes in England, it is in plaine words tearmed a Burgh. B

*Domesday. C

Southward we saw Merkat-Baldock, situate upon a whitish soile, wherein as also in Hitchin hard by, we read of no antiquity. Then is there seated in a well-husbanded and good ground Wimondley an ancient and famous Lordship, held by the most honourable tenure with us, which our Lawyers terme Grand-Sergeanty: namely, that the Lord thereof should serue unto the Kings of England upon their Coronation day the first cup, and be as it were the Kings Cup-bearer. Which honorable office in regard of this Lordship, certaine Noble Gentlemen called * Fitz-Tek held in the beginning of the Normans reigne; from whom by a daughter it came unto the Argentons. These fetched their name and pedegree from Dauid de Argenton a Norman and a martiall Knight, who under King William the Conquerour served in the wars, and they in remembrance heereof gave for their Armes Three Cups Argent in a shield Gueules. But at last, for want of issue male in King Henry the sixth his daies, Elizabeth Argenton the sole and entier inheretrice, brought it unto her husband Sir William Allington Knight, with faire lands thereby and this dignity, from whom Sir Giles Allington now the heire of this family is the seuenth, a young Gentleman right courteous and of a generous nature, who I hope will give some new lustre by his vertues unto the ancient worship of his house.

Grand-Sergeantie.

Fitz-Tec.

Argentons. D

Hard by and neere unto the roade high-way, betweene Steuenhaugh and Knebworth the seat of the worshipfull house of the Littons descended from Litton in Darby-shire, I saw certaine round hils cast up and raised by mans hands, such as the old Romans were wont to reare for souldiers slaine in the wars, of which the captaine himselfe laied the first turfe. Unlesse some man would rather say they had a reference to the bounds: For such like little hils in old time were reared to signifie the bounds of lands, under which they used to lay ashes, coles, lime, bricke, and tile beaten to powder, &c. as I will shew else-where more at large. E

In the County of Northampton.

Beneath this, more Southward, the river Lea, by our forefathers named Ligean, hath his head: who with a mild course passeth downe, first, by Whethamsted a towne plentifull in wheat, whereof it tooke name; which place, Iohn of Whethamsted there borne & thereof named, a man in King Henrie the Sixt his daies much renowned by his due desert of learning, made of more estimation. From thence running by Brocket Hall, the residence in late time of the Brockets Knights, approcheth neere unto Bishops Hatfield situate upon the fall and hanging of a little hill: in the upper part F whereof

Digitized by Google

A whereof stood a house of the Kings, now the Earle of Salisburies, in times past belonging to the Bishops of Ely, whereupon it was named Bishops Hatfield, which Iohn Morton Bishop of Ely reedified. For in this place King Eadgar gave unto the Church of Ely fortie hides of land. Afterwards it passeth under Hertford, in which some copies of Bede is named Herudford, where he treateth of the Synode there holden in the yeere of our Salvation 670. which name some interprete: The red ford, others, The ford of Harts. This towne in William the Conquerours time, discharged it selfe for tenne hides and in it were 26. Burgesses, and at that time Ralfe Limsey a noble man built heere a Cell for Saint Albans Monkes. But now it is neither greatly inhabited nor B much frequented: and in this respect most of all commended, because it is ancient. For why? it hath given name to the whole County, and is reputed the Shire-towne. A Castle it hath upon the river Lea, built, as men thinke, by King Edward the Elder, and enlarged first by the house of Clare, whereunto it belonged. For Gislebert of Clare about King Henrie the Second daies, was accounted Earle of this Hertford, and Robert Fitz-walter, of the same house of Clare, what time as Stephen seized into his hands all the Castles of England whersoever, avouched franckly even to Stephen his face, as we read in Mathew of Paris, that the keeping of this Castle by ancient right appertained unto himselfe. Afterwards it was laid unto the Crowne: and King Edward the Third granted unto Iohn of Gaunt his sonne, then Earle of Richmond, who C afterward was Duke of Lancaster, this Castle with the towne and Honor of Hertford: where (as the very words runne in the Graunt) he might according to his estate keepe house and decently make his aboade.

Bishops Hatfield.

From hence Lea falleth downe forthwith to Ware, so named of a barre or dam made to stay water streames, which our ancestors called a Weare or Ware. This towne, even at the very first did much harme unto Hertford, and afterwards by reason it became so greatly hanted, darkened, as it were, the light thereof.

For, when the Barons warre against King Iohn was waxed hote, this Ware presuming much upon their Lord the Baron Wake, turned London high way to it, where as before it was but a little village, and knowne by a Frierie which he founded: neiD ther was it lawfull to passe that way with any carts, considering that the bridge was chained up, the keyes whereof were in the custodie of the Bailife of Hertford. Neere about which time Gilbert Mareschall Earle of Pembroch a principall and most potent Peere of the Realm, proclaimed heere a disport of running on horsback with launces, which they call Tourneaments, under the name of Fortunie, making a scorne of the Kings authority, whereby such Torneaments were inhibited. To which place when a great number of the nobility & gentry were assembled, it fortuned that himselfe as he ranne at tilt, by occasion that his flinging horse brake bridle & cast him, was trampled under foote and so pittifully died. These Iusts or Torneaments were certaine publicke exercises of Armes and more than flourishes, practised among noble gentlemen, E and instituted (if we beleeve Munster) in the yeere of our Lord 934. having also speciall laws therto belonging, which you may find in the said Munster: & the same exercises were used a long time in such an outrageous maner, and with such slaughter of Gentlemen in all places, but in England most of all, since that King Stephen brought them in, that by divers decrees of the Church they were forbidden, upon paine, that whosoever therin were slaine should want Christian buriall in Church or Churchyard; and heere with vs King Henrie the Third by advise of his Sages made an act of Parliament, that their heires who trangressed in this kind, should be disinherited. Howbeit, contrary to the said law so good and wholsome, this naughty and wicked custome was practised a great while, and grew not quite ont of use beF fore the happie daies of King Edward the Third.

Tournaments.

Matth Paris Anno 1248.

Betwixt these two townes, Hertford and Ware, distant scarse two miles a sunder, Lea is encreased by two rilles from the North: Asserius termeth them Minerun and Beneficium. I would guesse that to be Beneficium upon which standeth Benington, where the notable familie of Bensted had in old time a little Castle: and also Wood-

Wood-hall.

hall

Digitized by Google

Butler. hall an habitation of the Butlers, who being branched from Sir Ralph Butler Baron of Wem in Shropshire, and his wife heire to William Pantulfe Lord of Wem, were Lords of Pulri-bach, and enriched much by an heire of Sir Richard Gobion, and another of Peletot Lord of this place, in the time of King Edward the Third. I take Mimeran to be the other broke whereupon Pukerich is seated, which by the grant of King Edward the First, at the mediation of William le Bland had a mercate and Faire granted to it. Whereupon also neighboureth Standon with a seemely house built by Sir Ralph Sadleir Chauncellour of the Dutchy of Lancaster, priuy Counsellour to three Princes, and the last Knight Baneret of England: a man so aduanced for his great services, and staied wisdome. A Standon.

At the backe of Pukerich, Munden Furnivall sheweth it selfe, a place to be remembred if it were but for this, that Geffrey Earle of Britaine gave it to Gerard de Furnivall (of whom also it bare the name) a younger sonne of Furnivall of Shefsfeld. But now let vs returne to the river Lea and the towne of Ware, unto which the Danes being come with their light pinnaces, and Shallops raised a fort, as the said Asserius reporteth, which when King Aelfred could not winne by force, hee by digging three severall chanels, turned a side the water of Lea, that they might not returne with their vessels; So as ever since it stood the neighbour inhabitants in small or no stead; untill being brought of late unto his ancient chanell, it is become more commodious for the carriages of all commodities, &c. Lea is not gone forward farre from Ware when hee entertaineth a riveret named Stort from the East, which first runneth downe out of Essex by Bishops Stortford, a small towne fenced sometime with a little Castle set upon a mount cast up of purpose, within a pretie Iland: which Castle King William the Conquerour gaue unto the Bishops of London: and of those Bishops it came to be so called; but King John for hatred to Bishop William overthrew it. From thence it maketh his way by Sabridgworth a parcell of the Honor of Earle William Mandeuile, and sometime the possession of Geffrey Say, neere Shingle-hall honested by the owners, the Leuenthorpes of ancient gentry. Soon, not farre from Honsdon forfaited by Sir William Oldhall to the Crowne in the time of K. Henrie the Sixt, which gaue a title of Baron Hunsdon to Sir Henrie Cary, through the favour of Queene Elizabeth, unto whom he was Lord Chamberlaine, as who verily, besides his deiscent from the royall familie of the Dukes of Somerset was by his mother Marie Bolen cousen german to the said Queene. Lea having thus admitted into him this reveret, hasteneth now with a merry glee to the Tamis, vnder Hodesdon a faire through Faire, to which H. Bourchier Earle of Essex having a faire house at Base therby (while it stood) procured a Mercat: & then as it were in gratulatorie wise saluteth Theobalds, commonly called Tibaulds, which our Nestor of Britaine, the right honorable Baron Burghley, late Lord high Treasurer of England built: an house, if one respect the workmanship none more faire and elegant, if the gardens, orchards, and walkes bedight with with groves, none more pleasant: unto whom especially this river willingly acknowledgeth it selfe beholden for the recovery againe of his ancient chanell. B C D E Bishops Stortford. Castle of Way-more.

Hodesdon.

Theobalds.

But returne we now to places more within the Country, and of greater antiquity. From Hertford twelve miles Westward, stood VEROLAMIVM, a Citie in times past very much renowned, and as greatly frequented, Tacitus calleth it VERVLAMIVM, Ptolomee, UROLANIVM & UEROLAMIVM, well knowen this is in these daies, neere unto S. Albans in Caisho Hundred, which the CASSII of whom Cæsar maketh mention in all probability, held and inhabited.

Verolamium. Saint Albons.

The Saxons named it Watlinga-ceaster, of the famous high-way Watlingstreet, and also Weolam-ceaster. Neither hath it as yet lost that ancient name, for commonly they call it Verulam, although there remaineth nothing of it to be seene, beside the few remaines of ruined walles, the checkered pavements, and peeces of Roman coine other whiles digged up there. It was situate upon the gentle descent or side of an hil Eastward, fenced about with passing strong walles, a double rampire and deepe trenches toward the South: and Eastward watered with a brooke, which in F old

Digitized by Google

A old time made a great meere, or ſtanding poole. Whereby it was gueſſed that this was the very ſame towne of Caſſibelaunus fortified with vvoods and mariſhes, which Cæſar wan: For there vvas not to be ſeene any other poole or meere in this tract, to my knowledge. In Nero his time it was counted a MVNICIPIVM: whence it is that in Ninius his Catalogue of cities, it is named Caer-Municip. So that probable it is, that this was the very ſame CAER MVNICIPIVM, which Hubert Goltzius found in an old inſcription. Theſe Municipia were townes endowed with the right of Romane Citizens, and this name came a Muneribus capiendis, that is, of publike offices and charges in the Common-wealth: and they had, for their States and Degrees, Decurions, that is, Gentlemen, and Commons: for their publike Councell, a Senate and People: For their Magiſtrates and Prieſts, Duum-virj, Trium-virj to ſit in iudgement and miniſter juſtice, CENSORS, AEDILES, Quæſtors and Flamins. But whether this Municipium or towne enfranchiſed were with ſuffrages or without, a man cannot eaſily affirme. A Municip with ſuffrages they tearmed that which was capable of honourable offices: like as that other they called without ſuffrage, which was not capable. In the reigne of the ſame Nero, when Bunduica or Boadicia Queene of the Iceues in her deepe loue of her country, and conceived bitter hatred againſt the Romans, raiſed bloudy and mortall war upon them, it was raſed and deſtroied by the Britans, as Tacitus recordeth. Hence it is that Suetonius wrot thus: To theſe miſchiefes ſo great proceeding from the Prince, there happened (to mend the matter) a grieuous loſſe in Britain, wherein two principall towers of great importance, with much ſlaughter of Romane Citizens and Allies, were put to the ſack & ſpoiled. Nevertheleſſe it flouriſhed againe and became exceeding famous and paſſing well frequented: yea and I have ſeene old antiquities of mony ſtamped, as it ſeemeth heere, with this inſcription, TASCIA, and on the reverſe VER. Which that learned ſearcher of Venerable antiquity David Powell, Doctour in Divinity interpreteth to be the Tribut of Verulamium. For Taſc, as he teacheth me in the Britiſh or Welch tongue ſoundeth as much as Tribute, Taſcia a Tribut Penny, and Taſcyd the chiefe collector of Tribute. But loe heere is the very peece of mony portraied for you to ſee, which heeretofore alſo I have exhibited.

Caſſibelines towne.

Municipia. - pt 703.

Verulam and Maldon.

E Some would have this mony to be coyned before the coming in of the Romans: but I beleeve them not. For I have alwaies thought them to be tribute mony, which being impoſed upon the poll and the lands were yeerely exacted and gathered by the Romans, as I have ſaid before. For before that the Romans came, I can ſcarſe beleeve the Britans coined or ſtamped any money. Yet I remember what Cæſar writeth of them: And they uſe, ſaith he, braſſe mony or rings of iron weighed to a certaine poiſe. Where the ancient bookes have Lanceis Ferreis, for which the Criticks put in Laminis Ferreis, that is, plates of iron. But let my pen returne againe to the matter propoſed, for my meaning is not heere to weave the ſame web ſtill. As for Verulam, it was famous for nothing ſo much as for bringing foorth Alban a citizen of ſingular holineſſe and faith in Chriſt, vvho vvhen Diocleſian went about by exquiſite torments to vvipe Chriſtian religion quite out of the memory of men, was the firſt in Britain that with invincible conſtancy and reſolution ſuffered death for Chriſt his ſake. Whereupon he is called our Stephen, and the * Protomartyr of Britain, yea and Fortunatus Preſbyter the Poet wrot thus of him, See pag. 97. Britans coines.

F

*Albanum

*Alban Martyr.

Digitized by Google

Albanum egregium fœcunda Britannia profert. A

Fruitfull Britan bringeth foorth
Alban a Martyr of high worth.

And Hiericus a French man, who flouriſhed 700. yeeres ago, of the ſame Alban and his executioner miraculouſly ſtricken blinde, made theſe verſes,

In the life of S. German.

Millia pœnarum Chriſti pro nomine paſſus,
Quem tandem rapuit capitis ſententia cæſi,
Sed non lictori ceſſit res tuta ſuperbo,
Vtque caput Sancto, ceciderunt lumina ſæuo.

Thouſands of torments vvhen he had endur'd for Chriſt his ſake
At length he died by dome thus given. [his head away to take] B
The Tortor proudly did the feat, but cleere he went not quit;
That holy Martyr loſt his head, this cruell wretch his ſight

In reproch of this Martyr and for the terrour of Chriſtians, as wee finde in an old * Agon of his, the Citizens of Verulam engraved his Martyrdom in a Marble ſtone, and inſerted the ſame in their walles. But afterwards when the bloud of Martyrs had conquered Tyrants cruelty, the Chriſtians built a Church, as Bede ſaith, of wondrous workman-ſhip, in memoriall of him: and Verulam carried with it ſo great an opinion of religion, that therein was holden a Sinode or Councell in the yeere of the worlds redemption 429. when as the Pelagian Hereſie, by meanes of Agricola ſonne to the Biſhop Severianus had budded foorth a freſh in this Iland, and polluted the Britiſh Churches ſo, as that to averre and maintaine the truth they ſent for German Biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus Biſhop of Troies out of France: who by refuting this hereſie gained unto themſelues a reverent account among the Britans: but chiefly German, who hath thorowout this Iland many churches dedicated to his memory. And neere unto the ruined wals of this raſed citie, there remaineth yet a chappel bearing S. Germans name ſtill, although it be put to a prophane uſe: in which place he openly out of the Pulpit preached Gods word, as the ancient records of S. Albans church do teſtifie.

* A Legend of his paſſion and Martyrdome.

S. Germant Chappell.

C

Which German (as Conſtantius flouriſhing in that time writeth in his life) commanded the Sepulchre of Saint Albane to be opened: and therein beſtowed; certaine reliques of Saints, that whom one heaven had received, ſhould alſo in one Sepulcher be together lodged. Thus much I note by the way, that yee may obſerue and conſider the faſhions of that age. Not long after, the Engliſh-Saxons wonne it: but Vther the Britan, ſurnamed for his ſerpentine wiſdome, Pendragon, by a ſore ſiege and a long recovered it. After whoſe death, it fell againe into their hands. For, we may eaſily gather out of Gildas words, that the Saxons in his daies were poſſeſſed of this Citie. God, ſaith he, hath lighted unto vs the moſt cleere lamps of holy Saints, the Sepulchres of whoſe bodies, and places of their martyrdome, at this day (were they not taken away by the wofull diſſeuerance which the barbarous enemie hath wrought amongſt vs, for our many grieuous ſinnes) might kindle no ſmall heat of divine charity in the minds of the beholders: Saint Alban of Verulam, I meane &c. When Verulam by theſe warres was vtterly decaied, Offa the moſt mighty King of the Mercians built juſt over againſt it about the yeere of our Lord 795. in a place which they called Holmehurſt, a very goodly and large Monaſtery in memorie of Saint Alban, or as we read in the very Charter thereof, Vnto our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, and Saint Alban Martyr, whoſe reliques Gods grace hath reuealed in hope of præſent proſperity, and future happines: and forthwith with the Monaſterie there roſe a towne, which of him they call Saint Albans. This King Offa and the ſucceeding Kings of England, aſſigned unto it very faire and large poſſeſſions, and obtained for it at the hands of the Biſhops of Rome as ample priviledges, which I will relate out of our Florilegus, that yee may ſee the profuſe liberallity of Princes toward the Church. Thus therefore writeth he. *Offa the moſt puiſſant King gave unto Saint Alban the Protomartyr, that towne of his ancient demeſne which ſtandeth almoſt twenty miles from Verulam and is named * Vneſlaw, with as much round about, as the Kings written deedes at this day doe witneſſe, that are to be ſeene in the foreſaid Monaſterie: which Monaſterie is privileged with ſo great liberey, that it alone is quite from*

D

E

F

* Peradventure Wineſlow.

Digitized by Google

A from paying that Apostolicall custome and rent, which is called Rom-scot: whereas neither King nor Archbishop, Bishop, Abbat, Prior, nor any one in the Kingdome is freed from the payment thereof. The Abbat also, or Monke appointed Archdeacon under him, hath pontificall iurisdiction over the Priests and Lay-men of all the possessions belonging to this Church, so as hee yeeldeth subjection, to no Archbishop, Bishop, or Legate, save onely to the Pope of Rome. This likewise is to be knowen, that Offa the Magnificent King granted out of his Kingdome a set rent or imposition called * Rom-scot to Saint Peters Vicar, the Bishop of Rome, and himselfe obtained of the said Bishop of Rome that the Church of Saint Alban the Protomartyr of the English nation, might faithfully collect, & being so collected reserve

* That is, of every house a penney.

B to their proper use, the same Rom-scot throughout all the province of Hertford, in which the said Church standeth. Whence it is, that as the Church it selfe hath from the King all roiall priviledges, so the Abbot of that place for the time being hath all pontificall ornaments. Pope Hadrian also the fourth who was borne hard by Verulam granted this indulgence unto the Abbats of this Monasterie (I speake the very words out of the Priviledge) that as Saint Alban is distinctly knowen to be the Protomartyr of the English nation: so the Abbat of this Monasterie should at all times among other Abbats of England in degree of dignitie be reputed first and principall. Neither left the Abbats ought undone that might serve either for use or ornament: who filled up with earth a mighty large poole under Verlam, which I spake of. The name whereof yet remaineth still heere in a cer-

C taine street of the towne named Fish-poole-streete. Neere unto which street, because certaine ankers were in our remembrance digged up, divers have verily thought (induced thereunto by a corrupt place in Gildas) that the river Tamus sometimes had his course and chanell this way. But of this Meere or Fish pool, haue heere what an old Historian hath written. Abbot Alfricke for a great peece of money purchased a large and deepe pond, (an evill neighbour and hurtfull to Saint Albans Church) which was called Fish-poole, appertaining to the Kings: And the Kings officers and fishers molested the Abbay, and burdened the Monkes thereby. Out of which poole he the said Abbot in the end drained and derived the water, and made it dry ground.

If I were disposed upon the report of the common people to reckon up what great

D store of Romane peeces of coine, how many cast images of gold and silver, how many vessels, what a sort of modules or Chapters of pillars, and how many wonderfull things of antique worke, haue beene digged up, my words would not carry credit: The thing is so incredible. Yet take with you some few particulars thereof, upon the credite of an ancient Historiographer Ealred the Abbot in the reigne of King Eadgar, having serched for the ancient vaults under ground at Verulam, overthrew all. About the yeere of Christ 960. and stopped up all the waies with passages under ground, which were strongly and artificially arched over head: For, they were the lurking hooles of whores and theeves. He leuelled with the ground the ditches of the Citie and certaine dennes, into which malefactours fled as unto places of refuge. But the whole tiles, and stones which he found fit

E for building, hee layd aside. Neere unto the banke they did light upon plankes of oke with nailes driven into them, cemented with stone-pitch: also the tackling and furniture of ships as anchors halfe eaten with rust, and ores of fire. A little after he writeth. Eadmer his successour went forward with the worke that Ealfred beganne, and his pioners overthrew the foundations of a pallace in the mids of the old Citie, and in the hollow place of a wall as it were, in a little closet, they hapned upon bookes covered with oken boords and silken strings at them: whereof one contained the life of Saint Albane written in the British tongue; the rest the ceremonies of the Heathen. When they opened the ground deeper, they met with old tables of stone, with tiles also and pillars, likewise with pitchers and pots of earth made by pot-

F ters and turners worke: vessels moreover of glasse containing the ashes of the dead &c. To conclude, out of these remaines of Verulam, Eadmer built a new Monasterie to Saine Albane. Thus much for the antiquity and dignity of Verulam: now have also with you for an over-deale in the commendation of Verulam an * Hexastich of Alexander Necham, who 400. yeeres since was there borne.

* Six verses.

Vrbs insignis erat Verolamia, plus operosa
Arti, naturæ debuit illa minus.

Septennem

Digitized by Google

Pendragon Arthuri patris hæc obsessa laborem
Septennem spreuit ciue superba suo.
Hic est martyrij roseo decoratus honore
Albanus, ciuis, inclita Roma, tuus.

The famous towne whilom cald Verolame,
To Nature ought lesse than to painfull art;
When Arthurs Syre Pendragon gainst it came,
With force of Armes to worke her peoples smart;
His seven yeeres siege did never daunt their heart.
Heere Alban gain'd the Crowne of Martyrdome,
Thy Citizen sometime ô noble Rome.

And in another passage.

Hic locus ætatis nostræ primordia nouit
Annos fœlices, lætitiæque dies.
Hic locus ingenuus, pueriles imbuit annos
Artibus, & nostræ laudis origo fuit.
Hic locus insignis, magnósque creauit alumnos,
Fœlix eximio Martyre, gente, situ.
Militat hîc Christo noctes & dies labori
Inuigilans sancto religiosa chors.

This is the place that knowledge tooke of my nativity,
My happie yeeres, my daies also of mirth and loility.
This place my childhood trained up in all arts liberall,
And laid the groundworke of my name and skill poeticall.
This place great and renowned Clerkes into the world hath sent:
For Martyr blest, for nation, for site, all excellent.
A troupe heere of religious men serve Christ both night and day,
In holy warfare taking paines, duly to watch and pray.

Saint Albans. Verolamium at this day being turned into fields: The towne of Saint Albans raised out of the ruins thereof flourisheth; a faire towne and a large, and the Church of that Monasterie remaineth yet for bignesse, beauty and antiquity, to be had in admiration: which when the Monkes were thrust out of it, was by the townesmen redeemed with the summe of 400 pound of our mony, that it might not be laied even with the ground, and so it became converted into a parish Church: and hath in it a very goodly font of solide brasse, wherein the Kings children of Scotland were wont to be baptized, which Font, Sir Richard Lea Knight Master of the Pioners, brought as a spoile out of the Scottish warres, and gave unto the said Church, with this lofty and arrogant inscription.

CVM LÆTHIA OPPIDVM APVD SCOTOS NON INCELEBRE, ET EDINBVRGVS PRIMARIA APVD EOS CIVITAS INCENDIO CONFLAGRARENT, RICHARDVS LEVS EQVES AVRATVS ME FLAMMIS EREPTVM AD ANGLOS PERDVXIT. HVIVS EGO TANTI BENEFICII MEMOR NON NISI REGVM LIBEROS LAVARE SOLITVS, NVNC MEAM OPERAM ETIAM INFIMIS ANGLORVM LIBENTER CONDIXI. LEVS VICTOR SIC VOLVIT. VALE. ANNO DOMINI. M. D. XLIII. ET ANNO REGNI HENRICI OCTAVI XXXVI.

When

When Leeth a towne of good account among the Scots, and Edinbrough their chiefe Cittie were on a fire. Sir Richard Lea Knight saved mee from burning, and brought mee into England. And I beeing mindfull of this so great a benefit, whereas before I was wont to serue for baptising of none, but Kings Children, haue now willinglie offered my service even to the meaneſt of the Englisſh Nation. Lea the victour would haue it so. Farewell. In the yeare of our Lord M. D. XLIII. and of the Reigne of King Henrie the Eighth. XXXVI.

But to the matter. As antiquity consecrated this place to bee an altar of religion: so Mars also may seeme to haue destined it for the verie plot of bloudie battaile; For, to let other particulars goe by, when England under the two houses of Lancaster and Yorke bereft, as it were, of vitall breath was readie through civill warre to sinke downe and fall in a sound, the chiefe captaines of both sides joyned battaile twise with reciprocall variety of fortune in the verie towne. First, Richard Duke of Yorke gaue the Lancastrians heere a sore overthrow, tooke King Henrie the Sixth captiue, and slue many honourable personages. Foure yeares after the Lancastrians under the conduct of Queene Margaret wonne heere the field, put the house of Yorke to flight, and restored the king to his former liberty. 1455.

About this towne (that I may let passe the mount or fortification which the common sort vseth to call Oister-hils and I take to have beene the campe of Ostorius the famous Lieutenant of Britaine) the Abbots in a pious and devout intent erected a little Nunnery at Sopwell, and Saint Iulians Spittle for Lepres, and another named Saint Mary de pree for diseased women: neere unto which they had a great Mannour named Gorombery: where Sir Nicolas Bacon Lord Keeper of the Great Seale of England built an house beseeming his place and calling. To this adjoyneth Reaborn, which is by interpretation Red-water, and yet the vvater running thereby (from Megrate sometime a religious house, now a seat of the Ferrers out of the house of Groby) is no more red than is the Red-sea. This Redborne in times past vvas a place renovvned and resorted unto in regard of Amphibalus the Martyrs reliques heere found, vvho instructed Saint Alban in the Christian faith, and for Christs sake suffered death under Diocleſian. At this daie well knowne, for that it is seated upon that common and militarie high way which wee call Watling-street, and hath hard-by Wenmer called also Womer, a brooke that never breaketh out and riseth, but it foretelleth dearth and scarcity of corne, or else some extremity of daungerous times, as the vulgare people doe verily beleeue. Neere unto this Redborne I haue some reason to thinke that the Station Duro-Co-Brivæ stood, whereof Antonine the Emperour maketh mention, although the distance of places gainesaith it. For, as Redborn in our language, so Dur-coh in the British is all one in signification, with Redwater. And verily the trueſt conjectures that wee can make of ancient places, are from antique Inscriptions from the lying of Iourneies everie waie, from the analogie and similitude of their names, and from rivers and lakes adioyning: although they answere not iust to the exact account of miles betweene place and place, considering that the numbers may verie soone bee corruptlie put downe, and the waies for shorter passage are as easily altered.

* De Prato of the Medow.

Redborn.

Duro-co-brivæ.

Certes it cannot otherwise be, but that Dur-Co-Brive stood where that Romane

Digitized by Google

Rode-waie passeth over this water, to wit under Flansted: for even there, by the high way side, there is a good bigge spring breaking out of the ground about seauen Italian miles from Verlam: (for which seaven, through the careleſſe negligence of the transscribers, twelue hath crept in). Which booke presently, whiles it is yet but small cutteth the high way crosse, and although it carry here no name at all, yet beneath Saint Albans town it is called Col, which is neare to the name Co. As for that BRIVA, which is an adjection to many names of places, it signified, as I suppose, among the old Britans and Gaules, a bridge, or a passage, seeing it is found onely where there are rivers. In this Island there was one or two Durobrivæ, that is to say, if I bee not deceived Water passages; in Gaules, Briva-Isaræ now Pontoise, where in times past they passed over the river* Isara, Briva-Oderæ, where they passed over Oderam, and Samarobriva (for this is the true name) where there was passage over the river Some.

Briva what it is.

*Yſere.

Flamsted.

Some what aboue Flamsted sheweth it self upon the hill, which in the time of king Edward the Confessour, Leofstane the Abbat of Saint Albans gaue unto three knights, Turnot, Waldese and Turman, for to defend and secure the country thereby against theeues. But William the Conqueror tooke it from them, and gaue it to Roger of Todeney or Tony, a noble Norman, whose possession it was, but by a daughter it was transferred at length to the Beauchamps Earles of Warwick.

Hemsted.

From hence I went downe Southward to Hempsted a little mercate towne called Hehan-Hamsted (when king Offa gaue it unto the monastery of Saint Albans) situat among the hils by a riveret side, which floweth anon into another, that runneth downe by Beckhamsted. Where the nobles of England, who deviſed how they might shake off the new yoake of the Normans, assembled them selves togither by the perswasion of Fretherike Abbat of Saint Albans: and unto whom William the Conqueror repaired (as wee reade in the life of the same Fretherike) fearing, least hee should loose the kingdome with shame, which hee had gotten with the effusion of so much bloud. And after much debating of matters in the presence of the Archbishop Lanfrank, the king for the preservation of his peace swore upon all thereliques of Saint Albans Church, and by laying hand upon the Holy Gospells unto Abbat Fretherick, who ministred the oth, to obserue and keepe inviolably the good and approved ancient lawes of the kingdome, which the holie and devout kings of England his predecessours, and king Edward especially ordeined. But most of those Peeres and Nobles hee forthwith evill entreated, turned out of all their possessions, and bestowed this Towne upon Robert Earle of Moriton, and Cornewall his halfe brother: Who fortified the castle heere with a duple trench and rampier: In which Richard king of Romans, and Earle of Cornwall full of honours and yeeres changed this life for a better. For default of whose issue and offspring king Edward the Third in the end made over this castle with the towne unto Edward his eldest sonne, that most warlicke prince, whom hee created Earle of Cornwall. Now that castle is nothing else but broken wals and a rude heape of stones: aboue which Sir Edmund Cary knight, and Mr of the Kings Iewell house descended from the familie of the Caryes of Cockington, and the Beauforts Dukes of Somerset built of late a verie goodlie and most pleasant house. In the verie towne it selfe nothing is worth sight saue onelie the schoole, which Iohn Incent Deane of Paules in London, a natiue of this place, founded.

Berkhamsted.

Kings Langley.

More into the South, standeth Kings Langley, sometime the kings house, in which was borne, and thereof tooke name Edmund of Langley king Edward the Third his sonne, and Duke of Yorke: where there was a small cell of Friers preachers, in which that silly and miserable Prince King Richard the Second, after he had beene wickedly deprived both of kingdome and life, was first buried, and soone after translated to Westminster; requited there by way of amends a tombe and brasen image for the losse of a kingdome. Iust in a maner over against this, there is another Langley also, which because it belonged to the Abbats of Saint Albanes is called Abbots Langley: wherein was borne Nicholas surnamed Break-speare, afterwards Bishop of Rome, Abbots Langley.

Digitized by Google

Rome, knowne by the name of Pope Hadrian the Fourth: who was the First that taught the Norwegians to the Christian faith, and represſed the Cittizens of Rome aſpiring to their ancient freedome; whoſe ſtirrup alſo as hee alighted from his horſe, Frederik the Firſt Emperor of the Romans held, and whoſe breath was ſtopped in the end with a flie that flew into his mouth. Somewhat lower I ſaw Watford and Rickemaneſworth, two mercate townes: concerning which I haue read nothing of greater antiquity than this, that king Offa liberally gaue them unto Saint Alban; as alſo Caiſhobery next unto Watford. In which place Sir Richard Moriſin knight, a great learned man, and who had beene uſed in Embaſſages to the mightieſt Princes, under king Henrie the Eighth and king Edward the Sixth began to build an houſe; which Sir Charles his ſonne finally finiſhed.

Pope Hadrian the Fourth. pa. 419.

Watford.

Caiſhobery.

More into the Eaſt, the Romans militarie high way went directly from London to Verolam by Hamſted-heath, Edgeworth and Elleſtre: neere unto which at the verie ſame diſtance where Antonine the Emperour in his Itinerarie placeth SVLLONIACAE, to wit, twelue miles from London and nine From Verolam, there remaine yet the markes of an ancient Station, and much rubiſh or rammel is digged up at an hil which in theſe daies they call Brockley-hil. But when the Romans Empire ceaſſed in this Iſland, as Barbariſme by little and little crept in, whiles all partes ſmoked with the Saxons warre, this, as every thing elſe, laie a great while relinquiſhed, untill that a little before the Normans comming in, Leofſtane Abbot of Saint Albans reſtored it. For hee, as wee find written in his life, *Cauſed the thicke and ſhady woods, which lie from the edge of * Chiltern unto London; eſpeciallie where the kings high waie called Watlinſteet laie to be cut up, the rugged places to be levelled, bridges to bee built, and the uneven waies to bee made plaine and ſafer for paſſage*. But about three hundered yeares ſince, this waie was after a ſort againe forſaken, by reaſon that another waie through licence of the Biſhops of London was laied open through High-gate and Bernet. This Bernet, for the beaſt mercat there kept, beginneth now to bee famous, but it was more renowned for a field there fought, when in the warre betweene the two families of Lancaſter and Yorke, England dared to doe againſt her owne bowells, whatſoever ambitious treachery and diſloialty would command. For, upon Gledeſmore hard by, even on Eaſter daie in the morning there was a bloudie battaile moſt fiercely fought, and that with variable fortune for a great while, by reaſon that a moſt thicke miſt covered the face of the ground. But in the end the victorie fell happily unto King Edward the Fourth, by occaſion that Richard Nevil Earle of Warwicke was there ſlaine, whom as the favourable indulgence of Fortune made over-ſtout and bold, yea and dangerous unto kings: ſo his death freed England from all feare of civill warres. Bernet hath for his neighbours Mimmes a ſeat of a worſhipfull familie of the Coningesbies deſcended to them by Frowick from the Knolles, ancient poſſeſſours thereof; and North-hal, where Ambroſe Dudley laſt Earle of Warwicke raiſed a ſtately houſe from the foundations.

Sulloniacæ, Salenæ in Ptolemee, but miſ-placed.

* Ciltriæ.

Bernet.

*

Mimmes.

North-hall.

This County of Hertford had Earles out of the familie de Clare, who notwithſtanding were oftener called Earles of Clare, from Clare in Suffolke their principall ſeat. The firſt to my knowledge was Gilbert, who under the title of Earle of Hertford is put downe as a witneſſe in a Charter of King Stephens. Likewiſe Roger de Clare in the time of King Henrie the Second is in the Red-booke of the Exchequer named Earle of Hertford.

Earles of Hertford. pa. 462.

Likewiſe his ſucceſſours, whom you may ſee in there places. But ſeeing both by right of inheritance, and alſo through the princes favour they attained to the Earledome of Gloceſter, they bare both titles iointly, and were called unto Parliaments by the name of Earles of Gloceſter and Hertford. And Richard de Clare who died in the yeare of our Lord 1262. is in plaine termes by Florilegus of Weſtminſter called Earle of Gloceſter and of Hertford, where hee reporteth this Epitaph compoſed for him in that age, to his greate commendation.

See the Earles of Gloceſter and in Suffolke.

Digitized by Google

Hic pudor Hippolyti, Paridis gena, ſenſus Vlyſſis, Aeneæ pietas, Hectoris ira jacet.
Chaſt Hyppolite, and Paris faire, Vlyſſes wiſe and ſlie, Aeneas kinde, fierce Hector here iointly entombed lie.

A

But not long ſince King Henrie the Eighth honoured Sir Edward de Saint Maur or Seymer with the title of Earle of Hertford, who alſo was created Duke of Somerſet by king Edward the Sixth. After whom ſucceeded in this Earledome his ſonne bearing the ſame name, a right honourable perſonage and a ſingular lover of Learning.

B

C

This countie hath pariſhes. 120.

TRI D

E

F

Digitized by Google

TRINOBANTES.

THey, whom Cæsar calleth TRINOBANTES, Ptolomee and Tacitus, TRINOANTES, were next neighbours to the Cattieuchlani, inhabiting in those countries, which now having changed their names are commonly termed Middlesex and Essex. Whence that ancient name sprung, I dare not verily so much as guesse, unlesse it come of the British word Tre-Nant, which is as much as towns in a vale. For this whole region in a maner lieth low in a valley upon the Tamis. But I doe not greatly please my selfe in this my conjecture. And yet they that inhabited Galloway in Scotland, lying altogether lowe in vallies were of old time in the British tongue called Noantes and Novantes, and in the Vale of Rheine, in french named Le Vaule, the people in old time called Nantuates, had both their aboade and their name thence: so that this conjecture of mine may seeme as probable as that of others, who over curiously haue derived Trinobantes, of Troy, as a man would say Troia Nova, that is, New Troy. But I wish them well, and that heerein they may please themselves. These were in Cæsars time of all these countries well neere the strongest City or State (for, evermore he termeth by the name of Civitas, a whole people living under the same lawe) and their King in those daies, was Immanuentius, who being slaine by Cassibelinus, his sonne Mandubratius saving his life by flight, went into Gaule to Cæsar, and putting himselfe under his protection returned with him into Britaine. At which time these Trinobantes petitioned Cæsar by their Ambassadors, that he would defend Mandubratius from the injuries of Cassibelinus, and resend him to the State, that he might be governour and beare rule over them: which being done, they gave forty Hostages, and were the first of all the Britans that yeelded themselves under his allegeance. This Mandubratius, that I may note so much by the way, is evermore called by Eutropius, Bede, and the later writers, Androgeus. But whence this diversitie of the name should arise, I am altogether ignorant: unlesse that bee true, which I haue learned from a very skilfull man in the British historie and language both, that this name Androgeus was given unto him for his lewdnesse and perfidious treason. For, the signification of wickednesse doth most plainly shew it selfe in it: And in the Booke of Triades, among the three Traitours of Britaine, he is counted the most villanous; in that he was the first that made way to bring the forraine Romans into Britaine, and betraied his country. After Mandubratius, when as now

See among the Coines, the peece stamped with TASCNOVANEL.

Civitas, that is, Citie, what it signifieth in Cæsar.

Androgeus.

Digitized by Google

by reason of hote ciuill wars, Britain was neglected of the Romans and left unto his own Princes and lawes, certaine it is that Cunobeline ruled as King in these parts, of whose coine I exhibit heere unto you one or two peeces, although I haue already shewed the very same and others heeretofore. A

B

C

Suetonius. Adminius this mans sonne banished by his father fled with a small retinue about him to the Romane Emperour Caius Caligula, and yeelded himselfe. Which so puffed up the young Emperours minde, that as if all the Iland had absolutly and wholly yeelded into his hands, he sent glorious letters to Rome, admonishing oftentimes the bearers thereof not to deliuer them unto the Consuls, but in the Temple of Mars, and in a frequent assembly of the Senate. When Cunobelinus was dead, Aulius Plautius by commission from Claudius the Emperour set upon this country. One of Cunobi-

Fasti Capitolini. linus his sonnes named Togodumnus he slew, and another called Catacratus he ouerthrew in the field, ouer whom also, as we finde in the Capitollin Record of the Romane Triumphes, he rode Ovant in triumph: and that, with so great honour as Suetonius writeth, that Claudius the Emperour went side by side with him both in his going to the Capitoll and also in his returne from thence. And he himselfe shortly after transporting his forces hither, brought these parts within few Monthes into the forme of a Prouince. Thence-foorth the Trinobants rested a while in peace, but that under the Empire of Nero they priuily entered into a conspiracy with the Iceni to shake off the Romans yoke. But Suetonius Paulinus, as Tacitus recordeth, quickly quenched this flame of sedition with a great effusion of Britans bloud. When the Romane Empire was at length come to an end in Britaine, Vortigern the Britan, gaue to the Saxons (who kept him prisoner) for his ransome this country with others, as Ninnius writeth: and it had his peculier Kings for a long time together, but such as held by homage sometimes of the Kentish Kings, sometimes of the Mercians. Among whom Sebert in the yeere 603. was the first that became a Christian: and Suthred the last King, who being vanquished by Egbert in the yeere 804. left the Kingdome unto the West-Saxons: But heereof elsewhere more largely: Now let us survey the very Country.

D

E

F

MIDLE-

Digitized by Google

MIDLE-SEX.

MIDLE-SEX taketh name of the Middle-Saxons, becauſe the inhabitants thereof were in the mids betweene Eaſt-Saxons, Weſt-Saxons, South-Saxons, and thoſe whom that age called Mercians. It is ſevered from Buckinghamſhire by the river Cole which the Britains called Co, on the Weſt-ſide, from Hertford-ſhire on the North-ſide by a knowen crooked limite, from Eſſex on the Eaſt with the river Lea, from Surrey & Kent on the South by the Tamis. It being compriſed within ſhort bounds lieth out in length, where it is longeſt twenty miles, and in the narroweſt place it is ſcant twelue miles over. For aire paſſing temperat, and for ſoile fertile, with ſumpteous houſes and prety townes on all ſides pleaſantly beautified: and every where offereth to the view many things memorable. By the river Cole, where it entereth firſt into this ſhire, we ſaw Breakeſpear an ancient houſe belonging to a family ſo ſurnamed, out of which came Pope Hadrian the fourth, of whom ere while I ſpake: then, Haresfeld, in old time Herefelle, the poſſeſſion in King William the Conquerours daies of Richard the *ſonne of Counte Giſlebert. More Southward, Uxbridge anciently Woxbridge a towne of later time built, and full of Innes, ſtretcheth out in length. Beneath which is Draiton, reedified by the Barons Paget; Colham, which from the Barons Leſtrange came to the Earles of Darby: and Stanwel ever ſince the Normans comming in, unto our fathers daies the habitation of the family of Windeſore. And not far from hence, Cole after it hath made certaine ſcattering medowllands, at two ſmall mouthes falleth into Tamis. Along the ſide whereof, as a Germane Poet in this our age pretily verſified,

Tot campos, Sylvas, tot regia tecta, tot hortos
Artifici dextrâ excultos, tot vidimus arces,
Ut nunc Auſonio Tamiſis cum Tybride certet.

So many fields and pleaſant woods, ſo many princely Bowres,
And Palaces we ſaw beſides, ſo many ſtately towres,
So many gardens trimly dreſſed by curious hand which are,
That now with Romane Tyberis the Tamis may well compare.

Breakſpeare.
Pope Hadrian the 4.
Haresfield.
* Fitz-Giſlebert.
Vxbridge.

At the very firſt entrance, Stanes in the Saxon tongue Stana offereth it ſelfe to our ſight, where Tamis hath a woodden bridge over it. This name it tooke of a meere-ſtone heere in times paſt ſet up to marke out the iuriſdiction that the Citie of London hath in the river. Neere unto this ſtone is that moſt famous Medow Runingmead commonly called Renimed: in which the Baronage of England aſſembled in great number in the yeere 1215. to exact their liberties of King Iohn. Whereof in the marriage of Tame and Iſis the Poet wrote thus, ſpeaking of the Tamis that runneth hard by.

Stanes.
Runingmead

Sublait hic pratum, quod dixit Renimed Anglus,
Quo ſedere duces armis anniſq; verendi,
Regis Iohannis cuperent qui vertere ſceptrum,
Edwardi Sancti dum leges juraq; vellent
Principe contempto tenebroſo è carcere duci:
Hinc ſonuere tubæ pluſquam ciuilia bella,
Venit & hinc refugus noſtras Lodouicus in oras.

Hence runnes it hard by Medow greene, in Engliſh RENIMED,
Where cloſe in counſell ſat the Lords, as well for armour dred
As ancient yeeres right reverend: who ſought their ſoveraigne King Iohn to depoſe from regall throne: Whiles that they ment to bring (Contemning Prince) S. Edwards lawes and liberties againe,

Inure,

Digitized by Google

Inure, which had long time forlet a quite forgotten laine. A
Hence more than civill warres, alovvd the trumpets ganne to ſound, Hence Levvis of Fraunce, vvho ſoone retir'd, ſet foot on Engliſh ground.

From thence it paſſeth by Coway-ſtakes at Lalam, where we ſaid that Cæſar croſſed over the Tamis, and the Britans fenſed the banke and fourd againſt him with ſtakes, whereof it had the name. Tamis paſſing downe from thence ſeeth aboue it Harrow, the higheſt hill of all this country, under which Southward there lie for a long way together exceeding rich and fruitfull fields, eſpecially about Heſton a ſmall village that yeeldeth ſo fine floure for manchet that a long time it hath ſerued for the Kings mouth. Within a little of it is Hanworth, where ſtands a prety houſe of the Kings, B which King Henrie the Eighth took exceeding delight in, as being a retiring place for his ſolace and voluptuous pleaſure. Afterwards it runneth hard by Hampton Court a roiall palace of the Kings, a worke in truth of admirable magnificence built out of the ground by Thomas Wolſey Cardinall, in oſtentation of his riches, when for very pride, being otherwiſe a moſt prudent man, he was not able to mannage his minde. But it was made an Honor, enlarged and finiſhed by King Henrie the Eighth ſo amply, as it containeth within it fiue ſeverall inner Courts paſſing large, environed with very faire buildings wrought right curiouſly, and goodly to behold. Of which Leland writeth thus:

Harrow-hill.

Hanworth

Hampton Court.

Eſt locus inſolito rerum ſplendore ſuperbus, C
Alluiturque vaga Tamiſini fluminis vnda,
Nomine ab antiquo iam tempore dictus Avona.
Hîc Rex Henricus taleis Octauius ædes
Erexit, qualeis toto Sol aureus orbe
Non vidit.

A Stately place for rare and glorious ſhew
There is, which Tamis with wandring ſtreame doth dowſſe;
Times paſt, by name of Avon men it knew:
Heere Henrie the Eighth of that name, built an houſe D
So ſumpteous, as that on ſuch an one (Seeke through the world,) the bright Sunne never ſhone.

And another in the Nuptiall Poeme of Tame and Iſis.

Alluit Hamptonam celebrem quæ laxior vrbis
Mentitur formam ſpaciis; hanc condidit aulam
Purpureus pater ille grauis. grauis ille ſacerdos
Wolſæus, fortuna ſuos cui felle repletos
Obtulit, heu tandem fortunæ dona dolores.

He runnes by HAMPTON, which for ſpatious ſeat
Seemes Citie-like: Of this faire and courtly Hall E Firſt founder was a Prieſt and prelate great Wolſey, that grave and glorious Cardinall:
Fortune on him had pour'd her gifts full faſt,
But Fortunes Bliſſe, Alas, proved Bale at laſt.

And now with a great winding reach the river bendeth his courſe Northward by Giſtleworth, for ſo was that called in old time, which now is Thiſtleworth. Where ſometime ſtoode the palace of Richard King of Romans and Earle of Cornwall, which the Londoners in a tumultuous broile burnt to the ground.

Thiſtleworth.

From hence Sion ſheweth it ſelfe, a little Monaſterie ſo named of the moſt holy mount Sion: Which King Henrie the fifth, when he had expelled thence the Monkes F aliens, built for religious Virgins to the honor of our Sauiour, the virgine Marie, and Saint Briget of Sion: like as he founded another on the rivers ſide over againſt it for the Carthuſian Monkes, named Ieſu of Bethelem. In this Sion, hee appointed to the glorie of God ſo many Nuns, Prieſts, and lay brethren devided a part within their ſeverall wals, as were in number æquall to Chriſt his Apoſtles & Diſciples: upon whom when he had beſtowed ſufficient living he provided by a law, that contenting themſelves

Digitized by Google

A themſelves therewith, they ſhould take no more of any man: but what overplus ſoever remained of their yeerely revenew, they ſhould beſtow it upon the poore. But after that in our fathers time thoſe religious Votaries were caſt out, & it became a retiring houſe of the Duke of Somerſet, vvho plucked downe the Church, & there began a nevv houſe. Vnder this the ſmall water Brent iſſueth into the Tamis, vvhich ſpringing out of a pond vulgarely called Brouſ-well, for Brentwell, that is, in old Engliſh Frog-well, paſſeth downe betvveene Hendon, vvhich Archbiſhop Dunſtan borne for the aduancement of Monkes, purchaſed for ſome few golden Bizantines, which were Imperiall peeces of gold coined at Bizantium or Conſtantinople, & gaue to the Monkes
B of Saint Peter of Weſtminſter: and Hamſted-hilles (from whence you haue a moſt pleaſant proſpect to the moſt beautifull Citie of London, and the louely countrie about it.) Ouer which the ancient Roman militatie way led to Verulam or Saint Albans by Edgeworth, and not by High-gate as now, which new way was opened by the Biſhops of London about ſome 300. yeeres ſince. But to returne, Brent into whom all the ſmall rillets of theſe parts reſort, runneth on by Brentſtreat, an Hamlet to whom it imparted his name, watereth Hanger-wood, Hanwell, Oiſterly parke, where Sir Thomas Greſham built a faire large houſe: and ſo neere his fall into the Tamis giueth name to Brentford a faire throughfaire, and frequent mercat.

Bezantes Bizantines of ſilver valued at two ſhillings anciently.

Neere which in the yeere 1116. King Edmond ſurnamed Ironſide, ſo fiercely charC ged upon the Danes whom he compelled by force to retire from the ſiege of London, that as faſt as their horſes could make way, they fled, not without their great loſſe. From Stanes hitherto, all that lieth betweene London highway (which goeth through Hounſlow) and the Tamis was called the Forreſt or Waren of Stanes, untill that King Henrie the Third, as in his Charter we read; Diſforreſted and diſwarened it. Then by the Tamis ſide is Fulham, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Fullonham, that is, The place of Foules: the greateſt credite and honor where of is the Biſhop of Londons houſe ſtanding their conveniently, not farre from the Citie, albeit not ſo healthfully. Alſo Chelſey, ſo named of a ſhelfe of Sand in the river Tamis as ſome ſuppoſe, but in Records it is named Chelche-hith: a place garniſhed with faire and ſtately houſes, by D King Henrie the Eighth, by William Powlet the firſt Marqueſſe of Wincheſter, and by others.

Fulham.

Chelſey, as one would ſay, Sheltsey.

But LONDON, the Epitome or Breviary of all Britain, the ſeat of the Britiſh Empire, and the Kings of Englands chamber, ſo much overtoppeth all theſe, as according to the Poet, Inter viburna Cupreſſus, that is, the Cypreſſe-tree among ſmal twigges. Tacitus, Ptolomee, and Antonine call it LONDINIVM, and LONGIDINIVM: Ammianus LVNDINVM and AVGVSTA; Stephen in his Cities ΛΙΝΔΟΝΙΟΝ, our Britans Lundayn; the old Saxons London ceaſtep, London-byrig, London-byc: ſtrangers Londra and Londres: the inhabitants London: Fabulous writers Troia nova, that is, New Troy, Dinas Belin, that is, Belins City, and Caer Lud of King Lud, whom they E write to have reedified it and given it the name. But theſe new names and originall derivations together with Eraſmus his conjecture, who deriveth it from Lindum a Citie in the Iſle Rhodes I willingly leave to ſuch as well like it. For mine owne part, ſeeing that Cæſar and Strabo doe write that the ancient Britains called thoſe woods and groves by the names of Cities and Townes, which they had fenced with trees caſt downe and plaſhed to ſtoppe up all paſſage: ſeeing alſo I have vnderſtood that ſuch woods or groves are in the Brittiſh tongue named Llwyn, I encline a little to the opinion that London thence tooke name, as one would ſay, by way of excellency The City, or A Citie thicke of trees. But if heerein I faile of the truth, let me with good leave give my coniecture (and heere would I have no man to charge me with inconF ſtancy while I diſport in conjecture) that whence it had the fame, thence alſo it tooke the name, even from ſhips, which the Britains in their language call Lhong: ſo that Londinum may ſeeme to ſound as much as a ſhip-Rode, or City of ſhips. For, the Britains tearme a City Dinas, whence the Latines have fetched their Dinum. And hence it is, that elſe-where it is called LONGIDINIVM, and in the funerall ſong or Dump of a moſt ancient Britiſh Bard*, Lhong-porth, that is, an harbour or haven of ſhips; & by this

London.

Britans townes.

Dinas.

*Poet.

this very terme Bononia, or Bolen in France, which Ptolomee calleth Geſſoriacum Navale, in the Britiſh Gloſſarie is named Bolung-long. For, many Cities have drawen their names from Ships, as Naupactus, Nauſtathmos, Nauplia, Navalia Auguſti &c. But of theſe none hath better right to aſſume unto it the name of a ſhip-Rode, or Haven, than our London. For, in regard of both Elements moſt bleſſed and happy it is, as being ſituate in a rich and fertile ſoile, abounding with plentifull ſtore of all things and on the gentle aſcent and riſing of an hill, hard by the Tamis ſide, the moſt milde Merchant, as one would ſay, of all things that the world doth yeeld: which ſwelling at certaine ſet houres with the Ocean-tides, by his ſafe and deepe chanell able to entertaine the greateſt ſhips that be, daily bringeth in ſo great riches from all parts, that it ſtriveth at this day with the Mart-townes of Chriſtendome for the ſecond priſe, & affoordeth a moſt ſure and beautiful road for ſhipping. A man would ſay that ſeeth the ſhipping there, that it is, as it were, a very wood of trees disbranched to make glades and let in light: So ſhaded it is with maſts and ſailes.

Who was the firſt founder, is by long time growen of knowledge, and in truth very few Cities there are that know their owne firſt founders, conſidering they grew up to their greatneſſe by little and little. But as other cities ſo this of ours fathereth her originall upon the Trojanes, as verily beleeving that Brutus the Nephew in the third deſcent of Great Aeneas was the builder thereof. But whoſoever founded it, the happie and fortunate eſtate thereof hath given good proofe, that built it was in a good houre and marked for life, and long continuance. And that it is for antiquity honorable, Ammianus Marcellinus giveth us to underſtand, who called it in his times, and that was 1200. yeares agoe, an old towne: and Cornelius Tacitus in like maner, who in Nero his daies 1540. yeares ſince, reported it to have been a place very famous for freſh trade, concourſe of Merchants, and great ſtore of victuals and all things neceſſary. This onely at that time was wanting to the glory thereof, that it had the name neither of Free City nor of Colony. Neither verily could it have ſtood with the Romans profit, if a City flouriſhing with merchandize ſhould have enjoied the right of a Colonie or Free City. And therefore it was, as I ſuppoſe, that they ordained it to be a Præfecture: For ſo they tearmed townes where Marts were kept and Iuſtice miniſtred: yet ſo as that they had no Magiſtrates of their owne, but rulers were ſent every yeere to governe in them, and for to miniſter law, which in publike matters, namely of tax, tributes, tolles, cuſtomes, warfare &c. they ſhould have from the Senate of Rome. Hence it cometh that Tacitus, the Panegyriſt, and Marcellinus call it onely a Towne. And although it was not in name loftier, yet in welth, riches, and proſperity it flouriſhed as much as any other, yea and continued in maner alwaies the ſame under the dominion of Romans, Engliſh-Saxons, and Normans, ſeldome or never afflicted with any great calamities. In the reigne of Nero, when the Britains had conſpired to recover and reſume their liberty under the leading of Boadicia, the Londoners could not withall their weeping and teares hold Suetonius Paulinus, but that after he had levied a power of the Citizens to aide him, he would needes diſlodge and remove from thence, leaving the City naked to the enemie: who foorthwith ſurpriſed and ſlew ſome few, whom either weakneſſe of ſex, feebleneſſe of age, or ſweetneſſe of the place had deteined their. Neither had it ſuſteined leſſe loſſe and miſery at the hands of the French, if it had not ſodden ely and beyond all expectation by Gods providence beene releeved. For when C. Alectus had by a deceitfull wile made away C. Carauſius a Cliue-lander, who taking vantage of our rough ſeas, of Dioclesians dangerous warres in the Eaſt, and withall preſuming of the French, and moſt venterous Mariners and ſervitours at ſea, had withheld to himſelfe the revenewes of Britaine and Holland, and borne for the ſpace of ſix yeeres the title of Emperour Auguſtus, as his coines very often found heere doe ſhew: when M. Aurelius Aſclepiodotus likewiſe had in a battaile ſlaine Alectus in the third yeare now of his uſurpation of the imperiall purple & ſtate; thoſe French, who remained aliue after the fight, haſting to London forthwith would haue ſacked the Cittie, had not the Tamis, which never failed to helpe the Londoners, verie fitly brought in the Romane ſouldiers, who by reaſon of a fogge

Præfecturæ.

C. Carauſius. Panegyrice, pronounced before Conſtantius Cæſar, and untruely entituled, unto Maximian.

Frankes put to the ſword.

Digitized by Google

A fogge at sea were severed from the nauie. For, they put the Barbarians to the swoord all the Citie over, and thereby gaue the Cittizens not onely safety by the slaughter of their enemies but also pleasure in the beholding of such a sight. And then it was, as our Chronicles record, that Lucius Gallus was slaine by a little brookes side, which ran through the middle almost of the City, and of him was in British called Nant-Gall, in English Walbrooke: which name remaineth still in a street, under which there is a sewer within the ground to ridde away filth; not farre from London-stone, which I take to haue beene a Millarie, or Milemarke, such as was in the mercat place of Rome: From which was taken the dimension of all journeys every way, considering it is in the very B mids of the City, as it lieth in length. Neither am I perswaded that London was as yet walled. Howbeit within a little while after, our Historics report, that Constantine the Great at the request of his mother Helena, did first fense it about with a wall made of rough stone & British bricks, which tooke up in compasse three miles or there about: so as it enclosed the modell of the Citie, almost foure square but not equall on every side, considering that from West to East it is far longer, then from South to North. That part of this wal which stood along the Tamis side is by the continuall flowing & washing of the river fallen downe & gone. Yet there appeared certaine remaines thereof in King Henry the seconds time, as Fitz-Stephen, who then lived, hath written. The rest now standing is stronger toward the North, as which not many C yeeres since was reedified by the meanes of Iotceline L. Major of London, became of a sodaine new, as it were, and fresh againe. But toward East and West, although the Barons in old time during their warres repaired and renewed it with the Iewes houses then demolished, yet is it all throughout in decaie. For Londoners, like to those old Lacedemonians laugh at strong walled cities, as cotte houses for women, thinking their owne City sufficiently fensed when it is fortified with men and not with stones. This wall giveth entrance at seven principall gates, (for wittingly I omit the smaller) which as they have beene newly repaired, so they have had also new names given unto them.

London stone. Militarium.

Hellens money oftentimes found under the walles.

The wall.

1474.

The gates.

On the West side there be two: to wit Lud-gate of King Lud, or Flud gate, as Le- D land is of opinion of a little floud running beneath it (like as the Gate Fluentana in Rome) built againe of late from the very foundation: and Newgate the faireſt of them all, so called of the Newnesse thereof, where as before it was termed Chamberlangate, which also is the publicke Goall or Prison. On the Northside are foure; Alderſgate of the antiquity, or as others would haue it, of * Aldrich a Saxon: Creple-gate, of a spittle of lame creples sometime adjoining thereunto: More-gate of a moorie ground hard by, now turned into a field and pleasant walkes: which gate was first built by Falconer Lord Maior in the yeere of our Lord 1414: & Bishopsgate of a Bishop, which gate the Duch Merchants of the Stiliard were bound by covenant, both to repaire and also to defend at all times of danger and extremity. On the East side there E is Aldgate alone, so named of the oldnesse, or Elbegate, as others terme it, which at this present is by the Cities charge reedified. It is thought also that there stood by the Tamis beside that on the bridge two gates more, namely, Belings-gate, a wharfe now, or a key for the receit of ships, and Douregate, that is, The Water-gate, commonly called Dowgate.

1586.

Aldrich.

Esterlings.

Where the wall endeth also toward the river there were two very strong forts or Bastilions: of which the one Eastward remaineth yet usually called, The Tower of London: in the British tongue, Bringwin, or Tourgwin of the whitenesse. A most famous and goodly Citadell, encompassed round with thicke and strong walles, full of loftie, and stately Turrets, fensed with a broad and deepe ditch, furnished also with F an armorie or magazine of warlicke munition, and other buildings besides: so as it resembleth a big towne: and a man may truly suppose, that those two Castles which Fitz-Stephen recorded to haue beene at the East-side of this Citie went both to the making of this one. The other Fort was on the West side of the Citie, where Fleete, a little reveret (whence Fleete streete tooke name) now of no account, but in times past able to beare vessells, as I have red in the Parliament Rolls sheddeth it selfe into

The tower.

to

Digitized by Google

to the Tamis. Fitz-Stephen called this the Palatine tower or caſtle: and they write, A that in the reigne of William the Conquerour it was conſumed by fire. Out of the ruins whereof, both a great part of Paules Church was newly built: and alſo in the very plot of ground where it ſtood, Robert Kilwarby Archbiſhop of Canterbury founded a religious houſe for Dominican Freers (whereupon we call the place Blacke Freers.) Whereby, a man may eaſily gueſſe of what bigneſſe it was. Howbeit there ſtood in that place in the daies of King Henrie the ſecond (Gervaſe of Tilburie in his booke entituled Otia Imperiatia is mine author) two forts or caſtles built with wals and rampiers: The one whereof belonged to Bainard, the other to the Barons of Montfichet by right of ſucceſsion. But nothing remaineth of them at this day. Yet ſome thinke, that B Pembroch houſe was a peece of them, which we terme Bainards Caſtle, of William Bai-
Pat. 6. I. m. 21. nard a noble man Lord of Dunmow, whoſe poſſeſſion ſometime it was, whoſe ſucceſſours the Fitz-walters were in right of inheritance the Enſigne bearers of the Citie of London, and amongſt them Robert Fitz-walter had licence of King Edward the Firſt to ſell the ſite of Bainards Caſtle to the ſaid Archbiſhop Robert.

Neither was this Citie at that time walled onely, but alſo when the Flamin or Pagan prieſt was taken away, and Chriſtian religion eſtabliſhed under that good Em-perour, a Biſhop was enſtalled in his roome. For, it appeareth, that at the Counſell of Arles which in the yeere of grace 314. was held under Conſtantine the Great, the Biſhop of London was preſent. For, he ſubſcribed, as is to be ſeene in the firſt Tome C of the Councels in this maner: RESTITVTVS Biſhop in the Citie of London, out of the Province of Britaine: which Reſtitutus and his ſucceſſors had their ſeat and reſiance, as ſome affirme, at Saint Peters in Cornhill. Heere after, London flouriſhed in ſuch honor, that it beganne to be called AVGVSTA, and by that name was famous under the Emperor Valentinian. For, Ammianus Marcellinus in his 27. booke writeth thus:
London called Auguſta. And going forward to London an ancient towne, which the poſterity called Auguſta: and in the 28 booke. He went from Auguſta, which men of old time called Lundi, whence it came, that when after Conſtantines time there was a mint appointed therein. (For A mint. we read in his peeces of mony, which he ſtamped in honor of his father Conſtantius, D and in others, this inſcription P. LON. S. that is, Pecunia Londini ſignata, that is,
L. high Treaſurer. Monie ſtamped at London) he that had the charge and ouer ſeeing thereof under the
* Comes ſacrarum Largitionum, is in the booke of Notice termed Præpoſitus Theſaurorum Auguſtenſium in Britania, that is, Provoſt of the Treaſury of Auguſta, or London in Britaine. For this name AVGVSTA was a name full of much dignitie, full of Majeſtie.
And both founders and repairers of Cities when they either hoped or wiſhed, that ſuch Cities would become flouriſhing and powerfull, gaue them ſignificative names of good fortune. But among the moſt auſpicious names that be, none is more magnificent, none more auſpicate than AVGVSTA. For, this of AVGVSTVS, that moſt gracious and mighty Emperor Oſtavianus tooke unto himſelfe not without the E judgement of the beſt learned. Surnamed he was, ſaith Dio, Auguſtus, as one of great Majeſtie above the nature of man. For, what things be moſt honorable and ſacred, are called AVGVSTA; Neither had London this name for ſo high an honor without the Licence of the Romane Emperours. For that names could not be impoſed to cities without licence, Virgill noteth in that verſe of his:

Vrbem appellabant, permiſſo nomine, Aceſtam.

The Citie, by permiſſion, ACESTA they did name.

But as continuance of time hath out worne this ſo honorable a name of Auguſta:
ſo it hath confirmed that other more ancient name, Londinum. Whiles it enjoied the foreſaid name Auguſta, it ſcaped faire from deſtruction by a rebellious rout of ran- F ſackers: but Theodoſius the father of Theodoſius the Emperour did cut them in peeces whiles they were encombred with their ſpoiles, and entred, as Marcellinus ſaith, with exceeding great ioy in triumphant maner into the Citie diſtreſſed before and overwhelmed with grievous calamities. And marching with his armie from thence, he by his valiant proweſſe ſo freed Britain from thoſe intolerable miſeries & dangers wherwith it was beſet, that the Romans, as witneſſeth Symmachus, honored him among other ancient worthies

Digitized by Google

A worthies and men of honorable renowne, with the ſtatue of a man of armes. Not long after, when the Romans Empire in Britaine was come to an end, in that publicke deſtinie and fatall fall of the whole State, it fell into the Engliſh-Saxons hands: but in what ſort, it is not agreed upon among writers. For mine owne part, I am of opinion, that Vortigern, to redeeme himſelfe being taken priſoner, delivered it for his ranſome unto Hengeſt the Saxon: conſidering that it belonged to the Eaſt Saxons, whoſe country, as writers doe record, Vortigerne upon that condition made over unto Hengiſt.

At which time the ſtate of the church went to wrake and endured ſore
B afflictions, the paſtours were either ſlaine or forced to flie, their flockes driven away, and after havock made of all, as well church goods as others, Theon the laſt Biſhop of London of Britiſh bloud, was faine to hide the holie reliques of Saints, for a memoriall (as mine author ſaith) and not for any ſuperſtition. But although Reliques hidden for a remembrance.
thoſe daies of the Engliſh Saxons were ſuch as that a man might truely ſay: Mars then brandiſhed and ſhooke his weapons, yet was London never the leſſe, as Bede teſtifieth, a towne of trade and traffique, Frequented with many nations reſorting thither by ſea and land. But afterwards, when a more gracious gale of peace breathed favourably upon this wearied Iſland, and the Engliſh Saxons beganne to profeſſe Chriſtianitie, it alſo beganne a freſh to flouriſh againe. For, Aethelbert 610.
C King of Kent, under whom Sebert reigned in this tract, as it were, his vaſſal and by courteſie, founded heere a Church and conſecrated it to Saint Paul, which beeing eftſoones reedified and repaired became at length moſt ſtately and magnificent, endowed alſo with faire livings and revenewes, wherewith are mainteined, a Biſhop, a Deane, and Chaunter, a Chancellour, and a Treaſurer, fiue Archdeacons, thirty Præbendaries, and divers others. Saint Paules Church.

The Eaſt part of this Church, which ſeemeth to bee the newer and curiouſly wrought, having under it a verie faire arched vault, which alſo is Saint Faithes Church, was begunne of the ruines of that Palatine Caſtle (which I ſpeake of) by Maurice the Biſhop; about the yeare of our Lord 1086. when as before time it
D had beene conſumed by a wofull accidentall fire: whereof, William of Malmesburie writeth thus: The beautie thereof is ſo magnificent, that it deſerveth to bee numbered in the ranke of moſt excellent edifices: ſo large is that arched vault underneath, and the Church abeue it of ſuch capacity, that it may ſeeme ſufficient to receive any multitude of people whatſoever. Becauſe therefore Maurice carried a minde beyond all meaſure in this project, hee betooke the charge and coſt of ſo laborious a peece of worke unto thoſe that came after. In the end when B. Richard his ſucceſſours had made over all the revenewes belonging unto the Biſhoprick to the building of this Cathedrall Church, ſuſteining himſelfe and his familie otherwiſe in the meane while, hee ſeemed in a manner to have done juſt nothing: ſo that hee ſpent his whole ſubſtance pro-
E fuſely here about, and yet ſmall effect came thereof. Biſhop.

The Weſt part, as alſo the Croſſe-yle are ſpatious, high built, and goodlie to bee ſeene by reaſon of the huge pillers and a right beautifull arched rouſe of ſtone. Where theſe foure parts croſſe one another and meete in one, there riſeth uppe a mightie bigge and loftly towre, upon which ſtood a ſpire ſteeple covered with leade, mounting up to a wonderfull height: for it was no leſſe than fiue hundered and foure and thirty foote high from the ground; which in the yeare of our Lord 1087. was ſet on fire with lightning, and burnt, with a great part of the Cittie: but beeing rebuilt, was of late in mine owne remembrance, when I was but a Child, fired againe with lightning, and is not as yet reedified;
F The meaſure alſo and proportion of this ſo ſtately building, I will heere put 1560.
downe out of an old writer, which you may, if it pleaſe you, reade: Saint Pauls Church conteineth in length ſixe hundered ninetie foote: the breadth thereof is one hundered and thirtie foote: the height of the Weſt arched rouſe from the ground carrieth a hundered and two foote: and the new fabrique from the ground is foure ſcore and eight foote high. The ſtoneworke of the ſteeple from the plaine ground riſeth in height

Digitized by Google

two hundered and threescore foote: and the timber frame uppon the same is two hunde- A red seventy foure foote high &c.

The Temple of Diana.

That there stood of old time a Temple of Diana in this place some haue coniectured, and arguments there are to make this their conjecture good. Certaine old houses adjoining are in the ancient records of the Church called Dianaes Chamber: and in the church-yard, while Edward the First reigned, an incredible number of Ox-heads were digged up, as wee finde in our Annals, which the common sort at that time made a wondering at, as the Sacrifices of Gentiles: and the learned Sacrifice of Bulls.

know, that Taurapolia were celebrated in the honour of Diana. I my selfe also when I was a boy, haue seene a stagges head sticking upon a speare-top, (a ceremony B suiting well with the Sacrifices of Diana) carried round about within the verie Church in solemne pompe and procession, and with a great noise of Horne-blowers. And that Stagge or Hart which they of the house de Bawde in Essex did present for certaine lands that there held, as I haue heard say, the Priests of this Church arraied in their sacred vestiments and wearing garlands of floures upon their heads, were wont to receiue at the steps of the quire.

Now whether this were in use before those Bawds were bound to exhibite such a stagge, I wote not: but surely this rite and ceremony may seeme to smell of Dianas worship and the gentiles errours, more than of Christian religion. And verily no man neede to doubt, that from them certaine strang, and foraine and C heathenish rites crept into Christian religion. Which ceremonies the first Christians, (as mankind is naturally a pliant sectary to superstition) either admitted, or else at the first tolerated, thereby to traine and allure the Heathen, from Paganisme by little and little to the true service and worship of God.

But ever since this church was built, it hath beene the See of the Bishops of London: and the First bishop that it had under the English (about fiftie yeares after that Theon of the British nation was thrust out) was Melitus a Romane consecrated by Austin Archbishop of Canterbury. In honour of which Austin, flat against the decree of Pope Gregorie the Greate, the ensignes of the Archbishopricke, and the Metropolitane See, were translated from London to Canterbury. D

Who were buried in Paules Church. About the yeare 680.

Within this Cathedrall church, (to say nothing of Saint Erkenwald, and the Bishops) there lie buried Sebba king of the East Saxons, who gaue over his kingdome for to serue Christ; Etheldred or Egeldred, who was an oppressour rather than a ruler of this kingdome, cruell in the beginning, wretched in the middle, and shamefull in the end: so outrageous he was in his connivencie to a parricidie committed, so infamous in his flight and effeminacie, and so miserable in his death.

1016. William Malmsbury.

Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne; Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Sir Simon de Burlie a right noble knight of the Garter executed by encroched authority without the kings assent, Sir Iohn de Beauchamp, Lord warden of the Cinque-ports; Iohn Lord Latimer, Sir Iohn Mason knight; William Herbert Earle of Pembroch, Sir E
Nicholas Bacon Lord keeper of the great Seale of England, a man of a deepe reach and exquisit judgement; Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Francis Walsingham, two famous knights &c. and Sir Christopher Hatton Lord Chancellour of England, for whose perpetuall memorie Sir William Hatton his Nephew by sister, descended from the auncient familie of the Newports, whom he adopted into the name of Hatton, dutifullie erected a sumpteous monument, wel beseeming the greatnesse of his adoptiue father.

Besides this church, there is not to my knowledge any other worke of the Englisn Saxons extant in London to bee seene: for why? they continued not long in perfect peace; considering that in short space the West-Saxons subdued the F
East-Saxons; and London became subject to the Mercians. Scarcely were these civill warres husht, when a new tempest brake out of the North: I meane the Danes, who piteously tore in peeces all this country, and shooke this City sore. For the Danes brought it under their subjection: but Aelfred recovered it out of their hands, and after hee had repaired it, gaue it unto Aetheldred Earle of the

Mercians,

Digitized by Google

Mercians, who had married his daughter. Yet those wastfull depopulators did what they could afterwards many a time to winne it by siege; but Canut* especially, who by digging a new chanell attempted to turne away the Tamis from it. Howbeit evermore they lost their labour; the Citizens did so manfully repulse the force of the enemie. Yet were they not a little terrified still by them, untill they lovingly received and saluted as their King, William Duke of Normandie; whom Gods destined to bee borne for the good of England against those spoilers. Presently then, the windes were laid, the clowds disparcled, and golden daies in deed shone upon it: Since when it never susteined any great calamity to speake of: but through the speciall favour and indulgence of Princes obteined verie large and great Immunities, beganne to bee called The Kings Chamber, and so flourished a new with fresh trade and traffique of merchants, that William of Malmesburie who lived well neere about that time, tearmed it a noble and welthie Citie, replenished with ritch Citizens, and frequented with the commerce of occupiers and factors comming out of all lands. And Fitz-Stephen living also in those daies, hath left in writing, that London at that time counted a hundered and twentie two parish-churches, and thirteene Covents of religious Orders: also that when a muster and shew was made of able men to beare armes, they brought into the field under their collours fortie thousand foote men, and twentie thousand horsemen.

*Or Cnute.

Then was it enlarged with new buildings, and the spatious Suburbes stretched forth from the gates a great length on every side: but westward especially which are the greatest, and best peopled: In which are twelue Innes, ordeined for students of our common law: whereof foure beeing verie faire and large belong to the iudiciall Courts, the rest two the Chancerie: besides to Innes moreover for the Serieants at Law. Heerein such a number of young gentlemen doe so painefullie plie their bookes, and studie the law, that for frequencie of students, it is not inferiour either to Angiers, Cane, or Orleance it selfe, as Sir Iohn Forteſcue in his small treatise of the lawes of England doth witnesse. The said foure principall houses, are The Inner Temple; the Middle Temple, Graies Inne, and Lincolns Inne. Those two former named, stand in the verie place where in times past, during the reigne of King Henrie the Second, Heraclius Patriarch of Ierusalem consecrated a Church for Knights Templars, which they had newlie built according to the forme of the Temple, neere unto the Sepulchre of our Lord at Ierusalem. For, at their first institution about the yeare of our Lord 1113. they dwelt in part of the Temple hard by the Sepulchre, whereof they were so named, and vowed to defend Christian religion, the Holy-land, and Pilgrimes going to visite the Lords Sepulchre, against all Mahometans, and Infidels; professing to liue in chastitie and obedience; whereupon all men most willingly and with right loving hearts embraced them: so that, through the bounteous liberality of Princes and devout people, having gotten in all places verie faire possessions, and exceeding great wealth, they flourished in high reputation for piety and devotion: yea and in the opinion, both of the holinesse of the men, and of the place King Henrie the Third, and many Noble men desired much to bee buried in their Church among them. Some of whose Images are there to bee seene, with their legges acrosse. For so they were buried in that age that had Taken upon them the Crosse (as they then termed it) to serue in the Holy-land, or had vowed the same. Among whom was William Marshall the elder a most powerfull man in his time, William and Gilbert his sonnes Marshalles of England and Earles of Penbroch. Upon William the elder his tombe I some yeares since read in the upper part Comes Penbrochiæ, and upon side this verse.

Innes of the Court.

The New Temple.

Old Temple where now stands Southampton house in Holborne.

Templars.

Miles eram Martis, Mars multos vicerat armis.

Of Mars I was a doughty knight,
Mars vanquished many a man in fight.

But in processe of time, when with insatiable greedinesse they had hoorded great wealth by withdrawing tithes from churches, appropiating ſpirituall livings to themſelves, and other hard meanes; their ritches turned to their ruine. For thereby their former pietie was after a maner ſtifled, they fell at iarre with other religious orders, their profeſſed obedience to the Patriarch of Ieruſalem was reiected, envie among the common ſort was procured, which hope of gaine among the better ſort ſo enkindled, that in the yeare of our ſalvation 1312. this order was condemned of impiety, and by the Popes authority utterly aboliſhed. Howbeit their poſſeſſions were by authority of the Parliament aſſigned to the Hoſpitalier knights of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, leaſt that ſuch lands given to pious and good uſes, againſt the Donours will ſhould bee alienated to other uſes. And yet it is apparent out of ancient writings, that this place, after the expulſion of the Templers, was the ſeat and habitation of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and of Sir Hugh Spenſer king Edward the Second his minion: afterwards of Sir Aimer de Valence Earle of Pembroch, and in the end turned into two Colledges or Innes of Lawyers. Of the reſt of theſe Innes, I haue found nothing at all by reading: But the generall voice goeth, that the one was the dwelling houſe of the Lord Greies of Wilton, and the other of the Earles of Lincolne.

* Guil. Tyrius.

A

The ſtatute as touching the Templars Lands. 17. Edward. 2.

B

* See Hoſpitilars afterwards.

Nere vnto this king Henrie the Third erected betweene the New and the Old Temple an houſe of Converts, for the maintenance of thoſe that were converted from Indaiſme to the Chriſtian truth: which king Edward the Third appointed afterwards for rolls and records to be kept therein, and thereof at this daie it is called The Rowls.

C

The Roules.

Theſe ſuburbes with houſes ſtanding cloſe together, and ſtately habitations of the nobles, and great men of the land along the Tamis ſide, reach out as farre as to Weſtminſter. Among which theſe are the moſt memorable here: Bride-well, where king Henry the Eighth built a roiall houſe for the entertainment of Charles the Fifth, Emperor: but now it is an houſe of correction: Buckhurſt houſe, or Salisbury court, belonging ſometime to the Biſhops of Salisbury: the White Freers, or Carmelite Freers: The Temples whereof I ſpeake: Then without the Bars Eſſex houſe, built by the Lord Paget: Arondel houſe before called Hampton place, and Somerſet houſe built by Edward Semer Duke of Somerſet: The Savoy, ſo named of Peter Earle of Savoy, who there dwelt, which Q. Æleonor wife to King Henrie the Third purchaſed of the fraternity of Mont-joy, and gaue it to her ſonne Edmund Earle of Lancaſter. Whoſe poſterity dwelt in it a long time untill that King Henrie the Seaventh dedicated it as an hoſpitall for the poore: Worceſter-houſe, late Bedford-houſe, Salisburie-houſe, Durham-houſe, built by Antonie Beeke Biſhop of Durham, and Patriarch of Ieruſalem, and thereby the onely ornament of this part the Britain-Burſe, built by the Earle of Salisburie, and ſo named by King Iames: Yorke-houſe In times paſt, Bath-houſe, and Northampton-houſe now begun by H. Earle of Northampton. But what meane I to name theſe places?

D

* Montis-Iouis.

E

Εισι ὁλως ὐδενος ἀλλα τυχης.

None claime them wholy for their owne:
Fortune diſpoſeth them every one.

Weſtminſter.

By this ſuburbes Weſtminſter, which ſome time was more than a mile diſtant, is conioined ſo cloſe vnto the City of London, that it ſeemeth a member thereof: whereas it is a City of it ſelfe, having their peculiar magiſtrates and priviledges. It was called in times paſt Thorney, of Thornes: but now Weſtminſter, of the Weſt ſituation, and the Monaſtery. Moſt renowned it is for that Church, the Hall of Iuſtice, and the Kings palace.

This Church is famous eſpecially by reaſon of the Inauguration and Sepulture of the kings of England. Sulcard writeth, that there ſtood ſometimes a Temple of Apollo in that place, and that in the daies of Antoninus Pius Emperor of Rome it fell downe with an earth-quake. Out of the remaines whereof, Sebert King of the Eaſt-Saxons erected another to Saint Peter, which beeing by the Danes overthrowne Biſhop Dunſtane reedified, and granted it to ſome few Monkes.

F

But

Digitized by Google

A But afterwards, King Edward ſurnamed the Confeſſor with the tenth penny of all his revenewes built it new for to be his owne ſepulture, and a Monaſtery for Benedictine Monkes; endowing it with livings and lands lying diſperſed in diverſe parts of England. But liſten what an Hiſtorian ſaith who then lived: The Devout King deſtined unto God that place, both for that it was neere unto the famous and welthy citie of London; and alſo had a pleaſant ſituation amongſt fruitfull fields and greene grounds lying round about it: and withall the principall river running hard by, bringing in from all parts of the world great variety of wares and merchandize of all ſorts to the citie adjoyning. But chiefly for the love of the chiefe Apoſtle, whom he reverenced with a ſpeciall and ſin-
B gular affection: He made choiſe to have a place there for his owne ſepulchre: and thereupon commanded, that of the tenthes of all his rents, the worke of a noble edifice ſhould be gone in hand with, ſuch as might beſeeme the Prince of the Apoſtles: To the end, that he might procure the propitious favour of the Lord after he ſhould finiſh the courſe of this tranſitory life, both in regard of his devout piety, and alſo of his free oblation of lands and ornaments, wherewith he purpoſed to endow and enrich the ſame. According therefore to the Kings commandment, the worke nobly began and happily proceeded forward: neither the charges already diſburſed or to be diſburſed are weighed and regarded, ſo that it may be preſented in the end unto God and S. Peter worth their acceptation. The forme of that ancient building read if you pleaſe out of an old Manuſcript booke: The principall plot or
C ground-worke of the building ſupported with moſt lofty arches is caſt round with a foure ſquare worke & ſemblable joincts. But the compaſſe of the whole, with a double arch of ſtone on both ſides is enclоſed with joind-worke firmely knit and united together every way. Moreover the Croſſe of the Church which was to compaſſe the mid quire of thoſe that chaunted unto the Lord, and with a twofold ſupportance that it had on either ſide to uphold and beare the lofty top of the tower in the mids, ſimply riſeth at firſt with a low and ſtrong arch: then mounteth it higher with many winding ſtaires artificially aſcending with a number of ſteps: But afterward with a ſingle wall it reacheth up to the roofe of timber well and ſurely covered with lead. But after an hundred and threeſcore yeeres King Henry the third ſubverted this fabrick of King Edwards, and built from the very foundation a new
D Church of very faire workmanſhip, ſupported with ſundry rowes of marble pillars, and the rowfe covered over with ſheetes of lead: a peece of worke that coſt fifty yeeres labour in building, which Church the Abbots enlarged very much toward the Weſt end: and King Henry the ſeventh for the burial of himſelfe, and his children adjoyned thereto in the Eaſt end a Chappell of admirable artificiall elegancy (the wonder of the world, Leland calleth it: for a man would ſay that all the curious and exquiſite worke that can be deviſed, is there compacted: wherin is to be ſeene his own moſt ſtately magnificall monument all of ſolide & maſſie copper. This church when the Monkes were dri-ven thence from time to time was altered to & fro with ſundry changes. Firſt of all it had a Deane & Prebendaries: ſoone after one Biſhop & no more,
E namely T. Thurlebey, who having waſted the Church Patrimony ſurrendred it to the ſpoile of Courtiers, and ſhortly after were the Monks with their Abbot ſet in poſſeſſion againe by Queene Mary: and when they alſo within a while after were by authority of Parliament caſt out, the moſt gracious Prince Queene Elizabeth converted it into a Collegiat Church, or rather into a Seminary and nurſe-garden of the Church, appointed twelue Prebendaries there, and as many old ſoldiers paſt ſervice for Almeſ-men, fourty ſcholers, who in their due time are preferred to the Univerſities, and from thence ſent foorth into the Church, and common-weale &c. Over theſe ſhee placed D. Bill Deane, whoſe ſucceſſour was D. Gabriel Goodman, a right goodman indeed and of ſingular integrity, an eſpeciall Patron of my ſtudies.

F Within this Church are entombed (that I may note them alſo according to their dignity and time wherein they died) Sebert the firſt of that name, and firſt Chriſtian King of the Eaſt-Saxons: Harold the baſtard ſonne of Canutus the Dane, King of England, S. Edward King and Confeſſor, with his wife Edith: Maud, wife to King Henry the firſt, the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots: King Henry the third, and his ſon, King Edward the firſt with Aeleonor his wife, daughter to Ferdinando the firſt King Princes entered in Weſtminſter Church.

Digitized by Google

of Castile and of Leon. King Edward the third, and Philippa of Henault his wife: King Richard the second and his wife Anne, sister to Wenzelaus the Emperour: King Henry the fifth with Catharine his wife, daughter to Charles the sixth King of France: Anne, wife to King Richard the third, daughter to Richard Nevill Earle of Warwicke: King Henry the seventh with his wife Elizabeth: daughter to King Edward the fourth, and his mother Margaret Countesse of Richmond: King Edward the Sixth: Anne of Cleve the fourth wife of King Henry the Eighth: Queene Mary: And whom we are not to speake of without praise, The love and joy of England Queene ELIZABETH of Sacred memory, our late Soveraigne and most gratious Lady, a Prince matchlesse for her heroicke vertues, wisdome, and magnanimity above that sex, rare knowledge, & skill in the tongues, is heere intombed in a sumptuous & stately monument, which King Iames of a pious minde erected to her memory. But alas, how little is that monument in regard of so noble and woorthy a Lady? who of her selfe is her owne monument and that right magnificent.

Queene Elizabeth.

For, how great she was, RELIGION REFORMED, PEACE VVEL GROVNDED, MONEY REDVCED TO THE TRVE VALEVV, A NAVIE PASSING VVEL FVRNISHED IN REDINESSE, HONOVR AT SEA RESTORED, REBELLION EXTINGVISHED, ENGLAND FOR THE SPACE OF XLIIII. YEERES MOST VVISELY GOVERNED, ENRICHED AND FORTIFIED; SCOTLAND FREED FROM THE FRENCH, FRAVNCE RELIEVED, NETHERLANDS SVPPORTED, SPAINE AVVED, IRELAND QVIETED, AND THE VVHOLE GLOBE OF THE EARTH TVVISE SAILED ROVND ABOVT, may with praise and admiration testifie one day unto all posterity, and succeeding ages.

Dukes, Earles, and other Nobles entombed in Westminster.

Of Dukes and Earles degree, their lie heere buried: Edmund Earle of Lancaster second sonne of King Henrie the Third, and his wife Aveline de Fortibus Countesse of Albemarle, William and Audomar of Valence of the familie of Lusignian, Earles of Pembroch, Alphonsus, John, and other children of King Edward the First, John of Eltham Earle of Cornwall, sonne to King Edward the second, Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Glocester the youngest sonne of King Edward the Third, with other of his children, Aeleanor daughter and heire of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and of Essex wife to Thomas of Woodstocke, the young daughters of Edward the Fourth, and King Henrie the Seuenth, Henrie a child two moneths old sonne of King Henrie the Eighth, Sophia the daughter of King Iames, who died, as it were, in the very first day-dawning of her age, Phillippa Mohun Duches of Yorke, Lewis Vicount Robsert of Henault in right of his wife, Lord Bourchier, Anne the young daughter and heire of John Mowbray Duke of Norfolke promised in marriage unto Richard Duke of Yorke younger sonne to King Edward the Fourth, Sir Giles Daubeney Lord Chamberlaine to King Henrie the Seuenth, and his wife of the house of the Arundels in Cornwall, I. Vicount Wells, Francis Brandon Dutches of Suffolke, Marie her daughter, Margaret Douglasse Countesse of Lennox, grandmother to Iames King of Britaine, with Charles her sonne, Winifrid Bruges Marchioness of Winchester, Anne Stanhop Dutches of Somerset and Iane her daughter, Anne Cecil Countesse of Oxford daughter to the Lord Burghley Lord high Treasurer of England, with Mildred Burghley her mother, Elizabeth Berkley Countesse of Ormund, Francis Sidney Countesse of Sussex, Thomas Butler, Vicount Thurles sonne and heire to the Earle of Ormond.

Besides these, Humfrey Lord Bourchier of Cromwall, Sir Humfrey Bourchier sonne and heire to the Lord Bouchier of Berners both slaine at Bernet Field, Sir Nicholas Carew, Baron Carew Baroness Powisse, T. Lord Wentworth, Thomas Lord Wharton, John Lord Russell, Sir T. Bromley Lord Chancellor of England, Douglas Howard daughter & heire generall of H. Vicount Howard of Bindon wife to Sir Arthur Gorges, Elizabeth daughter and heire of Edward Earle of Rutland wife to William Cecil, Sir John Puckering Lord Keeper of the great seale of England, Francis Howard Countesse of Hertford, Henrie and George Cary, the father and sonne Barons of Hunsdon both Lords Chamberlaines to Queene Elizabeth the heart of Anne Sophia the tender daughter of Christopher Harley, Count Beaumont Embassadour from the King of France

A France in England, bestowed within a small guilt Vrne over a pyramid. Sir Charles Blunt Earle of Devonshire, Lord Lieftenant generall of Ireland. And (whom in no wise we must forget) the prince of English Poets Geffrey Chaucer: as also he that for pregnant wit and an excellent gift in Poetrie of all English Poets came neerest unto him, Edmund Spenser. Beside many others of the Cleargie, and Gentlemen of qualitie.

Their was also another College or Free-chapell hard by consisting of a Deane, and twelve Chanons, dedicated to Saint Stephen: which King Edward the Third in his princely magnificence repaired with curious workmanship and endowed with faire possessions, so as hee may seeme to haue built it new what time as he had with
B his victories ouercome and subdued all France, to calling to minde (as we read the Charter of the foundation) and pondering in a due waight of deuout consideration the exceeding benefits of Christ, whereby of his owne sweet mercy and pity he preuenteth vs in all occasions, deliuering vs, although without all desert, from sundry perils, and defending vs gloriously with his powerfull right hand against the violent assaults of our aduersaries with victorious successes: and in other tribulations and perplexities wherein we haue exceeding much beene encombred, by comforting vs and by applying and in-powering remedies vpon vs beyond all hope and expectation. There was adjoining heereto a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England from the time of King Edward the
C Confessor: which in the reigne of King Henrie the Eighth, was burnt by casuall fire to the ground. A very large, stately, and sumpteous Palace this was, and in that age for building incomparable, with a vawmure, and bulwarks for defense: The remaines whereof, are the Chamber, wherein the King, the nobles, with the Counsellers and officers of state, doe assemble at the high court of Parliament, and the next unto it, wherein anciently they were wont to beginne the Parliaments, knowen by the name of Saint Edwards painted chamber, because the tradition holdeth that the said King Edward therein died. FitzStephens

The higher house.

But how sinfull an act, how bloudy, how fowle, how heinous, horrible, hideous, and odious both to God and man, certaine brute and savage beasts in mens
D shape enterprised of late, by the deuise of that Archtraitour Robert Catesby, with undermining, and placing a mighty deale of gunpowder under these edifices against their Prince, their country and all the States of the Kingdome, and that under an abominable pretence of religion, my very heart quaketh to remember and mention: nay, amazed it is and astonied but to thinke onely into what inevitable darknesse, confusion, and wofull miseries, they had suddenly in the twinckling of an eie plunged this most flourishing realme and common-welth: But that which an ancient Poet in a smaller matter wrote, we may in this with griefe of mind utter: The Treason of Robert Catesby.

Excidat illa dies æuo, ne postera credant
Secula, nos certè taceamus, & obruta multa
E Nocte tegi propriæ patiamur crimina gentis.

That cursed day forgotten be: no future age beleeve
That this was true: let vs also at least wise now that liue
Conceale the same, and suffer such designes of our owne nation
Hidden to be and buried quite in darknes of oblivion.

Adioyning unto this is the Whitehall, wherein at this day the Court of Requests is kept. Beneath this is that Hall, which of all other is the greatest, and the very Prætorium or haul of Iustice for all England. In this are the Iudiciall Courts, namely: The Kings Bench, The Common Plees, and The Chancery: And in places neere thereabout, The Star-chamber, the Exchequer, Court of Ward, and Court of the Dutchy of Lancaster, Westminsters hall.

F &c. In which at certaine set times (we call them Tearmes) yearely causes are heard and tried: whereas, before King Henry the third his daies, the Court of common Law and principall Iustice was unsetled and alwaies followed the Kings court. But he in the Magna Charta made a law in these words: Let not the Common Pleas follow our Court, but be holden in some certaine place. Which notwithstanding some expound thus: That the Common pleas from thence forth be handled in a Court of the owne by it William Lambert.

selfe

Digitized by Google

Built — selfe a part, and not in the Kings Bench, as before. This Iudgement Hall which we A now have K. Richard the Second built out of the ground, as appeareth by his armes engraven in the ſtone-worke, and many arched beames (when he had plucked downe the former old Hall that K. William Rufus in the ſame place had built before) and made it his owne habitation. For Kings in thoſe daies ſat in judgement place in their owne perſons: And they are indeed the ΔΙΚΑΣΠΟΛΟΙ, that is Iudges, Whoſe mouth
Prov. c. 16. (as that Royall writer ſaith) ſhall not erre in iudgement. But the foreſaid Pallace, after Burnt — it was burnt downe in the yeere of our Lord 1512. lay deſolate, and King Henry the Eighth tranſlated ſhortly after the Kings ſeat from thence to an houſe not farre off, which belonged but a while before to Cardinall Wolſey, and is called White Hall. This B while a call. houſe is a Princely thing: encloſed of the one ſide with a Park that reacheth alſo to another houſe of the Kings named S. Iames (where anciently was a Spitle for maiden lepres) built by King Henry the Eighth, on the other ſide with the Tamis. A certaine Poet termed the foreſaid houſe according to the Engliſh name thereof Lucan in Latine, as appeareth in theſe verſes:

——Regale ſubintrant
Leucæum Reges (dederant memorabile quondam Atria, quæ niveo candebant marmore, nomin)
Quod Tamiſis prima eſt cui gloria paſcere cygnos
Ledæos, rauco pronus ſubterluit æſtu. C

To Roiall Palace Kings enter in, ſometime LEVCAEVM hight.
(This famous name thoſe Courts it gave that ſhone with marble white.)
Hard under it with loe-ſound ſtreame Tamis downe apace doth glide,
A river feding ſwannes, wherein he takes eſpeciall pride.

Hard by, neere unto the Mues ſo called, for that it ſerved for to keepe Hauks and The Mues. now is become a moſt faire ſtable for the Kings horſes, there remaineth a monument in memoriall of that moſt pious and kind Queene Aeleonor, erected by the King Edward the firſt her moſt deerely beloved husband: and certes the memorie of her loving kindneſſe ſhall remaine worthy to be conſecrated to æternitie. For ſhe, the
The loue of a wife. daughter of Ferdinand the Third, King of Caſtile, being given in marriage to Edward D the firſt King of England, accompanied him into the Holy land: where, when as he was ſecretly forelaide, and by a certaine Moore wounded with an envenomed ſword, and by all the remedies that Phiſitians could deviſe was not ſo much eaſed as afflicted: ſhe tooke her to Rodericus Toletanus lib. 1 a cure ſtrange I muſt needs ſay and never heard of before, howbeit full of love and kind affection. For, her husbands wounds infected with the poiſon, and which by reaſon of the malignitie thereof could not be cloſed and healed, ſhe day by day licked with her tongue, and ſucked out the venemous humor which to her was a moſt ſweet liquor. By the vigour and ſtrength whereof, or to ſay more truly, by vertue of a wives lowely fidelity ſhe ſo drew unto her all the ſubſtance of the poiſon, that the wounds being cloſed, and cicatrized, hee became E perfectly healed, & ſhe caught no harme at all. What then can be heard more rare, what more admirable than this womans faithful loue? That a wives young thus annointed, as I may ſo ſay, with faith and loue to her husband, ſhould from her well beloved drawe thoſe poiſons, which by an approved Phyſitian could not be drawne: and that which many and thoſe right exqui-ſit medicines effected not, the loue onely and piety of a wife performed. Thus much of Weſtminſter jointly with London (although as I haue ſaid, it is a Citie by it ſelfe, and hath a ſeverall iuriſdiction from it) becauſe with continued buildings it ſo joi-neth thereto, that it may ſeeme to be one and the ſame Citie.

Moreover, at the Weſt end of the Citie, other Suburbs runne a great way in length, with goodly rowes of houſes orderly ranged, as namely Holborne or rather F Holborne. more truly Oldborn: wherein ſtood anciently the firſt houſe of the Templers onely in the place now called Southampton houſe. But now there ſtand certaine Innes, or Colleges of ſtudents in the Common law: and a Citie-habitation of the Biſhops of Ely, well beſeeming Biſhops to dwell in: for which they are beholden to Iohn de Hot- ham Biſhop of Ely under King Edward the Third.

At the North ſide likewiſe there bee ſuburbs adnexed to the City, wherein Iordan
Briſet

Digitized by Google

A Briſet a man verie wealthie and devout built an houſe for the knights Hoſpitalers of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, which grew in time ſo great, that it reſembled a Palace: and had in it a very faire church and a toure-ſteeple raiſed to a great height with ſo fine workemanſhip, that while it ſtood, it was a ſingular beauty and ornament to the City. Theſe knights Hoſpitalers at their firſt inſtitution, about the yeare 1124. and long after, were ſo lowly all the while they continued poore, that their governor was ſtiled Servant to the poore ſeruitours of the hoſpital of Ieruſalem, like as the maſter of the Templars, who ſhortly after aroſe, was termed The humble Miniſter of the poore Knights of the Temple. This religious order was inſtituted ſhortly after Geffery of Bollen had B recouered Hieruſalem. The brethren whereof ware a white croſſe vpon their vpper blacke garment, and by ſolemne profeſſion were bound to ſerue pilgrimes, and poore people in the Hoſpitall of Saint Iohn at Hieruſalem, and to ſecure the paſſages thither, they charitably buried the dead, they were continuall in praier, mortified themſelues with watchings and faſtings, they were curteous and kinde to the poore whom they called their Maſters, and fed with white bread, while themſelues lived with browne; and carried themſelues with great auſterity. Whereby they purchaſed to themſelues the loue and liking of all ſorts, and through the bounty of good Princes and priuate perſons admiring their piety, and proweſſe, they roſe from this low degree to ſo high an eſtate, and great riches, that after a ſort they wallowed in C wealth. For they had about the yeere of our Lord 1240. within Chriſtendome nineteene thouſand Lordſhips or Manours: like as the Templars nine thouſand (the reuenewes and rents whereof in England fell afterwards alſo to theſe Hoſpitalers.) And this eſtate of theirs growen to ſo great an height made way for them to as great honours, ſo as their Prior in England was reputed the * Prime Baron of the land and able with fulneſſe and aboundance of all things to maintaine an honourable Port untill that King Henry the Eighth aduiſed by them, which reſpected their priuate profit, gat their lands and liuings into his owne hands, like as he did of the Monaſteries alſo. Albeit it was then declared that ſuch religious places being of moſt pious intent conſecrated to the glory of God, might haue beene according to D the Canons of the Church, beſtowed in exhibition and almes for Gods Miniſters, releeſe of the poore, redemption of Captives, and repairing of Churches. Neere unto it, where now is to be ſeen a ſightly circuit of faire houſes, was the Charter-houſe, founded by S. Walter Many of Henault, who with ſingular commendation ſerued under K. Edward the Third in the French wars: and in that place heeretofore was a moſt famous cemitery, or buriall place in which in a plague time at London, were buried in the yeere 1349. more then 50000. perſons: a thing recorded to poſterity by an inſcription which continued there a long time engraven in Braſſe.

On this North-weſt ſide likewiſe London hath other great ſuburbs, and there ſtood in old time a * watchtowre or militarie fore-fenſe, whence the place was of an Ara- E bick worde called Barbacan, and by the gift of King Edward the Third became the dwelling houſe of the Vffords; from whom by the Willoughbies it came to Sir Pengrine Bertey, Lord Willoughbey of Eresby, a man noble and generous, and one of Mars his broode.

Neither leſſe ſuburbs runne out on the North-eaſt and Eaſt. In the fields of which ſuburbs, whiles I was firſt writing theſe matters, there were gotten out of the ground many vrnes, funerall veſſells, little Images, and earthen pots, wherein were ſmall peeces of mony coined by Claudius, Nero, Veſpaſian &c. Glaſſe vials alſo and ſundry ſmall earthen veſſels, wherein ſome liquid ſubſtance remained which I would thinke to bee either of that ſacred oblation of wine and milke, which the ancient Romanes F uſed when they burnt the dead, or elſe thoſe odoriferous liquors that Statius mentioneth.

Pharÿg; liquores
Arſuram lauere comam.

And liquid baulmes from Ægipt-land that came,
Did waſh his haire that redy was for flame,

Saint Iohns Hoſpitalers after called Knights of the Rhodes and now of Malt.

Templars

*Lord of S. Iohns.

Charter-houſe

Barbacan. Galeottus Martius.

This place the Romanes appointed to burne & burie dead bodies, who according A to the law of the xij. tables carried coarſes out of their Cities, and enterred them by the high waies ſides, to put paſſengers in minde that they are, as thoſe were, ſubiect to mortalitie: Thus much of that part of the Citie which lieth to the land.

London Bridge.

Now for that ſide where the river runneth, toward the South banke thereof, the Citizens made a bridge alſo over the water reaching to that large Burrough of South-warke, whereof I haue already ſpoken; Firſt, of wood in that place where before time they uſed for paſſage a ferry bote in ſtead of a bridge. Afterwards, under the reigne of King Iohn they built a new bridge with admirable wormanſhip of ſtone B hewen out of the quarry, upon 19. Arches, beſides the draw-bridge, and ſo furniſh-ed it on both ſides with paſſing faire houſes joining one to another in maner of a ſtreet, that for bigneſſe and beauty, it may worthily carrie away the priſe from all the Bridges in Europe.

See of Southwarke, in Surhrey.

Saint Saviour Suffolkhouſe.

In this Burgh of Southworke, to ſpeake onely of things memorable, there ſtood ſometime a famous Abbay of Monkes, of Saint Benets order, called Bermondſey, con-ſecrated in times paſt unto our Saviour, by Aldwin Childe Citizene of London: alſo a Statly houſe built by Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, which having ſerued his turne but a ſmall time, was ſhortly after pulled downe.

S. Thomas Hoſpitall.

Theſe are extant, Saint Thomas Hoſpitall, reedified or founded rather by the Ci-tie of London, for the ſuſtenance of feeble and impotent perſons: The Priorie of the C bleſſed Virgine Marie, called Saint Marie Over Rhe becauſe it ſtandeth beyond the river of Tamis in regard of London, erected by William Pont del Arche a Norman for blacke Chanons. The Biſhops houſe of Wincheſter built by William Giffard Biſhop, for his ſucceſſors, about the yeere of our Lord 1107. From which along the Tamis banke their runneth Weſtward a continued raunge of dwelling houſes: where within our fathers remembrance was the Bordello or Lupanarie, for ſo the Latines terme thoſe little roomes or ſecret chambers of harlots wherein they filthily proſtitu-ted their bodies to ſaile, becauſe they after the maner of ravening ſhe-wolves catch hold of ſilly wretched men and plucke them into their hooles. But theſe were prohibited by King Henrie the Eighth, at which time England was growen to exceſſive D laſciviouſneſſe and roiot; which in other nations are continued for gaine, under a ſpecious ſhew of helping mans infirmity: Neither, of theſe ſtrumpets and brothel-houſes, doe I thinke that this place in our tongue tooke the name Stewes, but of thoſe Stewes.

Ponds or Stewes, which are heere for to feed Pikes and Tenches fat, and to ſcoure them from the ſtrong and muddy fenniſh taſt. Heere haue I ſeene pikes-panches opened with a knife to ſhew their fatneſſe: and preſently the wide gaſhes and wounds come together againe by the touch of tenches, and with their gluttinous ſlime perfectly healed up. Among theſe buildings there is a place in maner of a Theater for baiting of Beares and Buls with Dogges: and certaine Kenels appointed ſeverally for Band-dogges or Maſtiues.

E Band-dogges or Maſtiues, which are of that ſtrength, and ſo ſure of bit, that three of them are able to take and hold downe a beare, and foure a Lion: ſo that the Poet in old time reported truly of our dogges, in theſe words:

Taurorum fracturi colla Britanni.

The Britiſh dogges are able well,
To breake the neckes of buls ſo fell.

Like as he that ſaid, they were more fierce than the dogges of Arcadian kind, which are thought to be engendred of Lions.

What time as the bridge was thus made betweene London and this Burrough, the Citie was not onely enlarged; but alſo an excellent forme of Common-welth F was therein ordeined, and the Citizens reduced into certaine diſtinct Corporations Societies or Companies of Citizens.

and Companies. The whole City divided into ſix and twenty wards: and the Counſell of the Citie conſiſted of as many ancient men, named of their age in our tongue Aldermen, as one would ſay, Senatours, who each one have the overſeeing and rule of Tribus. Wards.

his ſeverall ward: and whereas in ancient time they had for their head-Magiſtrate, a Portreve, that is, a governour of the City, King Richard the Firſt ordeined two Bal-

* Or Portgrave.

lives:

Digitized by Google

A lives: inſtead of whom ſoone after King Iohn granted them liberty, to chuſe by their voices yeerely out of the twelue principall companies a Maior for their chiefe Magiſtrate: alſo two Sheriffes, whereof the one is called the Kings, the other the Cities Sherife. This forme of common-wealth being thus eſtabliſhed it is incredible to tell how much London grew, and groweth ſtill in publike and alſo privat buildings, whiles all the Cities of England beſides decreaſe. For, to ſay nothing of that beautifull peece of worke, the Senate houſe named Guild Hall, built by Sir Thomas Knowles Major: Leaden Hall, a large and goodly building, erected by Simon Eire, to be a common Garner in time of dearth to pull downe the price of corne; the merchants meeting place ſtanding upon Pillars, which the common people call the Burſe, and Queen B Elizabeth with a ſolemne ceremony named The Royall Exchange, for the uſe of Merchants, and an ornament to the citie, ſet up by Sir Thomas Greſham Citizen and Knight; a magnificent worke verily, whether you reſpect the modull of the building, the reſort of Merchants from all Nations thither, or the ſtore of wares there. Which Sir Thomas Greſham, being withall an exceeding great lover of learning, conſecrated a moſt ſpatious houſe his owne habitation to the furtherance of learning, and inſtituted there profeſſours of Diuinity, Law, Phyſicke, Aſtronomie, Geometrie, and Muſicke, with liberall ſalaries and ſtipends; to the end that London might be a place not onely furniſhed with all ſorts of traficke, but alſo with the liberal arts and ſciences. To C paſſe over the Houſe of the Society of the Hanſe, commonly called the Stilard, as the Eaſterlings yard, and the waters conveighed by pipes under the ground, into all parts of the Citie, and very goodly conducts or ceſterns caſtellated to receive the ſame: alſo the new conveiance of water deviſed by the skilful travell of Peter Maurice a German; who by meanes of a forſer or wheele, with pipes placed at a certaine levell, brought water of late out of the Tamis into a great part of the city; To omit all theſe, I ſay, it is ſo adorned every where with churches, that RELIGION and GODLINES ſeeme to have made choiſe of their reſidence heerein. For the churches therin amount to the number of one hundred twenty and one, more verily then Rome it ſelfe (as great and holy as it is) can ſhew. Beſides Hoſpitals for diſeaſed perſons, it D maintaineth alſo ſix hundered Orphane children or there about, in Chriſts-Church Hoſpital, and poore people, upon contribution of Almes about 1240. &c. A long time it would aske to diſcourſe particularly of the good lawes and orders, of the laudable gouernment, of the port and dignity of the Major and Aldermen, of their forward ſervice and loialty to their Prince, of the citizens courteſie, the faire building and coſtly furniture, the breed of excellent and choiſe wits, their gardens in the Suburbs full of dainty arbours, and banqueting rowmes, ſtored alſo with ſtrange hearbs from forrain countries, of the multitude, ſtrength and furniture of their ſhips, the incredible ſtore of all ſorts of Merchandiſe (two hundred thouſand broad clothes, beſide other Antwerp alone hath received from hence every yeere) and of the ſuperabundance of E all things which belong to the furniture or neceſſity of mans life. For, right truely wrote that Hadrianus Junius in his Philippeis:

Prætor or Major. 1411. 1405. The Burſe. 1567. Royall Exchange. Greſhams Colledge. Guicciardin.

Tecta ſibuſq; refertum
Londinum, & ſi fas, numeroſo ciue ſuperbum,
Larga vbi fœcundo rerum vndat copia cornu.

Thicke built with houſes London is, with riches ſtuffed full,
Proud, (if we may ſo ſay) of men that therein live and dwell,
Wherein moſt plenteous wiſe abound all things that tongue can tell.

F

And Iul. Scaliger in his Poem of Cities.

Vrbs animis, numeroque potens, & robore gentis.

For peoples, courage, numbers, powre, it is a city ſtrong.

And another Poet hath powred out theſe verſes alſo, concerning London, if you deigne to read them,

LONDINVM

LONDINVM gemino procurrit littore longè A
Aemula materna tollens sua lumina Troiæ
Clementer surgente jugo dum tendit in ortum:
Vrbs peramana situ, cæloq; soloq; beata.
Vrbs pietate potens, numeroso cive superba,
Vrbsq; Britannorum quæ digna BRITANNIA dici.
Hæc noua doctrinis Lutetia, mercibus Ormus,
Altera Roma viris, Chrysea secunda metallis.

Along both bankes out stretched farre the City LONDON lies B
Resembling much her mother Troie, a loft she lifts her eies, Whiles on a gentle rising hill she beareth toward East:
A City pleasant for her site, in aire, and soile much blest.
Religious, and populous: and hence she looks on hie
And well deserues for to be cal'd the Britans Britanie.
For learning new Lutetia, Ormus for trade and wealth
A second Rome for valiant men, Chryse for plate, and health.

In this maner likewise versified Henry of Huntingdon in praise of London, while K. Stephen reigned, about 400. yeeres since: C

Ibis & in nostros dives Londonia versus,
Quæ nos immemores non sinis esse tui.
Quando tuas arces, tua mœnia mente retracto,
Quæ vidi, videor cuncta videre mihi.
Fama loquax & nata loqui, moritura silendo,
Laudibus erubuit fingere falsa tuis.

Thou also shalt of verses ours Rich London have thy part, D
For why? we cannot thee forget, so great is thy desart
When I thinke of thy stately towers, thy faire and spacious wall
Which I have seene, me thinks therewith I see no *lesse then all.
This pratling fame, that's borne to prate, and talk'd shee not would die,
In all the praise that goes of thee hath bash'd to tell onely.
Another Poet in like maner pleasantly plaied upon London in this sort:

Hæc urbs illa potens, cui tres tria dona ministrant
Bacchus, Apollo, Ceres, pocula, carmen, ador.
Hæc urbs illa potens, quam Iuno, Minerva, Diana Mercibus, arce, feris, ditat, adornat, alit. E

This is that City strong to which three gifts are given by three:
By Bacchus, Ceres, and Phabus, Wine, Wheat, and Poetree
This place sterne Pallas, Iuno Queen, Diana Hunters-feer
Adorn's, enricheth, and doth feed, with towers, with wares, with deere.

But in a more grave note and serious stile, a friend of mine and a praise worthy person, Master Iohn Ionston, professour of divinity in the Kings University of S. Andrewes. F

VRBS AVGVSTA, cui calumq;, solumq;, salumq;
Cuiq; favent cuncti, cuncta elementa bonis.
Mitius haud usquàm cælum est, uberrima Tellus
Fundit inexhausti germina læta soli.
Et pater Oceanus Tamisino gurgite mistus,
Convehit immensas totius orbis opes.

Regali

Digitized by Google

A Regali cultu; ſedes clariſsima Regum,
Gentis præſidium, cor, anima, atque oculus.
Gens antiqua, potens virtute & roborè belli,
Artium & omnigenûm nobilitata opibus.
Singula contemplare animo, attentuſq; tuere,
Aut Orbem aut Orbis dixeris eſſe caput.

This City well AVGVSTA call'd, to which (a truth to ſay)
Aire, Land, Sea, and all Elements, ſhew favour every way.
The wether no where milder is, the ground moſt rich to ſee,
B Doth yeeld all fruits of fertill ſoile, that never ſpent will bee.
And Ocean, that with Tams ſtreame his flowing tyde doth blend Conveis to it commodities, all that the world can ſend.
The noble ſeat of Kings it is for port and roialty,
Of all the realme the ſenſe, the hart, the life, and lightſome ey.
The people ancient, valorous, expert in chivalry,
Enriched with all ſorts and meanes of Art and myſterie
Take heedfull view of every thing, and then ſay thus in briefe,
This either is a world it ſelfe, or of the world the cheife.

C But of theſe and ſuch like particulars Iohn Stowe Citizen of London, and a famous Chronicler hath diſcourſed more at large, and more exactly in that his Survey of London, which hee lately publiſhed.

Now will I take my leaue of my deere natiue country, and bid London a diew, after I haue given this onely note, that the Pole is here elevated fiftie one degrees, and foure and thirty ſcruples, and the Meridian diſtant from the fartheſt Weſt-point three and twentie degrees and fiue and twenty ſcruples. That the * Fidicula ſymbolizing in nature with Venus and Mercurie, is the Topick ſtarre which glanceth upon the Horizon, but never ſetteth; and the Dragons head is reputed by Aſtronomers to bee the Vertical ſtarre over head. *Orpheus harpe a ſtar.

D * From London, the Tamis watering Redcliff, ſo called of the Red-cliffe, a prety fine towne and dwelling place of ſailers, as hee fetcheth almoſt a round compaſſe with a great winding reach, taketh into him the River Lea at the Eaſt bound of this County, when it hath collected his divided ſtreame and cheriſhed fruitfull marſh-medowes. Upon which there ſtandeth nothing in this ſide worth the ſpeaking of. For, neither Aedelmton hath ought to ſhew, but the name derived of Nobility; nor Waltham, unleſſe it bee the Croſſe erected there for the funerall pompe of Queene Aeleonor wife to King Edward the Firſt, whereof alſo it tooke name. Onely Enfeld a houſe of the Kings is here to be ſeene, built by Sir Thomas Lovel knight (of the order E of the Garter and one of King Henrie the Seaventh his priuie counſell) and Durance neighbour thereunto a houſe of the Wrothes of ancient name in this Countie. To Enfeld-houſe, Enfeld-chace is hard adioining, a place much renowned for hunting: the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Magnavils Earles of Eſſex, afterwards of the Bohuns who ſucceeded them: and now it belongeth to the Duchie of Lancaſter, ſince time that Henry the Fourth King of England eſpouſed one of the daughters and coheires of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Eſſex of that ſurname. And there are yet to bee ſeene, in the mideſt well nere of this chaſe, the rubbiſh and ruines of an old houſe, which the vulgar ſort ſaith was the dwelling place of the Magnavills Earles of Eſſex. As for the title of Midle-ſex, the kings of England haue vouchſafed it to F none, neither Duke, Marquis, Earle, or Baron.

* Or Beyond Radcliffe. Iſle of Dogs

Edmonton. Walcham Croſſe.

Enfield chaſe.

In this County, without the City of London, are reckoned Pariſhes much about. 73.
Within the City, Liberties, and Suburbes. 121.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A

ESSEX.

B THe other part of the Trinobantes, toward the East called in the English Saxon tongue Eaſt-Seaxa and Eaſt-Seax-rcipe, in the Norman language Exſſeſa, of the ſituation toward the East, and the Saxons which inhabited it, and commonly Eſſex, is a country large in compaſſe, fruitfull, full of woods plentifull of Saffron, and very wealthy: encircled, as it were, on the one ſide with the maine ſea, on the other with fiſh-full rivers, which alſo doe afford their peculiar commodities in great abundance. On the North ſide, the river Stour divideth it from Suffolk, on the East the Ocean windeth it ſelfe into it: On the South part, the Tamis being now growne great ſecludeth it from Kent like as in the Weſt part the little river Ley from Midleſex, and Stort or Stour the leſſe which runneth into it, from Hertfordſhire. In deſcribing of this country, according to my method begun, firſt I C will ſpeake of the memorable places by Ley and the Tamis, afterwards of thoſe that be further within, and upon the Sea-coſt.

By Ley, in the the Engliſh Saxon tongue Lyʒean, there ſtretcheth out a great way in length and bredth a foreſt ſerving for game, ſtored verie full with deere, that for their bigneſſe, and fatneſſe withall, haue the name aboue all other. In times paſt called it was by way of excellency Foreſta de Eſſex, now Waltham Forreſt, of the towne Waltham, in the Saxon ſpeech Wealo-ham, that is, A wild or wooddy habitation. This ſtandeth upon Ley, where, by dividing his chanell he maketh divers Eights or Iſlands, and is not of any great antiquity to make boaſt of. For, when the kingdome of the Saxons beganne to decay, one Tovie, a man of great wealth and authority, as wee D reade in the private hiſtorie of the place, The Kings Staller, that is, Standerd bearer, for the abundance of wild beaſts there, firſt founded it, and planted threeſcore and ſixe indwellers therein. After his death Athelſtane his ſonne quickly made a hand of all his goods and great eſtate: and king Edward the Confeſſor gaue this towne to Harold Earle Goodwins ſonne: and ſtreight waies an Abbay was erected there, the worke and tombe both of the ſaid Harold. For, hee beeing crept up by the errour of men and his owne ambition to Regall dignity built this Abbay in honour of an Holie Croſſe found farre Weſtward, and brought hither, as they write, by miracle. Herein made he his praiers and vowes for victorie when he marched againſt Normans, and beeing ſoone after ſlaine by them, was by his mother, who had with moſt ſuppliant E ſuite craved and obteined at the Conquerours hands his corpes, heere entombed. But now it hath a Baron, namely Sir Edward Deny, called lately unto that honour by king Iames his writ. Over this towne upon the riſing of an hill ſtandeth Copthall, and yeeldeth a great waie of, a faire ſight to feed mens eyes. This was the habitation in time paſt of Fitz-Aucher, and lately of Sir Thomas Heneage Knight, who made it a verie goodly and beautifull houſe. Nere unto this river alſo was ſeated, no doubt, DVROLITVM, a towne of antique memorie, which the Emperour Antonine maketh mention of, but in what place preciſely, I am not able to ſhew. For, the ancient places of this County, I tell you once for all bee forehand) lie hidden ſo enwraped in obſcurity that I, who elſe where could ſee ſome-what, heere in, am F here more than dim-ſighted. But if I may giue my gueſſe, I would thinke that to haue beene DVROLITVM, which reteining ſtill ſome marke of the old name, is called at this day Leyton: that is, The towne upon Ley, like as Durolitum in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth, the Water Ley. A ſmall village it is in theſe daies, inhabited in ſcattering wiſe, fiue miles from London, for which fiue, through the careleſſe negligence of tranſcribers is crept into Antonine XV.

Waltham Foreſt.

Wa'tham Abbay.

Baron Deny.

Copthall.

Durolitum.

Digitized by Google

That there was a common passage heere in times past over the river, a place nigh unto it called Ouldford seemeth to proue, In which when Queene Mawd wife to king Henrie the First hardly escaped daunger of drowning; shee gaue order that a little beneath, at Stretford, there should bee a bridge made over the water. There, the river brancheth into three severall streames, and most pleasantly watereth on every side the greene medowes: wherein I sawe the remaines of a little monasterie which William Montfichet, a Lord of great name of the Normans race built, in the yeare of our Lord 1140: and forth-with Ley gathering it selfe againe into one chanell mildely discharged it selfe in the Tamis, whereupon the place is called Leymouth. A B

Berking. Roding, the river. The Booke of Ely.

The Tamis which is mightily by this time increased, doth violentlie carry away with him the streames of many waters, hath a sight (to speake onelie of what is worth remembrance) of Berking, which Bede nameth Berecing, a Nunnery founded by Erkenwald Bishop of London, where Roding a little river entreth into the Tamis. This running hard by many villages imparteth his name unto them, as Heigh Roding, Eithorp Roding, Leaden Roding &c. of the which, Leofwin a noble man gaue one or two in times past, to the Church of Ely, for to expiate and make satisfaction for the wicked act hee had committed in murdering his owne mother: then, by Chipping Angre.

Angre, whereupon a verie high hill are the tokens of a Castle built by Richard Lucy Lord chiefe Iustice of England in the reigne of Henrie the Second: of which C

Liber Inq. de Rifarijs.

familie, a daughter and one of the heires, king Iohn gaue in marriage to Richard Rivers, who dwelt hard by at Stranford Rivers.

*

So it passeth by Lambourn Manour, which is held by service of the Wardstaffe, vz. to carrie a load of strawe in a Carte with sixe horses, two ropes, two men in harnesse to watch the said Ward-staffe when it is brought to the towne of Aibridg, &c. and then by Wansted Parke, where the late Earle of Leicester built much for his pleasure. From the mouth of this Roding, this Tamis hasteneth through a ground lying verie flat & low, and in most places otherwhiles overflowen, (whereby are occasioned strong and unholsome vapours exceeding hurtfull to the health of the neighbour Inhabitants) to Tilbury: neere unto which there be certaine holes in the rising of a chalky hill, sunke into the ground tenne fathom deepe, the mouth whereof is but narrow, made of stone cunningly wrought but within they are large and spatious, in this forme, which he that went downe into them described unto me after this manner. D

Marshes.

Ho'es cut out.

E

F

Of

Digitized by Google

A Of which I haue nothing elſe to ſay, but what I haue delivered already. As for Tilbury, (Bede nameth it Tilaburg) it conſiſteth of ſome few cotages by the Tamis ſide, yet was it in ancient time the ſeat of Biſhop Chad, when about the yeare of our ſalvation 630. hee ingrafted the East-Saxons by baptiſme into the church of Chriſt. Afterwards, this river paſſing by places lying flat and unholſome, with a winding returne of his water, ſevereth the Iſland CONVENNON, which alſo is called COVNOS, (whereof Ptolomee maketh mention) from the firme land. This hath not yet wholie forgone the old name, but is called Canvey. It lieth againſt the coaſt of Eſſex, from Leegh to Hole Haven, fiue miles in length: ſome part whereof appertaineth to the Collegiat church of Weſtminſter. But ſo low, that often B times it is quite over flowen, all ſaue hillocks caſt uppe, upon which the ſheepe haue a place of ſafe refuge. For, it keepeth about foure hundered ſheepe, whoſe fleſh is of a moſt ſweet and delicate taſte, which I haue ſeene young lads taking womens function, with ſtooles faſtened into their buttockes to milke, yea and to make cheeſes of Ewes milke in thoſe dairy ſheddes of theirs, that they call there, Wiches.

In Kent pag. 334. Tilbury.

Convennos the Iſle.

Canvey.

There adjoyne to this Iſland along in order, firſt Beamfleot, fortified with deepe and wide trenches (as ſaith Florilegus) and with a Caſtle, by Haſting the Dane, which king Aelfred wonne from them: Then Hadleigh, ſometime the Caſtle of Hubert de C Burgo, afterwards of Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Glocester, now defaced with ruines: and in the laſt place Leegh, a proper fine little towne and verie full of ſtout and adventurous ſailers: with Pritlewel faſt by where Swein de Eſſex built long ſince a Cell for Monkes. And heere the land ſhooteth forward to make a Promontory, which they call Black-tayle Point, and Shobery Neſſe of Shoberie a village ſituate upon it, which ſometime, was a citie an Haumet named Sceobirig. For, in the old Annales of the Engliſh Saxons wee read thus, The Danes beeing driven from Beamfleot, goe to a City ſeated in Eaſt-ſex, called in the Engliſh tongue Sceobirig and there built themſelves a ſure and ſtrong Fort. Heere by reaſon that the bankes on both ſides ſhrinke backe, the Tamis at a huge and wide mouth rowleth into the ſea. D This doth Ptolomee terme Aeſtuarium TAMESAE, and corruptly in ſome other, copies TEMESAE, and we commonly, the Tamis Mouth.

Beamfleat.

S. Shobery.

Anno. 894.

More inward is Rochford placed, that hath given name to this Hundered: Now, it longeth to the Barons Rich, but in old time it had Lords of ancient nobilitie ſurnamed thereof: whoſe inheritance came at length to Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltſhire, and from them to Sir Thomas Bullen, whom King Henrie the Eighth created Vicount Rochford, and afterward Earle of Wiltſhire, out of whoſe progenie ſprung that moſt gracious Queene ELIZABETH, and the Barons of Hunſdon.

Rochford.

Lord Rochford.

Heere I heard much ſpeech of a Lawleſſe Court (as they called it) holden in a ſtrange manner about Michaelmaſſe, in the firſt peepe of the daie upon the firſt E cocke crowing, in a ſilent ſorte; yet with ſhrowde fines eftſoones redoubled, if not anſwered, which ſeruile attendance, they ſay was impoſed upon certaine tenants there-about for conſpiring there at ſuch an vnſeaſonable time, to raiſe a commotion. But I leaue this knowing neither the originall, nor the certaine forme thereof. Onelie I heard certaine obſcure barbarous rimes of it. Curia de Domino Rege tenetur ſine lege. Ante ortum ſolis, luceat, niſi polus &c. not worth remembring.

*

Lawleſſe-Court.

Leaving the Tamis banke, and going farther within the country, yea from Weſt to Eaſt, theſe places of name aboue the reſt ſtanding thus in order ſhew themſelues.

Havering an ancient retiring place of the kings, ſo called of a ring, which in that place F a Pilgrime delivered as ſent from S. Iohn Baptiſt (for ſo they write) unto K. Edward the Confeſſor: Horn-church, named in times paſt Cornutum Monaſterium, that is, the Horned Minſter, for there ſhoot out at the Eaſt end of the Church certaine points of leade faſhioned like hornes: Rumford, the glorie whereof dependeth of a ſwine mercat; & Giddy-hall, an houſe adjoyning to it, which belonged to that Sir Thomas Cook Major of London, whoſe great riches hoorded up togither wrought him his greateſt danger.

Havering.

Rumford. See the Annales.

Digitized by Google

For, being judicially arraigned, (innocent man as he was) of high treason, and through the incorrupt æquity of iudge Markham acquit in a most dangerous time, yet was he put to a very grievous fine, and stript in manner of all that he was worth: Brentwood called by the Normans Bois arse, in the same sense, and by that name King Stephen granted a Mercat and a faire there, to the Abbot of S. Osith; and many yeares after Isabell Countesse of Bedford daughter to King Edward the Third built a Chappell to the memory of S. Thomas of Canterbury, for the ease of the inhabitants: Engerstone a towne of note for nothing else but the Mercat and Innes for travailers. A Brent-wood.

Heere am I at a stand, and am halfe in a doubt whether I should now slip as an abortive fruite that conjecture, which my minde hath travailed with. Considering there hath beene in this tract the City CAESAROMAGVS, and the same doubtlesse in the Romans time of especiall note, and importance; for, the very name, if there were nothing else, may evict so much, signifying as it doth Cæsars city, as DRVSOMAGVS the City of Drusus, which also should seeme to have beene built in the honour of Cæsar Augustus. For, Suetonius, writeth thus, Kings, that were in amity and league, founded every one in his owne Kingdome Cities named Cæsareæ in honour of Augustus. What if I should say that CAESAROMAGVS did stand neare vnto Brentwood, would not a learned reader laugh at me, as one Soothsayer doth when he spieth another? Certes, no ground I have nor reason to strengthen this my conjecture from the distance thereof, seeing the numbers of the miles in Antonine be most corruptly put downe, which nevertheless agree well enough with the distance from COLONIA and CANONIVM. Neither can I helpe my selfe with any proofe by the situation of it upō the Romane high-way, which in this enclosed country is no where to be seene. Neither verily there remaineth heere so much as a shadow or any twinkling shew of the name CAESAROMAGVS, unlesse it be (and that is but very slender) in the name of an Hundred, which of old time was called Ceasford, and now Cheasford Hundred. Surely, as in some ancient Cities the names are a little altered, and in others cleane changed: so there be againe, wherein one syllable or twaine at most be remaining: thus CAESARAVGVSTA in Spaine is now altered to be Saragosa: CAESAROMAGVS in France, hath lost the name cleane and is called Beauois, and CAESAREA in Normandie, now Cherburg, hath but one syllable left of it. But what meane I thus to trifle, and to dwell in this point? If in this quarter heereby, there be not CAESAROMAGVS, let others seeke after it for me: It passeth my wit, I assure you, to finde it out, although I have diligently laid for to meet with it with net, and toile both of eares and eies. B C D

Cæsaromagus called in the Itinerary table, BAROMAGVS.

Beneath Brentwood I saw South-Okindon: where dwelt the Bruins a family as famous as any one in this tract: out of the two heires female whereof, being many times married to sundry husbands, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, the Tirels, Berners, Harlestones, Heveninghams and others descended. And of that house there be males yet remaining in South-hampton-shire. Also, Thorndon, where Sir John Petre Knight raised a goodly faire house, who now was by our Soueraigne King Iames created Barō Petre of Writtle. That Thorndon was in times past the dwelling place of a worshipfull family of Fitzlewis: the last of which name if we may beleeue the common report, by occasion that the house happened to be set on fire in the time of his wedding feast, was pittiously himselfe therein burnt to death. Burghsted, & more short Bursted, that is, the place of a Burgh, which name our forefathers vsed to give unto many places that were of greater antiquity. This I once supposed to have beene CAESAROMAGVS: and what ever it was in old time, it is at this day but a good country towne neere unto Byliricay, a mercat towne of very good resort. Likewise Ashdowne, sometimes Assandun, that is, as Marian interpreteth it, the Mount of Asses, where long since a bloudy battaile was fought, in which King Edmund surnamed Ironside had at the beginning a good hand of the Danes and put them to rout, but streight waies the fortune of the field turning about, he was so defeited that he lost a great number of the English Nobility. In memoriall of which battaile we read that King Canutus the Dane built a Church afterward in that place, what time as E F

South Okindon. Bruin.

Thorndon. Baron Petre.

Ashdown.

upon

Digitized by Google

A upon remorse and repentance for the bloud which he had shed he erected, Chappels in what part soever he had fought any field, and shed Christian bloud.

Not farre from these, is Raleigh, a prety proper towne: & it seemeth to be Raganeia in Domesday booke, wherin is mention made of a Castle that Suenus heere built, in which also we read thus: There is one Parke and six Arpennes of vinyard, and it yeeldeth twenty Modij of wine if it take well. Which I note the rather, both for the French word Arpenn and also for the wine made in this Isle. This Suenus was a man of great name and of noble birth, the sonne of Robert, sonne of Wimarc, but father to Robert of Essex: whose son was that Sir Robert de Essex who in right of inheritance was the B Kings Standard bearer, and who for that in a light skirmish against the Welsh, he had not onely cast of his courage, but also cast away his standard; being chalenged for treason, vanquished in duell, or combat; and therof thrust into a Cloystre, forfeited a goodly patrimony, and livelod, which was confiscate to King Henry the second, and helped to fill his coffers. As for the Barony, it lay dead from that time a great while in the Kings hands, untill Sir Hubert de Burgh obtained it of King Iohn.

Arpen. Wine. Radulphus de Diceto The family of the Essex.

Aboue this the shores retiring backe by little and little admit two creekes of the Ocean entring within them: the one, the neighbour inhabitants call Crouch, the other Blackwater (which in old time was named Pant.) In the said Crouch, by reason of the waters division, there lie scattered foure Ilands carrying a pleasant greene hew, C but by occasion of inundations, growne to be morish and fenny, among which these two be of greatest name, Wallot and Foulnesse: that is, The Promontorie of foules, which hath a Church also in it: and when the sea is at the lowest ebbe, a man may ride over to it. Betweene these Creekes lieth Dengy Hundred, in ancient times Dauncing, passing plentifull in grasse, and rich in cattaile, (but sheepe especially) where all their doing is in making of cheese: and their shall yee haue men take the womens office in hand and milke ewes: whence those huge thicke cheeses are made that are vented & sould not only into all parts of England but into forraine nations also, for the rusticall people, labourers, and handicraftes men to fill their bellies, & feed upon. The chiefe towne heereof at this day is Dengy; so called as the inhabitants are per- D swaded, of the Danes, who gave name unto the whole Hundred: Neere unto which is Tillingham, giuen by Ethelbert the first Christian King of the English-Saxons, unto the Church of Saint Paul in London: and higher up to the North shore, flourished sometimes a Citie of ancient record, which our Forefathers called Ithancestre. For, Raulph Niger writeth thus out of S. Bede. Bishop Chad baptised the East Saxons neere to Maldon in the City of Ithancestre, that stood upon the banke of the river Pant, which runneth hard by Maldon, in Dengy province; but now is that Citie drowned in the river Pant. To point out the place precisely I am not able, but I nothing doubt that the river called Frosshwell at this day, was heeretofore named Pant: seeing that one of the springs thereof is called Pantswell, and the Monkes of Coggeshal, so termed it. E Doubtlesse, this Ithancester was situate upon the utmost Promontorie of this Dengy Hundred, where in these daies standeth Saint Peters upon the wall. For, a long this shore much a doe haue the inhabitants to defend their grounds with forced bankes or walles against the violence of the Ocean, ready to inrush upon them. And I my selfe am partly of this minde, that this Ithancester was that OTHONA where a Band of the Fortenses with their Captaine, in the declination of the Romane Empire, kept their station or Guard under the Comes or Lieutenant of the Saxon shore, against the depredations of the Saxon Rovers: For the altering of OTHONA to ITHANA, is no hard straining: and the situation thereof upon a Crecke into which many rivers are discharged, was for this purpose very fit and commodious, and yet heere remai- F neth a huge ruin of a thicke wall, whereby many Romane coines haue beene found.

Dengy hundred. Essex cheese.

It seemeth not amisse to set downe, how King Edward the Confessour graunted by a briefe Charter the keeping of this Hundred to Ranulph * Peperking, which I will willingly heere annex, to the end that we, who sift every pricke and accent of the law, may see the upright simplicity and plaine dealing of that age. And thus goeth the

The Normans call him Pevorell.

Digitized by Google

the tenour of it, as it was taken forth of the Kings Records in the Exchequer, but by often exemplifying and copying it out, some words are mollified and made more familiar. A

In the Records Saint Hilary terme. E.2.17. in the The keeping of the Treasurer and Chamberlaine of ths Exchequer.

Iche Edward Koning
Have given of my Forrest the keeping.
Of the Hundred of Chelmer and Dancing,
To Randolf Peperking and to his kindling:
With heorte and hinde, doe and bocke,
Hare and Foxe, catt and brocke,
Wild fowell with his flock,
Partrich, fesant hen and fesant cock: B
With green and wilde stob and stocke.
To kepen and to yemen by all her might,
Both by day and eke by night:
And hounds for to hold
Good and swift and bolde:
Four greahounds and six racches,
For hare and fox, and wild cattes.
And therefore ich made him my booke:
Witnes the Bishop Wolston C
And booke ylered many on,
And Swein of Essex our Brother
And teken him many other,
And our Stiward Howelin
That by sought me for him.

This was, the plaine dealing, truth, and simplicity of that age, which used to make all their assurances of whatsoever, in a few lines, and with a few gilt Crosses: For, before the comming in of the Normans, as we read in Ingulphus, writings Obligatorie were made firme with golden Crosses and other small signes or markes: but the D Normans beganne the making of such Bills and Obligations, with a print or seale in wax, set to with every ones speciall signet under the expresse entituling of three or foure witnesses. Before time many houses and land thereto passed by graunt and bargaine without script, Charter, or Deede, onely with the Landlords sword or helmet, with his horne or cup. Yea and many tenements were demised with a spurre, or horse-cury-combe, with a bowe, & some with an arrow.

Seales or signets first taken up among Englishmen.

Into the Creeke of Blackwater, which as I said, closeth the North side of this Hundred, and is stored with those dainty oysters, which we call Walfleot oysters, their runne two rivers that water a great part of the Shire, Chelmer & Froshwell. The river Chelmer flowing out of the inner part of the country which is woody, runneth downe E first by Thaxted, a little mercate towne seated very pleasantly upon an high rising hill; also by Tiliey, where Maurice Fitz-Gilbert founded in times past a small Abbay, unto Estannes ad Turrim, now Eston, which noble Gentleman surnamed De Lovaine inhabited, as descended from Godfrey of Louaine brother to Henrie the Sixth of that name Duke of Brabant, who being sent hither to keepe the Honor of Eye, his posterity flourished among the Peeres of this Realme to the time of King Edward the Third, when the heire generall was married into the house of Bourchier.

Thence it glideth downe to Dunmow, of old time called Dunmawg, and in the Tax booke of England Dunmaw, a towne pleasantly situate upon an hill with a prety gentle fall. Where, one Iuga founded a Priorie in the yeere 1111. But William Bainard, of whom Iuga held (thus we find it written in the private history of this Church) F the village of little Dunmow, by felony lost his Baronie, and King Henrie the First gave it to Robert the sonne of Richard, sonne to Gislebert Earle of Clare, and to his heires, with the Honor of Bainards Castle in London: which Robert at that time was King Henries Sewar. These be the very words of the author: neither doe I thinke it lawfull for me to alter see Chaucer in the wife of Baths prologue p. 280 in my old booke, concerning the Abbot of Bacc. or

A or reforme them otherwise than they are, although there be in them some Ἀνπχρονισμος, that is, a putting or mistaking of one time for another, a thing that we meet with otherwhiles in the best Historiographers. For, their had not beene, as then any Earle of Clare in the familie of Clare.

Now let vs for a while digresse and goe a side a little on either hand from the river. Not farre from hence is Plaisy seated, so called in French of Pleasing, in times past named Estre, the habitation both in the last yeeres of the English-Saxons, and also afterwards, of the great Constables of England, as witnesseth Ely booke. At this towne the first William Mandevil E. of Essex beganne a Castle, and two Princes of B great authority, Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloceſter and Earle of Essex who founded heere a College, and John Holland Earle of Huntingdon brother to King Richard the second by the mothers side, deprived of lost honorable title of Duke of Exceſter, when they could not keepe a meane betweene froward stubbernesse and servile obsequiousnes, found thence their subversion. For Thomas, upon his rash & headstrong contumacie was on a sudden violently carried from hence to Calice and there smothered: and Iohn, for a seditious conspiracie was beheaded in this place by King Henrie the Fourth, that he might seeme to haue beene justly punished by way of satisfaction for the said Thomas of Woodstocke, of whose death he was thought to be the principall practiser, and procurer. From thence passeth Chelmer downe not
C farre from Leez, a little Abbay of old time founded by the Gernons, which at this day is the chiefe seat of the Barons Rich, who acknowledge themselves for this dignitie beholden to Richard Rich a most wise and iudicious person; Lord Chancellor of England under King Edward the Sixth, who in the first yeare of his reigne created him Baron Rich. A little beneath, standeth Hatfield Peverell, so denominated of Randulph Peverell the owner thereof, who had to wife a lady of incomparable beauty, in those daies; the daughter of Ingelricke a man of great nobility among the English-Saxons: This Ladie founded heere a College, which now is in maner quite plucked downe, and in a window of the Church, whereof their remaineth still a small part, lieth entombed. She bare unto her husband William Peverel Castellane of Dover, Sir
D Payne Peverel Lord of Brun in the county of Cambridg: & unto King William the Conquerour whose paramore she was, William Peverel Lord of Nottingham. But now retume we to Chelmer, which by this time speedeth it selfe to Chelmerford commonly Chensford (where, by the distance of the place from CAMALODVNVM, it may seeme that old CANONIVM sometimes stood). This is a good bigge towne situate in the hart of the shire betweene two rivers, who as it were, agreed heere to joyne both their streames together: to wit Chelmer from the East, and another from the South, the name whereof if it be Can, as some would haue it, we haue no reason to doubt, that this was CANONIVM.

Barons Rich.

The booke of Saint Martins in London.

Canonium.

Famous it was within the remembrance of our fathers in regard of a small religi-
E ous house built by Malcome King of Scots, now of note onely for the Assises (for so they call those Courts of Iustice wherein twise a yeere the causes and controversies of the whole County are debated before the Iudges.) It beganne to flourish, when Maurice Bishop of London, unto whom it belonged, built the bridges heere in the reigne of Henrie the First, and turned London way thither, which lay before through Writtle, a towne right well knowen for the largenesse of the Parish: which, King Henrie the Third graunted unto Robert Brus Lord of Anandale in Scotland: (whose wife was one of the heires of Iohn surnamed Scot the last Earle of Chester) for that he would not haue the Earledome of Chester to be devided among the di-
F staves: and King Edward the Third, when as the posterity of the Bruses forsooke their allegeance, bestowed it upon Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and of Essex. But now of late, when King Iames at his entrance to the Kingdome bestowed Baronies bountifully vpon select persons, he created Sir Iohn Petre a right respective Knight, Baron Petre of Writtle. Whose father Sir William Petre a man of approved wisdome and exquisite learning, memorable not so much for those most honorable places and offices

Digitized by Google

ces of State which he bare, (as who was of the privie Counsell to King Henrie the Eighth, King Edward the Sixt, Queene Marie, and Queene Elizabeth, and sent oftentimes in Embassage to forraigne princes) as for that being bred and brought vp in good learning, hee well deserved of learning in the Vniuersitie of Oxford, and was both pittifull and bounteous to his poore neighbours about him, and at Engerstone, where he lieth buried. A Frosh-well the river, more truly called Pant, & neere to his mouth, Black-water issuing out of a small spring about Radwinter that belonged to the Barons of Cobham, after it hath gone a long course and seene nothing but Bocking a fat Parsonage, it commeth to Cogeshall a mercate towne, well knowne in times past for a Priorie of Cluniacke Monkes built by King Stephen, and the habitation of ancient Knights thence surnamed De Cogeshall, from whose heire generall married into the old family of Tirell, their branched farre a faire propagation of the Tirells in this shire and elsewhere. Then goeth on this water by Easterford, some call it East-Sturford: and leauing some mile of Whitham a faire through-faire and built by King Edward the Elder, in the yeere 914. which also afterward was of the Honour of Eustace Earle of Bollen; meeteth at length with Chelmer. Which now passing on whole in one chanell not farre from Danbury mounted upon a high hill, the habitation for a time of the family of the Darcies, runneth hard by Woodham-walters, the ancient seat of the Lords Fitz walters: who being nobly descended were of a most ancient race, derived from Robert the younger sonne of Richard sonne to Earle Gislebert: but in the age more lately foregoing, translated by a daughter into the stocke of the Ratcliffes, who being advanced to the Earldome of Sussex dwell now a little from hence in New Hall, a stately and sumptuous house. This New Hall appertained sometime to the Butlers Earles of Ormond, and then hereditarily to Sir Thomas Bollen Earle of Wiltshire, of whom King Henrie the Eighth getting it by way of Exchange, inlarged it to his exceeding great charges, and called it by a new name Beaulieu, which for all that was never currant among the people. After this, Chelmer with other waters running with him, being divided by a river-Iland, casting of that name, and now being called of some Black-water and of others Pant, saluteth that ancient Colonie of the Romanes CAMALODVNVM, which many hundred yeeres since adorned this shore. Ptolomee termeth it CAMVDOLANVM, Antonine CAMVLODVNVM and CAMOLVDVNVM: But Plinie, Dio, and an old Marble stone, induce vs to beleeve that Camalodunum is the right name. In the seeking out of this Citie, good God, how dimsighted haue some beene, whereas it bewraied it selfe by the very name and situation; and shewed it selfe cleerely to them that are halfe blind: A number haue searched for it in the West part of this Isle, as that good man, who thought himselfe to carrie, as one would say, the Sunne of antiquity in his owne hand: others in the furthest part of Scotland: others wholly addicted in opinion to Leland affirmed it to be Colchester: when as (the name scarce any whit maimed) it is called at this day, in steed of CAMALODVNVM, Maldon, in the Saxon tongue Maledune, and Mealdune, the greate part of the word remaining yet entire in & use. Neither hath the expresse remaine of the name onely perswaded me to this, but also the distance set downe in Plinie from Mona, and the very situation in the ancient Itenerarie Table doe afford a most evident proofe thereof. That this name was imposed upon CAMALODVNVM, of the God CAMVLVS, I hardly dare imagine. Howbeit that Mars was worshipped under this name Camulus, both an old stone at Rome in the house of Collotians, and altars discovered with this Inscription CAMVLO DEO SANCTO ET FORTISSIMO, that is, To CAMVLVS THE HOLY AND MOST MIGHTY GOD, doe jointly proue. And in an antique coine of Cunobellinus, whose roiall palace this was, (as I haue already said) I haue seene the portraict stamped of an head having an helmet on it, also with a speare, which may seeme to be that of Mars, with these letters, CAMV. But seeing this peece of money is not now ready at hand to shew, I exhibite heere unto you other expresse portraicts of Cunobellinus his peeces, which may be thought to haue reference to this Camalodunum.

B

C

D

E

F

Cogeshall. Tirell.

Easterford. Whitham.

Camalodunum.

Maldon.

Camulus a God.

This

Digitized by Google

This Cunobelin governed this East part of the Isle in the time of Tiberius the Emperour, and seemeth to have had three sonnes, Admimus, Togodumnus, and Cataeratus. Admimus by his father banished, was interteined by Caius Caligula the Emperour what time as he made his ridiculous expedition into Batavia, that from thence he might blow, and breath out the terrour of his owne person over into Britaine. As for Togodumnus, Aulus Plautius in a set battaile defaited and slew him, and over Cataeratus, whom, as I said, he discomfited and put to flight, he rode ovant in petty triumph. This is that Plautius, who at the perswasion of C. Berrœus, the Britane a banished man (for there never want quarels one or other of war) was the first after Julius Cæsar that attempted Britaine under Claudius: whom Claudius himselfe, having shipped over the legions, followed in person with the whole power of the Empire, and with Elephants (the bones of which beasts being found, have deceived very many) he passed over the Tamis and put to flight the Britans, who upon the bancke received and encountred him as he came toward them; and won with rase this Camalodunum the Kings seat. For which exploit after he had named his sonne BRITANNICVS, and beene himselfe oftentimes saluted Imperator, within six monthes after he set first forth in his voyage, returned to Rome. But heereof have I written before more at large, neither list I to iterate the same in this place.

Claudius in Britannia.

When Camalodunum was thus brought under the Romans subjection, Claudius planted a Colony there with a strong band of old tried souldiers, and in memoriall heereof ordeined peeces of mony to bestamped with this inscription: COL. CAMALODVN. Out of which it is gathered, that this happened in the XII. yeere of his Empire, and in the yeere 52. after the Birth of Christ. And in regard of those old experienced souldiours of the fourteenth legion called Gemina Martia Victrix, whom Tacitus tearmeth the Subduers of Britaine, brought thither and placed in it, it was named COLONIA VICTRICENSIS, and the inhabitants Cives Romani, that is, Citizens of Rome, in an old Inscription, which I heere present to you.

CN. MVNATIVS. M. F.
PAL. AVRELIVS
BASSVS PROC.
AVG.
PRÆF. FABR. PRÆF. COH.
III. SAGITTARIORVM, PRÆF.
COH. ITERVM II. ASTVRVM,
CENSITOR CIVIVM ROMA-NORVM COLONIÆ VICTRI-CENSIS QVÆ EST IN BRI-TANNIA CAMALODVNI, &c.

Digitized by Google

A Colony (if it may be materiall to know so much) is a Company of men that be all brought into one certaine place, built with houses to their hands, which they are to have and hold by a certaine right. For the most part, old soldiours that had served long, were brought to such a place, both that them selves might be provided for, and maintained, and also be ready in all extremity to helpe against rebels, and enforme withall the provincials in their duties by law required. These Colonies also were of great estimation, as being pety resemblances and images, as it were, of the city of Rome. Moreover they had their peculiar Magistrates both superior and inferior: Of which because others have written sufficiently, I neede not to stand either upon them, or such like points. In this first Colony that the Romans planted in Britain, there was a temple built unto * Divus Claudius, Tacitus teameth it, The Altar of eternall dominion, Whereof Seneca maketh mention in his Play, after this maner. A small matter it is, saith hee, and not sufficient, that Claudius hath a Temple in Britain which the Barbarous nation adoreth, and praieth unto, as to a God. There were Priests also elected in honor of him, by name Sodales Augustales, which under a shew of Religion lauishly consumed the Britans goods. But after tenne yeeres, fortune turned her wheele and downe went this Colony. For, when those old soldiours brought into these territories which they had won, exercised extreame cruelty vpon these silly people, the burning broiles of warre which before were quenched brake out into flames, with greater flashes. The Britans under the leading of Bunduica, who also is called Boodicia, by maine force sacked and set on fire this Colonie, lying unfortified and without all fence, and within two daies won the said Temple whereinto the souldiers had thronged themselues. The Ninth Legion comming to aide they put to flight, and in one word slew of Roman citizens and associates together threescore and tenne thousand. This slaughter was foretold by many prodigies. The Image of Victory in this city was turned backeward and fallen downe: In their Senate house strange noises were heard: The Theater resounded with howlings and yellings: Houses were seene under the water of Tamis, and the Arme of the sea beneath it over flowed the bankes as read as bloud to see to, which now (for what cause I knowe not) we call Blacke water, like as Ptolomee termed it IDVMANVM æstuarium, under which is couched a signification of Blackneſſe: for Ydu, in the British tongue soundeth as much as Black. Yet, out of the very embers, the Romans raised it againe: For, Antonine the Emperour made mention of it many yeeres after. Howbeit in the English-Saxons government it is scarse mentioned: Onely Marianus hath written, that Edward the sonne of Aelfred repaired Maldun when it was sore shaken by the furious rage of the Danes, and then fortified it with a Castle. William the Norman, Conquerour of England, as we read in his * Commentarie, had in this towne 180. houses in the tenure and occupation of Burgesses, and 18. mansions wasted. But at this day, for the number of the inhabitants, and the bigneſſe, it is worthily counted one of the principall townes in all Essex, and in Records named, The Burgh of Maldon.

Servius.

* Deified.

The altar and Temple of Claudius.

Dio saith foureſcore thousand.

Idumæus.

* Domesday.

It is an haven commodious enough, and for the bigneſſe very well inhabited, being but one especiall street descending much about a mile in length. Vpon the ridge of an hill answerable to the termination of Dunum which signified an hilly, and high situation, wherein I saw nothing memorable, vnleſſe I should mention two silly Churches, a desolate place of White Friers, and a small pile of Bricke built not long since by R. Darcy, which name hath beene respectiue heere-about.

Hence passing down ouer the brackish water divided into two streamlets, by Highbridg, I sought for an ancient place which Antonine the Emperor placed six miles from Camalodunum, in the way toward Suffolke, and called it AD ANSAM.

some say this is Stanchaster in this County.

This I have thought to have beene some bound belonging to the Colonie of Camalodunum, which resembled the fashion of Ansa, that is, The handle or eare of a pot. For, I had read in Siculus Flaccus, The territories lying to Colonies were limited with divers and sundry markes: In the limits their were set up for bound markes, heere one thing, and there another: in one place little images, in another long earthen vessels: heere you should haue little sword blades, there square stones or Lozenges pointed, and else where according

The bounds of Colonies.

Digitized by Google

A cording to Vitalis and Arcadius, they were ſtones mere like flagons and ſmall wine pipes: why might not therefore a ſtone faſhioned like the handle of a pot be ſet for a bound? Seeing that Antonie according to his wonted manner called it Ad Anſam, and not Anſa? But how religiouſly and with what ceremoniall complements, theſe bound markes were in old time ſet, I will by way of digreſſion ſet downe heere out of the ſame Siculus Flaccus. When they were to place their bound-markes, the verie ſtones themſelues they did ſet upon the firme ground, hard by thoſe places wherein they ment to pitch them faſt, in pittes or holes digged for the purpoſe, they annointed them and with vailes and garlands bedecked them. This done, in thoſe pits wherein they were to put them, after ſacrifice made, and an unſpotted beaſt killed, upon burning firebrands covered over in the B graue, they dropped in bloud, and thereupon they threw frankincenſe and corne, Honie combes alſo and wine with other things, as the manner is to ſacrifice unto Gods of bounds and limites, they threw after the reſt into the ſaid pitte. Thus when all theſe viands were conſumed with fire, they pitched the foreſaid bound-markes upon the hot aſhes thereof, and ſo with carefull diligence faſtened them ſtrongly, and rammed them round about with fragments of ſtones, that they might ſtand the ſurer. But in what place ſoever this AD-ANSAM was, I betake my ſelfe againe to my former opinion for the ſignification of the word: namely, that Ad Anſam was either a bound marke, or onely, a reſting place or ſome Inne by the high way ſide under ſuch a ſigne: and that I collect C by the diſtance to haue beene neere unto Cogeſhall. Neither were they any things elſe but bound markes or Innes, that in the Romane age were named after the ſame forme of ſpeech, Ad Columnam, Ad fines, Ad tres tabernas, Ad Rotam, Ad ſeptem fratres, Ad Aquilam minorem, Ad Herculem &c. that is, At the piller, At the Cogeſhall. Bounds, At the three Taverns, At the wheele, At the ſeaven bretheren, At the leſſe Aegle, At Hercules &c.

And therefore to ſearch more curiouſlie into theſe matters, were nothing elſe but to hunt after the windes. Yet I will heere impart what I incidentlie happened upon in a private note, while I was inquiſitiue heere-about for AD-ANSAM. In a place called Weſtfield three quartes of a mile diſtant from Cogeſhall and D belonging to the Abbay there, was found by touching of a plough a great braſen potte. The ploughmen ſuppoſing it to haue beene hidde treaſure, ſent for the Abbot of Cogeſhall to ſee the taking uppe of it; and hee going thither mette with Sir Clement Harleſton, and deſired him alſo to accompanie him thether. The mouth of the potte was cloſed with a white ſubſtance like paſt or claie, as hard as burned bricke, when that by force was remooued, there was found within it an other potte but that was of earth; that beeing opened there was found in it a leſſer potte of earth of the quantitie of a Gallon couered with a matter like veluet, and faſtned at the mouth with a ſilk-lace. In it they found ſome whole bones and many peeces of ſmall bones wrapped up in fine ſilke of freſh colour, which the Abbot tooke for the reliques of ſome Saints, E and laied uppe in his Veſtuary. But this by way of digreſſion, leaving it to your conſideration.

From Malden the ſhores drawne backe intertaine the ſea in a moſt large and pleaſant bay, which yeeldeth exceeding great ſtore of thoſe oyſters of the beſt kinde, which wee call Walfleot. And (that our coaſts ſhould not bee defrauded of their due fame and glorie) I take theſe to bee thoſe verie ſhores, which, as Plinie ſaith, ſerued the Romanes Kitchins: ſeeing that Mutianus giveth unto Britiſh oyſters the third place after thoſe of Cizicum, in theſe verie words of his: The oyſters of Cizicum bee greater than thoſe that come from Lucrinum, and ſweeter than they of Britain.

F But neither at that time, nor afterwards, when Sergius Orata brought thoſe Lucrine oyſters into ſuch name and great requeſt, did the Britiſh ſhores, as hee Lib. 9. cap. 54. ſaith, Serue Rome with oyſters. So that hee may ſeeme to haue given the chiefe price unto Britiſh oyſters. Neither thinke I were thoſe oyſters other than theſe which Auſonius called Mira, that is, Wonderfull, in this verſe to Paulinus:

Digitized by Google

Mira Caledonius nonnunquam detegit æstus. A
The Britiſh tides ſometimes lay bare,
Thoſe oyſters huge, that wonderous are.

But, of theſe oyſters and of their pits or ſtewes in this coaſt I will giue thoſe leaue to write, who beeing deinty toothed are iudicious clerkes in Kitchenrie.

Into this creeke, beſide other rivers, Coln ſheddeth himſelfe, which growing to an head out of divers ſprings in the North part of this County, paſſeth by the towne of Hedningham or Hengham, commonly called Heningham, where was a goodly faire proper Caſtle in times paſt, and the ancient habitation of the Earles of Oxford who procured a mercat thereunto. Over againſt which, upon the other ſide of the river B ſtandeth Sibble Heningham, the place, as I haue heard ſay, wherein was borne Sir Iohn Hawkwood (the Italians corruptly call him Aucuthus) whom they ſo highly admired for his warlicke proweſſe, that the State of Florence in regard of his notable demerites adorned him with the ſtatue of a man of armes and an honorable tombe, in teſtimony of his ſurpaſſing valour and ſingular faithfull ſervice to their ſtate. The Italians reſound his worthy Acts with full mouth, and Paulus Iouius in his Elogia commendeth him. But for my part it may ſuffice to adde unto the reſt this Tetraſtichon* of Iulius Feroldus,

Hawkwood. Hawkwood Anglorum decus, et decus additæ genti, Italicæ, Italico præſidium q; ſolo. C
Vt tumuli quondam Florentia, ſic ſimulachri, Virtutem Iouius donat honore tuam.
The glorie prime of Engliſhmen, then of Italians bold,
O Hawkwood and to Italie a ſure defenſiue hold:
Thy vertue Florence honored ſometime with coſtly graue,
And Iouius adorn's the ſame now with a ſtatue braue.

*4. Verſes.

This renowned Knight thus celebrated abroad, was forgotten at home, ſaue that ſome of his kinde ſouldierly followers founded a Chanterie at Caſtle Heningham for him and for two of his militarie companions, Iohn Oliver and Thomas Newenton D Eſquiers.

* 14 H. 4.

From hence the river Coln, holding on his courſe by Hawſted, which was the ſeat of the familie of the Bourchiers, whence came Robert Bourchier Lord Chauncellour of England in the time of King Edward the Third, and from him ſprang a moſt honorable progenie of Earles and Barons of that name. Thence by Earles Coln (ſo called of the Sepulture there of the Earles of Oxford) where Aubry de Vere in the time of king Henry the Firſt founded a little Monaſtery and became himſelfe a religious Monke; it comes to COLONIA, whereof Antonine the Emperor maketh mention, and which he noteth to be a different place from the Colonie Camalodunum. Now whether this tooke name of a Colonie hither brought, or of the river Coln, Apollo himſelfe had neede to tell us: I would rather deriue it from the river, ſeeing, as I doe, E that many little townes ſituate upon it, are named Coln. A Earles Colne, Wakes Colne, Colne Engaine, Whites Colne, bearing the names all of their Lords. The Britaines called this Caer Colin, the Saxons Colecaſtep, and wee Colcheſter. A proper and fine burrough it is, well traded and pleaſantly ſeated, as being ſituat upon the brow of an hill, ſtretching out from Weſt to Eaſt, walled about, beautified with 15. Churches, beſides that large and ſtately one, without the walles, which Eudo Sewar to king Henrie the Firſt conſecrated unto Saint Iohn, now ruinated, and converted into a private dwelling houſe. In the mideſt of the towne, there is a Caſtle now yeelding to time ready to fall: which, as our Hiſtorians write, Edward the ſonne of Aelfred firſt F raiſed from the ground, what time as he repaired Colcheſter defaced with warres and long after Maud the Empreſſe gaue it to Alberic Vere to aſſure him to her partie.

Colonia. Colcheſter. 1105.

The infinite deale of auncient coine daily gotten out of the ground there doth moſt plainly ſhew that this flouriſhed in the Roman time in happy eſtate. Yet haue I light of no peeces more ancient than of Gallienus. For, the moſt were ſuch as had upon them the Inſcriptions of the Tetrici, & the Victorini, of Poſthumus, C. Caraſius, Conſtantine

Digitized by Google

A Constantine, and the Emperours that followed him. The inhabitants affirme, that Flavia Iulia Helena the mother of Constantine the Great was borne and bred there, being the daughter of King Coel: and in memory of the Crosse which shee found, they give for their Armes a Crosse enragled betweene foure Crownes: whence it is, that our Necham as touching her, and this place came out with these verses, although Apollo was not greatly his friend therein, Helen Great Constantines mother.

Effulsit sydus vitæ, Colcestria lumen
Septem Climatibus lux radiosa dedit.
Sydus erat Constantinus, decus imperiale,
B Servijt huic flexo poplite Roma potens.

From out of thee, ô Colchester, there shone a Star of life
The raies whereof to Climats seven gave great and glorious light,
This Star was Constantine the Great, that noble Emperor, Whom Rome in all obedience lay prostrate to adore.

Verily she was a woman of life most holy, and of invincible resolution and constancy in propagation of Christian Religion: Whereupon in ancient inscriptions she is every where named PIISSIMA, and VENERABILIS AVGVSTA, that is, Most DEVOVT, and VENERABLE EMPRESSE. Beneath this, where the River Colne runneth into the sea, standeth to be seene S. Osithes a little town, whose ancient name, which was Chic, is growne out of use by reason of Osith the virgin of royall parentage, who being wholy devoted to the service of God, and stabbed there to death by the Danish Pirates, was of our ancestors honoured for a Saint: and in her memoriall Richard Bishop of London about the yeere 1120. built a religious house, of Regular Chanons. But now it is the chiefe seate of the right honourable Lords Darcy, called De Chich, whom King Edward the Sixth advanced to the honour of Barons when he created Sir Thomas Darcy his Counsellour, Vicechamberlain, and Captane of the Gard, L. Darcy of Chich. S. Osith. Chic. Barons Darcy of Chich.

From hence the shore shooting out, buncheth foorth as farre as to the Promontorie Nesse, which in the English-Saxon tongue is called Eadulphes-ness. What hath beene found in this place, have heere out of the words and credit of Ralph the Monke of Coggeshall, who wrot 350. yeeres agoe. In King Richards time, on the Seashore, at a village called Eadulphnesse, were found two teeth of a certaine Giant, of such a huge bignesse, that two hundred such teeth as men have now a daies might be cut out of them. These saw I at Coggeshal (quoth he) and not without wondering. And such another Giantlike thing (I wot not what) as this, was in the beginning of Queene Elizabethes raigne digged up by R. Candish a Gentleman, neere unto this place. Neither doe I denie, but there have beene men, that for their huge bodies, and firme strength were wonderous to behold: whom God, as S. Austin saith, would have to live upon the earth, thereby to teach us, that neither beauty of body, ner talnesse of stature, are to be counted simply good things, seeing they be common as well to Infidels as to the godly. Yet may we very well thinke, that which Suetonius hath written, namely that the huge limmes of monstrous Sea-creatures elsewhere, and in this kingdome also, were commonly said and taken to have beene Giants bones. D Nesse. Giants. Giants bones. E

From this Promontory, the shore bendeth backe by little and little to the mouth of Stoure, a place memorable for the battaile at sea there fought betweene the English and Danes in the yeere 884. where now lieth Harewich a most safe road, whence it hath the name: For, hare-pic in the English-Saxon tongue, betokeneth a Station, or a creeke where an army encamped. The towne is not great, but well peopled, fortified by Art and nature, and made more sensible by Queene Elizabeth. The salt water so creeketh about it, that it almost insulateth it, but thereby maketh the springs so brackish, that there is a defect of fresh water, which they fetch some good way off. Harewich. F

This is the Stour, that running betweene Essex and Suffolke serveth as a bound to them both, and on this side watereth nothing else but rich and fruitfull fields.

Digitized by Google

But not farre from the head therof ſtandeth Bumſtead, which the family of Helion held A by Baronie, from whom the Wentworthes of Gosfield are deſcended.

Barklow. And what way this country looketh toward Cambridge-ſhire Barklow ſheweth it ſelfe, well knowen now, by reaſon of foure little hils or Burries caſt up by mans hand: ſuch as in old time were wont to be raiſed (ſo ſome would have it) as tombes for ſoldiers ſlaine, whoſe reliques were not eaſie to be found. But when a fifth, and ſixt of them were not long ſince digged downe, three troughes of ſtone were found, and in them broken bones of men, as I was informed. The country people ſay that they were reared after a field there fought againſt the Danes. For, Dane-wort which with bloud-red berries, commeth up heere plenteouſly, they ſtill call by no other name than Daneſ-bloud, of the number of Danes that were there ſlaine, verily beleeving B that it bloweth from their bloud.

Ancient tombes Daneſ-bloud.

Walden. A little below ſtandeth upon an hill Walden of Saffron, called Saffron Walden, among the fields looking merily with moſt lovely Saffron. A very good Mercat town incorporated by King Edward the ſixth with a Treaſurer, two Chamberlaines and the Commonalty. Famous it was in times paſt for a Caſtell of the Magnavilles (which now is almoſt vaniſhed out of ſight) and an Abbay adjoyning, founded in a place very commodious in the yeere 1136. wherein the Magnavilles founders thereof were buried. Geffrey de Magnavilla was the firſt that gave light and life (as it were) to this place. For Mawde the Empreſſe in theſe words (out of her very Patent I copy them) C gave unto him Newport (a good bigge towne this is hard by). For ſo much as he was wont to pay that day whereon (as her words are) my father King Henry was alive and dead: and to remove the mercat from Newport into his Caſtell of Walden, with all the cuſtomes that before time in better maner appertained to that Mercat, to wit in Toll, paſſage & other cuſtomes, and that the waies of Newport neere unto the water banke be directed ſtreight according to the old cuſtome into Walden, upon the ground forfited to me: and that the Mercat of Walden be kept upon Sunday and Thurſday: and that a Faire be holden at Walden to begin on Whitſonday even, and to laſt all the Whitſon weeke. (And From that time, by occaſion of this Mercat, for a great while it was called Cheping Walden). Alſo as it is in the Booke of Walden Abbay, he the ſaid Geffrey appointed Walden to be the principal D place and ſeat of his Honour and Earledome for him and his ſucceſſours. The place where he built the Abbay had plenty of waters, which riſing there continually doe run and never faile. Late it is ere the ſunne riſeth and ſhineth there, and with the ſooneſt he doth ſet and carry away his light, for that the hilles on both ſides ſtand againſt it.

Commonly called Mandeuilles.

That place now they call Audley End, of Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellour of England, who changed the Abbay into his owne dwelling houſe. This Thomas, created by King Henry the eight Baron Audley of Walden, left one ſole daughter and heire Margaret, ſecond wife to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, of whom he begat L. Thomas, L. William, Lady Elizabeth, and Lady Margaret. The ſaid Thomas emploi- E ed in ſundrie ſea-ſervices with commendation Queene Elizabeth ſummoned by writ unto the High Court of Parliament, among other Barons of the Realme, by the name of Lord Howard of Walden. And King Iames of late girded him with the ſword of the Earledome of Suffolke, and made him his Chamberlain: who in this place hath begunne a magnificent building. Neere to another houſe of his at Cheſterford, there was a towne of far greater antiquity, hard by Icaldun, in the very border of the ſhire, which now of the old Burgh, the ruſticall people uſe to call Burrow Banke, where remaine the footings onely of a towne lying in maner dead, and the manifeſt tract of the very walles. Yet will I not ſay, that it was VILLA FAVSTINI, which Antonine the Emperour placeth in this tract: and albeit Baron Awdley of Walden.

1597.

Burrow-bank.

Ingrata haud leti ſpatia detinet campi,
Sed rure vero, barbaroq; lætatur:

F

It takes not up large ground that yeelds no gaine,
But country like, is homely rude and plaine:

Yet dare not I once dreame that this is that Villa Fauſtini, which in theſe and other verſes is by that pleaſant and conceited Poet Martiall, depaincted

in

Digitized by Google

A in his Epigrams. The fieldes heere on every ſide (as I ſaid) ſmell ſweetly, and ſmile pleaſantly with Saffron (a commodity brought into England in the time of King Edward the Third.) This in the moneth of Iuly every third yeare, when the heads thereof have beene plucked up and after twenty daies ſpitted or ſet againe under mould, about the end of September they put foorth a whitiſh blew flower, out of the middle whereof there hange three red fillets of Saffron (wee call them Chives) which are gathered very early in the morning before the ſunne riſing, and being plucked out of the flower, are dried at a ſoft fire. And ſo great increaſe commeth heereof that out of every acree of ground there are made foureſcore or an hundred pounds B weight of ſaffran, while it is moiſt: which being dried yeeld ſome twenty pound in weight. And that, which a man would marvell more at, the ground which three yeeres together hath borne Saffran, will beare aboundance of Barly eighteene yeeres together without any dunging or manuring, and then againe beare Saffran as before, if the inhabitants there hath not miſinformed me, or I miſconceived them. Saffron.

More into the South is Clavering ſeated, which King Henry the Second gave unto Sir Robert Fitz-Roger (from whom the family of Evers are iſſued). The poſterity of this Sir Roger, after they had a long time taken their name of their fathers fore-name, or Chriſten-name according to that ancient cuſtome, as Iohn Fitz-Robert, Robert C Fitz-Iohn &c. afterwards, by the commandement of King Edward the Firſt, they aſſumed from hence the name of Clavering. But of theſe I am to ſpeake in Northumberland. Stanſted Montfichet heere alſo putteth up the head: which I will not paſſe over in ſilence, conſidering it hath beene the Baronie or habitation in times paſt of the family De Monte Fixo, commonly Mont-fichet, who bare for their Armes three Cheverus Or, in a ſhield Gueles, and were reputed men of very great nobility. But five of them flouriſhed in right line: and at the laſt three ſiſters were ſeized of the inheritance, Margaret wife of Hugh De Bolebec, Aveline wedded to William De Fortibus Earle of Aumarle, and Philip wife to Hugh Playz. The poſterity male of this Hugh flouriſhed within the remembrance of our great Grandfathers, and determined in a D daughter married to Sir Iohn Howard Knight; from whoſe daughter by Sir George Vere, deſcended the Barons Latimer, and the Wingfeldes. Barons of Clavering. See in Northumberland. Barons Montfichet. The Montfichet Coat of armes. Playz.

And a little below, is Haſlingbury to be ſeene, the reſidence of the Barons Merley: of whom I ſhall ſpeake more in Norfolke. And cloſe to this, ſtandeth an ancient Fort or Military enſe thereof named Walbery: and more Eaſt-ward Barrington Hall, where dwelleth that right ancient family of the Barringtons, which in the reigne of King Stephen the Barons of Montfichet inriched with faire poſſeſſions, and more enobled their houſe in our fathers remembrance by matching with one of the daughters and coheires of Sir Henry Pole Lord Montacute, ſonne of Margaret Counteſſe of Salisbury, deſcended of the bloud royall. Haſlingbury. Barington.

E Neither is Hatfield Regis, commonly called of a broad ſpread Oke, Hatfield Brad-Oake to be omitted, where Robert Vere Earle of Oxford built a Priory, and there lieth entombed croſſe-legged with a French inſcription, wherein he is noted to be firſt of that name Robert, and third Earle of Oxford. Hatefeld Brad-oke.

After the comming in of the Normans, Maude the Empreſſe, Lady of the Engliſh (for ſo ſhee ſtiled herſelfe) created Geffrey De Magnavilla, uſually called Mandevil, ſon to William by Margaret daughter and heire of Endo the Steward or Shewar, the firſt Earle of Eſſex, that ſhe might ſo by her benefits oblige unto her a man both mighty and martiall. Who in thoſe troubleſome times under King Stephen deſpoiled of his eſtate made an end of his owne turbulent life with the ſword. And hee verily for F his wicked deedes (as I finde in an old writer) juſtly incurred the worlds cenſure and ſentence of excommunication: in which while he ſtood, he was deadly wounded in the head at a little towne called Burwel. When he laie at the point of death ready to give his laſt gaſpe there came by chance certaine Knights Templars, who laid upon him the habit of their religious profeſſion ſigned with a red croſſe, and afterwards when he was full dead, taking him up with them, encloſed him within a Coffin of lead, and hunge him upon a tree in the Earles of Eſſex. p. 450. Regiſter of Walden. p. 490.

Digitized by Google

Orchard of Old Temple at London. For in a reverent awe of the Church they durſt not burie him, becauſe he died excomunicated. After him ſucceeded Geffrey his ſonne, who was reſtored by Henrie the Second to his fathers honours and eſtate for him, and his heires; but hee having no children left them to his brother William, who by his wife was alſo Earle of Albemarle, and died likewiſe in his greateſt glory iſſueleſſe. Some yeares after king Iohn promoted Geffrey Fitz-Petre, Iuſticer of England, a wiſe and graue perſonage unto this honour in conſideration of a great maſſe of money and title by his wife Beatrice the eldeſt daughter of William de Say, who was the ſiſters ſonne of that great Geffrey de Magnavill, the firſt Earle of Eſſex. This Fitz-Petre, a man (as an old author writeth) Paſsing well monied had formerly dealt with the Biſhop of Elie the kings chiefe Iuſticer, for a great peece of money preſently paid and by intreaty beſide; and then claimed, and demaunded the Earledome in his wiues right, as being the daughter of William Say eldeſt brother to Geffrey Say. Who gaue him full Seiſin thereof, (againſt Geffrey Say) and required the money that hee promiſed: which within a ſhort time he received of him every penny wel and truly paid, for to bee brought into the kings coffers. Thus being admitted, and confirmed by the Kings letters patent, he held and poſſeſſed it taking Homage of all that held of him in Knights ſeruice. And ſo was girt with the ſword of the Earledome of Eſſex by K. Iohn at the ſolemnity of his Coronaton. This Geffrey Fitz-Petre was aduaunced to the high eſtate of Iuſticer of England by King Richard the Firſt, when hee remooued Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury from that office by the Popes peremptorie commands: for that Biſhops ought not to intermedle in ſecular affaires. This place the ſaid Geffrey Fitz-Petre executed with great commendation preſerving by his wiſdome the Realme from that confuſion which it after fell into by King Iohns vnaduiſed carriage. His two Sonnes Geffery and William, aſſumed unto them the ſurname of Magnavill or Mandevill, and enjoied this honour ſucceſſiuely. As for Geffrey, hee by his wife was Earle of Gloceſter alſo, and beeing a young man loſt his life at a Turneament. William tooke part with Lewis of France againſt king Iohn, and departed out of this world without iſſue. Theſe being thus dead childleſſe, their ſiſters ſonne Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and high Conſtable of England, ſucceeded in their roome.

A B C D

Regiſter of Walden Monaſtery.

Of this mans poſterity male, their ſucceeded many yeares together one after another, Earles of Hereford and of Eſſex: of whom I will ſpeake among the Earles of Hereford, ſeeing that they wrote themſelues Earles of Hereford and of Eſſex. Aeleonor the eldeſt daughter of the laſt of theſe Bohuns, beeing given in marriage together with the title of Eſſex unto Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Gloceſter, bare unto him a daughter named Anne, who had for her firſt husband Edmund Earle of Stafford, from whom came the Dukes of Buckingham: and for her ſecond Sir William Bourchier, unto whom King Henrie the Fifth gaue the Earledome of Ew in Normandie. This William of her bodie begat Henrie Bourchier, whom king Edward the Fourth inveſted in the dignity of the Earledome of Eſſex, in regard hee had married his aunt, and was deſcended from Thomas of Woodſtock. Hee had to ſucceede him another Henrie, his grand-child, who beeing caſt out of the ſadle by a flinging horſe, loſt his life, leaving behind him one onely daughter Anne, who beeing then little reſpected, King Henrie the Eighth preſently and all at once made Thomas Cromwell, (whom hee had uſed as his inſtrument to ſuppreſſe and aboliſh the Popes authority) Earle of Eſſex, Lord Great Chamberlaine of England and knight of the Order of Saint George: whom before for his reaching politicke head, hee had made Baron Cromwell of Okcham, The Kings Vicar General in Spiritual matters, and Lord of the priuy Seale: and all theſe honours were heaped upon him within the compaſſe of fiue yeares.

See the Earles of Hereford.

Eliz. ſiſter to Rich. Duke of Yorke.

E F

But in the Fifth month after hee was Earle, hee loſt his head and ſo had the enterlude of his life a bloudy Cataſtrophe, as moſt of theſe have, who are buſie managers of the greateſt affaires. And then the ſame King thought Sir William Parr, upon whom hee had beſtowed in marriage Anne the onely daughter and heire of the foreſaid Henry Bourchier, worthy alſo to bee entituled Earle of Eſſex.

But

Digitized by Google

A But at the laſt, after Parr was dead without iſſue, Walter D' Eureux Vicount Hereford, whoſe great grandmother was Cecilie Bourgchier ſiſter to Henrie Bourgchier whom I named right now, through the gracious favour of Queene Elizabeth received this dignity of the Earledome of Eſſex, and left it to his ſonne Robert. Who beeing adorned with ſingular gifts of nature, and ſupported beſides with the ſpeciall favour of his moſt gracious Prince, grew ſo faſt unto ſuch honour, that al England conceived good hope hee would haue fully equalled, yea and farre ſurpaſſed the greateſt vertues and praiſes of all his progenitours. But (alas) whiles hee was carried away with popularity, and made haſt to out goe his hopes, hee caſt B himſelfe headlong into deſtruction: as many more haue done, who deſpiſing that which might come by patience with ſecuritie, haue made choiſe to haſten thereto before time with their finall overthrow.

But our moſt gratious Soveraigne King Iames of his roial benignity hath reſtored his ſonne Robert to his bloud, and honours by Parliament authority.

C

There be counted in this County Pariſh Churches. 415.

D

E

ICENI.

F

Digitized by Google

ICENI.

THe Region next unto the Trinobantes which afterwards was called East-England, and containeth Suffolke, Norfolk, and Cambridge-shire with Huntingdon-shire, was inhabited in times past by the ICENI, called elsewhere amisse TIGENI: and in Ptolomee more corruptly SIMENI: whom also I have thought heeretofore to have beene in Cæsar by a confused name, termed CENIMAGNI: and so to thinke induced I was, partly by that most neere affinity betweene these names ICENI, and CENI-MAGNI, and in part by the consent of Cæsar and Tacitus together. For Cæsar writeth that the Cenimagni yeelded themselves unto the Romans: which Tacitus recordeth that the Iceni likewise did, in these words: They willingly joined in amity with us. But (that which maketh most to the cleering of this point) in a Manuscript old booke for CENIMAGNI, we finde written with the word devided in twaine, CENI, AGNI. For which if I might not be thought somewhat too bould a Critick, I would read instead thereof ICENI, REGNI. Neither verily can you find the Cenimagni elsewhere in all Britain, if they be a diverse people from the Iceni and Regni. But of this name ICENI, there remaine in this tract very many footings, if I may so tearme them, as Ikensworth, Ikenthorpe, Ikbortow, Iken, Iksning, Ichlingham, Eike, &c. Yea and that high street-way, which went from hence, the Historians of the former age every where doe name Ichenild-Street, as one would say, the Icenes street.

Sup. p. 64 — Ichenild street.

What should be the reason of this name (so love me Truth) I dare not guesse, unlesse one would fetch it from the Wedge-like-forme of the country, and say, it lieth Wedgwise upon the sea. For the Britans in their language call a Wedge Iken, and for the same cause a place in Wales, by the Lake or Meere Lhintegid, is of that forme named Lhan-yken, as Welsh-Britans enformed me: and in the very same sense a little country in Spaine (as Strabo writeth) is cleped SPHEN, that is, The wedge, and yet the same seemeth not to resemble a wedge so neere, as this of ours doth.

Sphen.

A mighty nation this was, as saith Tacitus, and after they had betaken themselves to the protection of the Romans, never shaken nor troubled unto Claudius his time. For then, when as Ostorius the Romane Lieutenant raised fortifications upon the rivers, and disarmed the Britans, they assembled their forces and made head against him: but after, that the Romanes had broken through the rampier, wherewith his

A they had fenſed themſelves, they were vnquiſhed not without great ſlaughter. In which fight verily, they performed many worthy acts, and M. Oſtorius the Lieutenants ſonne wonne the honour of ſaving a Citizens life. When this warre was thus huſht, ſcarce 13. yeeres had gone over their heads, when a new tempeſt of warre aroſe vpon theſe occaſions. Praſutagus King of theſe Iceni, to ſecure (though it were with the hurt of his owne private eſtate) his kinred from calamity, ordained by his laſt will and teſtament Nero the Emperour to be his heire, ſuppoſing that by this obſequious ſervice of his (let Tacitus ſpeake forme a while) his kingdome and
B houſe both ſhould be ſafe from all iniury: which fell out cleane contrary: ſo that his kingdome was waſted by the Centurions, and his houſe by ſlaves, as if they had beene ſubdued by force. And now firſt of all, his wife Boodicia, who alſo is called Bunduica was whipped, and her daughters deflowred. All the principall men of the Iceni, as though they had received the whole Country in free gift were ſtript of their goods, and turned out of their ancient inheritance: thoſe alſo of the Kings ſtocke and bloud accounted no better than bondſlaues. By occaſions of which grievous injuries and for feare of greater indignities (for ſo much they had beene reduced into the forme of a pro-
C vince) in all haſt they tooke armes, having with all ſollicited the Trinobantes to rebellion, & others alſo who had not as yet beene inured to bondage: Theſe by privie conſpiracies agreed to reſume their liberty, being incenſed with moſt bitter & deadly hatred againſt the old ſoldiours planted at Maldon aboue ſaid. Thus beganne a moſt dangerous war to kindle, which was ſet more on a light fire by the greedy covetouſneſſe of Seneca, who about that time exacted with extremitie 400000. Seſterces, an hundred times told, (which amount to three hundred thouſand pounds of our money) ſo encreaſed by his biting vſurious contracts.

Seneca his vſurie in Britannie.

D In this warre, that I may be briefe, that Boodicia, whom Gildas ſeemeth to call the crafty Lioneſſe, wife to Praſutagus, ſlew outright of Romanes and their aſſociates foure ſcore thouſand, raiſed Caimalodunum their Colonie, and the free towne Verulamium. The ninth Legion ſhe diſcomfited, and put to flight Catus Decianus the Procuratour: but at length ſhe being put to the worſt by Suetonius Paulinus in a pitched field, with an invincible courage and reſolution died (as Tacitus writeth) by drinking a cup of poiſon; or as Dio ſaith, by ſickneſſe. In the heat of this warre, Xiphilinus recordeth out of Dio, that the Britans eſpecially worſhipped the God-
E deſſe VICTORIE under the name of ANDATES, which the Greeke booke in another place calleth Andraſtes: alſo that in her ſacred grove, they ſacrificed priſoners aliue in moſt barbarous and ſavage maner. And yet the Britans in theſe daies acknowledge no ſuch name of Victorie, neither know I what the meaning of it ſhould be, unleſſe, as the Latins haue called Victorie Victoriam, a vincendo, that is, of winning: the Sabins acunam, ab Vevacuando, that is, of emptying and making riddance: and the Grecians NIKHN, ἀπὸ τῆς νικᾶσθαι, that is, of not yeelding or giving backe: ſo the Britans named it Anaraith, of over-
F throwing; For, ſo they terme a miſchieuous and deadly overthrow. But thus much ſlightly by the way. From thoſe times ever ſince no mention is there in authors of the Iceni, neither can any thing by reading be found, but that the Romanes, when their Empire went apace to decay, did ſet a new officer over the ſea coaſts along theſe and other countries to reſtraine the piracies and robberies of the Saxons, whom, as I haue Andates or Andraſtes. The Goddeſſe Victoric.

In Kent.

ſaid

* Earle or Lieutenant. said heeretofore, they called * Comes of the Saxons shore along Britaine. A

* Seuen kingdomes. But when the English Saxons now had established their * Heptarchie in this Iland, this prouince became part of the Kingdome of East Angles, which of the site thereof Eastward they named in their language, Eaꝛꝺ-angle-þýꝺ, that is, The Kingdome of East English: and it had for the first King thereof, Vffa, whence his successours were a long time called Vff Kines, who seeme to haue beene vassalles sometimes to the Kings of Mercia, and sometimes to the Kings of Kent. Whose of-

East-Angle.

Vff kines.

spring being come to an end in Saint Edmund; the Danes ouerran this country most B piteously for the space of fifty yeeres or there about, afflicting it with all the calamities that accompany the warres: untill that King Edward the Elder having subdued them united it at length to his owne Kingdome of the West Saxons. But afterwards, it had peculiar Presidents and Gouernours: which honorable place at the first comming in Raulph Presiden. of East-Angle.

of the Normans, and a while after one Raulph borne in the lesser Britaine held; a man of a perfidious disposition and disloyall, who at the celebration of a marriage in most sumptuous maner, wickedly with many moe conspired the death of William the C Conquerour: but in vaine it was to hope for secrecie and trust, among so many privie to the conspiracy: For, it was discouered, and he deprined of his dignity was attainted, and the rest beheaded. But these things are to be handled more at large by the Historians: and now let vs goe in hand with that which belongeth properly, to our purpose, that is, the places themselues. What kind of country this was, behold how Abbo Floriacensis, who liued in the yere of Christ 970. hath pictured it out in these words:

" This part which is called East Angle or East England is renowned, as for other " causes, so in this regard, that it is watered almost on euery side: being on the South- " east and East enuironed with the Ocean, and on the North-east with huge Fennes soked D " in moisture, which rising by reason of the levell ground from the mids in maner of all
" Britaine, for the space of an hundred miles and more doth descend with the greatest " riuers into the Sea. But of that side which lieth Westward the Prouince it selfe is " continuate to the rest of the Iland, and therefore passable throughout: but, least it " should be overrunne with the often irruptions and breakings in of enemies, it is fen-
" sed along with a banke like unto a wall, and a trench. Inwardly the soile is fruitfull en- " ough, and the country of a passing fresh hue, with pleasant Orchards, Gardens, and " groues, most delectable for hunting, notable for pastures, and not meanly stored with E " sheepe and other cattell. I say nothing of the fishfull riuers, considering that of the " one side the Sea licketh it with his tongue, and of the other side there are by reason of " the broad fennes and wide marishes an infinite number of pooles two or three miles o-
" uer. Which Fennes doe afford to a multitude of Monkes their wished priuate rety-
" rings of a recluse and solitarie life: wherein as long as they are enclosed, they neede not
" the solitarinesse of any desert wildernesse. Thus farre Abbo.
"

Suffolke, F

Digitized by Google

SOVTH-FOLKE or SVFFOLKE.

VFFOLKE, which we muſt ſpeake of firſt, in the Saxon tongue Suð-folc, that is, South-folke, or people in reſpect of Norfolke, hath on the Weſt ſide Cambridgeſhire, on the South the river Stour, which divideth it from Eſſex: on the Eaſt ſide the German ſea, and on the North two little rivers; Ouſe the leaſt, and Waveney, which flowing out as it were of the ſame fountaine, runne divers waies, and ſever it apart from Norfolke. A large country it is, and full of havens, of a fat and fertile ſoile, (unleſſe it be Eaſtward) being compounded (as it is) of clay and marle: by meanes whereof, there are in every place moſt rich & goodly corne fields, with paſtures as battable, for grazing and feeding of cattell. And great ſtore of cheeſes are there made, which to the great commodity of the inhabitants are vented into all parts of England: Nay into Germanie, France, and Spaine alſo, as Pantaleon the Phiſitian writeth, who ſtucke not to compare theſe of ours for colour, and taſt both with thoſe of Placentia: but he was no dainty toothed ſcholar out of Apicius ſchoole. Neither be their wanting woods heere, which haue beene more plentifull, and parkes; for many their are lying to Noble mens and Gentlemens houſes repleniſhed with game.

Cheeſes.

This Countie was divided politically into three parts: whereof one is called the Geldable, becauſe out of it there is gathered a Tribute: a ſecond, Saint Edmunds liberty, for that it belonged to his Abbay: the third Saint Audries liberty, becauſe it appertained to Ely Abbay, unto which our Kings in times paſt granted certaine territories with Sach and Soch, as ſaith Ely Booke, without any exception either of Eccleſiaſticall or ſecular juriſdiction. But let vs ſurvey it Chorographically, and beginning at the Eaſt ſide take a view of the better and more remarkable places.

Where it lieth Weſt and toward Cambridgeſhire, in the very limite ſtandeth Ixning, more famous in times paſt than now. For Audre the Virgine K. Annas daughter and canonized for a Saint, was heere borne, Raulph alſo Earle of this Eaſt England heere entred into conſpiracie againſt William the Conquerour, and Hervey the firſt Biſhop of Ely made a cauſey or highway from hence to Ely.

Nouum mercatum.

But now, for that Newmercate is ſo nere, whither men reſort with their wares & cõmodities more frequently, it hath begun to decay. That this Newmarket is a towne of late daies built, the very name it ſelfe doth import: and it is ſituate in ſuch ſort, that the South part therof belongeth to Cambridgeſhire, the North ſide to Suffolke: and both of them haue their ſeuerall ſmall Churches: whereof this acknowledgeth Ixning, the former Ditton or Dichton, for their mother. Heereof I haue found by reading nothing, but that under King Henrie the third, Sir Rober L'Iſle gaue one part of it in franke marriage with his daughter Caſſandra unto Sir Richard de Argenton, from whom the Alingtons are deſcended.

Newmercate. Newmarket Heath.

Heere lieth out a great way round about, a large plaine, named of this towne, Newmarket Heath, conſiſting of a ſandy and barren ground yet greene withall, wherein is to be ſeene that wonderfull dich, which, as if it had beene caſt by the devill, the common ſort call Devils dike, whereas in very truth, moſt certainly it is knowne to be one of them, wherwith the inhabitants, as (Abbo writeth) fenſed themſelves againſt the inrodes of their enemies, as ſhall be ſhewed more at large when we are come to Cambridgeſhire. Yet in the meane time, I am heere to advertiſe the reader, that the leaſt of all theſe diches ſheweth it ſelfe two miles from hence betweene Snaile-well and Moulton.

More within the Countrie is that renowned towne of Saint Edmund which in the Saxons age, men called Bedepic-ȝueopd: and in the time of the Britans, as it ſhould ſeeme, was that VILLA FAVSTINI, whereof Antonine maketh mention: For of that opinion

S. Edmunds Bury.

Digitized by Google

opinion was Talbot a man right skilfull in antiquities, and very much conuerſant in this part of England. The diſtance alſo, as well from the Iciani, as from Colonia in Antonine agreeth well enough: And as Villa in the Latin tongue ſignifieth ſome Gentlemans houſe ſtanding vpon his land, ſo Gueorð, in old Engliſh betokened the ſame. For, that Abbo aforeſaid, interpreteth Bedericſ-gueord, by theſe words Bedericī Cortis, that is, Villa, that is to ſay Bedericſ Court, Farme, or manſion houſe. Beſides that, the Engliſhmen may ſeeme to haue brought the ſignificancie of that Latine word into their owne language: For as Fauſtinus in latin implieth a certaine meaning of proſperity: ſo doth Bederic in the German tongue, as writeth that moſt learned Hadrianus Iunius, where he interpreteth the name of Betorix (who in Strabo was the ſonne of Melo the Sicambrian,) Full of happineſſe and fauour. But if theſe were diuers perſons, I willingly confeſſe that I am ignorant, who that Fauſtinus, and who this Bedericus was. Sure I am that it was not that VILLA FAVSTINI which Martiall in his Epigrames depainteth: and if I ſaid it was the habitation of that Beric, who being driuen out of Britaine, as Dio writeth, perſwaded the Emperour Claudius to warre vpon the Britans, I ſhould not beleeue my ſelfe. But whatſoeuer it was, if it be not that Fauſtini Villa, yet ſeemeth it to haue beene of famous memorie, conſidering that when Chriſtian religion beganne to ſpring up in this tract, King Sigebert heere founded a Church; and Abbo called it Villam regiam, that is, A royall towne: But after that the people had tranſlated hether the body of Edmund that moſt Chriſtian King, whom the Danes with exquiſite torments had put to death, and built in honor of him a very great Church wrought with a wonderfull frame of timber, it beganne to be called Edmundi Burgus, commonly Saint Edmundbury, and more ſhortly, Bury: and flouriſhed marvailous much. But eſpecially ſince that K. Canutus for to expiate the ſacrilegious impiety of his father Suenus againſt this Church, being affrighted with a viſion of Saint Edmunds, built it againe of a new worke, enriched it, offered his owne crowne vnto the holy martyr, brought into it Monkes with their Abbot, and gaue vnto it many faire and large Manours, and among other things the towne it ſelfe full and whole: ouer which the Monkes themſelves by their Seneſchall had rule and iuriſdiction. Whereupon, Ioſcelin de Branklond a Monke of this houſe, writeth thus: The men as well without the Burgh as within are ours, and all within Banna Leucarenioy the ſame libertie.

Guord or worth.

Beric the Britan.

A B C D

Afterwards, Herveie the Sacriſt comming of the Norman bloud, compaſſed it round about with a wall, whereof their remaine ſtill ſome few reliques, and Abbot Newport walled the Abbay. The Biſhop of Rome endowed it with very great immunities and among other things granted, That the ſaid place ſhould be ſubject to no Biſhop in any matter, and in matters lawfull depend vpon the pleaſure and direction of the Archbiſhop. Which is yet obſerued at this day. And now by this time the Monkes abounding in wealth erected a new Church of a ſumptuous and ſtately building, enlarging it every day more than other with new workes; and whiles they laid the foundation of a new Chappell in the reigne of Edward the Firſt, There were found (as Everſden a Monke of this place writeth) The walles of a certaine old Church built round, ſo as that the altar ſtood (as it were) in the mids, and we verily thinke, ſaith he, is was that, which was firſt built to Saint Edmunds ſeruice: But what maner of towne this was, and how great the Abbay alſo was while it ſtood, heare Leland ſpeak, who ſaw it ſtanding: The Sunne (ſaith hee) *hath not ſeene either a Citie more finely ſeated, (ſo delicately ſtandeth it vpon the eaſie aſcent or hanging of an hill, and a little riuer runneth downe on the Eaſt ſide thereof:) or a goodlier Abbay, whether a man indifferently conſider, either the endowment with reuenewes, or the largeneſſe, or the incomparable magnificence thereof. A man that ſaw the Abbay would ſay verily it were a Citie: ſo many gates there are in it, and ſome of braſſe, ſo many Towres, & a moſt ſtately Church: Vpon which attend * three others alſo ſtanding glorioufly in one and the ſame Churchyard, all of paſſing fine and curious workmanſhip.* If you demaund how great the wealth of this Abbay was, a man could hardly tell, and namely how many gifts and oblations were hung vpon the tumbe alone of Saint Edmund: and beſides, their came in, out of lands and reuenewes, a thouſand fiue hun-Malmesburienſis.

Euerſden.

* Now but two.

E F

dred

Digitized by Google

A dered and three score pounds of old rent by the yeare. If I should relate the broiles severally that from time to time arose betweene the townesmen and the Monkes (who by their * Steward governed the townesmen) and with how great rage they fell together by the eares, purposedly to kill one another, my relation would seeme incredible. But as great a peece of worke as this was, so long in building and still encreasing, and as much riches as they gathered togither for so many yeares with S. Edmunds shrine, and the monuments of Alan Rufus Earle of Britaine and Richmond, Sir Thomas of Brotherton sonne to King Edward the first Earle of Norfolke, and Marshall of England, Thomas of Beauford, Duke of Excester, W. Earle of Stafford, Marie

B Queene Dowager of France daughter to King Henrie the Seaventh, and many other worthie personages there entombed; were by King Henrie the Eighth vtterly overthrowne. What time as at one clap hee suppressed all Monasteries; perswaded thereto by such as under a goodlie pretense of reforming religion preferred their private respects and their owne enriching before the honour of Prince and countrie, yea and before the Glorie of God himselfe. And yet there remaineth still lying along the carcasse, as one would say, of that auncient monument, altogether deformed, but (for ruines I assure you) they make a faire and goodlie shew, which who soever beholdeth, hee may both wonder there at, and withall take pity thereof. England also, that I may note this also by the way if ever else it had

C losse by the death of any man, susteined here one of the greatest. For, that father in deed of his Country Humfrey Duke of Gloucester a due observer of justice, and who had furnished his noble witte with the better and deeper kinde of studies, after hee had under King Henrie the Sixth governed the kingdome fiue and twentie yeares with great commendation, so that neither good men had cause to complaine of, nor evill to finde fault with, was here in Saint Saviours hospitall brought to his end by the spitefull envie of Margaret of Lorain. Who seeing her husband King Henrie the Sixth, to be a man of a silly simple minde and faint harted, to the end she might draw into her owne hands the managing of the State, divised and plotted this wicked deed: but to her owne losse, and this Realme, in the highest degree. For Normandie and

D Aquitane were thereby shortely after lost, and warres more then civil enkindled in England.

Nere unto this Saint Edmunds Bury, is Rushbroke to bee seene, the habitation of the worshipfull familie of the Iermins, knights: and not farre from thence Ikesworth, where there stood an auncient Priorie founded by Gilbert Blund, a man of great nobility and Lord of Ikesworth, whose issue male by the right line, ended in William, that in King Henrie the Third his daies was slaine in the battaile at Lewis, and left two sisters his heires, Agnes wife to William de Creketot, and Reise wedded to Robert de Valenijs. Afterward, both here, at Haulsted neere by Rougham, and else-where, the E familie of Drury, (which signifieth in old English, A Pretious iewell) hath beene of great respect and good note, especially since they married with the heires of Fresil, and Sexham.

More Northward is Saint Genevefs Fernham, in this regard memorable, for that Richard Lucy Lord cheife Iustice of England tooke prisoner there in a pight field Robert Earle of Leicester, making foule worke and havock here; and withall put to the sword aboue ten thousand Flemings, whom he had levied & sent forth to the depopulation of his Country. Hard by, I had the sight of two verie faire houses

F the one built by the Kitsons Knights, at Hengraue, the possession in times past of Edmund de Hengraue, a most renowned Baron under king Edward the First: the other at Gulsurth, erected by Sir Nicholas Bacon Knight, sonne unto that Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord keeper of the great seale of England: who for his singular wisdome and most sound iudgement, was rightworthily esteemed one of the two supporters of this kingdome in his time. And not farre off standeth Lidgate a small village, yet in this respect not to bee passed over in silence, because it brought into the world Iohn Lidgate the monke, whose wittes may seeme to haue beene framed and shapen by the very Muses themselues: so brightly re-shine in his English verses, all the plea-

*Or Seneschal.

Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, he was buried at St Albans

Ikesworth. Blund.

Drury.

1173.

Hengraue. Culsurth. Sir Nicholas Bacon.

Lidgate. Iohn Lidgate

Digitized by Google

sant graces and elegancies of speech, according to that age. Thus much for the more memorable places on the west side of Suffolke. A

On the South side wee saw the river Stour, which immediatly from the verie spring head spreadeth a great Mere, called Stourmeer: but soone after drawing it selfe within the bankes runneth first by Clare a noble village: which had a castle but now decaied, and gaue name to the right noble familie of the Clares, descended from Earle Gislebert the Norman: and the title of Dukedome unto Leonel King Edward the Thirds sonne, who after hee had married a wife out of that house was entituled by his father, Duke of Clarence. For hee of this place with a fuller sound, than that of Clare, was stiled Duke of Clarence, (like as before him the sons of Earle Gislebert & their successours, were hence surnamed De Clare) and called Earles of Clare. Who died at * Languvill in Italie, after hee had by a second marriage, matched with a daughter of Galeacius Vicount of Millain: and in the Collegiat Church here lieth enterred: as also Ioan Acres daughter to K. Edward the first, married to Gislebert de Clare Earle of Gloceſter. Here peradventure the Readers may looke, that I should set down the Earles of Clare so denominated of this place, and the Dukes of Clarence, considering they haue beene alwaies in this realme of right honourable reputation: and verilie so will I doe in few words, for their satisfaction in this behalfe. Richard the sonne of Gislebert Earle of * Augy in Normandie served in the warres under King William when hee entred England, and by him was endowed with the townes of Clare and Tunbridge. This Gislebert begat foure sonnes, namely Gislebert, Roger, Walter, and Robert; from whom the Fitz-walters are descended. Gislebert by the daughter of the Earle of Clercmont had issue Richard, who succeeded him; Gislebert, of whom came that noble Richard Earle of Pembroch and Conquerour of Ireland; and Walter. Richard the First begotten sonne was slaine by the Welshmen and left behind him two sonnes Gilbert and Roger. Gilbert in King Stephens daies was Earle of Herford: howbeit both hee and his successours are more often and commonly called Earles of Clare, of this their principall seat and habitation, yea and so many times they wrote themselues. After him dying without issue, succeeded his brother Roger, whose sonne Richard tooke to wife Amice the daughter and one of the heires to William Earle of Gloceſter, in right of whom his posterity were Earles of Gloceſter. And those you may see in their due place. But when at length their issue male failed, Leonel Third sonne of King Edward the Third, (who had married Elizabeth the daughter and sole heire of William de Burgh Earle of Vlſter, begotten of the bodie of Elizabeth Clare) was by his father honored with this new title, Duke of Clarence.

But when as hee had but one onely daughter named Phillippa wife to Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, King Henry the Fourth created Thomas his owne younger sonne Duke of Clarence, who beeing withall Earle of Albemarle, High Steward of England and gouernor of Normandie, and hauing no lawfull issue was slaine in Anjou by the violent assault of Scots and French. A long time after, king Edward the Fourth bestowed this honour upon his owne brother George, whom after grievous enmity and bitter hatred, he had received againe into favour and yet at the last made an end of him in prison, causing him, as the report currently goeth, to be drowned in a Butte of malmesey. A thing naturally engraffed in men, that whom they haue feared, and with whom they haue contended in matter of life; those they hate for ever, though they bee their naturall brethren.

From Clare, by Long-Melford, a verie faire Almes-house lately built by that good man Sir William Cordal Knight, and Maister of the Rolls, Stour passeth on, and commeth to Sudbury, that is to say, the South-Burgh, and runneth in maner round about it, which men suppose to haue beene in old time the chiefe towne of this shire, and to haue taken this name in regard of Norwich, that is, The Northren Towne. Neither would it take it well at this daie to bee counted much inferiour to the townes adioyning: for, it is populous and wealthy, by reason of clothing there, and hath for the chiefe Magistrate, a Major, who everie yeare is chosen out of seaven Aldermen. Not farre, Stoke Clare.

Earles of Clare.

* Ad Albam Pompiam.

* Auensis. or Ewe.

Guiliel. Gemiticensis. Lib. 7. c. 37.

Rob. Montensis.

Dukes of Clarence.

1421.

Sudbury.

Digitized by Google

A farre from hence distant, is Edwardeston, a towne of no great name at this daie, but yet in times past it had Lords therein dwelling of passing great honour, of the surname of Mont-chensie*: out of which family Sir Guarin Montchensie married the daughter and one of the heires of that mighty William Mareschall, Earle of Pembroch, and of her begat a daughter named Ioan, who unto the stile of her husband William de Valentia of the family of Lusignie in France, brought and adioyned the title of Earle of Penbroch. But the said Sir Guarin Mont-chansy, as he was a right honorable person, so he was a man exceeding wealthy, in so much as in those daies they accounted him the most potent Baron, and the rich Crassus of England. For his last will and testament amounted unto two hundred thousand Markes, no small wealth as the standard was then. From a younger brother or cadet of this house of Montchensie, issued by an heire B general the family of the Waldgraues, who have long flourished in Knightly degree at Smalebridg neerer to Stoure, as another family of great account in elder ages at Buers, which was thereof surnamed.

Edwardeston.
* Barones.
Monte-chensie.
Minor Histor. Matth. Paris.
Waldgrave.
Buers.

A few miles from hence Stour is enlarged with Bretan a small brooke, at one of whose heads is seene Bretenham, a very slender little towne, where scarse remaineth any shew at all of any great building: and yet both the neere resemblance & the signification of the name partly induced me to thinke it to be that COMBRETONIVM whereof Antonine the Emperour made mention in this tract. For like as Bretenham in C English signifieth an habitation, or Mansion place by Breton, so Combretonium in British, or Welsh betokeneth a Valley, or a place lying somewhat low by Breton. But this in Peutegerius his table is falsly named COMVETRONVM, and ADCOVECIN. Somewhat Eastward from hence is Nettlested seene, of whence was Sir Thomas Wentworth, whom King Henry the Eighth adorned with the title of Baron Wentworth, and neere thereto is Offton, that is to say, The towne of Offa King of the Mercians, where upon a clay hill lie the ruines of an ancient Castle, which they say Offa built after he had wickedly murdered Aethelbert King of the East-Angles, and usurped his Kingdome.

Cumbretonium.
Bretenham.
Barõs Wentworth.

But to returne to the River Breton. Upon another brooke that joyneth therwith D standeth Lancham, a pretty Mercat, and neere it the Manour of Burnt-Elleie, whereunto King Henry the Third granted a Mercat at the request of Sir Henry Shelton Lord thereof, whose posterity a long time heere flourished. Hadley, in the Saxons language headleye, is watered with the same brook: a town of good note in these daies for making of clothes: and in old time much mentioned by our Historians, because Guthrum or Garmo the Dane was heere buried. For, when Aelfred brought him to this passe, that he became Christian and was baptized, he assigned unto him these countries of the East-Angles; that he might (to use the words of mine authour) cherish them by right of inheritance under the allegiance of a King which he had overrun by robbing and ransacking.

Lancham.
Hadley.
Guthrum or Garmo the Dane.

From hence Breton speedeth it selfe by Higham, whence the family of Higham is so named, to Stour, which joyntly in one streame run not far from Bentley, where the E Talmachs of a celebrat ancient house flourished for a long time, and after a few miles neere unto Arwerton the house long since of the family of the Bacons, who held this Manour, and Brome, by conducting all the fontemen of Suffolke and Norfolke from S. Edmunds dike in the warres of Wales. Now it belongeth to the Parkers hereditarily, who by the fathers side derive their descent from the Barõs Morley, & by the mothers from the Calthrops, a family sometime of great account in these parts. Beneath this Stour falleth into the Ocean; and at the very mouth thereof, the river Orwell or Gipping discharged it selfe together with it.

Bentley.
Arwerton.

This river springeth up in the very navell or centre, as one would say, of this shire, out of two fountaines, the one neere to Wulpit, the other by Gipping a small village. Wulpet is a Mercat towne, and foundeth as much as, The Woolues pit, if we F may beleeue Nubrigensis who hath told as prety and formall a tale of this place, as is that fable called the TRVE NARRATION of Lucian: namely, how two little boies (forsooth) of a greene colour, and of Satyrs kinde, after they had made Wulpet.

Vera narratio.

Digitized by Google

along journey by passages under the ground, from out of another world from the Antipodes and Saint Martins land, came up heere: of whom if you would know more, repaire to the authour himselfe, where you shall finde such matter as will make you laugh your fill, if you have a laughing spleene. I wot not whether I were best to relate heere, into what a vaine hope of finding gold at Norton hard by, a certaine credulous desire of having, enticed and allured King Henry the Eight; but the digging and undermining there sufficiently shew it, although I say nothing. But betweene Gipping and Wulpet upon an high hill remaine the tokens of Hawghlee an ancient Castle, taking up much about two acres of ground. Some affirme this to have beene called Hagoneth Castle, which belonged to Ralph le Broe, and that in the yeere 1173. it was by Robert Earle of Leicester won and overthrowen in the intestine war betweene King Henry the second, and his vnkindly disloiall sonne.

Norton. Hagoneth. A B

Upon the same river are seene two little Mercat townes, Stow and Needham, and not far from the banke, Hemingston: in which Baldwin Le Pettour (marke his name well) held certaine lands, by Serjeanty, (the words I have out of an old booke) for which on Christmas day, every yeere before our soveraigne Lord the King of England he should performe one Saltus, one Suffletus, and one Bumbulus, or, as we read elsewhere, his tenour was, per saltum, sufflum, & pettum, that is, if I understand these tearmes aright. That he should daunce, puffe up his cheekes making therewith a sound, and besides let a cracke downeward. Such was the plaine and jolly mirth of those times. And observed it is, that unto this Fee, the Manour of Langhall belonged.

Farter. Aprety conceited tenure. C

Neere unto the mouth of this river we saw Ipswich, in times past Gippwich, a faire towne resembling a City, situate in a ground somewhat low: which is the eie (as it were) of this shire, as having an haven commodious enough; fenced in times past with a trench and rampire, of good trade and stored with wares, well peopled, and full of inhabitants, adourned with foureteene Churches, and with goodly, large and stately ædifices. I say nothing of foure religious houses now overturned, and that sumptuous and magnificent Colledge which Cardinall Wolsey a Butchers sonne of this place, heere began to build, whose vast minde reached alwaies at things too high. The body politicke, or corporation of this towne consisteth, as I was enformed, of twelue Burgesses (Portmen they terme them) out of whom are chosen yeerely for the head magistrates two Baillives, and as many Iustices out of foure and twenty others. As touching the Antiquity thereof so farre as ever I could observe, the name of it was not heard of before the Danish invasion, whereof it smarted: For in the yeere of salvation 991. the Danes sacked and spoiled it, and all the sea coast with so great cruelty that Siritius Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Nobles of England thought it the safest and best course they could take, to redeeme and buy their peace of them for the summe of ten thousand pounds. Nevertheless, within nine yeeres, they made spoile of this towne againe, and presently thereupon the Englishmen valiantly encountred them in the field, but through the cowardly running away of one man alone, named Turkill, as writeth Henry of Huntingdon (for in matter of war things of small weight otherwise, are of right great moment, and sway very much) our men were put to flight, and let the victory slip out of their hands. In the reigne of S. Edward, as we find in the Surrey booke of England, out of this towne Queene Edena had two parts, and Earle Guert a third part: & Burgesses there were eight hundred, paying custome to the King. But after the Normans had possessed themselves of England, they erected a pile or Castle heere, which Hugh Bigod defended for a good while against Stephen the vsurping King of England, but surrendred it in the end: This fort is now quit gone, so as there remaine not so much as the ruines thereof. Some say it was in the parish of Westfield hard by, where is to be seene the rubbish of a Castle, and where old Gipwic, as men say, stood in times past. I thinke verily it was then demolished, when K. Henry the second laied Walton Castle neere unto it even with the ground. For it was a place of refuge for Rebels, and heere landed those three thousand Flemings whom the Nobles of England had called in against him, what time as he unadvisedly

Ipswich. D

Domesday booke. E

Walton. F

A adviſedly he had made Prince Henry his ſonne King, and of æquall power with himſelfe: and the yong man knowing no meane, would be in the higheſt place or none, ſet upon a furious deſire of the kingdome, moſt unnaturally waged war againſt his owne father. Albeit theſe Caſtles are now cleane decaied and gone, yet this ſhore is defended ſufficiently with an huge banke, they call it Langerſton, that for two miles or thereabout in length lieth foorth into the maine ſea, as he ſath, not without great danger and terrour of ſuch as ſaile that way: howbeit the ſame ſerveth very well for fiſhermen to dry their fiſhes, and after a ſort is a defenſe unto that ſpatious and wide Haven of Orwell. And thus much for the South part of this ſhire. Langerſton.

B From hence the curving ſhore (for all this Eaſt part lieth full againſt the ſea) ſhooting foorth Northward ſtraight-way openeth it ſelfe to the * Deben, a riveret having his ſpring head neere unto Mendleſham; unto which towne, the Lord of the place H. Fitz-Otho, Maſter of the Mint, purchaſed the liberty of Mercat and Faire: by whoſe heires there fell no ſmall poſſeſſions unto the Boutetorts Lords of Wily in Worceſterſhire, and from them againe in the reigne of Richard the Second, unto Frevil, Barkley of Stoke, Burnel, and others. Others call it Thredling. Boutetort.

This river Deben firſt floweth hard unto the little Mercat towne Debenham, and giveth it the name, which others would have to be called more truly Depenham, for that the waies every where about it, by reaſon of a clay ground and the ſame over moiſt, are very deepe and comberous. From thence it runneth by Vfford the ſeat in C times paſt of Robert de Vfford Earle of Suffolk, and by a towne over againſt it on the other ſide of the river named Rendeliſham, that is, as Beda interpreteth it, Rendils Manſion place, where Redwald King of the Eaſt Saxons kept vſually his court, who was the firſt of all his nation that was baptiſed, and received Chriſtianity; but afterwards, ſeduced by his wife, he had in the ſelfe ſame Church, as ſaith Beda, one Altar for Chriſts religion, and another for ſacrifices unto Devils. In this place alſo Swidelm a King of theſe Eaſt-Angles was likewiſe after wards baptiſed by Biſhop * Chadda. Rendeliſham. * Cedde.

From hence the river Deben paſſeth downe to Woodbridge, a little towne beawtified with faire houſes; where at certaine ſet tmes are holden aſſemblies for Saint D Audrees Liberty: and after it hath gone ſome few miles, is received into the Ocean at Bawdſey haven.

By this time now the ſhore creepeth by little and little Eaſtward to the mouth of the river * Ore, which runneth neere to Framlingham Caſtle belonging ſometime to the Bigods by the bounty of King Henry the Firſt: and forthwith on the Weſt ſide thereof ſpreadeth (as it were) into a lake. A very faire and beautifull Caſtle this is, fortified with a banke, ditch, and walles of great thickneſſe, wherein are thirteene towers; and inwardly furniſhed with buildings right commodious and neceſſary. * Some name it Winchell. Framlingham.

From hence it was that in the yere of our redemptiõ 1173. what time as K. Henry the E Second his rebellious ſonne tooke armes againſt his father, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, with his mercenary Flemings infeſted this Country farre and neere: from this Caſtle alſo in the yeere 1553. Queene Mary entred upon her Kingdome for all the ambitious fretting and fuming of Iohn Dudley Duke of Northumberland againſt King Henry the Eigl:th his daughters.

Then commeth the River to Parrham a little towne, the Lord whereof William Willoughby King Edward the Sixth honoured with the eſtate of a Baron: and afterwards running by Glemham, which gave name to an ancient family deſcended from the Bacons and Brandons; at Oreford, that tooke the name of it, diſburdeneth himſelfe into the ſea. A bigge towne this was and of great reſort, fenſed alſo with a caſtell F of a reddiſh ſtone, and appertained in times paſt to the Valoineis, and afterwards to the Willoughbeies, but complaineth at this daie of the Seas vnkindneſſe which ſhrinketh backe from it by little and little, and beginneth to envy the commodity of an Haven unto the towne. Neither have I any thing elſe to ſay of Oreford unleſſe it pleaſe you to runne over theſe few words of Ralph Cogeſhall an old writer. Parrham. Barons Willoughbey of Parrham. Oreford.

Digitized by Google

In King Henries the Seconds daies, saith hee, when Bartholmew Glanvile kept the Castle A of Oreford, it happened that the Fishermen caught a wilde man within their nets, who in all parts and members of his body resembled a man, had haire on his head, a huge beard with a Piloe devant, about the breast exceeding hairy and rough: who notwithstanding slipt awaie secretly to the sea and was never seene after: So that it may be verie true, which is so rife with the common people, That there is nothing bred in any part of Nature, but the same also is in the sea: and that it is not altogether a faigned fable, that Plinie hath reported of a Triton taken on the shore of Portugall, and of the seaman caught in the streights of Gibraltare.

Tritons and Monsters of the sea.

Not much higher, lieth Aldborough for situation right safe and very plea- B sant within Slaughden vale, where from the East the sea and from the West the river beateth. This name Aldburgh, is by interpretation the Old Burgh, or as others would haue it, The Burgh upon the river Ald. Now it is an harbour verie commodious for sailers and fishermen, and thereby well frequented, and acknowledgeth the Ocean sea to bee favourable unto it, how spitefull soever and malicious it is to other townes in this coast. Neere unto it, what time as in the yeare 1555. by reason of vnseasonable weather the corne throughout all England was choked and blasted in the eare, there grew pease miraculously among the rocks, without any earth at all about them about the end of September, and brought downe the price of corne.
Yet the wiser sort of men doe say that pulse beeing cast upon the shore by ship- C wracke is wont otherwhiles to come uppe againe there, so that the thing is not to be thought miraculous: But, that the like usually everie yeare grow of their owne accord among the stones on the shore of Kent, I haue shewed alreadie.

Aldburgh.

Pease growing out of the Rocks.

From hence coasting along the shore, at ten miles end, wee met with Dunwich, in the English Saxon tongue Dunmoc, whereof Beda maketh mention: where Felix the Burgumdium that reduced the Eastangles againe into the faith, when they were backesliding from Christ, in the yeare of Grace 630. placed an Episcopall See whose successours for many yeares together were Bishops over all East England.
But Bise the Fourth Bishop after Felix, when hee became verie aged and sicklie withall, beeing not able to discharge so great a iurisdiction, divided it into two D Sees: the one continued still in this Dunwich, the other hee placed in North Elmham, a little town. In the reigne of William the Conquerour, Dunwich had in it two hundred and sixe and thirtie burgesses: an hundered poore people: it was valued at fiftie pounds, and three score thousand herings, of gift. For, so wee reade in Domes- daie booke. In the foregoing age, it was well peopled and frequented with inhabitants: famous also for a Mint therein: and in the reigne of Henrie the Second, as William of Newborough writeth, It was a towne of good note, and full stored with sun- drie kindes of riches. At which time when England was all on a light fire with new stirres and broiles, it was so fortified, that it made Robert Earle of Leicester affraied, who with his army over-ranne all the parts there-about at his pleasure. But E now by a certaine peculiar spite and envie of Nature, that suffereth the greedy sea to haue what it will and encroch still without all end, the greatest part thereof is violently carried away with the waues, and by reason that the Bishops many yeares agoe translated their seat to another place, it lieth (as it were) desolate. A little aboue it, the river Blith voideth it selfe into the sea, on whose banke Southward wee saw Blithborow a small towne, which for no other thing is memorable, but because Anna a Christian king was there buried, whom Penda the Mercian slew in a pitched field. It was beautified by King Henrie the First with a Colledge of Chanons, who granted the same as a Cell to the Chanons of Saint Osiths. And it was made a mercate by the meanes of Iohn Lord of Clavering, unto whom King Edward F the Second gaue this libertie together with the Faire. And verily a goodly inheritance hee had in this tract, as who derived his descent from the daughter and heire of William * Cheney, who held the Baronie of Horsford in the countie of Norfolke, and erected the little Abbay at Sibton.

Allectum or Halecum.

Blithborrow.

* De Casineto.

Here

Digitized by Google

A Heere the Promontorie Eaſton-Neſſe ſhooteth out, and reacheth farre into the East, which is deemed to bee the fartheſt East point in all Britaine; Ptolomee calleth it Εξοχὴ, or EXTENSIO. And that you may not doubt, that this is the verie ſame which wee call Eaſton, bee it knowne unto you, that Eyſteney in the Britiſh tongue is the ſame that in Greeke Εξοχὴ, and in Latine Extenſio, that is, A ſtretching forth: although this name may ſeeme with as good probability to haue beene impoſed in our Engliſh language, of the ſituation Eaſtward. Vpon the point of this promontorie ſtandeth Eaſton a village of fiſhermen well neere eaten up by ſea, and on South ſide of this Promontorie, Southwold lieth in the plaine, full againſt the open ſhore of the ſea: A towne well enough frequented through the benefit of an haven B that the river Blith emptying it ſelfe there into the ſea maketh; and at every high water it is ſo environed with the waues, that it ſeemeth to bee an Iſland, and a man would wonder that it is not overflowne. In ſo much as when I ſaw the manner thereof I called that ſaying of Cicero into my remembrance: What ſhould I ſpeake of the ſea tides about Spaine and Britain and of their flowing and ebbing at certaine times? Surely, they cannot bee without the hand of God, who hath reſtrained and gaged the waues within their bounds. More within the land Wingfield ſheweth it ſelfe, where the walles of a Caſtle halfe downe are to be ſeene: which hath given name to a familie in this tract that is ſpred into a number of branches, and is beſides for knighthood and auncient gentilitie renowned, and thereof it was the principall ſeat: C Alſo Dunnington, which ſtandeth much upon the Lord thereof Sir Iohn Philips, father to that Sir William who married the daughter and heire of Baron Bardolph, whoſe daughter and heire likewiſe Iohn Vicount Beaumont tooke to wife: But now the habitation it is of the auncient familie of the Rouſſes. Not farre from hence ſtandeth Huntingfield, which had a Baron of that name in King Edward the Third his time, and neere unto it Heueningham, the reſidence of the familie off Heveningham, Knights: who are knowne to bee of verie great antiquity: and not farre of ſtandeth Haleſworth, in times paſt Healſworda, an ancient towne of the Argentons, and now of the Alingtons: unto which Sir Richard Argenton obteined at D the hand of King Henrie the Third the liberty of a mercate.

I gaue you to underſtand before, that two ſmall rivers, Ouſe the leaſt, and Waveney on the North ſide, divided this Countrie from Norfolke; which riverets riſing out of a mariſh ground by Lophamford, from two ſprings but a little a ſunder one from another, take their courſes diverſe waies with creekes full of ſhallow fourds. Along by Ouſe which runneth Weſtward, there is nothing in this quarter to bee ſeene worth the report. By Waveney ſide that tendeth Eaſtward, firſt is Hoxon in times paſt Hegilſdon ennobled by reaſon of King Edmunds Martyrdom. For E there the moſt cruell and bloodie Danes (that I may uſe the words of Abbo) having bound the moſt Chriſtian King to a tree, for that hee would not renounce Chriſtianitie, ſhot him in with ſharpe arrowes all his bodie over, augmenting the paines of his torment with continuall piercing him with arrow after arrow, and thus inflicted wound upon wound, ſo long as one arrow could ſtand by another: And as a Poet of middle time verſified of him.

Iam loca vulneribus deſunt, nec dum furioſis
Tela, ſed hyberna grandine plura volant.

Though now no place was left for wound, yet arrowes did not faile, Theſe furious wretches; ſtill they flie thicker than winter haile.

In which place afterwards ſtood a verie faire houſe of the Biſhops of Norwich, untill they exchaunged it not long ſince for the Abbay of Saint Benet. Hard by, at F Brome, dwelt a long time the familie of Cornwalleis, of knights degree: of whom Sir Iohn Cornwal was Steward of Edward the Sixth his houſe hould while he was Prince; and his ſonne Sir Thomas, for his wiſdome and faithfulneſſe became one of the privie counſell to Queene Marie, and Controller of her roiall houſe. Beneath it lieth Eay, that is, The Iſland; ſo called, becauſe it is watered on every ſide with brookes, where are to bee ſeene the rubbiſh, ruines, and decaied walles of an old Caſtle that Eaſton Neſſe.

Extenſio.
A promontory.
Lib. 2. de Natura Deorum.
Wingfield.
Philips.
Huntingfield.
Heuningham.
Haleſworth.
King Edmunds Martyrdom.
Hoxon.
Cornwalleis.
Eaye.

Digitized by Google

that belonged to Robert Malet a Norman Baron. But after that he under King Henry A Liber inquisitionum. the first was deprived of his dignity, because he sided with Robert Duke of Normandy
By intrusion reaping the commodities thereof. against the King, the said King bestowed this Honour upon Stephen Earle of Bullen, who, being afterwards the Vsufructuary King of England left it unto his sonne William Earle of Warren. But after he had surrendred his state to King Henry the second, and lost his life in the expedition of Tholose, the King held it in his owne hands a° 1159. untill that King Richard the first conferd it upon Henry the fifth of that name Duke of Brabant and of Lorain, together with King Stephens neice by his daughter, who had been a professed Nunne. Long time after, when it was now devolved againe upon the Kings of England, King Edward the Third gave it, as I have read, to Sir Robert B Vfford Earle of Suffolke.

Bedingfield. Neither must I passe over in silence Bedingfield neere adjoyning, which gave the name to a worshipfull and ancient family, that received very much reputation and credit from the heire of the family of Tudenham. From thence by Flixton, in stead
Flixton. of Felixton, so named of Felix the first Bishop of these parts, like as many other places
Bungey. in this shire, the river Waveney runneth downe to Bungey, and spreadeth it selfe in maner round about it; where Hugh Bigod fortified a Castle both by artificiall workmanship, and also by naturall situation, when as the seditious Barons tossed all England to and fro with stormes of rebellion. Concerning which Castle, as imprenable, he was wont to vaunt in these termes: C

> Were I in my Castle of Bungey > upon the River of Waveney,
> I would ne care for the King of Cockeney.

Yet notwithstanding afterwards he obtained at the hands of King Henry the Second (by giving him a great summe of mony and pledges withall of his loialty) that it Mettingham. might not be overthrowen & raised. Not far thence from the banke, you may see Mettingham; where, upon a plaine, Sir Iohn surnamed De Norwich Lord of the place built a fower square Castle and a Colledge within it, whose daughter, and in the end the D heire of the same family, Robert de Vfford aforesaid, Earle of Suffolke tooke to wife with a goodly inheritance.

Now Waveney drawing neerer unto the sea whiles he striveth in vaine to make him-
Luthingland. selfe a two-fould issue into the Ocean, the one together with the river Yare, and the other by the meere Luthing, maketh a prety big Demy Isle or Biland, which some name Lovingland, others more truely Luthingland, of Luthing the lake spreading in length and bredth; which beginning at the Ocean shore is discharged into the river
Lestoffe. Yare. At the entrance whereof standeth upon the sea, Lestoffe, a narrow and little towne: and at the issue of it Gorlston, where I saw the towre steeple of a small suppressed, Friery which standeth the sailers in good steed for a marke. Within the land, hard E
Somerley towne. by Yare is situate Somerley towne, the habitation in ancient time of Fitz-Osbert, from whom it is come lineally to the worshipfull ancient family of the Iernegans Knights of high esteeme in these parts: farther up into the land where Yare and Waveney meet in one streame, there flourished Cnobersburg, that is, as Bede intetpreteth it, Cnobers Cnoberi vibs. City, we call it at this day Burgh-Castle. Which, as Bede saith, was a most pleasant Castle, by reason of woods and sea together, wherein a Monastery was built by Fursey a holy Scot: by whose perswasion Sigebert King of the East-Angles became a Monke and resigned up his Kingdome: who afterwards being drawne against his will out of this Monastery, to encourage his people in battaile against the Mercians, toge- F ther with his company lost his life. In that place now there are onely ruinous wals in forme, as it were, foure square, built of flint stone and British Bricke, but all ouergrown with briers and bushes: among which otherwhiles are Romane peeces of coines gotten foorth: So that it may seeme to have been one of those fortifications that the Romans placed vpon the river Yare to represse the piracies of the Saxons: or rather that it was the ancient GARIANONVM it selfe, where the Stablesian Horsmen had their

Station

Digitized by Google

A Station, and kept ward at the declination of the Romane Empire in Britaine.

Suffolke hath had Earles and Dukes out of ſundry families. There be of the later writers, who report, that the Glanvils in times paſt were honoured with this title: But ſeeing they ground upon no certaine authority, wheras men may eaſily miſtake, and I haue found nothing of them in the publicke records of the Kingdome, they muſt pardon me if I beleeve them not, untill they produce more certainty. Yet in the meane while I confeſſe, that the family of the Glanvils in this tract was of right good note and high reputation. Neither haue I hitherto learned by witneſſes of credite, that any one was entituled Earle of this province ſeverally before the daies of King B Edward the Third, who created Sir Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke a man much renowned both in peace and warre, the ſonne of Sir Robert Vfford Steward of the Kings houſe under King Edward the Second, by Cecilie de Valonijs Ladie of Orford. After him ſucceeded his ſonne William, who having foure ſonnes that were taken away by untimely death during his life, died himſelfe ſuddenly in the Parliament houſe as he was about to report the minde of the Commonalty. And then Sir Robert Willoughby, Roger Lord Scales, and Henrie Ferrars of Groby the next of his bloud and his heires, divided the inheritance betweene them. Afterward King Richard the Second promoted Michael De-la-Pole to this title, & made him L. Chancellor of C England. Who, as Thomas Walſingham writeth, imploied himſelfe more in trafficke and merchandiſe, (as having beene a merchant and a merchants ſonne) than in martiall matters. For he was the ſonne of William De la-pole, that firſt Maior of Kingſton vpon Hull, and for his wealthy eſtate, adorned by King Edward the Third with the dignity of a Baneret. But when as in the proſperous confluence of ſo many aduancements, the mans nature was not capable of ſo great fortunes, he was enforced by his aduerſaries enuie to depart out of his country, and ſo died a baniſhed man. His ſonne Michael being reſtored, died at the ſiege of Harflew, and againe within one moneth his ſonne Michael was ſlaine in the battaile of Agincourt leauing daughters only. Then William his brother ſucceeded, whom King Henrie the Sixt ſo fauoured that he made him alſo Earle of Penbroke, and then Marqueſſe of Suffolke, to him and the heires D maſles of his body. And that both hee and the heires of his body ſhould carry the golden rod having a doue in the top thereof, on the coronation day of the King of England: and the like rod or verge Yuory at the coronation of the Queenes of England: And afterwards he aduanced the ſame William for his great ſeruice and deſerts to the honor and title of Duke of Suffolke. Certes hee was an excellent man in thoſe daies, famous, and of great worth. For whereas his father and three brethren had in the French warres loſt their liues for their countrie; he, as we find in the Parliament Rols of the 28. of K Henrie the Sixth, in the ſame war ſerved full 34. yeeres: For ſeventeene yeeres together he never returned home from warfare; being once taken priſoner when hee was as yet no better than a priuate Knight, he paid downe for his ranſome twenty thou- E ſand pounds of our Engliſh money: he was of the Kings privie Counſell 15. yeeres; and a Knight of the Order of the Garter 30. Hereupon, as hee ſtood in eſpeciall grace and favour with his Prince, ſo hee incurred therefore the greater envy of the common people, and ſome emulatours: being grieuouſly charged with treaſon and miſpriſions. And therefore called before the King and Lords of the Parliament, after he had anſwered the Articles obiected, referred himſelfe to the Kings order. Whereupon the Chancellour by the Kings commandment pronounced, that wheras the Duke did not put himſelfe vpon his Peeres, the King touching the Articles of treaſon, would be doubtfull, and as for the Articles of miſpriſion, not as a Iudge by ad- F uice of the Lords, but as one to whoſe order the Duke had ſubmitted himſelfe, did baniſh him the realme and all other his dominions for fiue yeeres. But when he was embarked for France, he was by his adverſaries intercepted upon the ſea & beheaded. He left a ſonne named Iohn De-la-Pole, who wedded King Edward the fourth his ſiſter, and of her begat Iohn Earle of Lincolne by King Richard the Third proclaimed heire apparant of the Crowne: whoſe ambitious minde puffed vp and giddy therewith could Dukes and Earles of Suffolke.

Inquiſit. 5. Rich. 2.

Leland, in his Commentary upon his Cygnea Canetio.

Walſingham pag. 358.

Regiſt Monall de Melſa. See Hull in Yorkſhire.

Digitized by Google

could not contain it self, but soone after brak out against K. Henrie the Seuenth, to his own destruction (for in the battel at Stoke he was quickly slain) to his fathers death also, (who for very griefe of heart ended his daies) & to the utter ruine of the whole family, which together with them was in a sort extinguished & brought to nothing. For, his brother Edmund being Earle of Suffolke fled into Flanders: began there to conspire and stirre vp rebellion against King Henrie the Seuenth, who, albeit hee feared him, would seeme to fauour him, and as a Prince better contented with repentance than punishment, freely pardoned him for sundry offences, that he might winne him. But after he was thus fled, his estate was forfeited, and the King neuer thought himselfe secure from his practises, vntill he had so farre prevailed with Philip Duke of Burgundie, that he was delivered into his hands (against the law of hospitality toward strangers, as some then gaue out) vpon solemne promise in the word of a Prince that his life should be spared. Nevertheless he was kept close prisoner, and after executed by King Henrie the Eighth (who thought himselfe not tied to his fathers promise) what time as he first minded to make warre upon France, for feare least in his absence some troubles might be raised at home in his behalfe, yet his younger brother S. Richard de la Pole a banished man in France, usurped the title of Duke of Suffolke: who being the last male (to my knowledge) of this house, was slaine in the battaile of Pavie (wherin Francis the first, King of France was taken prisoner in the yeere of our Lord 1524.) fighting manfully among the thickest of his enemies. For whom, in consideration of his singular valour, and high parentage the Duke of Burbon himselfe, although hee was his enemie, made a sumptuous funerall, and honoured the same with his presence in mourning blacke. In the meane time, King Henrie the Eighth adorned Sir Charles Brandon, vnto whom hee had given in marriage his owne sister Marie widdow, and Dowager to Lewis the twelft King of France, with the title of Duke of Suffolke, and granted to him all the Honours, and Manours which Edmund Earle of Suffolke had forfeited. After whom succeeded Henrie his sonne a child, and after him his brother Charles: who both died of the English swet vpon one day in the yeere 1551. Then King Edward the Sixth honoured with that title Henrie Grey Marquesse Dorset, who had married Francis their sister: but hee enjoying the same but a small time lost his head in Queene Maries daies for complotting to make his daughter Queene, and was the last Duke of Suffolke. From that time lay this title of Suffolke void, untill that very lately King Iames aduanced to that honor Thomas Lord Howard of Walden, the second sonne of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, whom for his approued fidelity and vertue he also made his Lord Chamberlaine, in his first entrie into the kingdome.

A

B

C

D

But not on the wife.

E

The Parishes in this County amount to the number of 575.

F

NORTH-

Digitized by Google

NORTH-FOLKE.

NORTH-FOLKE, commonly Norfolke, which is by interpretation, people of the North, lieth Northward of Suffolke, from which it is divided by those two little rivers which I spake of, Ouse the least, and Waueney, running divers waies: on the East & North side the German Ocean which is plētifull of fish beateth upon the shores with a mighty noise: On the West, the greater Ouse, a river disporting himselfe with his manifold branches and divisions secludeth it from Cambridgeshire. It is a region large and spatious, and in maner all throughout a plaine champion, unlesse it be where there rise gently some prety hils; passing rich, exceeding full of sheepe, and stored with conies: replenished likewise with a great number of populous villages: for, beside xvij mercate townes, it is able to shew villages and country townes 625: Watered with divers rivers and brookes, and not altogether destitute of woods. The soile, according to the variety of places, is of a divers nature: Some where, fat, ranke and full of moisture, as in Mersh-land and Flegg: otherwhere, but Westward especially, leane, light, and sandy: elsewhere, standing upon clay and chalke. But the goodnesse of the ground a man may collect by this (whence Varro willeth vs to gather it) that the inhabitants are of a passing good complexion: to say nothing of their exceeding wily wits, and the same right quicke in the insight of our common lawes: in so much, as it is counted, as well now, as in times past, the onely country for best breed of Lawyers: so that even out of the meanest sort of the common people, there may be found not a few, who, if their were nothing else to beare action, are able to fetch matter enough of wrangling controversies, even out of the very prickes, titles, and accents of the Law. But least, whiles I desire brevity, I become long by these digressions which may distaste; I will turne my penne from the people to the places; and beginning at the South side, runne over briefly those which are more memorable, and of greater antiquitie.

Vpon the least Ouse, where Thet a small brooke breaking out of Suffolke, meeteth and runneth with him, in a low ground, was seated that ancient Citie SITOMAGVS; which Antonine the Emperour maketh mention of, corruptly in the Fragments of an old Choragraphicall table called SIMOMAGVS, and SINOMAGVS now Thetford, in the Saxon language Ðeotford, in which remaineth part of the former name with the addition of the English word Ford. For, like as Sitomagus in the British tongue implieth a Citie by the river Sit, which now is Thet (for Magus as Plinie sheweth, signified a Citie). so Thetford in English betokeneth the Ford of Thet; neither are these two names Sit and Thet much unlike in sound. There are in it at this day but few inhabitants, although it be of a good bignesse; but in times past it was very populous; and beside other tokens of antiquity it hath still to be seene a great mount raised to a good height by mens hands; fenced with a double rampier, and as the report goeth, fortified in ancient time with walles; Which was a Romane worke as some thinke, or rather of the English Saxons Kings, as others would haue it, under whom it flourished a long time. But after it was sacked, first by Sienus the Dane, who in rage set it on fire in the yeere 1004; an six yeeres after being spoiled againe by the furious Danes, it lost all the beauty and dignity that it had. For the recovery whereof, Bishop Arfast remoued his Episcopall See from Elmham hither, and Bishop William his successour did all he could to adorne and set it out: so that, under King Edward the Confessour, there were counted in it 947 Burgesses, and in William the Conquerours time 720 Mansions: whereof 224 stood void, and the chiefe Magistrate was ruled a Consul, which name may intimate that it was a Romane towne. But when Bishop Sitomagus. Thetford. Magus.

Digitized by Google

Biſhop Herbert (ſurnamed Loſenga, for that he was compoſed of Leaſing and Flatery) A the third prelate that by evill meanes & Symonie climbed up to this dignity, had removed his ſeat from hence to Norwich, it fell againe to decay, and as it were languiſhed. Neither could it ſufficiently be comforted for the abſence of the Biſhop, by the Abbay of Cluniac Monkes, which by his meanes was built. This Abbay, Hugh Bigod built out of the ground: For ſo writeth he in the Inſtrument of the foundation. I Hugh Bigod Steward to King Henry, by his graunt and by the adviſe of Herbert Biſhop of Norwich, have ordained Monkes of the Order of Cluny, in the Church of S. Mary which was the Epiſcopall ſeat of Thetford, which I gave unto them, and afterwards founded another more meet for their uſe, without the towne. Howbeit even then, the greateſt part B of the City that ſtood on the hithermore banke by little and little fell to the ground: the other part although it was much decaied, yet one or two ages agoe flouriſhed with ſeven Churches, beſides three ſmall religious houſes, whereof the one was, by report erected in memoriall of the Engliſhmen and Danes ſlaine heere. For hard by as our Hiſtorians doe record, Edmund that moſt holy king a little before his death fought ſeaven houres and more with the Danes not without an horrible ſlaughter, and afterwards gave over the battaile on even hand; ſuch was the alternative fortune of the field that it drave both ſides paſt their ſenſes.

By Wavency the other river of thoſe twaine, that bound this ſhire and runneth Eaſtward, not farre from the ſpring head thereof, are ſeene Buckenham and Keninghall. C
This which may ſeeme to haue the name left unto it of the Iceni, is the ſeat of that moſt honorable family of the Howards, whoſe glory is ſo great, that the envie of Buchanan cannot empaire it. As for the other, ſo named, as I take it of Beech trees which the Saxons called Bucken; it is a faire and ſtrong Caſtle, built by William de Aubigny the Norman, (unto whom the Conquetour had given the place) & by his heires that were ſucceſſiuely Earles of Arundell, it deſcended to the Tatſalls, and from them by
The family of the Knevets. Caly and the Cliftons unto the family of the Knevets. Theſe are of an ancient houſe and renowned ever ſince Sir John Knevet was Lord Chancellour of England under King Edward the Third, and alſo honourably allied by great marriages. For over and beſide theſe of Buckenham, from hence ſprang thoſe right worſhipfull Knights, Sir Thomas Knevet Lord Knevet, Sir Henrie Knevet of Wiltſhire, and Sir Thomas Knevet of Aſhellwell Thorp & others. This Aſh. llwell Thorp is a little towne nere adjoining, which from the Thorpes in times paſt of Knights degree, by the Tilneis and the L. L. Bourchiers of Berners, is devolved at length hæreditarily unto that Sir Thomas Knevet be-Barons Bourchiers of Berners. forenamed. As for that Buckenham, aforeſaid, it is holden by this tenure and condition, that the Lords thereof ſhould at the Coronation of the Kings of England be the Kings Butlers that day. Like as, (a thing that may beſeeme the noting) in Charleton a little neighbour village, Raulph de Carleton and ſome one other, held lands by this ſervice, namely, To preſent an hundred Herring-pies or paſties, when Herings firſt come in, unto their ſoveraigne Lord the King, whereſoever he be in England. E

But this river neare to his ſpring runneth by and by under Diſce; now Dis, a prety towne well knowne; which king Henrie the Firſt gaue frankely to Sir Richard Lucy, and hee ſtreightwaies paſſed it over to Walter Fitz-Robert with his daughter: of whoſe poſterity Robert Fitz-Walter obteined for this place the libertie of keeping mercat, at the hands of King Edward the Firſt. From thence, although Wavency bee on each ſide beſet with townes, yet there is not one amongſt them that may boaſt of any antiquity: unleſſe it bee Harleſton a good mercat, and Shelton that ſtandeth farther of, both which haue given ſurnames to the ancient families of the Sheltons and Harleſtons: but before it commeth to the ſea, it coupleth it ſelfe with the river Yare, which the Britans called Guerne, the Engliſhmen Gerne and Iere, of Alder F trees, no doubt, ſo termed in Britiſh wherewith it is over ſhadowed. It ariſeth out of the mids of this countrie, not far from Gernſton a little towne that tooke name thereHengham. Lord of Rhia. of, and hath hard by it Hengham, which his Lords, deſcended from John Mareſcall (nephew by the brother to William Mareſcall Earle of Penbroch) upon whom King John beſtowed it with the lands of Hugh de Gornay, a traitour, and alſo with the daughter

A daughter and coheire of Hubert de Rhia. From this Mareſcals it paſſed in revolution of time, unto the Lord Markis, and from them by Lovell unto the Parkers, now Lords Morley. A little from hence is Sculton, otherwiſe called Burdos or, Burdalois, which was held by this tenure, that the Lord thereof on the Coronation daie of the Kings of England, ſhould bee chiefe Lardiner. Joint-neighbour to Sculton is Wood-Riſing the faire ſeate of the familie of Southwells, which received the greateſt reputation and encreaſe from Sir Richard Southwell privie councellour to king Edward the Sixth; and his brother Sir Robert Maiſter of the Rowles. Sculton. Wood riſing.

More Eaſtward is to be ſeene Wimundham, now ſhort, Windham, famous for the Albineys Earles of Arundell, there enterred: whoſe anceſtour and progenitor William D' Windham.

B Albiney, Butler to king Henrie the Firſt founded the Priory, and gaue it to the Abbay of Saint Albans for a Cell, which afterward was advanced to an Abbay. Upon the ſteeple whereof, which is of a great height, William Ket one of the Captains of the Norfolke Rebels, in the yeare of our Lord 1549. was hanged on high. Neither would it be paſſed over in ſilence, that fiue miles from hence ſtandeth Attilborrough, the ſeate of the Mortimers, an ancient familie, who beeing different from thoſe of Wigmor; bare for their Armes, A ſhield Or, Semè de flourès de Lyz Sables, and founded heere a Collegiat Church, where there is little now to bee ſeene. The inheritance of theſe Mortimers hath by marriage long ſince accrued to the Ratcliffs, now Earles of Suſſex, to the familie of Fitz-Ralph, and to Sir Ralph Bigot. But returne wee Attilborrough. Mortimers.

C now to the river.

The ſaid Yare holdeth not his courſe farre into the Eaſt, before he taketh Wentſum a riueret (others call it Wentfar) from the South, into his ſtreame: upon which, neere unto the head thereof, there is a foure ſquare rampier at Taiesborrough, conteining foure and twentie acres. It may ſeeme to haue beene a campe place of the Romans, if it bee not that which in an old Chorographicall table or Map publiſhed by Marcus Welſerus, is called AD TAVM. Somewhat higher, upon the ſame river, ſtood VENTA ICENORVM, the moſt flouriſhing City, (for a little one) in times paſt of all this people; but now having loſt the old name, it is called Caſter. And no mervaile, that of the three VENTAE, Cities of Britain, this onely loſt the name, ſee- Venta Icenorum. Caſter.

D ing it hath quite loſt it ſelfe. For, beſide the ruines of the walles, which containe within a ſquare plot or quadrant, about thirty acres, and tokens appearing upon the ground where ſometimes houſes ſtood, and ſome fewe peeces of Romane money which are now and then there digged up, there is nothing at all remaining. But out of this ancient VENTA, in the ſucceeding ages, Norwich had her beginning, about three miles from hence, neere unto the confluents of Yare and another nameleſſe river (ſome call it Bariden) where they meet in one: which river with a long courſe running in and out by Fakenham, which king Henry the Firſt gaue to Hugh Capell, and K. Iohn afterward to the Earle of Arundel; and making many crooked reaches, ſpeedeth it ſelfe this way by Attilbridge to Yare, and leaueth Horſford North from it: Horſford.

E where a Caſtle of William * Cheneys, who in the reigne of Henry the Second, was one of the great Lords and chiefe peeres of England, lieth overgrowne with buſhes and brambles. This NORWICH is a famous City, called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Nop'ðpic, that is, a Northerly Creek, if Wic among the Saxons ſignifieth the creeke or Cove of a river, as Rhenanus ſheweth unto us: for, in this verie place the river runneth downe amaine with a crooked and winding compaſſe: or, a Northren Station, if Wic, as Hadrianus Iunius would haue it, betokeneth a ſure and ſecure ſtation or place of aboad, where dwelling houſes ſtand jointly and cloſe together: or a Northerly Caſtle, if Wic ſound as much as a Caſtle, as our * Archbiſhop Alfrick the Saxon hath interpre- * De Caſineto. Norwich. Wic in the Saxons tongue what it ſignifieth.

F ted it. But, if I ſhould with ſome others bee of opinion that Norwich by a little turning is derived from Venta, what ſhould I doe but turne a wrie from the verie truth? For, by no better right may it chalenge unto it ſelf the name of Venta, than either Baſil in Germany, the name of AVGVSTA, or Baldach of BABYLON. For, like as Baldach had the beginning of Babylons fall; and Baſil ſprang from the ruine of Auguſta: even ſo our Norwich appeared and ſhewed it ſelfe, though it were late, out of that ancient *In the Engliſh Saxon Grammer. Auguſta Rauracorum.

Digitized by Google

VENTA, which, the Britiſh name therof Caer Guntum in Authors, doth proue where- A in, like as in the river Wentſum or Wentſar the name of Venta doth moſt plainly diſcover it ſelfe. For, this name Norwich wee cannot reade of any where in our Chronicles before the Daniſh warres.

So farre is it off, that either Cæſar or Guiteline the Britain built it, as they write who are more haſty to beleeue all than to weigh matters with ſound iudgement. But now, verily, by reaſon of the wealth, the number of Inhabitants, and reſort of people, the faire buildings, and faire Churches, and thoſe ſo many, (for it conteineth about thirtie Pariſhes) the painefull induſtrie of the Citizens, their loialty towards their Prince, and their courteſie unto ſtrangers, it is worthily to bee raun-ged with the moſt celebrate Cities of Britain. It is right pleaſantly ſituate on the B ſide of an hill two and fiftie degrees and fortie ſcrupuls from the Aequator, and foure and twentie degrees and fiue and fiftie ſcrupuls in Longitude. The forme is ſomewhat long: lying out in length from South to North a mile and an halfe: but carrying in breadth, about halfe ſo much, drawing it ſelfe in by little and little at the South end in manner, as it were, of a cone or ſharpe point. Compaſſed it is about with ſtrong walles (in which are orderly placed many turrets, and twelue gates) un-leſſe it bee on the Eaſt-ſide; where the river (after it hath with many windings in and out watered the North part of the Citie, having foure bridges for men to paſſe to and fro over it) is a fence thereto, with his deepe chanell there, and high ſteepe bankes. In the verie infancie, as I may ſo ſay, of this City, when Etheldred a wit- C leſſe and vnaduiſed Prince reigned, Sueno or Swan the Dane who raunged at his pleaſure through England with a great rable of ſpoiling ravenours, firſt put it to the ſacke, and afterwards ſet it on fire. Yet it revived againe, and as wee reade in that Domeſday booke wherein William the Conquerour tooke the review of all England, there were by account in King Edward the Confeſſours time, no fewer than one thou-ſand three hundred and twentie Burgeſſes in it. At which time (that I may ſpeake out of the ſame booke) It paid unto the King twenty pounds, and to the Earle ten pounds: and beſide all this twentie ſhillings, and foure prebendaries, and ſixe Sextars of Hony; alſo a beare and ſixe dogs for to bait the beare: but now it paieth ſeauentie pounds by weight to the King, and an hundred ſhillings for a * Gerſume to the Queene; and an ambling palfrey: D *Fine, as ſome take it. alſo twenty pounds Blanc to the Earle, and twenty ſhillings for a Gerſume by tale. But while the ſaid King William reigned, that flaming fire of fatall ſedition, which Raulph Earle of Eaſt England had kindled againſt the King, ſettled it ſelfe here. For, when hee had ſaved him ſelfe by flight, his wife together with the French Britons endu-red in this place a moſt grievous ſiege even to extreame famine: yet at length dri-ven ſhe was to this hard pinch that ſhe fled the land, and this Citie was ſo empaired, that ſcarce 560. Burgeſſes were left in it, as wee reade in that Domeſday booke. Of this yeelding up of the City Lanfrank Archbiſhop of Canterbury maketh mention in his Epiſtle to king William, in theſe words. Your Kingdome is purged of theſe vilanous and filthy Britons, The Caſtle of Norwich is rendred up into your hands. And the Britons E who were therein and had lands in England, having life and limme granted unto them, are ſworne within fortie daies to depart out of your realme, and not enter any more into it without your leave and licence. From that time beganne it againe to recover it ſelfe by little and little out of this diluge of calamities, and Biſhop Herbert whoſe good name was cracked for his foule Simony, tranſlated the Epiſcopall See from Thetford hi-ther, and built up a verie faire Cathedral Church on the Eaſt ſide & lower part of the City, in a certaine place then called Cow-holme, nere unto the Caſtle. The firſt ſtone whereof in the reigne of king William Rufus, and in the yeare after Chriſts nativity 1096. himſelfe laid, with this inſcription. F

DOMINVS HERBERTVS POSVIT PRIMVM LAPIDEM IN NOMINE PATRIS, FILII, ET SPIRITVS SANCTI. AMEN.

That is.

LORD

Digitized by Google

A LORD [BISHOP] HERBERT LAID THE FIRST STON IN THE NAME OF THE FATHER, THE SONNE, AND HOLY GHOST, AMEN.

Afterwards, he procured of Pope Paschal that it should be established, and confirmed for the Mother Church of Norfolke and Suffolke: he endowed it bountifully with as much lands, as might sufficiently maintaine three score Monkes, who had there faire and spacious Cloysters. But after that they were thrust out by King Henry the Eight, there were substituted for them a Deane, six Prebendaries and others. The B Church being thus built and an Episcopall see there placed, the towne now (as saith William of Malmesbury) became of great name for frequent trade of Merchants and resort of people. And in the 17. yeere of King Stephen, as we read in old Annals, Norwich was founded a new, became a well peopled City, and was made a Corporation. And most certaine it is out of the Kings Records, that King Stephen granted it unto his sonne William for his Appennage, as they tearme it, or inheritance. Out of whose hands King Henry the Second shortly after wrested it by composition and kept it for himselfe: And albeit his Sonne Henry, called the younger King, when he aspired ambitiously to the kingdome, had made a large promise thereof unto Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke whom he had drawen to side with him. At which time Bigod taking part with the younge King, who could not containe his hope of the Kingdome within C the bounds of dutie and equitie, most grieuously afflicted and oppressed this citie: and then as it is thought reedified that Castle standing within the very City upon an high hill neere unto the Cathedrall Church, which being compassed with a ditch of a wonderfull depth seemed in those daies impregnable. Which notwithstanding, Lewis the French-man, with whom the seditious Barons of England combined against King Iohn, won it easily by siege. Now, that Bigod reedified this castle I verily beleeue, because I haue seene Lions Saliant engraven there in a Stone after the same forme that the Bigods used in times past in their seales: of whom also there was one that in his seale used a Crosse. These things fell out in the first age (wee may say) of Norwich.

D But in the age next ensuing, it encreased mightily & flourished, by reason that the Citizens grew to be passing wealthy, who exhibited a supplication in the Parliament house unto King Edward the First, that they might be permitted to wall their City about, which they afterwards performed to the exceeding great strengthning and honour thereof. They obteined moreover of K. Richard the Second, that the Worsted made there might be transported: and in the yeere 1403. K. Henry the Fourth, granted that they might choose every yeere a Major in steed of their Bailiffes, which before were the principall Magistrates. They built likewise a passing faire Towne-house in the very middest of the City neere unto the Mercat-place, which on certaine E set daies is furnished exceeding well with all things necessary for mans life. And verily much beholden it is unto the *Netherlanders, that being weary of Duke de Alba his cruelty, and hating the bloudy Inquisition, repaired hither in great numbers and first brought in the making and trade of saies, baies, & other stuffes now much in vse. But why should I stand long upon these things, when as Alexander Nevill a Gentleman well borne and very learned hath notably described all these matters, together with the story of their Bishops, the orderly succession of their Magistrates, and the furious outrage of that most villanous Rebell Ket against this City? This onely will I adde, that in the yeere 1583. the Citizens conveighed water out of the river through pipes by an artificiall instrument or water-forcer up into the highest places F of the City. Heere I might iustly commence an action both against Polydor Virgill an Italian, and also against Angelus Capellus a Frenchman, and put them to their answer before the Tribunall of venerable Antiquity, why they have avouched that the ancient ORDOVICES, who be seated, as it were in another world, inhabited this Norwich. I would have the same mery action also against our country man D. Caius, but that I know for certaine that the good old man, right learned though he were, was blinded in this point with the naturall loue of this his owne native country. Neither have I

*Or Dutchmen of the Low countries.

Digitized by Google

more to say of Norwich unlesse it may please you to runne over these verses of M. Iohn Ionston a Scotish-Britan written of the same. A

Vrbs speciosa situ, nitidis pulcherrima tectis,
Grata peregrinis, delitiosa suis.
Bellorum sedes, trepido turbante tumultu,
Tristia Neustriaco sub duce damna tulit.
Victis dissidijs, postquàm caput arduа calo
Extulit, immensis crevit opima opibus.
Cultus vincit opes, & cultum gratia rerum,
Quam bene? si luxus non comitetur opes. B
Omnia sic adeò sola hac sibi sufficit, ut si
Fors regno desit, hac caput esse queat.

A City seated daintily, most faire built she is knowen,
Pleasing and kinde to strangers all, delightfull to her owne.
The seat of war whiles civill sturs and tumults yet remain'd,
In William the Normans daies, she grievous losse sustain'd.
These broiles and jarres once past, when as her head aloft againe
She bare, in richnesse infinite and wealth she grew amaine.
Her port exceeds that wealth, and things all superfine, this port
How happy were it, if excesse with such wealth did not sort. C
So all sufficient in her selfe, and so complete is shee,
That if neede were, of all the Realme the mistresse shee might bee.

From Norwich, the river Yare having entertained other beackes and brookes as guests, yet all under his owne name, passeth on still with many winding crookes very full of the fishes called Ruffes, which name because in English it soundeth like to Rough, D. Caius named it aptly in Latine Aspredo, that is, Rough. For, it is all the body over, rough and hath very sharpe & pricky finnes: it delighteth in sandy places; for shape and bignesse like unto a perch; in colour browne and duskish aboue, but palish yellow beneath: marked by the chawes with a double course of half-circles: the eie for the upper halfe of it of a darke browne, for the nether somewhat yellowish like delayed gold, the ball and sight thereof blacke. This speciall marke by it selfe it hath, that there is a line goeth along the backe, and fastened to the body (as it were) with an overthwart thred, all to be spotted over the taile and finnes with blacke speckes: which finnes when the fish is angry stand up and bristle stiffe and strong: but when the anger is alaied they fall flat againe. The meat of this Ruffe resembleth that of the Perch, much commended for holsomnesse; and for eating tender & short. D

A Ruffe. De Rariorum animalium, Historia.

* When Yare is gone past Claxton, where there stands a Castlet built round, which Sr Thomas Gawdy Knight Iustice of the Common Plees of late repaired, it receiveth a brook which passeth by nothing memorable but Halles-hal, & that only memorable for his ancient owner Sir James Hobart Atturney Generall and of the Privy Counsell to King Henry the Seventh (by him dubbed Knight at such time as he created Henry his sonne Prince of Wales) who by building from the ground the faire Church at Loddon being his parish Church, Saint Olaues bridge over Waveney that diuideth Norfolke and Suffolke, the cawsey thereby, and other workes of piety, deserved well of the Church, his country, and the Common-weale, and planted three houses of his owne issue, out of the second wherof Sir Henry Hobart his great Grandchild now likewise Atturney Generall to King Iames is lineally descended. Now Yare approching nearer to the sea, runneth downe Southward, that so it may shed it selfe more gently into the salt sea waves, & thereby maketh a little languet of land like a tongue thrust out, which it selfe of one side watereth, and the sea on the other beateth upon. On this languet I saw standing in a most open plaine shore, Yarmouth, in the English-Saxon Gar-muð, and Ier-muð, that is Yares-mouth, a very convenient haven, and as faire a towne, beautifully built and passing well fensed both by the naturall strength of the place and also by the skilfull industry of mans art. For although it be environed almost round with water, on the West side with the river which hath a draw bridge over it, and from other partes with the Ocean, unlesse it bee E F Halles-hall. Hobart.

Garienis Ostium. Yarmouth.

Northward

Digitized by Google

A Northward where there is firme land: yet is it in moſt ſightly maner encloſed with a good ſtrong wall, which together with the river make a ſquare forme of foure ſides, but ſomewhat long: upon which wall, beſide towres, there is caſt a mount toward the Eaſt, from whence the great peeces of Ordnance uſe to thunder and flaſh all about into the ſea under it, which is ſcarce 60. paces off. It hath indeed but one Church, yet the ſame is very large, having a paſſing high ſpire ſteeple to adorne it, built by Herbert Biſhop of Norwich hard by the North gate: under which are to be ſeene the foundations brought above ground of a goodly peece of worke to enlarge the ſame. That this was that old towne GARIANONVM, where, in times paſt, the Garianonum.
B Stableſian Horſemen kept their ſtanding watch and ward againſt the barbarous enimies, I dare not affirme; neither doe I thinke that Garianonum was where Caſter is now (in times paſt the faire ſeat of Sir Iohn Faſtolfe, a moſt martiall Knight, and now appertaining to the Paſtons) albeit it is much celebrated among the inhabitants for the antiquity thereof, and the fame goeth that the river Yare had another mouth or paſſage into the ſea under it.

But, as I am perſwaded that GARIANONVM ſtood at Burgh-Caſtle in Suffolke, which is on the other banke about two miles off, ſo I am eaſily induced to thinke, that both Yarmouth aroſe out of the ruines thereof, and alſo that the ſaid Caſter was one of the Roman forts, placed alſo upon the mouth of Yare, that now is ſtopped
C up. For, like as the *North Weſterne winde doth play the Tyrant upon Holland *Caurus.
over againſt it, and by drift of ſhelves and Sand-heapes hath choked the middeſt of the Rhene-Mouthes: even ſo the *North-Eaſt winde afflicteth and annoieth this Coaſt, and driveth the ſand on heapes, ſo as it may ſeeme to have dammed up this mouth alſo. *Aquilo.

Neither will it be preiudiciall to the Truth, if I ſhould name our Yarmouth, GARIANONVM, being ſo neere adjoining as it is, unto the old Garianonum: conſidering that Garienis the river, whence it tooke the name, having now changed his chanell, entreth into the maine ſea a little beneath this towne, which it hath alſo given name unto: For, I muſt needs confeſſe, that this our Yarmouth is of later memorie. For,
D when that ancient Garianonum aforeſaid was decayed, and there was no garriſon to defend the ſhore, Cerdick a warlike Saxon landed heere (whereupon the inhabitants at this day call the place Cerdikeſand, and the writers of Hiſtories, Cerdik-ſhore) and after he had made ſore warre upon the Iceni, tooke ſea and ſailed from hence into the Weſt parts, where he erected the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons. And not long after, the Saxons in ſteed of Garianonum, founded a new towne in that moiſt and wateriſh ground, neere the Weſt ſide of the river and named it Yarmouth: But finding the ſituation thereof not to be healthfull, they betooke themſelues to the other ſide of the river called then of the ſame Cerdicke, Cerdikſand, and built this new towne, in which there flouriſhed in King Edward the Confeſſour his daies 70. Burgeſſes, as we find re-
E corded in the Notitia of England. After this, about the yeere of our redemption 1340, the townesmen ſtrengthned it with a wall, and in ſhort ſpace it grew ſo rich and puiſant, that oftentimes in ſea fights they ſet upon their neighbours of Leſtoff, yea and the Portmen, for ſo they termed the inhabitants of the Cinque ports, not without much bloud ſhed on both ſides. For they were moſt ſpitefully bent againſt them, haply for being excluded out of the number of the Cinque ports, & deprived of theſe priviledges which old Garianonum or Yarmouth, and their anceſtours, enjoied under the *Comes of the Saxon ſhore in elder times. But this their ſtoutneſſe was repreſſed *Lieutenant.
at length and taken downe by the Kings authority: or as ſome thinke, their luſty cou-
F rage became abated by that moſt grievous and lamentable plague, which in one yeere, within this one little towne brought 7000. to their graves. The which is witneſſed by an ancient latin Chronographicall Table hanging up in the Church, wherein are ſet downe alſo their warres with the Portmen and Leſtoffians aforeſaid.

Since that time, their hearts haue not beene ſo hauty, nor their wealth ſo great, to make them bold: howbeit painfully they follow the trade of Merchandiſe, Herrings.

Cerdicus the Saxon. Cerdik ſand

William Worceſter. *Domſday booke.

*Portuenſes.

Digitized by Google

Halecum. and taking of Herrings (which the learned thinke to be Chalcides and Leucomanides) a kinde of fish more plentifull heere than in any other coast of the world againe. For, A it may seeme incredible how great a faire, and with what resort of people, is holden here at the feast of Saint Michaell, and what store of herrings and other fish is then Portuenses. bought and sold. At which time, they of the Cinque-Ports abouesaid by an old order and custome, appoint their Bailiffs, Commissioners, and send them hither, who, that I may speake out of their owne Patent or Commission, togither with the magistrates of this towne, during the time of the free faire, hold a Court, for matters concerning the faire, doe execute the Kings justice, and keepe the Kings peace. As for the haven below the towne, it is verie commodious both for the inhabitants, and for Norwich-men also: but for feare that it should be barred and stopped up, they wrestle as it were, to their B great cost and charges, with the maine sea: which to make them amends and to restore what it hath eaten and swallowed up elsewhere in this shore, hath by heaping of earth and sand together, cast up here of late a prety Island.

The river Thyrn. At this mouth also, another river, which some call Thyrn sheddeth it selfe together with Yare into the sea: This river springing up neere unto Holt a towne so called of an Holt or tuft of trees, and for the mercat well knowne, running about fiue miles distant from Yare, holdeth on a joint course a great way and keepeth pace with him, Blickling. Ailesham. by Blickling, now the seat of the ancient familie of Clere who in former times dwelt at Ormesby; and by Ailesham a mercat towne of good resort, where the Earle of
* Athole in Scotland had lands not farre from Worsted, where as I reade, the Stuffe Worsted. Worsted Stuff. Worsted, in so great request amongst our ancestours, was first made; and hence so C named, as Dornicks, Cameric, Calecut &c. had in like manner their denomination from the places where they were first invented, and made. Then passeth Thirn neare Saint Benets in the Holme. the decaied great Abbay called Saint Benet in the Holme: which Knut the Dane built, and the monkes afterward so strengthned with most strong wals and bulwarks, that it seemed rather a Castle than a Cloister. In so much, that William the Conqueror could not winne it by assault, untill a monke betraied it into his hands upon this condition, that himselfe might be made Abbot thereof. Which was done accordingly: but forthwith; this new Abbot for beeing a traitour, (as the inhabitants D make report) was hanged up by the kings commandement, and so justly punished for this treason. But the ground in this Island or Holme is so fenny and rotten, that if a man cut up the strings and rootes of trees, and shrubs there growing, in floteth aloft on the water, and is ready to follow one whither he will haue it. And some there be who thinke, by the perwinkles and cocles that other while are digged up there; Ludham. Clipsby. that the sea had broken in thither. From thence runneth this river downe by Ludham, an house of the Bishops of Norwich, and by Clipsby, which gave name to a family of ancient note in his tract, and streightway vniteth his owne streame with the Yare. From the mouth of Yare the shore goeth directly (as it were) North, to Winterton a point or cape very well knowne to sailers, which tooke that name, I suppose, of the cold and winterly situation. For, it lieth full upon the Ocean, the father of winds and E cold, who with exceeding violence rusheth against the bankes and piles that are opposed against him. Howbeit, the country adiojning round about, in many mens opi-
A most fat and batle ground. nion hath the fattest soile and softest mould of any country in all England, as which asketh least labour, and yeeldeth most fruit. For, with a silly jade, (as Plinie writeth of Bizacium in Africke) and a poore old woman at one side of the yoake drawing the plough, it is easily broken up, and eared. From Winterton immediatly the shore turning Westward, the sea retireth, without any bearing out in maner at all, along a flat and low coast, as farre as to Eccles, which is almost overflowed and drowned with the Bronholme. Ocean. From thence it carrieth an higher shore, by Bronholme sometime a Priorie F founded and enriched by G. Glanvill, and seated upon the sharpe top of an hill, the Crosse whereof our ancestours had in holy reverence, I know not for what miracles.
* Next it is Paston a small townlet which yet hath giuen surname to a family growne Paston. Gimmingham. great, both in estate and alliance, since they matched with an heiresse of Beary and Maultbye. Not farre hence is Gimmingham, which with other Manors, Iohn Earle

of

Digitized by Google

A of Warren and Surrie gaue in times past to Thomas Earle of Lancaster, and by Cromer where the neighbour inhabitants with great expense went about to make an havenet, but to small purpose; the Ocean so furiously plaied the tyrant and made resistance. Thence the shore runneth forth to Wauburne-hope; a Creeke fortified in our time, so called of Wauburne a little towne, unto which by the incercession of Oliver de Burdeaux, King Edward the Second granted the libertie of keeping a mercat: Next unto it is Clay; and over against it with a little river running betweene, Blackney, our country man Bale calleth it Nigeria, a famous house of Carmelite Friers in this late age afore going, built by Sir Robert de Roos, Sir Ro- Blackney.
B bert Bacon, and Iohn Bret: out of which came Iohn Baconthorp, so named of the 1321.
place of his nativity, (which now is the habitation of the Heidons, an ancient race Iohn Baconthorp. of knights degree) A man in that age of such variety and depth withall of excellent learning, that hee was had in exceeding great admiration among the Italians, and commonly called The Resolute Doctor. Whence it is, that Paulus Pansa thus writeth of him. If thy minde stand to enter into the secret powre of the Almighty and most mercifull God, no man hath written of his essence more exactly. If any man desireth to learne the causes of things, or the effects of Nature; if hee wish to know the sundrie motions of heaven, and the contrary qualities of the Elements, this man offereth himselfe as a store-house to furnish him: The Armour of Christian Religion, of better proofe The Resolute Doctor.
C and defence than those of Vulcans making against the Iewes, this resolute Doctour alone hath delivered &c. When you are past Wauborn, the coast lieth more low and flat, as farre as to Saint Edmunds Point, cut through and distinguished with many a rillet; and hardly defended from the injurie of the sea by heapes of sand which they use Meales or Miles.
to call Meales, opposed against it.

More within the Country is Walsingham scarce foure miles from hence: where- Walsingham.
upon it is that of the vicinity unto the sea Erasmus calleth it Parathalassia. Verie famous now is this village by reason of the best Saffron growing there: but of late time as much renowned through all England for a pilgrimage to our Ladie the Virgin Marie: whom hee who had not in that former age visited and presented with D offerings, was reputed irreligious. But this shall Erasmus an eye-witnesse describe in his owne verie words. Not farre from the sea, (saith hee) about foure miles, there standeth a towne living almost of nothing else but upon the resort of pilgrimes. There is a Colledge of Chanons, yet such, as unto whom the Latinists haue given the addition of Re- Regulares.
gulares, a middle kinde betwixt Monkes and those Chanons whom they terme Secular: This Colledge hath scarce any other revenewes than from the liberality of the said Virgin. For certaine of the greater presents and oblations are laied up and preserved. But if there bee any money offered or aught else, of small value, that goeth unto the maintenance of the Covent and their Head or president, whom they call Prior. The Church is faire and neat; yet in it the Virgin dwelleth not: that honour, forsooth, shee hath done unto her E Sonne: shee hath her Church by her selfe, but so, as that shee may bee on the right hand of her Sonne. Neither doth shee dwell heere for all this, for why, the building is not yet finished, and the place hath a through light and ayre on all sides, with open dores and wide open windowes; the Ocean-sea withall, the father and foster of Winds is hard by. In that Church, which I said was unfinished, there is a small chappell, but all of wood, whereinto on either side at a narrow and little dore are such admitted as come with their devotions and offrings. Smal light there is in it, and none other in manner but by tapers or wax-candles, yeelding a most deinty and pleasant smel. Nay if you looke into it, you would say it were the habitation of heavenly Saints in deed, so bright shining it is all over with precious stones, with gold and silver. But within the memory of F our fathers, when King Henry the Eighth had set his minde and eye both, upon the riches and possessions of Churches, all this vanished quite away. Touching Walsingham, I haue nothing else to say more, but that the familie of the Walsinghams, knights (as they will haue it that curiously search after Genealogies) fetched first their name and originall from hence: Out of which house flourished that Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretarie unto Queene Elizabeth, a man as

as of deepe insight, so also of as rare and painfull industry in the weightiest affaires of the Realme. But hardby it at Houghton, flourished sometime the noble family of the Neirfords, who by matching in mariage with* Parnel de Vallibus (who had about Holt, Cley, and elsewhere a goodly inheritance) was greatly enriched. But now let vs looke backe againe to the shore. A Houghton. The Neirfords. * Petronilla Vaulx.

Neere unto Walsingham Westward, upon the sea side, was that ancient towne BRANNODVNVM, where when the Saxons first molested Britajne with their invasions, The Dalmatian Horsemen laie in Garison under the Lieutenant of the Saxon Shore. But now it is a country village, reteining nought but the remaines of that name, and shewing a trench and rampire (the neighbour inhabitants call it the Castle) that conteineth within it a plot of ground much about eight acres, and is named Brancaster, where peeces of Romane mony are many times gotten out of the earth. Very commodiously was there a garison planted in this place: for at S. Edmunds Chappell neere adjoining, and Hunstanton, built by that holy King Saint Edmund, the coast draweth backe into the South, and so admitteth a larger creek for the sea to enter into, lying open for pirats, into which many rivers also doe void themselves. As for Hunstanton it is to be remembred in this regard if there were nothing else, for that it hath beene the Habitation of the family of Le Strange, Knights by degree, ever since that in the reigne of Edward the Second, Iohn Baron Le Strange of Knockin, gave the same unto Hamon his younger brother. B C Brannodunum. Brancaster. Hunstanton. Le-Strange.

The catching of hawkes, and the plentifull fishing, the Iet and Amber also found oftentimes in this shore I wittingly omit, seeing that there is great store of these things elsewhere along this tract. Yet Sharnborn in this coast is not to be omitted both for that Fœlix the Burgundian who brought these East Englishmen to the Christian faith and state of perpetuall felicity, built in this place the second Church of Christians in this Country (for the first, he founded at Babingley where he landed) as also because it is verily thought and that by the faithfull testimony of old deeds and evidences, that an old Englishman Lord of this place before the comming of the Normans, by vertue of sentence given judicially in open Court by William Conquerour himselfe, recovered this Lordship against Warren, unto whom the Conquerour had given it. Which argument they enforce hard, who would prove that the said William entred upon the possession of England by covenant and agreement, and not by right of war and conquest. D

Sharnborn. Fœlix a Bishop.

The foresaid Creeke or Bay, our country men call the Washes, Ptolemee termed it AESTVARIVM METARIS, haply for Malthraith, by which name the Britans called the like Frithes and Armes of the sea in other places: neither doth it signifie among them any other thing than an Arme of the sea vncertainly changing the chanell such as this is: Upon this, where the River Ouse striveth forcibly against the Ocean, standeth Linne, peradventure so named of the waters broad spreading; For that doth Lhyn import in the* British tongue. A large towne this is encompassed with a deepe trench and wals for the most part thereof, divided by two smal rivers that have fifteene bridges or thereabout over them: and although it be of no great antiquity and not long since called Linnum Episcopi, that is, Bishops Linne, because it appertained to the Bishops of Norwich, untill King Henry the Eighth his daies, for it had beginning out of the ruines of an elder towne which stood over against it in Marshland, & is at this day called Old Linne and Linnum Regis, that is, Kings Linne; yet by reason of the safe Haven which yeeldeth most easie accesse, for the number also of Merchants there dwelling, and thether resorting, for the faire and the goodly houses, the wealth also of the townesmen, it is doubtlesse the principall towne of this shire except Norwich onely. It hath likewise most large franchises and immunities, which the inhabitants bought with their owne bloud of King Iohn, whiles they tooke part with him and defended his quarrell, who ordeined there a Major, and delivered unto them his owne sword to be caried before him, yea and gave unto them a silver cup all gilt, which they still doe keepe. These their liberties being afterwards lost, they redeemed not without bloud also, of King Henry the Third, when siding with him E F

The Washes. Metaris Æstuarium. Lynne. * Welch.

and

Digitized by Google

A and ſerving under his banner, they fought an unfortunat battaile againſt the outlawed Lords in the Iſle of Ely, as the booke of Ely and Mathew Paris doe both iointly witneſſe.

Over againſt Linne, on the farther ſide of the river lieth Merſhland, a little moiſt merſh country, as the name implieth, divided and parted every where with ditches, trenches & furrows to draine & draw the waters away: a ſoile ſtanding upon a very rich and fertile mould, and breeding aboundance of cattaile: in ſo much as that in a place commonly called Tilneyſmeth there feed much about 30000 ſheep: but ſo ſubject to
B the beating, and overflowing of the roaring maine Sea, which very often breaketh, teareth, and troubleth it ſo grievouſly, that hardly it can be holden off with chargeable wals and workes. The places of greater note in this Merſhland, are theſe: Walpole, which the Lord of the place gave in times paſt unto the Church of Ely together with his ſonne, whom he made a Monke there: Wigenhall, the poſſeſſion of I. Howard in the reigne of Edward the firſt, whoſe poſterity ſpred, and became a moſt honorable and noble family, whereof I haue already ſpoken: Tilney, whence in old time the ſtocke of the Tilneys, Knights, tooke name; and Saint Maries the ſeat of the ancient race of the Carvils. Tilney. S. Maries.

Now have we paſſed along all the Sea-coaſt. As for the inner part of the country, there are alſo very many townes toward the Weſt ſide, but becauſe they be of later
C memory, I will briefely runne them over. Neere to Linne upon an high hill ſtandeth Riſing-caſtle, almoſt matchable to the Caſtle of Norwich; the ſeat in times paſt of the Albineys; afterwards of Robert de Monthault, by one of the ſiſters and coheires of Hugh Albiney Earle of Arundell; and at laſt the manſion place of the Mowbrays; who, as I have learned, came out of the ſame houſe that the Albineys did. But now, after long languiſhing, as it were, by reaſon of old age, the ſaid Caſtle hath given up the ghoſt. Below it is Caſtle-acre, where was ſometimes the habitation of the Earles of Warren, in a Caſtle now halfe downe, on a little rivers ſide: which carrying no name, ariſeth not farre from Godwicke a lucky good name, where there ſtands a ſmall
D houſe, but greatly graced by the Lord thereof, Sir Edward Coke Knight, a man of rare endowments of nature, and as in the Common lawes much practiſed, ſo of deepe inſight therin, which all England both took knowledge of whiles he diſcharged the function of Attourney Generall many yeeres moſt learnedly, and now acknowledgeth whiles being Lord chiefe Iuſtice of the Common Plees, hee adminiſtreth juſtice as vprightly and iudiciouſly. Neither is he leſſe to be remembred, for that he loueth learning, and hath well deſerved of the preſent and ſucceeding ages by his learned labours. Reports.

This riveret or brooke with a ſmall ſtreame and ſhallow water runneth Weſtward to Linne, by Neirford, that gave name to the familie of the Neirfords famous in times Neirford.
E paſt, and by Neirborrough: where neere unto the houſe of the Spilmans, Knights, upon a very high hill is to be ſeene a warlike fort of paſſing great ſtrength and of ancient worke, ſo ſituated, as it hath a very faire proſpect into the country about it. After, upon the ſaid brooke is ſeated Penteney, a prety Abbay the ordinary buriall place in ancient time of the Noble men and gentlemen in this tract.

Neere unto it lieth Wormegay, commonly Wrongey, which Reginald de Warren bro- Wormegay.
ther of William de Warren the ſecond Earle of Surrie had with his wife, of whom as I have read, the ſaid Earle had the donation or Maritagium (as they uſe to ſpeake in the law phraſe) and by his ſonnes daughter ſtreightwaies it was tranferred to the Bar- Bardolphs dolphs, who being Barons of great nobility, flouriſhed a long time in honorable ſtate, Barons.
F and bare for their Armes Three cinque-foiles Or in a ſhield Azur, The greateſt part of whoſe inheritance together with the title came to Sir William Phellps, and by his daughter paſſed away to the Vicount Beaumont. More Eaſtward are ſeated, Swaffham a mercat towne of good note, ſometime the poſſeſſion of the Earle of Richmond: Aſhele Manour, by tenure whereof the Haſtings and Greies Lords of Ruthin had the charge of table clothes and linnen uſed at the ſolemne Coronation of the Kings of England: North Elmham, the Biſhops See for a good time, when as this province

was

Digitized by Google

was divided into two Dioceſes: Dereham, wherein Withburga King Annas daughter was buried: whom becauſe ſhe was piouſly affected, farre from all riotous exceſſe, and wanton lightneſſe, our anceſtours accounted for a Saint. Next unto which is A Greſhenhall. Elſing. Folliots. Greſhenhall, and adjoining thereto Elſing, the poſſeſſions in ancient time of the Folliots, men of great worth and dignity, which in right of dowrie came by a daughter of Richard Folliot to Sir Hugh de Haſtings, deſcended out of the family of Abergevenny: and at length by the daughters and heires of Haſtings the laſt, Greſhenhall aforeſaid fell unto Sir Hamon le Strange of Hunſtanton, and Elſing unto William Browne the brother of Sir Antonie Browne the firſt Vicount Mount-acute. In this quarter alſo is Ick-borrough, which Talbot ſuppoſeth to have beene that ICIANI, whereof Antonine ſpeaketh. Neither have I cauſe to write any more of theſe places. And now I thinke it is good time to ſet downe the Earles and Dukes of Northfolke, that I may proceede to Cambridgeſhire. B Ickborrough. Iciani.

William the Conquerour made one Raulph Governour of Eaſt-England, that is to ſay, of Norfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeſhire, who forthwith gaping as I ſaid, after an alteration and change in the ſtate, was diſpoſſeſſed of that place. After certaine yeeres, in the reigne of Stephen, Hugh Bigod was Earle of Norfolke: For, when peace was concluded betweene Stephen and Henrie Duke of Anjou, who became afterwards King Henrie the ſecond, by expreſſe words it was provided, that William King Stephens ſonne ſhould have the whole Earldome of Northfolke, excepting among other things, The third peny of that County, whereof Hugh Bigod was Earle. Whom notwithſtanding King Henrie the Second created Earle againe, of the third peny of Norfolke and Norwich. Who dying about the 27. yeere of Henrie the Second, Roger his ſonne ſucceeded, who, for what cauſe I know not, obtained at the hands of King Richard the Firſt a new Charter of his creation: Him ſucceeded his ſonne Hugh, who tooke to his wife Mawde the eldeſt daughter and one of the heires of William Mareſcall Earle of Pembroch. By whom he had iſſue one ſonne named Roger, Earle of Norfolke and Mareſcall of England, who at Tournament having his bones put out of joint, died without iſſue: and another, called Hugh Bigod Lord chiefe Iuſtice of England ſlaine in the battaile of Lewis: whoſe ſonne Roger ſucceeded his Vncle in the Earldome of Norfolke and dignity of Mareſcall: but having incurred through his inſolent contumacy the high diſpleaſure of King Edward the Firſt, was compelled to paſſe away his honors and well neere his whole inheritance into the Kings hands to the uſe of Thomas of Brotherton the Kings ſonne, whom he had begotten of his ſecond wife Margaret ſiſter to Philip the Faire, King of France. For thus reporteth the Hiſtorie, out of the Librarie of Saint Auſtens in Canterbury. In the yeere 1301. Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke ordained King Edward to be his heire: and he delivered into his hands the rod of the Marſhals office with this condition, that if his wife brought him any children he ſhould without all contradiction receive again all from the Ki. & hold it peaceably as before: and the King gave unto him 1000 pounds in money, and a thouſand pound land during his life, together with the Marſhalſhip, and the Earldome. But when he was departed this life without iſſue King Edward the Second, honored the ſaid Thomas of Brotherton his brother, according to the conveiance aforeſaid, with the Titles of Marſhall and Earle of Norfolke. Whoſe daughter Margaret called Marſhalleſſe and Counteſſe of Norfolke wife to Iohn Lord Segrave, King Richard the Second created in her abſence Dutcheſſe of Norfolke for terme of life: and the ſame day created Thomas Mowbray the daughters ſonne of the ſaid Margaret, then Earle of Notingham, the firſt Duke of Norfolke, To him and his heires males; unto whom he had likewiſe granted before the State and ſtile of Earle Marſhall of England. C D E F
Earles and Dukes of Norfolke.
Compoſition betwixt King Stephen and Henrie Duke Anjou.
Parliament 21 Rich. 2.

This is he, that before the King was challenged and accuſed by Henrie of Lancaſter Duke of Hereford, for vttering inconſideratly certaine reprochfull, and derogatorie words againſt the King. And when they were to fight a combat, at the very barre and entry of the Liſts, by the voice of an Herauld it was proclaimed in the Kings name, That both of them ſhould be baniſhed, Lancaſter for ten yeeres, and Mowbray for ever: who afterwards ended his life at Venice, leaving two ſonnes behind him in England.

Digitized by Google

A England. Of which, Thomas Earle Marſhall and of Nottingham, for no other title uſed he, was beheaded for ſeditious plotting againſt Henrie of Lancaſter, who now had poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Crowne by the name of King Henrie the Fourth. But his brother and heire Iohn, who through the favour of King Henrie the Fift was raiſed up, and for certaine yeeres after called onely Earle Marſhall and of Nottingham, at laſt in the very beginning of Henrie the Sixth his reigne, By authority of Parliament and by vertue of the patent granted by King Richard the Second, was declared, Duke of Norfolke, as being the ſonne of Thomas Duke of Norfolke his father, and heire to Thomas his brother. Rot. Parl. 1. Hen. 6.

B After him ſucceeded Iohn his ſonne, who died in the firſt yeere of Edward the fourth: and after him likewiſe Iohn his ſonne, who whiles his father lived was created by King Henrie the Sixth Earle of Surrie and of Warren. Whoſe onely daughter Anne, Richard Duke of Yorke, the young ſonne of King Edward the Fourth tooke to wife, and together with her received of his father the titles of Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marſhall, Earle of Warren and Nottingham. But after that he and his wife both were made away in their tender yeares, Richard the Third, King of England conferred this title of the Duke of Norfolke, and the dignity of Earle Marſhall upon Iohn Lord Howard, who was found next coſen in bloud & one of the heires to the ſaid Anne Dutcheſſe of Yorke and Norfolke; as whoſe mother was one of the daughters of that firſt Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke, and who in the time of King Edward the Fourth was ſummoned a Baron to the Parliament.

C This Iohn loſt his life at Boſworth field, fighting valiantly in the quarell of King Richard, againſt King Henrie the Seuenth. His ſonne Thomas, who being by King Richard the Third created Earle of Surrie, & by King Henrie the Seventh made Lord Treaſurer, was by Ki. Henrie the Eighth reſtored to the title of Duke of Norfolke, & his ſonne the ſame day created Earle of Surrie: after that by his conduct, Iames the Fourth, King of the Scots was ſlaine, and the Scotiſh power vanquiſhed at Branxton. In memoriall of which victorie the ſaid King granted to him and his heires males for ever, that they ſhould beare in the midſt of the Bend in the Howards Armes, the whole halfe of the vpper part of a Lyon Geules, pierced through the mouth with an arrow, in the due colours of the Armes of the King of Scots. Floddon field. p. 816.

D I tranſlate it Verbatim out of the Patent. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Thomas as well in his honours, as in the office of Lord Treaſurer of England, and lived to the time of Queene Marie, toſſed too and fro betweene the reciprocall ebbes and flowes of fortune, whoſe grand ſonne Thomas (by his ſonne Henrie, the firſt of the Engliſh nobility that did illuſtrate his high birth with the beauty of learning) being attainted for purpoſing a marriage with Marie the Queene of Scots, loſt his life in the yeere of our Lord 1572. and was the laſt Duke of Norfolke. Since which time his ofspring lay for a good while halfe dead: but now watered and revived with the vitall dew of King Iames, reflouriſheth very freſhly. See in the Adages of Hadrianus Iunius, Achilleum Votum.

E

In this Province there be Pariſh Churches about 660.

F

CAMBRIDGE.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A

CAMBRIDGE-SHIRE.

AMBRIGE-SHIRE, called in the English-Saxon Grentbrigrcyne lyeth more inward, and ſtretched out in length Northward. On the Eaſt it butteth upon Norfolke and Suffolk, on the South upon the Eaſt-Saxons or Eſſex, and Hertfordſhire, on the Weſt upon Bedford & Huntingdon ſhires, and Northward upon Lincoln-ſhire: being divided into two partes by the river Ouſe which croſſeth it overthwart from Weſt to Eaſt.

B

The lower and South-part is better manured, and therefore more plentifull, beeing ſome-what a plaine, yet not altogether levell, for the moſt part or all of it rather (ſaue onely where it bringeth forth ſaffron) is layd out into corne fields, and yeeldeth plentifully the beſt barly; of which ſteeped in water and lying wet therein untill it ſpurt againe, then, after the ſaid ſprout is full come, dried and parched over a kill, they make * ſtore of mault: By venting and ſending out whereof into the neighbour-countries, the inhabitants raiſe verie great gaine. The farther and Northren part, becauſe it is fenniſh ground,

*Byne. Mault.

C by reaſon of the many flouds that the rivers cauſe, and ſo diſperſed into Iſlands, is called The Iſle of Ely, a tract paſſing greene, freſh and gay by reaſon of moſt plenteous paſtures: howbeit after a ſort hollow, by occaſion of the water that in ſome places ſecretly entreth in; yea and other while when it overfloweth, ſurroundeth moſt part of it.

Along the Weſt ſide of the lower part, runneth one of the two high waies made by the Romans, (Ely booke calleth it Ermingſtreet) which paſſeth forth right to Huntingdon through Roiſton, that ſtandeth in the verie edge and entry of the Shire, a towne well knowne, yet but of late built, whereof I haue already ſpoken: alſo by Caxton in times paſt the ſeat of the Baronie of Stephen de Eſchallers, and from whoſe poſterity in the reigne of king Henry the Third it deſcended to the Frevills, and from Roiſton. See in Hertfordſhire. Caxton.

D them by the Burgoins to the Iermins. Neither is Gamlinghay far diſtant from hence, where dwelt the Avenells, whoſe inheritance came by marriage to the ancient familie of Saint George, (out of which there flouriſhed many knights ſince the time of king Henry the Firſt) at Hatley, which of them is called Hatley Saint George. Aboue Caxton before mentioned is Elteſley, where was in elder ages a religious houſe of holie Virgines; among whom was celebrated the incertaine memory of Saint Pandionia a daughter of a Scotiſh king, as the tradition is. But long ſince they were tranſlated to Hinchinbroke. And againe aboue Elteſley was the Priorie of Swaſey founded for Black monkes by Alan la Zouch brother to the Vicount of Rohan in the Leſſer Britaine, and was the common ſepulture a long time for the familie of Zouch.

Hatley Saint George.

*

E More Weſtward a little river runneth through the middle of this part, which iſſuing downe out of Aſhwel, haſteneth from South to North with many turnings, to joine it ſelfe with the Ouſe, running by Shengay (where be the goodlieſt medowes of this Shire) a Commanderie in old time of the knights Templars; which Shengay, Sibyl the daughter of Roger Mont-gomerie Earle of Shrewsbury, and wife of I. de Raines gaue unto them in the yeare 1130. nor far from Burne Caſtle, in ancient times the Baronie of Picot Sheriff of this Shire, and of the Peverels, from whom by one of the daughters, this and other poſſeſſions came unto Sir Gilbert Pech: the laſt of whoſe houſe, after he had otherwiſe advanced his children by his ſecond wife, ordeined King Edward the Shengay. A Commandery.

Burne. Barones de Burne.

Barnwell Hiſtorie. The King heire to private perſons.

F First, to bee his heire. For, in thoſe daies the Noble men of England brought into uſe againe the cuſtome of the Romans under their Emperours, which was to nominate them their heires, if they were in any diſfauour with their Soveraignes.

But in the Barons warre in King Henrie the Third his daies, this Caſtle was burnt downe, beeing ſet on fire by Ribald L' Iſle: At which time Walter de Cottenham a reſpective perſon, was hanged for rebellion.

Digitized by Google

By what name writers termed this river, it is a queſtion: ſome call it Granta, others Camus. And unto theſe I rather incline: both for that the courſe thereof is ſomewhat crooked; for, ſo much doth Cam in the Britiſh tongue ſignifie, whence a certaine crooked river in Cornwall is named Camel; and alſo becauſe that ancient towne CAMBORITVM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth in his third iourney of Britain, ſtood upon this river as I am well neere induced to beleeue, by the diſtance, by the name, and alſo by the peeces of Romane money found heere nigh unto the bridge in great ſtore. For, CAMBORITVM, ſignifieth A fourd at Camus, or a Fourd with crooked windings. For Rith in our Britiſh or Welſh tongue betokeneth A Fourd, which I note to this end, that the Frenchmen may more eaſilie perceive and ſee what is the meaning of Auguſtoritum, Darioritum, Rithomagus, and other ſuch like in France. Howbeit the Saxons choſe rather, to call our Camboritum, Grantceſter, Granta-ceaſtep and Granta-ceaſtep, which name it keepeth ſtill: but whence it was derived, I can not yet ſee. If I ſhould fetch it from Gron a Saxon word that ſignifieth a fenny place, I might perhaps goe wide: And yet Aſſerius termed, once or twice, certaine fenniſh and mariſh grounds in Somerſetſhire, by a mungrell name halfe Saxon and halfe Latine, Gronnas paludoſiſsimas: and verie well knowne it is, that a City in Weſt Friſland, which is ſituate in ſuch a ground is named Groningen. But let other hunt after the derivation of this name. About the yeare of Chriſt 700. this was a little deſolate City, as ſaith Bede, whiles hee reporteth, that neere unto the walles, there was found a little trough or coffin, very cunningly and finely wrought of marble, and covered moſt fitly with a lidde of the like ſtone. But now a ſmall village it is: one part whereof, Henrie Lacie Earle of Lincolne gaue unto his baſe ſonne Henrie, with this condition, that his ſonnes and their poſterity (which a good while ſince bee cleane worne out) ſhould haue no other Chriſtian name but Henry: the other part, Henrie the Sixth king of England comming out of the houſe of Lancaſter, into whoſe hands the patrimonie of Earle Lacie fell, granted unto his kings Colledge in Cambridge: which was either a part or elſe a plant of that ancient Camboritum, ſo nere it commeth unto it both in ſituation and name. Neither can I eaſily beleeue, that Grant was turned into Cam; for, this might ſeeme a deflexion ſome what too hardly ſtreined, wherein all the letters but one are quite ſwallowed up. I would rather thinke, that the common people reteined the terme of the ancient name of Camboritum, or of the river Cam, although writers uſed more often the Saxon name Grantbridge. This City which being the other Univerſity of England, the other eye, the other ſtrong-ſtaie, as it were, thereof, and a moſt famous mart & ſtore-houſe of good literature and Godlineſſe, ſtandeth upon the river Cam, which after it hath in ſporting wiſe beſprinkled the Weſt ſide thereof with many Iſlets, turning into the Eaſt, divideth it into two parts, and hath a bridge over it, whence aroſe this later name Cambridge. Beyond the bridge is ſeene a large & ancient Caſtle, which ſeemeth now to haue lived out his full time, & Maudlen College. On this ſide the bridge, where ſtandeth the greateſt part by far ſo the City, you haue a pleaſant ſight everywhere to the eye, what of faire ſtreets orderly raunged, what of a number of churches, and of 16. Colledges, ſacred manſions of the Muſes, wherein a number of great learned men are maintained, and wherein the knowledge of the beſt arts, and the skil in tongues ſo flouriſh, that they may be rightly counted the fountaines of literature, religion, & all knowledge whatſoever, who right ſweetly bedew and ſprinkle, with moſt holeſome waters the gardens of the Church and Common-wealth through England. Neither is there wanting any thing here, that a man may require in a moſt flouriſhing Vniverſitie, were it not that the ayre is ſomewhat unhealthfull ariſing as it doth out of a fenny ground hard by. And yet peradventure, they that firſt founded an Univerſity in that place, allowed of Platoes iudgement. For, he being of a verie excellent & ſtrong conſtitution of bodie choſe out the Academia, an unholſome place of Attica, for to ſtudie in, that ſo the ſuperfluous rankeneſſe of bodie which might overlaie the minde, might bee kept under by the diſtemperature of the place. Nevertheleſſe, for all this, our forefathers, men of ſingular wiſdome dedicated this place, and Camboritum.

Rith what it ſignifieth in Britiſh and French.

Granteceſter.

Cambridge.

A B C D E F

